Those who came to answer the call of nature, on seeing him, approached him and asked: “Venerable Sir, why are you standing like this with your mouth open?” “I live on air, there is no food for me other than air,” he replied boastfully. People went on asking: “Venerable Sir, why do you stand on one leg only, with one leg rested on the knee of the other one?” “I am a person engaged in rigorous austerity practices. When I stand with both my legs touching the ground, the earth cannot withstand my glories and attributes and trembles violently; that is why I stand in this posture. In truth (because of the earth quakes). I have got to stand on one leg night and day, without sitting down, without sleeping,” replied Jambuka with an air of ostentation.

(It is a general fact that people accept readily what others say; only few take the trouble to consider whether there is element of truth or not). So they said in admiration: “O Marvellous indeed it is! There are such personalities in the world who undertake severe practices. We have never before seen such personalities having such rigorous practices.” A great number of people from Anga and Magadha countries, agitated and excited by hearing the news of Jambuka's austerities, came together with offerings for him and continued paying him homage every month.

Jambuka suffering for Fifty-five Years

Jambuka went on rejecting delicious and wholesome food offered by people, maintaining: “I live on air only, I do not take any other food. If I do take any other thing than air, it means breach of my practice.” People beseeched him, repeatedly saying: “Venerable Sir, may you not deny us this opportunity to gain merit; if only a personality such as yours, well advanced in austerity practices, accept our offer of alms-food, will our prosperity and happiness grow and last long.” Jambuka was not interested in any food but excrements, but pressed by earnest requests of the people, he was obliged to taste such food as butter and molasses the people fetched, picking them up with the tip of a blade of grass, just to give them satisfaction. Then he dismissed them, saying: “Go ye now; this much will go far to do a great deal of good for you.”

Thus Jambuka had to pay for his offences against an arahat by suffering for fifty-five years in these four ways:

- (1) He could not put on any clothes.
- (2) He ate nothing except faeces.
- (3) He had to pull out his hair by using Palmyra seed shell.
- (4) He slept on the ground.

Emancipation of Naked Ascetic Jambuka

It is the usual function of Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddhas to survey the whole world at early dawn, every day, to see who are ready for liberation from the cycle of suffering. Thus, early one morning, the Omniscient Buddha, on surveying the world, perceived the person of Jambuka in His mind's eye. Upon further investigation, He discovered that Jambuka had already accumulated meritorious deeds which would serve as sufficing conditions for his attainment of arahatta-phala, complete with four fold Analytical Knowledge (patisambhida-ñāṇa). He also came to know that He would have to teach a verse sermon to the naked ascetic Jambuka, and that His Teaching will also bring about the realisation of the Four Noble Truths by eighty thousand sentient beings who will thus gain emancipation. “Because of this person Jambuka, thousands of people will come to achieve happiness.” Thus, after going round Rājagaha for alms-food, He informed the Venerable Ānanda: “My dear son, Ānanda, I will be going to see Jambuka.”

“Glorious Buddha, is it that you are going there alone,” asked Ānanda. “That’s right, Ānanda. I will go alone,” replied the Buddha and went to the place of Jambuka in the evening of that day.

The good devas considered: “The glorious Buddha is visiting the naked ascetic Jambuka this evening; but that naked ascetic’s abode is the great stone slab which is abominably filthy and smelly with accumulation of excrement, urine and discarded tooth cleaners of twigs. We should wash up the loathsome mess by a downpour of rain.” Thus they caused, by means of their supernatural power, the falling, at that very instant, of a torrential rain, which washed away all the filth and dirt from the stone slab, making it look spick and span. Then the devas caused the falling of flowers of five colours on the stone slab.

On arrival at the place of Jambuka in the evening, the Buddha called out the naked ascetic by his name ‘Jambuka’, who felt annoyed to be discourteously addressed ‘Jambuka’ by an unknown person who, he thought, must be a lowly one. He retorted angrily: “Who is that calling me by my name?” The Buddha replied: “I am a noble recluse.” Jambuka asked then: “What is that you want here?” When the Buddha said: “I wish you would allot Me a place to stay for one night.” Jambuka replied bluntly: “There is no place for you at this place.” But the Buddha insisted: “O Jambuka, please do not say like this; do allot Me a place to stay for one night. It is only natural that a recluse seeks help of a recluse, men expect help of men and beasts expect help of their own kind.” Whereupon the naked ascetic asked: “Are you, indeed, a recluse?” “Yes, I am a noble recluse,” answered the Buddha. Jambuka then queried: “If you are a recluse, where are the equipments of a recluse, such as gourd, ladle for stirring fire, sacrificial threads?” The Buddha replied: “I possess the equipments of a recluse you ask about; but thinking it is cumbersome to carry them separately while wandering around, I take them along only inside Me.” Jambuka was much annoyed and reproached the Buddha: “Being a recluse, how could you go wandering about without the necessary equipments of a recluse?” The Buddha made a gentle reply: “O Jambuka, let that be! Don’t be angry with Me. Just point out a place for Me.” But Jambuka gave the terse reply: “There is no place for you around here.”

There was a small valley close by Jambuka’s place and the Buddha asked: “Who stays there?” “No one,” replied Jambuka. “If so, I want that allotted to Me,” said the Buddha. Whereupon, Jambuka made a reply: “It is up to you to judge whether it is suitable or not,” implying that he had no objection for his occupation of the place but took no responsibility whatsoever.

The Buddha placed a small mattress at a spot in the valley and sat upon it. At the first watch of the night, four guardian devas from the Catumahārajika Deva realm came, illuminating the four points of the compass and waited upon the Buddha. When Jambuka saw the illumination he wondered what it could be. At the second watch of the night, Sakka, King of the devas, came to attend upon the Buddha and Jambuka remained puzzled as before. At the last watch of the night, when Mahā Brahmā who had the power of lighting one world with one finger of his, two worlds with two fingers, ten worlds with ten fingers, came to wait upon the Buddha, illuminating the whole forest, Jambuka pondered, as before: “Now, what could that illumination be!”

When the morning came, Jambuka approached the Buddha and after courteous exchange of greeting, sat down at an appropriate place and addressed Him: “O big recluse, who were those that came to you, in the first watch of the night, lighting up the four points of the compass?” “Jambuka, they were the four guardian devas of the Catumahārajika Deva realms,” He replied. “Why did they come?” asked Jambuka. “They came to pay homage and wait upon Me,” was the reply. Jambuka asked again: “O big recluse, how is that? Are you superior to them?” “Yes, Jambuka, that’s right, I am superior to them,” replied the Buddha.

The naked ascetic Jambuka asked again: “O big recluse, who was the one that arrived in the middle watch of the night?” “He was Sakka, King of the devas,” replied the Buddha.

“And why did he come?” asked Jambuka. The Buddha replied: “He came to pay homage to Me and attend upon Me.” Jambuka asked again, “O big recluse, how is that? Are you superior to Sakka also?” “Yes, Jambuka,” replied the Buddha, “I am superior to Sakka also; Sakka is just like a nurse attending on Me or a resident novice who looks after Me.”

Jambuka went on asking the Buddha: “O big recluse, who was he that came in the last watch of the night, flooding the whole forest with his body radiance?” “Jambuka, the one who came in the last watch of the night was none other than Mahā Brahmā whose name is often invoked by brahmins and others uttering: ‘I worship the Great Brahmā’ when they suddenly sneeze or loose balance and totter.” Jambuka asked again: “O big recluse, how is that? Are you superior to Mahā Brahmā too?” “Yes, Jambuka, I am the King of Brahmās, superior to Mahā Brahmā as well.”

Then the ascetic Jambuka made his usual boastful remark: “O big recluse, you are worthy of admiration indeed, by the snapping of fingers. None of those persons have ever come to pay homage to me at this place where I have been practising austerities for fifty-five years. True! for the last fifty- five years I have been sustaining myself only on air; and all along those years, these devas, Sakka and Brahmās have never approached me and paid homage to me.”

Whereupon, the Buddha gave Jambuka a very plain talk: “O Jambuka, you, who have been playing a game of bluff with persons of poor intelligence, think of playing the same game with Me! Have you not been eating filth for the past fifty-five years, sleeping on the bare ground, wandering round naked, extracting hair by means of a shell of Palmyra seed? And yet you have been deceiving all the people, telling them: ‘I only live on air, standing on one leg without sitting down and sleeping’; and now you wish to play the same trick on a Fully Awakened Buddha like Me!”

“O Jambuka, because you had professed this vile, base heretical view you have to be living on filth, sleeping on bare ground, roaming naked, extracting hair with the shell of Palmyra fruit seed (for all these years experiencing intense suffering); and yet you are still holding this wretched, low heretical view.”

Then Jambuka asked the Buddha: “O big recluse, what kind of unwholesome deeds have I committed?” Whereupon, the Buddha explained to him extensively various misdeeds he had done in the past. While the Buddha was giving him the discourse, Jambuka was assailed by remorse, sense of shame and dread of consequences of his past misdeeds; he was shaken so much that he squatted down to conceal parts of his body.

Whereupon, the Buddha threw a bathing robe to him. Jambuka put on the robe and sat down at a suitable place making obeisance to Him. Then the Buddha expounded a graduated discourse touching on points connected with alms-giving (dāna-katha), moral conduct (sīla-katha), etc., and finally the Four Noble Truths. At the end of discourse, Jambuka attained arahatship, complete with the Four Analytical Wisdom (patisambhida-ñāṇa). He stood up from his seat and worshipping the Buddha, made a request for formal admission as a novice and ordination as a bhikkhu.

(N.B. Thus, the ill-effects of the unwholesome deeds which he had committed in the past, had ceased. To elaborate: For his offence against an arahat-bhikkhu during the Buddha Kassapa’s Dispensation, (as stated above) he had suffered intensely, being burnt and incinerated in the lowest Hell of Avīci for a duration of time, long enough for the earth to rise to a height of one yojana and three gavutas. And after that, for the amount of retribution still outstanding against him, he had to make his expiation by going through fifty-five years of wretched, abominable inhuman life. Having thus paid off his debts of evil deeds, the consequences of his past misdeeds have become exhausted.

But his accumulation of merit, which he had earned by observance of moral precepts as a bhikkhu for twenty thousand years, remained undisturbed by his evil deeds.

Therefore, when Jambuka requested for initiation and ordination, the Buddha stretched out His right hand and called out: “Ehi bhikkhu, carabrahmacariyam samma dukkhassa antakiriya — Come bhikkhu, (accept the monkhood that you wish) strive to take up the three noble practices which form the moral training in my Disposition, in order to bring about the end of round of suffering.” At that moment, Jambuka turned into a full-fledged monk like a senior thera of sixty years, readily robed and equipped with the eight requisites.

On the very day when Jambuka attained arahatship, people from Anga and Magadha visited him with offering to pay homage. When they saw the Buddha, and began to wonder: “How is that? Is our teacher Jambuka superior to the great recluse Gotama or is the great recluse Gotama superior to our teacher Jambuka?” Then they wrongly surmised that since the great recluse had come to the presence of their teacher, their teacher Jambuka must be superior to the recluse Gotama.

The Buddha knew what was in the minds of the people, and He told Jambuka: “Dear son Jambuka, you might yourself remove the doubt from the minds of your followers.” Jambuka replied: “Most Exalted Buddha, it has also been my intention to do so,” and so saying, he entered into the fourth jhāna. Then rising up from his seat, he went up into the air to the height of a palm tree from where he addressed the Buddha: “Glorious Buddha, You, the Exalted Buddha, are my teacher, I am but a disciple of Yours.” Then he came down to the earth and after paying homage to the Buddha, rose up in the air again. He repeated the same performance seven times, going up higher and higher, to the height of two palm trees, three palm trees, etc., up to the height of seven palm trees. In this manner, he had made it very clear to the assembled crowd that he was just a disciple of the Buddha.

On seeing these strange phenomena, people were struck with wonder and said: “O Buddhas are worthy of admiration by the snapping of fingers; they are glorious and there is no equal to them.” The Buddha, being desirous of holding discussion with the masses on Dhamma subjects addressed them:

“O lay devotees, Jambuka has lived here for the last fifty-five years telling you ostentatiously: ‘I have been exercising self-denial, eating only what is picked by the tip of a blade of grass out of the whole lot of offering you have brought.’ Supposing, he continued on with this practice of self-denial till it reached one hundred years, and certain amount of merit accrued on that score. Such a measure of merit to his credit would not be worth even 1/256 part of the merit he would earn by refusing to take any food now as a noble ariya, through having some doubt whether the food and the time it is offered is allowable or not allowable.” Then the Buddha expounded the following Dhamma stanza which was pertinent to what He had been telling the people:

bālo bhuñjeyya bhojanam na so sankhātadhammanam
kalan agghati solasim*

Even though, month after month (or once a month) the fool (who does not know the Four Noble Truths) bent on living in austerity, takes his food sparingly by picking it up on the tip of a grass blade for one hundred years; he is not even worth, one part out two hundred and fifty-sixth (1/256) part of ariya who have comprehended the Four Noble Truths.

The stanza was expounded with reference to a particular individual, namely Jambuka. When considered in its generic sense:

- (1) There is the volition (cetana), which arises when ignorant heretical recluse practises self-sacrifice for as long as one hundred years.
- (2) There is the volition (cetana), which arises when an ariya who comprehends the Four Noble Truths, refuses an offer of food through having some doubt whether the food and the time it is offered is allowable or not allowable.

Of the two types of cetanas mentioned above, the cetanas accumulated by the heretical recluse for as long as one hundred years is not worth 1/256 part of the cetana that arose when an ariya refused food through doubt over the food and the time it was offered.

To explain further: The amount of merit accruing from cetana occasioned by mere doubt on the part of an ariya recluse as to the kind of food and the time it is offered, entailing the loss of a meal for him, is 256 times greater than the sum of merit gained by a heretical recluse through his faulty practice of self-denial for a hundred years.

At the close of the discourse, eighty-four thousand sentient beings gained release from the cycle of suffering through realization of the Four Noble Truths<sup>3</sup>.

FOUNDING OF VESALI

Long time ago, the Chief Queen of King of Bārāṇasī conceived a child. The Queen brought this news to the King and he appointed sufficient number of maids of honour to attend on the Queen for the duration of her pregnancy. The Queen lived with ease and comfort, carefully tending the embryo in her womb, and entered the maternity chamber in due time of time.

It is taken to be a natural fact that ladies of high social status, enjoying the fruits of past meritorious deeds, usually give birth to children at early dawn of the morning.

The Queen, being one of such ladies of elite class, gave birth at early dawn, to a lump of flesh as red as hibiscus rosa sinensis flower or lac. The queen thought to herself: “The king would surely remark: ‘Other queens give birth to children who resemble golden statues; but this Chief Queen of mine gave birth to a lump of flesh’ and I shall fall down in disgrace before the King.” Wishing to avoid disgrace of losing favour and dignity, she had the lump of flesh put into a cup covered by another cup and caused it to be thrown into the current of the river Ganges.

Miraculous events took place, the moment the cup containing the lump of flesh left the human hands, it was taken charge by the devas who placed it securely in the cup, a gold plate, on which were inscribed in vermilion the words: “These are the sons born of the Chief Queen of the King of Bārāṇasī.” Protected by the guardian devas, the cup floated along smoothly with the current, undisturbed by billows and swelling tides.

At that time, a hermit was residing close by the river Ganges depending on a village of cowherds for alms-food. When he went to the river early one morning, he saw a cup floating down the stream and recovered it as an object discarded by someone up stream. He saw the royal insignia stamped on the covering cup and discovered the gold lettered plate and the lump of flesh on opening the cup. As soon as the hermit saw the lump of flesh, he opined that the the lump of flesh must be in embryo stage since it raised no foul odour. He brought it to his hut and kept it in a clean corner.

After a lapse of fifteen days, the lump of flesh was seen to have divided into two separate units. The hermit took greater care of the object on seeing these strange developments. In another fortnight's time, each lump was found to have bulged in five places where the head, two arms and two legs would appear. The hermit attended to them with greater care than before. In another fifteen days time, one was transformed into a boy with golden body and the other into a girl with a golden body.

The love developed by the hermit for the infant boy and girl was so intense that it was like that of a parent for his own offsprings. The two thumbs of the hermit turned into fountains from which milk gushed out. From then onwards, the hermit received gruel cooked with milk from the village of the cowherds (by virtue of the babies' merit). The hermit ate the solid portion of gruel and fed the babies with the fluid that remained. Whatever went inside their bodies could be seen like objects going through a glass vessel. They were therefore named 'Licchavi'<sup>1</sup> after their soft, delicate, thin skin.

Having to attend to the babies, the hermit could go to the village for alms-round only very late in the morning and he had to return to his hermitage in a hurry. When the villagers came to know about his worries, they addressed the hermit: “Venerable sir, looking after the babies is a great hindrance to the observance of the precepts and incumbent on recluses. May you hand the babies over to our care. We will relieve you of the burden of looking after them, then you could attend to your Dhamma practice without any obstruction.” The hermit agreed to their request, saying: “Yes, you may.”

On the following day, the villagers made the roads smooth, level and clean, scattered flowers on it and after planting streamers and banners on the sides of the road, gathered at the hermitage playing various kinds of musical instruments, to receive the children from the hermit. The hermit then gave them words of advice: “Lay devotees, these babies are of great power and glory (because of their great accumulation of past merits). Bring them up with much care, attention and heed till they come of age; and arrange for their matrimonial ceremony when they come of age. Go to the King of Bārāṇasī and having paid him tributes of milk, curds, ghee, butter milk, butter (five kinds of produce of the cow, gorasa), make a request to him to grant you some land for the founding of a city. Then having rounded the city, appoint this young man your king, holding the coronation ceremony in the new city.” With this advice the hermit handed over the babies to the care of the villagers. After giving him the promise to follow his advice, the villagers took away the babies and brought them up in accordance with the instructions given by the hermit.

When they grew up, they played together with the children of the cowherds. But whenever there was dispute while at play, they beat and kicked their playmates. When the parents saw their children crying, they asked them why they were crying. The children would reply: “The two orphans, cared for by the hermit, beat and kicked us.” Even the adopted parents of the two children, along with other villagers, rebuked them, making remarks, such as: “These two children bully our children; they are too troublesome. We should not gratify them; we should avoid the pair of brother and sister.” Ever since that time, the region measuring thirty yojanas where the cowherds village was situated was known as ‘Vajjī country.’<sup>2</sup>

In due time, the cowherds approached the king, as instructed by the hermit, with offerings consisting of five ‘gorasa’ and requested for the allotment of a place and founded a city there. As the boy had reached the age of sixteen, he was crowned as king of the region. This was followed by a matrimonial ceremony in honour of the two youths. The people of the region agreed then to make a ruling that, no woman from other place should be made their queen, and none of their women should be given away in marriage to those outside of their country.

The crowned King and the Queen produced their offsprings in due time, the Queen giving birth to a pair of twins, one male and female for the first time. The Queen gave birth to twins in like manner for sixteen times in all. When those children came of age, they, in turn, gave birth to twins for sixteen times each.

The population of the city grew rapidly, so much so, that there was no longer sufficient land in the city to accommodate all the princes and princesses with their palaces, pleasure parks and their large retinues. Therefore, the city had to be extended by one gāvuta each on all four sides, entailing the construction of a second walling to enclose the whole city.

After a long time, the growth of the city, in like manner, demanded further extension to meet the requirements of the increasing number of royal families. As before, it was extended again by one gāvuta each on all four sides with the construction of another walling round the entire city. As years rolled by, the city had to be extended again by one gāvuta on all four sides in the same way for the third time. Thus the city grew and flourished with the march of time. It came to be known far and wide as the city of Vesali, throughout the southern sphere of the universe, Jambudīpa.

This section gives an account of the origin of the nomenclatures, such as Licchavi Kings, the Vajji country and the City of Vesali (as given in the Khuddakapāṭha Commentary and Sarattha dipani tika).

2. Based on the words uttered by the villagers including the foster parents of the two children cared for by the hermit, namely, Vajjetabba Ime = we should avoid these two, the brother and sister. The region, measuring thirty yojanas came to be known as Vajji country.

Buddha gave Protection and Peace to The City by teaching Ratana Sutta

Vesali city was thriving and prosperous, like its contemporaries Rājagaha and Savatthi, in the time of Buddha Gotama. At that time, the city was inhabited by seven thousand seven hundred and seven reigning monarchs, each with their crown princes, generals of the army, finance ministers, and various officials, each of them numbering seven thousand seven hundred and seven. For their accommodation, there were seven thousand palaces and mansions with decorated terraced roofing and equal number of Law courts, assembly halls, gardens, pleasure parks and lakes. The city was thickly populated and food was abundant.

As years rolled by, the rulers and the ruled of the city failed to observe their bounden duties (aparihāniya-dhamma)<sup>3</sup>.

They eventually fell victims to disaster, such as drought, poor harvest, shortage of food, famine, etc.

The First Disaster

This disaster had caused a great number of deaths from amongst the poor people. Dead bodies, thrown everywhere out of the city, were soon becoming in various stages of decomposition and raise foul ordour. Such a condition gave the opportunity for evil spirits (ogres) to enter the city and play havoc with the people.

The Second Disaster

Disastrous famine together with evil influence of ogres brought about more deaths and suffering. To make matters worse, there occurred an epidemic of an infectious disease known as snake-windsickness (ahivata roga), which shook the morale of the people and took a heavier toll than before.

The Third Disaster

The citizens, reeling under the continuous shocks of the three disasters, namely, the famine disaster, the havoc caused by the evil spirits and the outbreak of the epidemic, went to the king and made the following address:

“Your Majesty, the city of Vesali is facing three kinds of scourges; no such disaster had ever occurred during the reigns of the immediate past seven kings. The consensus of opinion now is that such disasters are brought about by the negligence of duty on the part of the sovereign rulers.”

The King then caused all the citizens to assemble at the Court of Law and addressed them: “Citizens, you may hold an inquest to find out if there was any failures on my part in the discharge of my royal duties towards my people.” On systematic inquiry of all the daily performances of the King, people found that there was nothing wanting on the part of his Majesty, in the discharge of his duties towards his people. They then put their heads together to find a way to overcome the disasters that had fallen on them.

The disciples of the six teachers of heretical sects suggested that the city of Vesali would be rid of the three scourges as soon as the six heretic teachers set foot in the city. But some of the citizens (who had faith in the Three Jewels) said: “Friends, it is said that Buddha has appeared in the world. He is said to have expounded Dhamma for the welfare and prosperity of all beings. He is powerful and glorious. Our city may be free from all disasters once He is in our city.”

All the people were delighted with the proposal. But some people wanted to know the whereabouts of the Buddha and expressed their doubt: “He may not care to come here even if we invite Him.” Whereupon, some intelligent persons expressed their optimistic view:

“Buddhas are always helpful and have compassion for sentient beings; so why wouldn't He come if we invite Him? There is however, one thing to note. The

3. Aparihāniya dhamma: Factors of non-decline, discourse taught to Vajji princes by the Buddha in order to maintain their prosperity and welfare. For full particulars reference may be made to Mahāparibbana Sutta, Mahā Vagga, Digha Nikāya.

Buddha is now residing in Rājagaha; King Bimbisāra (a sotāpanna and donor of the monastery) is attending upon Him, providing Him with four requisites. He might stand in the way of Buddha's coming to our city.”

The people unanimously decided that ‘they should approach King Bimbisāra and acquaint him with the circumstances they now faced with and, with his approval, should request the Buddha to make a visit to Vesali.’ Accordingly, they sent two Licchavi princes to Rājagaha with the responsibility of meeting King Bimbisāra of Rājagaha, carrying with them numerous gifts for him and accompanied by armed guards and troops.

The two princes arrived at Rājagaha and having presented the valuable gifts to King Bimbisāra, they then told him the situation in their city and the reason why they had been sent to Rājagaha and made the request: “May your Majesty present this request, on our behalf, to the Buddha to visit Vesali.” The King did not comply with their request, but advised them: “You should approach the Buddha yourself and enquire as to the Buddha's intention.”

The two Licchavi princes then went to the Buddha and addressed Him with profound respect: “The Glorious Buddha, our city of Vesali is being visited by three calamities. If out of compassion, you would kindly make a visit to Vesali, it will be a blessing to all of us, the citizens of Vesali.”

Upon kind consideration of their request, the Buddha perceived: “The recitation and preaching of Ratana Sutta in Vesali would bring one hundred thousand crores of universes under protection against diseases; and at the end of the discourse, eighty-four thousand sentient beings would be emancipated through realization of the Four Noble Truths.” He, therefore, accepted the reverential invitation of the two Licchavi princes.

King Bimbisāra's Preparation for A Ceremonial Send-off.

On hearing the news of acceptance by the Buddha of the invitation to visit Vesali, King Bimbisāra caused it to be proclaimed all over the city: “Know, ye, all men, the Buddha has accepted the invitation to visit the city of Vesali.” He then went to the Buddha and asked: “Most Exalted Buddha, have you accepted the invitation of the citizens of Vesali?” The Buddha replied: “Yes, I have accepted, your Majesty.” “If that be so, may the Buddha wait till all necessary preparations for ceremonial send-off are completed.”

Then King Bimbisāra caused the road between Rājagaha and the river Ganges which was five yojanas in length, to be levelled and made even, and temporary pavilions were set up at every yojana along the route. When the Buddha was then informed that everything was set, He started the journey in the company of five hundred bhikkhus.

The five yojanas long route was strewn with flowers of five different colours up to knee height, colourful streamers were erected along the route, pots filled with water and plantain trees were placed in order on either side of the road. Two white umbrellas protected the Buddha from the weather; likewise every bhikkhu was protected by a white umbrella each. The King and his retinue of courtiers and army made offerings with flowers and scents along the route and at every stop, giving the Buddha and the company of bhikkhus enough time to take rest. After a comfortable journey of five days, the whole procession reached the bank of the Ganges.

While the Royal barge was in the process of being decorated, King Bimbisāra sent a written intimation to the Licchavi rulers, saying: “The Buddha is en route to Vesali; necessary arrangements should be made to keep the roads in a good state of preservation, for a grand reception of the Buddha and His bhikkhus by all the Licchavi rulers.”

When the members of Licchavi clan received the good news, they unanimously made the decision to organise a welcoming ceremony which should be twice as grand as the reverence shown by King Bimbisāra. They levelled the roads between Vesali and the bank of River Ganges which was three yojanas. They kept four white umbrellas for the Buddha and two white umbrellas each for every bhikkhu accompanying the Buddha. The whole city came out in a grand procession to the bank of the River Ganges to await the arrival of the Buddha.

In the meanwhile, King Bimbisāra caused two big boats to be kept side by side and firmly tied together to form a huge barge. On the top of it was erected a pavilion, which was decorated profusely with bouquets of flowers and scents, suspended wreaths of flowers fashioned like a fan; inside the pavilion was installed the throne for the Buddha. It was studded with seven kinds of precious jewels. On arrival at the bank of the River Ganges, the Buddha and His bhikkhus went aboard the royal barge; the Buddha took seat on the throne and the bhikkhus took seats at appropriate places.

After conducting the Buddha and His bhikkhus to the barge, Bimbisāra went down the Ganges river up to his neck, and holding the barge, addressed the Buddha: “Most Glorious Buddha, I will be waiting for Your return, from the bank of this River Ganges,” and he gently released the royal barge from his hand as he came out of water.

Celestial beings of the deva-world, including the Brahmās of Akanittha Brahmā realm, paid honour to the Buddha. Similarly, beings from the lower planes, such as Kamhala Naga King and Assatara Naga King, also paid their homage to the Buddha.

Thus, amidst great festive celebrations, devas and humans vying with one another in paying honour to the Buddha while He was being conducted across the Ganges, measuring one yojana from bank to bank, until eventually He entered the territory of the Vesali rulers.

The Buddha was received on the opposite bank of Ganges by the Licchavis who were ready waiting for His arrival. They honour the Buddha twice as much as that of King Bimbisāra had shown, going down the deep river up to their neck to welcome Him with profound respect.

Pokkhravasa rain fell as soon as The Buddha stepped ashore

As soon as the royal barge carrying the Buddha reached the opposite bank of the river, wave after wave of dark rain clouds gathered from all sides, accompanied by flashes of lightning and deafening roar of thunder, presaging a violent thunderstorm. The setting of Buddha’s right foot on the bank of the river was marked by falling of torrential Pokkharavasa rain which wetted those who wished to get wet, leaving alone those not wanting to get soaked. Streams of rain water with varying depths, ranging from the depth of the knee to the waist, the chest and to the neck, rushed all over the city of Vesali, washing away smelly dead bodies which were left unattended, as they flowed into the river Ganges. The whole city became clean once again, free from rubbish of all descriptions.

The Licchavis conducted the Buddha from the river bank to Vesali, three yojanas away, amidst enthusiastic masses and festivities, stopping one night at every pavilion which were constructed at one yojana intervals. On the way, offerings were made which were twice as much as shown by King Bimbisāra. Finally the Buddha arrived at Vesali after three days.

When the Buddha arrived at Vesali, Sakka accompanied by devas came down from their celestial planes to pay homage to Him. The congregation of powerful devas at Vesali caused most of the ogres (who had hitherto played havoc with the citizens) to flee the city.

The Buddha stood at the city gate and gave instructions to the Venerable Ānanda:

“Dear Ānanda, after learning this Ratana Sutta from Me, you should recite it within the three walls of the city as a preventive measure, (Paritta), going round the city accompanied by the Licchavi princes who should be instructed to carry in their hands offertories.”

Preventive Measures taken by The Venerable Ananda by The Recitation of Paritta

Having learned the Ratana Sutta from the Buddha at the gate of Vesali on the very day of arrival, the Venerable Ānanda went round within the three walls of the city reciting it rhythmically, with correct intonation, pronunciation, accent and punctuation. He took with him as he went round, the Buddha’s alms-bowl, filled with water which he sprinkled all over the city.

As soon as Venerable Ānanda started reciting the first stanza of the sutta with the words, ‘Yamkiñci vittam’ those ogres, ghosts, ghouls, goblins, demons who had not yet fled the city but had remained taking shelter under garbage dumps or clinging to the walls, etc., made off in great haste through the four city gates. As the gates got jammed with fleeing evil spirits, some of them were forced to break through the walls of the city. With the fleeing of brute beings from the city, those who had suffered from their evil influences, regained their health and all pestilences disappeared. These citizens came out from their houses, with bunches of flowers and scents, and paid homage to the Venerable Ānanda.

The Buddha expounded The Ratana Sutta at The Legislative Assembly Hall of The City

The King and the citizens decorated the Legislative Assembly Hall in the heart of the city with garlands of flowers and scents, setting up a canopied ceiling with studded ornament. Then they installed the throne for the Buddha in a proper place and conducted Him to the Hall. The Buddha took His seat on the throne while the bhikkhus, kings and princes, and citizens sat at appropriate places. Then Sakka, accompanied by the devas of the two celestial realms of Catumahārājika and Tāvātimsa as well as Brahmās and other devas, also arrived to pay homage to the Buddha.

The Venerable Ānanda, having taken preventive measures by reciting the Paritta all over Vesali, arrived at the City Hall with the crowd of citizens and they all took seats at suitable places.

At this huge gathering of devas, humans and Brahmās, the Buddha gave the same discourse of Ratana Sutta<sup>4</sup>, (which He had taught Ānanda).

(N.B. The Ratana Sutta text which the Buddhist public see, read and study nowadays is made up of three sections:

- (a) The portion beginning with ‘Panidhānato pathāya...’ up to ‘Parittam taṃ bhanāmahe’ is the preface in prose and verse composed by scholars of the ancient past.
- (b) Fifteen stanzas, beginning from ‘Yanidha bhūtāni samagātāni...’ to ‘Khinam purānam nava natthi sambhavam...’ are the original Pāli text expounded by the Buddha.
- (c) The last three, ‘Yanidha bhutani samāgatāni...’ etc. were uttered by the Sakka at the congregation.)

At the conclusion of discourse on the Ratana Sutta on the first day, the Licchavi royal families together with all the citizens of Vesali were freed from suffering and gained happiness; all kinds of dangers and pestilence were removed and peace was restored. Eighty-four thousand sentient beings were emancipated through realizing the Four Noble Truths.

It dawned upon Sakka then: “The Buddha had brought happiness and prosperity to the people of Vesali by speaking words of Truth about the attributes of the Three Jewels, I should also utter words of Truth concerning the virtues of the Three Jewels for the welfare of the citizens of Vesali.” He therefore rose to recite the three stanzas, ‘Yānidha bhūtāni samagātāni...’ etc., which appear at the end of the Sutta.

The Buddha continued to expound The Ratana Sutta for Seven Days

After reciting the three stanzas, Sakka paid homage to the Buddha by circumambulating Him three times and left for the world of devas accompanied by his celestial followers. But the Buddha went on expounding the Sutta on the second day when eighty-four thousand sentient beings were again emancipated through realizing the Four Noble Truths. In this way, the Buddha continued to expound the same sutta for seven days in succession, emancipating eighty-four thousand sentient beings on each day.

The Fundamental Principle of Administering Paritta Recitation

4. This Ratana Sutta text with full exposition is dealt with in the chapter on the Jewel of Dhamma.

Paritta means “the Buddha’s word,” otherwise known as Sutta, which serves as a protective measure, dispelling all forms of danger from all quarters: Pacifying and making those dangers presently arising, to cease and disappear and preventing the impending dangers from arising at all.

Maṅgala Sutta, Ratana Sutta, etc. are discourses taught by the Buddha, and they are powerful enough to protect both the reciter and the listener from impending danger, and also to repel or disperse the danger presently operating. They have special attributes of bringing wellbeing and prosperity; hence they have the special name of Paritta.

In order to bring about such beneficial effects, it is necessary that the reciter should have the four accomplishments and the listener should also possess the four accomplishments as set out below:

(a) Four accomplishments of a reciter<sup>5</sup>.

- (1) The reciter must be capable of reciting passages, phrases, syllables of the Pāli text with correct mode of articulation, enunciation, and accent.
- (2) He must have full and exact understanding of the Pāli text he is reciting.
- (3) The reciter should chant paritta without expectation of gifts or presents.
- (4) Paritta should be recited with a pure heart full of loving-kindness and compassion.

Paritta should be recited only with the fulfilment of these conditions so as to be really effective in warding off and dispelling the impending dangers to the listener. Unless these conditions are fulfilled by the reciter, no beneficial results will accrue and no advantages gained as intended by reciting a paritta.

The above modes of reciting and listening paritta are prescribed on the lines laid down in the Digha Nikāya Commentary. Systematic study and scrutiny of words and phrases should be made, proper attention being paid to the understanding of Pāli terms employed. Unless proper attention is paid to study correct enunciation and meaning of the Pāli Text, the chances of securing the desired result are remote. Only recitation by those who have carefully studied the modes of reciting will bear powerful effects. Recitation of parittas by those with intention to receive gifts or offerings will not produce any real result. Recitation of paritta by those with hearts full of loving-kindness and compassion and with an inclination towards freedom from cycle of suffering will be advantageous.

[NB. Therefore, one who administers paritta must first and foremost study the Pāli Text, together with relevant Commentaries, under a qualified teacher, special attention being paid to mode of enunciation, accent and punctuation. Any omission or deletion of words, phrases from the Pāli Text may render the recitation altogether meaningless. Correct mode of recitation with full understanding of its meaning are the vital forces of the paritta which will bring about the desired result. Mistakes in the way of administration, lack of correct enunciation and understanding of its true meaning, coupled with a desire to receive something in return, will undermine the strength of the paritta and no desirable result will be obtained.

It must, therefore, be emphasised that it is necessary to administer paritta according to the conditions laid down, with a heart full of loving-kindness, and compassion and resolute inclination towards release from the samsāra and curbing one’s desire to receive offerings.]

(A) Failure and Success of One who administers Paritta

Failure of one who administers paritta arises from two causes, namely, Payoga vippatti and Ajjhāsaya vippatti.

- (1) Payoga vippatti means inability to express words and phrases of all Text with accuracy and exactness and full understanding of their meanings, through lack of effort and

5. The author gives two versions: 3 accomplishments and 4 accomplishments. As, the second version includes the first version also, we translate only the second version of 4 accomplishments.

(2) Ajjhāsaya vippatti means administration of paritta with a desire for gains and fame.

Success of one who administers paritta arises from two causes, namely Payoga sampatti and Ajjhāsaya sampatti.

(1) Payoga sampatti means proficiency in administering paritta through diligence, through learning correct modes of enunciation and with full understanding of the meaning.

(2) Ajjhāsaya sampatti means proficiency in administering paritta through loving-kindness, compassion with an inclination towards emancipation and without selfish motive for rewards.

(B) Four Accomplishments of A Listener

(1) The listener should be free from the guilt of five grave transgressions which bring immediate retribution (pañcanantariya kamma), namely,

- (a) killing father
- (b) killing mother
- (c) killing an arahat
- (d) causing bleeding in an attempt on Buddha's life
- (e) causing schism amongst the disciples of a Buddha.

(2) The listener should be free from wrong views with fixed destiny (Niyata-micchaditthi)<sup>6</sup>.

(3) The listener should possess unshakable faith in the efficacy and beneficial results of paritta.

(4) The listener should listen to the paritta recitation with due diligence, full attention and profound respect.

These are the qualifications which should be possessed by a listener of paritta; in Milinda Panha Pāli Text (Chapter on Mendaka Panha, and on Pasamutti Panha) are mentioned the first three accomplishments as follows: “Your Majesty, hindrances, such as (a) the five grave transgressions, (b) wrong views or heretical beliefs and (c) non-confidence in the paritta, cannot serve as a means of protection against dangers.” These are the words of the Venerable Nagasena spoken to King Milinda. In view of this, it must be concluded that those, who are free from the three hindrances, stand to enjoy the benefit of the paritta.

Failure and Success of One who listens to Paritta Recitation

Failure of one who listens to the paritta arises from two causes, namely, Payoga vippatti and Ajjhāsaya vippatti.

(1) Payoga vippatti means failure to listen to the paritta recitation with due respect, raising the palms together; with one's mind fixed on the paritta without any distractions, through lack of diligence and effort.

(2) Ajjhāsaya vippatti means listening to the paritta half-heartedly, without confidence in the efficacy and the beneficial result of paritta; listening to the paritta just to oblige and please the person who invites one to the ceremony of paritta recitation.

Success of one who listens to the paritta arises from two causes, namely, Payoga Sampatti and Ajjhāsaya Sampatti.

(1) Payoga Sampatti means making necessary effort in listening to the paritta recitation by raising the hands with palms together with profound respect and with one's mind fixed on the paritta without any distractions.

6. Niyata-micchaditthi; Uncausedness of existence (ahetuka-ditthi); Inefficacy of action (akiriya-ditthi); Nihilism (natthika-ditthi). (See Buddhist Dictionary by Nānatiloka).

- (2) Ajjāsaya Sampatti means listening to the paritta wholeheartedly, with full confidence in the efficacy and beneficial result of listening to the paritta, not just to oblige and please the person who invites one to listen to the paritta but with wholesome desire to gain merit.

Listeners of the paritta should abandon the two factors of vippatti as mentioned above and strive to be accomplished in the two sampattis, so as to secure the true of benefit of protection from impending dangers.

Just as the paritta reciter has to abandon the two factors of failure and to become accomplished in the two factors of success, so also the listener has to do likewise.

Parittas that possess Unique Power

- (1) Ratana Sutta is possessed of power which extends over one hundred thousand crores of world-systems. It has brought about the realization of magga-phala nāṇa and attainment of Nibbāna by five lakhs eighty-eight thousand devas, humans and Brahmās. It is therefore a ward-rune or paritta of great authority or influence.
- (2) Maṅgala Sutta is also possessed of power which extends over one hundred thousand crores of world-systems. Innumerable number of devas, humans and Brahmās have realised magga-phala-nāṇa and attained Nibbāna through listening to this sutta.
- (3) Mettā Sutta is a well known sutta of great power. Its authority extends over one hundred thousand crores of world-systems. It had helped forest dwelling bhikkhus attain arahatship, through extinction of āsavas. By assiduously and fully cultivating the moral instructions laid down in this sutta, one can assuredly gain the Path to emancipation. It is also a powerful paritta too.
- (4) Khandha Sutta is another powerful sutta, the authority of which extends over one hundred thousand crores of world-systems. It has the power to ward off dangers from various poison at all times. This sutta contains certain portions that describe the virtues and glories of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha and also the good effects of loving-kindness (mettā). Thus it is a powerful paritta which can bring about unique beneficial results.
- (5) Dhajagga Sutta is also a sutta of great power which extends over one hundred thousand crores of World systems. Contemplation of the virtues of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha extolled in this sutta is a means to strengthen one's intellectual power, to enjoy celestial bliss for three thousand world-cycles, to be reborn as Sakka for eighty times, as a Universal Monarch for one thousand times, as an ordinary king or emperor for countless number of times; to be always rich and prosperous in every existence, when the properties he possesses cannot be lost, stolen or destroyed. For one hundred thousand world-cycles, he would not be reborn in the planes of woes nor would he be disturbed or shaken through fright which caused hair to stand on end and goose flesh to appear. Such is the immense power of this sutta which will ultimately lead one to arahatship.
- (6) Bojjhaṅga Sutta wields great authority which extends over one hundred thousand crores of world-systems, possessing power to ward off danger and ailments. Thorough and complete cultivation of the seven Factors of Enlightenment contained in this sutta leads to Nibbāna in this very life through realization of magga and phala nāṇa.
- (7) Ātānātiya Sutta was originally composed by the four Guardian Devas of Catumahārajika Deva realm, having gathered together in the celestial city of Atanata. They first paid homage to the Seven Buddhas, praising their virtues and attributes. They then composed this sutta and made a proclamation: "Those unruly wild celestial beings such as yakkhas who are not amenable to the instructions of the Buddha nor to the code of conduct laid down by ourselves will be punished according to the celestial laws." The Guardian Devas then went to the Buddha, accompanied by a great number of celestial guards and troops, and presented this powerful sutta, which they had composed, to Him. The Buddha taught this sutta to the bhikkhus which thus became a powerful authoritative, protective word-rune, paritta.

The relevant Commentary lays down the method of administering the sutta as follows:

In the case of those possessed by demons, petas and unruly beings, Ātānāṭiya Sutta should not be administered initially. For seven days continuously, Mettā Sutta, Dhajagga Sutta and Ratana Sutta should be recited first. Should the possessed person become normal after these recitations, there is no need for administering the Ātānāṭiya Sutta.

Only when the desired result is not achieved after reciting continuously for seven days of the first three suttas, should the Ātānāṭiya Sutta be recited. The bhikkhu who would recite the Ātānāṭiya Sutta should not eat cakes made of flour, meat and fish; nor should he reside in a cemetery. This is because if such a bhikkhu eats flour cakes, meat or fish and reside in a cemetery, he is liable to be possessed by evil spirits. The place chosen for recitation of the paritta should be kept clean and tidy and besmeared with turmeric power.

The bhikkhu who would administer the paritta should be conducted from the monastery to the house, surrounded by a security guard of men armed with bows and arrows, shields, swords and spears. The bhikkhu should not recite the paritta in the open; the gate door, windows and doors of the house should be securely closed and the bhikkhu should sit down closely surrounded by the armed guard. Then with a heart full of loving-kindness he should administer the paritta according to the following guide lines:

It is essential that the afflicted person should be first established in sīla by observance of the precepts and then followed by the recitation of paritta. Should such measures fail to drive away the evil ones, the possessed person should be taken to the monastery and kept lying on the stupa platform. The stupa platform should be swept clean and offerings of light should be made; then Pāli prose and verses, such as ‘Diva tapati adicco’, etc., which generally bring auspiciousness should be chanted. An announcement should then be made to the effect that all bhikkhus have gathered together at that place.

Then someone should go to the nearby forest grove where there would be a tree which is conspicuous by special features, such as size, height, etc., and invite the guardian dryad, saying: “All the bhikkhus are desirous of your coming to the gathering.” (Such an invitation by the bhikkhus can never be refused).

Then the person possessed should be asked: “What is your name?” (Should it be Naradeva, for instance,) He should be addressed by that name: “O Naradeva, you have been given the share of merits gained from provision of accommodation to the Sangha, the share of merits gained from offerings of scents and flowers, from offering of meals to the Sangha; the bhikkhus have also recited auspicious suttas, such as Maṅgala Sutta, etc., as a gift of Dhamma to you. So out of consideration for these deeds of kindness and out of respect to the bhikkhu Sangha, we pray that you release this patient.”

Should such measures fail to secure the release of the demoniacal possession, the situation should be made known to the benevolent devas: “O good devas, you are fully aware that this unruly evil spirit does not take notice of our request made with loving-kindness. We have no alternative but to have recourse to invoke the authority of the Buddha.” So saying, the Atanatiya Sutta should be recited.

The above method is applicable only to lay people. For the bhikkhu who is possessed by demons, petas and unruly beings, his room should be swept clean and made tidy, then all the Sanghas should be invited to assemble there. After sharing the merits gained from offerings of flowers, scents, etc., the Atanatiya Sutta should be recited as described before.

Thus the administration of Atanatiya Sutta is elaborately described in the Commentary on the Atanatiya Sutta. When recited systematically as laid down in the Commentary, the Atanatiya Sutta is of immense authority, wielding great power and influence.

Likewise, the other parittas are also of great power and influence in their own way. In short, the words of the Buddha, as Piṭaka consisting of the Five Nikāyas, are of great authority, its influence pervading over one hundred thousand crores of world-system, promoting welfare and prosperity both in mundane and supra-mundane spheres. It wards off all kinds of dangers and paves the way to attainment of Nibbāna through realization of magga-phala nāṇa. These words of the Buddha, enshrined in the Nikāyas of the Piṭaka are the noblest of all the spoken words and it should thus be confidently taken to be of immense authority, wielding great power and influence.

*Yam Buddho bhāsatte vācam khemam Nibanna pattiyā dukkhassantakiriyāya
sā ve vācānamuttamā*

The Fully-Self Enlightened Buddha has expounded out of great compassion the Five Nikāyas with the object of attainment of Nibbāna, which is the cessation of all sufferings. The words spoken by the Buddha, as contained in the Nikāyas of the Piṭakas, excel all other words, free of any fault and conducive to peace and happiness.

Discourse on The Life of The Bodhisatta Brahmin Sankha

After a fortnight's stay in the city of Vesali, the Buddha told the Licchavi princes: "We are leaving," by way of farewell. Whereupon the Licchavis honoured the Buddha as much as twice that of King Bimbisāra and in three days they conducted Him to the bank of the Ganges.

The nāga devas in the region of the Ganges agreed amongst themselves saying: "Men have made homage to the Buddha on a lavish scale and why should we not do likewise? We shall do likewise." They proceeded to create golden boats, silver boats, and emerald boats mounted with golden, silver and emerald thrones, and covering the entire surface of the Ganges by a blanket of five different species of lily. They then approached the Buddha and made the solemn request: "Most Exalted Buddha, may you grant us a favour by gratifying our wish out of compassion for us?"

The Buddha conceded to their request and went aboard the boats which were created by nāgas with ornamentation of jewels. Each of the five hundred bhikkhus also occupied a jewelled boat. Whereupon the nāga kings conducted the Buddha and His five hundred bhikkhus to the Naga realm. The Buddha spent the whole night expounding discourses for the benefit of the nāga audience. The next morning, a great offering of celestial food was made to the Buddha and His bhikkhus by the nāga kings. After teaching a discourse in appreciation of the offerings, the Buddha made His departure from the nāga land.

Devas, who had dominion over that region of the earth (bhumma-devās), also agreed amongst themselves, saying: "Humans and nāgas have made great homage to the Buddha, why should we not do likewise? We shall follow suit." They proceeded to do honour to the Buddha by setting up excellent umbrellas all over the hills, forest and trees. In this manner similar offerings were made right up to the Brahmā plane of Akanittha.

King Bimbisāra, making great homage twice as much as that of the Licchavis, conducted the Buddha and His bhikkhus to Veḷuvana monastery, Rājagaha, making the whole journey as before, in five days.

After the arrival of the Buddha at Veḷuvana monastery, Rājagaha, bhikkhus assembled at the Main Hall in the afternoon to discuss matters relating to meditation. Their discussion was often interrupted by conversations, such as:

"The glories of the Buddha are really wonderful. The stretch of land on this side of the Ganges is five yojanas and on the other side of the Ganges it is three yojanas, a total of eight; the surface of the land on both sides was without bumps or hollows at any place. It has an even surface all over and strewn with white sand and flowers.

The surface of the river Ganges, with a width of one yojana, was covered by a blanket of five-hued species of flowers. The whole region was decorated with white umbrellas right up to the Brahmā plane of Akanittha." Their discussion on meditation was often interrupted by such words of praise in honour of the Buddha.

Being aware of what was going on, the Buddha left the Scented Chamber and went to the Assembly Hall. He sat on the reserved seat. He then asked the bhikkhus: “Bhikkhus, what is the subject of your discussion at this moment?” When explained what it was, He said:

“Such a wonderful manner of making obeisance is not attributable to my glories as a Buddha nor to the powers of nāgas, devas and Brahmās. It should be attributed to the beneficial results which accrue from a small deed of mine done in the past.”

When the Buddha had given such a hint, the bhikkhus approached Him with the request: “Most glorious Buddha, we have not any knowledge of the small deed of charity done in the past. Most Exalted Buddha, we pray that we may be enlightened so as to know about it fully.” The Buddha, thereupon, proceeded:

“Bhikkhus, what happened in the past was this ... There was a brahmin in the city of Takkaśīla by the name of Sankha. He had a son named Susima, who was sixteen years old. One day, Susima approached his father with great respect and his father asked him: ‘My dear son, what is the matter with you?’ Then the lad replied: ‘O Father, I would like to go to Bārāṇasī to acquire education.’ His father said: ‘My dear son, there is a brahmin professor in Bārāṇasī. He is my child-hood friend, you might go to him and receive your share of education.’ He then gave his son a sum of one thousand pieces of money for his necessary expenditure.

Susima paid due respect to his parents and taking the money, set out on his journey and arrived at Bārāṇasī in due time. He approached the Professor with profound respect and in a customary way. He told the Professor that he was the son of Brahmin Sankha of Takkaśīla. The Professor gave him a warm reception making the remark: ‘So you are a son of my friend.’

After a moment of rest, Susima went again to the Professor, and placing the sum of money at his feet, requested him for permission to acquire education under his care. The permission was willingly granted. He took pains in learning as much in a very, short time, adding every thing to the fount of his knowledge, just like the precious grease of lion retained in a golden cup for the sake of security. As he was endowed with pāramīs, he completed the full course of learning in a few months instead of twelve years as an average pupil would have to spend.

As Susima was in the middle of studying a Veda text, he discovered that the treatise contained only the beginning and middle of the subject they treated; the final section was not to be found therein. He brought the matter to the notice of the Professor, saying: ‘O great Professor, this Veda text deals only with the beginning and middle of the subject, the final portion is not found in it.’ Whereupon, the Professor also admitted that he too did not find it. Susima then asked the Professor: ‘O Professor, is there anyone who knows all about the subject from beginning to end.’ The Professor replied: ‘My dear son Susima, those Paccekabuddhas who live in the forest of Isipathana, Migadaya, may probably know.’ ‘If so, may I have your kind permission to go and ask those Paccekabuddhas about it,’ requested the youth Susima. The Professor granted his permission, saying: ‘My dear son Susima, you may please yourself as you like.’

Susima, who was accomplished in pāramī, went to the forest of Isipathana, Migadaya, approached the Paccekabuddhas with due respect and asked: ‘Venerable Sirs, do you know (the subjects) in Vedas from beginning to end?’ ‘Yes, we do, lay devotee Susima,’ was their reply. Then he requested them: ‘Kindly teach me the last part of the knowledge which is missing in the Veda.’ The Paccekabuddhas told him: ‘Lay devotee Susima, you will have to renounce the world and become a recluse. No one other than a bhikkhu could learn that.’ Susima agreed and gave his word: ‘Very well, Venerable Sirs, please ordain me as a bhikkhu. You may direct me to do anything that is necessary so long as it helps me learn the last portion of Veda knowledge.’ He was ordained as a bhikkhu as requested and was taught how to wear the robes properly such as keeping the edges (borders) of both the upper and lower robes in a tidy circular fashion. They could teach him only the precept of very good conduct, ābhisamācārika sīla, and not any meditation, (because unlike Omniscient Buddhas, they had not the ability to give instructions on how to practise Vipassanā meditation.)

The newly ordained Bhikkhu Susima devoted himself earnestly to the observance of the ābhisamācārika sīla as instructed by the Paccekabuddhas, Having performed deeds of merit in the past which formed sufficing conditions (upanissaya) for attainment of Paccekabuddha-nāṇa, after a brief period of practice, he became a Paccekabuddha. He was soon held in high repute and reached the height of His glory acquiring great fame and gains and a large number of followers and disciples. But because of his past misdeeds, which prohibited longevity, he did not live long and passed away while still young. His remains were cremated by the Paccekabuddhas and the citizens of Bārāṇasī. The relics of his body were enshrined in a stupa built near the gate of the city.

The old brahmin father, Sankha, thought of his son one day: 'My son had been gone for a long time now and no news had been received from him.' So he left Takkasīla with a longing to see his son and eventually reached the gate of the city of Bārāṇasī. He saw quite a number of people gathered together near the shrine there; and thinking someone from amongst the crowd would perhaps know something about his son, he approached them and enquired: 'Friends, there is a young man by the name of Susima who came to Bārāṇasī to learn; perhaps some of you might know something about him.'

'Yes we do, old brahmin. That young man Susima, after acquiring the complete knowledge of Vedas under the care of the Professor of Bārāṇasī, received ordination at the place of the Paccekabuddhas, and eventually became a Paccekabuddha through realization of Paccekabuddha-nāṇa. He had passed away now, attaining Anupādisesa Nibbāna. This is the shrine where his relics are enshrined.'

After hearing this shocking news, the poor old brahmin wept most hopelessly, beating the earth with his palm many a time. After mourning the loss of his dear son to his heart's content, he went into the precincts of the shrine and removed grass, spreading white sand which he had brought from a nearby place with his shoulder towel. He poured water from his jug all over the place to keep the dust from arising; then he collected as much wild flowers as possible and offered them to the shrine. He put his shoulder towel into the shape of a streamer and wrapping it round his umbrella, he placed it high above the shrine, tying them tight to the shrine. Then he departed."

Having thus told the story of the past, the Buddha correlated the events of the past with those of the present by giving the following discourse:

"Bhikkhus, you might be wondering who the Brahmin Sankha of this story could be. You need not ponder any more about it. The Brahmin Sankha was none other than Myself.

- (1) I, who was a Bodhisatta then, had cleaned the precincts of the shrine containing the relics of Paccekabuddha Susima, removing the grass roots, stump, etc. As a beneficial result of this act of merit, the people made the road clean and free of tree stumps and levelled it for a stretch of five yojanas on this side of the Ganges and three yojanas on the far bank.
- (2) I, then a Bodhisatta, had spread white sand in the precincts of the Paccekabuddha shrine. As a benefit accruing from this act of merit, people spread white sand all along the route measuring eight yojanas.
- (3) I, then a Bodhisatta, had collected as much wild flowers as I could and placed them in the shrine. This meritorious deed of mine resulted in devas and humans strewing various kinds of flowers on land and the river, covering a distance of nine yojanas.

- (4) I, then a Bodhisatta, had sprinkled the precincts of the Paccekabuddha shrine with water from my jug to prevent the dust from arising. As a result of this act of merit of mine, Pokkharavasa rain (from a cloud bank the size of a lily leaf) fell the moment I set foot on the land of Vesali.
- (5) I, then a Bodhisatta, had set up a streamer at the shrine of the Paccekabuddha and erected an umbrella on top of it. For that act of merit, streamers were set up all the way to the Akanittha Brahmā realm and white umbrellas were erected all over the regions.”

“Bhikkhus, making homage to Me in such wonderful manner is not attributable to my glories as a Buddha, nor to the powers of nāga, devas and Brahmās. It should be attributed to the beneficial results which accrue from a small deed of merit done by Me as a Bodhisatta in my existence as Brahmin Sankha.” The Buddha in winding up the discourse expounded the following verse:

*Mattāsukhapariccāgō
Passe ce vipulam sukham
caje mattāsukham dhīro
sampassam vipulam sukham*

When it is known with certainty that a generous abandoning by way of sacrifice of pleasurable sensations, which give a small amount of happiness, will bring a vast amount of reward such as the happiness of Nibbāna, then surely a wise person should forego such an insignificant reward of a small pleasure in favour of the great reward of Nibbānic happiness.

At the conclusion of the exposition, many sentient beings attained Sotāpatti-magga-phala, etc.

The Story of Richman's Son, Uggasena, The Acrobat

In the time of Buddha, a theatrical troupe of five hundred entertainers used to stage shows to entertain the King of Rājagaha for seven days annually or bi-annually, for which they received enormous amount of rewards in gold and silver. The prize awarded by the enthusiastic general public in their honour, at intervals of performances, was inestimable. The citizens sat upon rows and rows of four-legged bedsteads of their own, arranging them behind and above one another, each row getting higher and higher than the one in front.

Their show usually started with the appearance on the stage of a young actress, the daughter of the troupe's leading acrobat. She displayed her skill in acrobatics in various styles on a string of bamboos at a certain height from the ground; she moved from end to end gently and steadily, as she danced and sang with a pleasant voice.

Uggasena, Son of A Richman

Amongst the audience was a youth named Uggasena, the son of a rich man. He was enjoying the show together with a friend. He gazed attentively at the impressive performer displaying her acrobatic skill in different postures and styles, softly bending, raising, stretching her delicate hands and feet. He went back home driven mad with intense attachment and affection for the youthful actress. On arrival at home, he threw himself down on bed, saying: “I will live only if I can get her or else I will die on this bed,” and sentimentally went on hunger strike.

His parents asked him: “Dear son, what ails you?” “O dear mother and father, ... I will live only if I win the hands of the acrobatic actress whom I have seen performing in the precincts of the royal palace; if not, I will die on this bed-stead,” was his frank, blunt reply. His parents consoled him by saying: “Dear son, don't get so sentimental. We will find a fair lady suitable for you from amongst our own clansmen of wealthy status.” But Uggasena was not moved by the pleadings of his parents but reiterated his wish as before without any change and kept on lying on his bed.

Uggasena's father made several attempts to persuade his son to change his mind, talking to him privately with soothing words, but to no avail. Finally the parents sent for his friend and asked him to negotiate with the head acrobat, the father of the girl, on their behalves, saying: "Friend, please take his sum of one thousand and give it to the father of the young actress with a request to accept it and to give his daughter in marriage to my son, Uggasena."

The head acrobat's reply to the messenger's request was: "I am not prepared to accept the money in exchange for my daughter. If the rich man's Uggasena cannot live unless he wins the hands of my daughter, he will have to come along with us. I will give away my daughter only on this condition that he follows us wherever we go."

Uggasena followed The Actress

When his parents conveyed the news to him, Uggasena said: "O mother and father, in that case I will go along with them," and so saying he left for head acrobat's place in spite of repeated requests of his parents and relatives not to do so. The head acrobat was as good as his words, he gave away his daughter and they all wandered about towns and villages staging shows and acrobatic performances,

A son was born of the union of Uggasena and the actress. The mother used to coax and cuddle the child by singing a lullaby:

Son of a watchman of the carts ... I wish you would sleep.

Son of a wicked man, the custodian of prize money... I wish you would sleep.

Son of an ignoramus... I wish you would sleep.

She sang this in a mocking, ridiculing manner.

This lullaby reflected on the life being led by Uggasena. Whenever the entertainment troupe rested during the course of wanderings, he was charged with the responsibility for securing food for the oxen and feeding them, and for the security of the camp. He was also responsible for safe custody of the proceeds from the performances.

Uggasena realized that by singing mocking lullabies, the actress was making insinuations and ridiculing him. He asked the actress: "Are you singing to despise me?" She replied: "Yes, it was intended for you." Uggasena retorted: "Then I will have to abandon you and go back to my parents." The actress was unmoved by this threat and she replied: "I don't care at all whether you go away or come back," and went on repeating the lullaby again and again (knowing that it was irritating to Uggasena). (The actress was puffed up with pride of her beauty and her fine art of dancing which enabled her to earn her living easily.)

Uggasena became An Acrobatic Artist

Uggasena thought over how the actress became so conceited and finally realised: "Her pride is rooted in her prowess as an acrobatic artist." He made up his mind to learn the skill in acrobatic feats. Approaching his father-in-law, the acrobatic master, he sought and received permission from him to be trained in the art of gymnastics until he became an expert in it. He then went from place to place staging shows in villages and marketing towns and finally he came back again to the city of Rājagaha. There, he had it announced widely throughout the city that "seven days from now, Uggasena, the son of the rich man, will stage a performance, demonstrating the amazing feats of acrobatics and somersaults."

The citizens vied with one another in setting up bedstead seats with longer legs to get better view of the performances and they assembled round the stage on the appointed day. Finally, Uggasena appeared and he climbed up a pole of sixty cubits high and made up of many lengths of bamboo affixed to one another firmly. He stood on top of the pole poised to stage a performance.

Uggasena appeared on The Mental Vision of The Buddha

On the day fixed for the staging of performance by Uggasena, the Buddha surveyed the world of beings before dawn and perceived by means of Omniscience, the vision of Uggasena caught His supernormal mental screen, like a fish trapped in a net, and He reflected on what would come to pass. He saw in His mind's eye:

When the morning comes, Uggasena will stand on top of the pole of sixty cubits high to stage a performance and the citizens will appear to witness it. At that assemblage of people, I will expound the Dhamma made up of four verses. As a result of hearing this discourse of Mine, eighty-four thousand sentient beings will gain emancipation through realization of the Four Noble Truths. Uggasena will attain arahatship.

As the time for alms-round arrived, the Buddha went into the city in the company of His bhikkhus as usual. Just before the Buddha's entry into the city, Uggasena had signalled to the audience by pointing his index finger towards them that he was about to begin the show; that brought thunderous applause from the crowd. Uggasena who was then standing on top of the pole took a leap up into the air and somersaulted seven times in the air before he came down and stood on the pole.

The Buddha, who had now arrived in the city, caused the audience, by His super normal power, to pay exclusive attention to Him, thus diverting their interest which was directed to Uggasena a moment ago. Watching the mood of the audience from atop the pole, Uggasena noticed their attention which was fixed on him suddenly changed towards the Buddha. He felt down-hearted that the audience had lost interest in him. He thought to himself: "I can stage this acrobatic show only once a year, yet, as soon as the Buddha has come into the city, the audience is no longer interested in me, instead, they give their attention only to Him. All my efforts to demonstrate my skill in the acrobatic feats are in vain, and fruitless."

The Buddha knew what was in the mind of Uggasena and asked the Venerable Moggallāna: "Dear son Moggallāna, go ye to the son of the rich man and tell him that he is wanted to go on with the performance of acrobatics." Venerable Moggallāna went as instructed by the Buddha and standing at the base of the pole gave encouragement to Uggasena by the following verse:

*Igha passa naṭaputta
Uggasena mahābbala
karohi rañgam̐ parisāya hāsayassu mahājanam̐.*

O gymnastic artist of great strength, Uggasena, I urge you to resume your display of skill in somersault with ease of mind. Look at the crowd that has gathered. Let the mass of people enjoy your amazing entertainment and praise your skill with uproarious cheers.

On hearing the words of Venerable Moggallāna, Uggasena felt greatly delighted and encouraged; he thought that the Buddha was desirous of seeing his skill. He replied while still standing on top of the pole by the following verse:

*Igha passa Mahāna
Moggallāna mahiddhika
karomi rañgam̐ parisaya
hasayami mahājanam.*

Venerable Moggallāna of great wisdom and of the highest degree of supernormal power! Please watch, I will entertain the crowd that has gathered by displaying my skill with ease of mind. I will perform such an amazing feat that the audience will give enthusiastic cheers and praise uproariously.

So saying, he threw himself up and made fourteen complete rounds of somersault in the air before coming down on his feet on top of the bamboo pole.

Exhortation by The Buddha

At that moment, the Buddha exhorted Uggasena by these words: “Dear son Uggasena, a wise man should abandon attachment to the five aggregates which had arisen before, to the five aggregates which will arise in the future and to those which are presently arising. Not clinging to the five aggregates, he should strive for the release from the suffering of birth, the suffering of ageing, the suffering of death.” The Buddha went on expounding the Dhamma by means of the following verse:

na punaṃ jātijaraṃ upehisi.*

Dear son Uggasena, give up, abandon the craving for the fivefold aggregates of mind and matter of the past, .... of the future .... of the present. Once you have completely forsaken the attachment to these aggregates of the past, the future and the present, you will have transcended the round of suffering of the three realms, namely, the sensual world, (kāma-bhava), the world of form (rūpa-bhava) and the formless world (arūpa-bhava) and reached perfection and become an authority in matters pertaining to special wisdom (abhiññā), full comprehension (pariññā), abandonment (pahāna), mental development (bhāvanā) and realisation (sacchikariyā); you will live fully emancipated from all forms of the conditioned and pass beyond the stages of birth, ageing, ailing and death.

At the conclusion of the discourse, eighty-four thousand sentient beings became emancipated through realization of the Four Noble Truths. The rich man’s son, Uggasena, attained arahatship complete with analytical wisdom (paṭisambhida-ñāṇa) while still standing on top of the bamboo pole. He came down from it and went towards the Buddha, paying homage with full reverence. He then requested for permission to receive ordination. The Buddha stretched out His hand and pronounced ‘Ehi bhikkhu’ to let him become a full-fledged bhikkhu. The form of an acrobatic artist disappeared instantaneously and Uggasena assumed the form of a mahāthera of sixty years’ standing (aged eighty) fully equipped with the eight requisites of a bhikkhu.

Bhikkhus asked Uggasena whether He was afraid or not

Fellow bhikkhus asked Uggasena: “Did you not feel afraid when you came down from the top of the bamboo pole sixty cubits high?” Thereupon, Uggasena replied: “Friends, I had not the slightest fright.” The bhikkhus went to the Buddha and reported: “Most Exalted Buddha, Uggasena has claimed to be an arahat by telling lies that ‘he did not feel the slightest fright when he was coming down from the top of the pole.’ ”

The Buddha gave them a brief explanation in support of Uggasena: “Dear bhikkhus, all the bhikkhus, like my son Uggasena, through eradication of āsavas by cutting off the ten fetters (samyōjana<sup>7</sup>) are free from fright.”

7. Samyōjanas: bonds or fetters binding all beings to the wheel of existence. When they are completely broken or eliminated, emancipation results. The ten fetters are: (i) Sakkāya-diṭṭhi: belief in atta or soul, the view that the body and mind is ‘myself’ (ii) Vicikicchā: doubt or wavering concerning the Buddha’s Enlightenment, His Teaching and His Order. (iii) Sīlabbataparāmāsa: the belief that there are paths other than the ariya Path of eight constituents that can liberate one from dukkha. (iv) Kāma-rāga: sensual desire, sensuous passion. (v) Patigha: ill-will. (vi) Rūpa-rāga: craving for existence in the Fine-material (Brahmā) realm (vii) Arūpa-rāga: craving for existence in the Formless (Brahmā) realm. (viii) Māna: pride, awareness of superiority or inferiority. (ix) Uddhacca: restlessness, agitation, mental unrest. (x) Avijjā: ignorance, lack of real or correct knowledge as to the nature of existence, as to the Four Noble

The Buddha continued to expound the following verse which is included in the Brāhmana vagga of Dhammapada.

*Sabbasaṃyojanam chetvā Yo ve napaṭitassati saṅgātigam viṣaṃyuttam
tamataṃ brumi brāhmanam*

Bhikkhus, a bhikkhu who has attained arahatship through eradication of āsavas has indeed cut off the ten long fetters by the sword of arahatta-magga; he cannot therefore be moved or startled by fright which has its origin in greed (lobha). I praise and proclaim such an arahat who has overcome seven kinds of clinging (sanga), namely, sensuous passion, ill-will, conceit, wrong view, moral defilement, physical, verbal and mental misdeeds, and who has nothing more to do with four yogas (kāma, bhava, dhitthi and avijjā) as a truly noble, pure person, Brāhmana, who has done away with all kinds of evil.

A large multitude of people attained sotāpatti-magga, etc., at the conclusion of the discourse.

Uggasena's Past Deeds

One day, bhikkhus were assembled again in the Main Hall to discuss the mode of Uggasena's attainment to arahatship: "Friends, one wonders, in the first place, how a person such as the Venerable Uggasena, who was predestined to attain arahatship, got entangled through an actress with the troupe of acrobatic performers, following them wherever they wandered; and in the second place, what was the cause of the powerful sufficing condition for attainment of arahatship." The Buddha went to the Main Hall and asked: "Bhikkhus, what is the subject of your discussion?" When explained what the subject of their discussion was, He explained them briefly thus: "Bhikkhus, Uggasena himself had been the cause of these two events; the one that entailed his engagement with the dancing troupe and the other that resulted in his attainment to arahatship." He then went on to relate the full account as below:

"Long, long ago, when a stupa was built to enshrine the relics of Buddha Kassapa, men and women of Bārāṇasī went in large numbers to the stupa site to contribute necessary labour, carrying plenty of food in their carts. On the way they met a mahāthera entering the city for his round of alms-food.

At that time, one woman noticed the mahāthera and told her husband: 'My dear lord, the Thera is still on his round of receiving food, please go and bring his bowl so that we may offer some thing to him. We have brought along in the cart plenty of food.' The man went and fetched the bowl from the bhikkhu and after filling it with hard and soft food to its brim, they returned it to the mahāthera and both the husband and wife declared their wish: 'Revered Mahāthera, for this deed of merit, may both of us be blessed with a share of the Supramundane knowledge which you have realized.'

The recipient of their gift food was not an ordinary bhikkhu, he happened to be an arahat devoid of taint of defilements (āsavas). He foresaw, by means of his anāgata-ñāna, knowledge of the future, that their wishes would be fulfilled and so he smiled happily. The woman caught a glimpse of it and she muttered: 'My dear lord, the Venerable who received our offering might be an actor.' The husband also agreed, saying. 'Yes, he might be an actor.' They then departed from that place. This then was the deed the husband and wife had done in the past.

The couple lived to the end of their life span in that existence and were reborn in the realm of the devas. After enjoying the life of devas, the wife was born as the daughter of the leading acrobatic performer in her present (last) existence. The husband was born as the son of a rich man in the last stage of his existence, by the name of Uggasena. Although born as a son of a rich man, he had to accompany the dancing troupe in their wanderings, for the demeritorious deed of giving a wrong word of agreement: ‘Yes, he might be an actor’ to his wife in a past existence. But for the good deed of offering food to an arahat, in pure piety and devotional faith, he attained arahatship.”

The Young Actress also attained Arahatsip

When Uggasena attained arahatship and became an chi-bhikkhu, his wife, the young actress, thought to herself, awakened by the meritorious deed of the past: “Whatever level of intelligence possessed by my husband, my level of intelligence should also be the same as his.” Reasoning in this way she approached the bhikkhunis and received ordination from them. Then devoting herself to the practice of dhamma, in due course she also attained arahatship, having eradicated all the āsavas.

War between the Sakyans of Kapilavatthu and of Koliya over River Rohini's Water

There was a small river by the name of Rohini between Kapilavatthu and Koliya. The two kingdoms took turns, in perfect harmony, to water their respective arable lands by controlling the flow of the channel with a single dam.

The level of the water in the channel was at its lowest in the month of Jetthamasa and the crops usually withered. The farmers of the two countries called a meeting to discuss the matter of sharing the water in the channel. At the meeting the farmers of Koliya said:

“Friends, if the small amount of water in the reservoir were to be divided and shared by both of us, none of us would receive sufficient amount to water our fields. One more flood of water would suffice to bring maturity to our crops. We request you therefore to let us make use of this small amount of water.”

“Friends, we can't go from door to door of your houses carrying baskets and our purses filled with gold, silver and precious jewels in search of paddy, in a dejected manner, while you all sat down with your minds at ease having filled your granaries with paddy to their full capacities. Our early crops, too, are about to mature and need watering in like manner.”

Heated arguments ensued, one side saying ‘we are not going to yield’, the other side retorting in the same words. Exchange of words eventually led to blows, a farmer on one side starting to attack a farmer from the other side and the latter retaliating in a like manner. The affray that started between the farmers on both sides ultimately grew into hostilities (like a small bush fire which grows fierce and finally burns down a palatial mansion) to the extent of decrying the royal clans on both sides. The Koliyan farmers began the quarrel:

“You have threatened us by placing your reliance on the royal clan of Kapilavatthu. These Kapilavatthu royal clan you depend upon behave like common dogs and jackals of the forest making their own sisters their wives<sup>8</sup>. What harm can their elephants, horses and armours can do to us?”

The Kapilavatthu farmers retaliated in no less acrimonious tone:

“You threatened us by relying on your little lepers inflicted with horrible leprosy. The Koliya descendents on whom you lean for support are themselves in a miserable plight ever since they were banished from the city and lived like animals in the hollow of Kola trees<sup>9</sup>. What harm can their elephants, horses and armours can do to us?"

The farmers returned to their respective cities and reported the matter to the Ministers of Agriculture, who in turn, brought the state of affairs to the notice of their chiefs.

Consequently, the Sakyans of Kapilavatthu prepared to wage war on Koliyas and came out of the city, shouting the war cry: "The husbands of their own sisters will demonstrate their feat of arms." The rival royalties on the side of Koliyas also prepared for war and came out, their war cry being: "Those taking shelters in the hollows of Kola trees will display their feat of arms."

At that time, the Buddha was still residing in the Jetavana monastery of Savatthi. On the very day on which the two rival communities of Kapilavatthu and Koliya were all prepared to go to the battlefield, He surveyed the world early at dawn and perceived that a bloody battle was imminent between the two opposing sides that very evening. He further perceived that He would be able to avert the war by going to the scene of hostilities and expounding three Jātakas, namely, Phandāna, Duddaba and Lathukika. This would bring about peace, after which, He will have to teach the two Jātakas of Rukkhadhamma and Vattaka and lastly, followed by Attadanda Sutta to bring home the benefits of unity and harmony. Having heard the discourses, the Sakyans and Koliyans will each give Him two hundred and fifty youths to enter the Order: "I will ordain them to become bhikkhus culminating in the convening of the Great Assembly of Mahā Samaya."

Having perceived thus, the Buddha decided to go to the place of hostilities and save the warring kinsmen from mutual destruction. He went early for the usual round of receiving alms-food and stayed the whole day in the Scented Chamber. Towards evening, He left the Chamber, carrying the big robe and alms bowl himself, for the scene of strife all alone, without informing anyone. On arrival at the spot, He sat cross-legged in the sky in the middle of the rival groups, and caused dark-blue rays to be emitted from His hair so that darkness prevailed all over, although the sun had not yet set. This was meant to cause contrition in the heart of the warring factions.

While all the people were greatly frightened by the strange phenomenon, the Buddha, sending out six-coloured rays from His body, manifested Himself to them.

Peace

When members of the Sakyan clan saw the Buddha, they began to contemplate thus: "The Buddha of our own blood has come, perhaps He has full knowledge of our strife." They discussed among themselves and decided: "It is not right and proper for us to let our weapons fall upon the bodies of others in the presence of the Buddha; let Koliyans kill us or take us captives, should they desire to do so." By mutual consent they abandoned all their weapons and sat down respectfully making homage to the Buddha.

The Koliyans also arrived at the same decision among themselves. They too abandoned their weapons and sat down paying obeisance to the Buddha who then descended from the sky and sat on a reserved seat on the delightful sandy plain, with all the grace and glory of a Buddha.

Discourse on End of Strife

The Buddha knowingly asked: "Why have you all come to this place?" The kings of both the countries replied: "Most Exalted Buddha, we have not come just to see the river, nor to sport in the river; as a matter of fact we have come to wage war upon one another on this sandy plain."

The Buddha again asked: "Your Royal Highnesses .... what is the actual cause of your strife?" Then they replied: "Water of this Rohini stream is the actual cause of it."

The Buddha then asked: "Your Royal Highnesses .... what is the value of water of this Rohini stream?” They replied: “Exalted Buddha, it is of small value.” The Buddha asked an additional question: “What is the value of the earth?” “Its value is limitless,” was the reply.

Whereupon, the Buddha made this direct question: “How would you evaluate the noble royal Khattiya race?” They replied: “The value of noble royal Khattiya race is unlimited.”

The Buddha then made this address:

“Your Royal Highnesses ... For some water of this Rohim channel that is of small value, why do you wish to destroy the priceless royal race of Khattiya by fighting one another. Not the slightest amount of pleasure could be found in worthless conflicts and wasteful strifes. O! Your Royal Highnesses ... there was a glaring instance where the seed of enmity sown by a tree deva and bear remained potent throughout the Bhadda world-system.”

The Buddha then went on to expound the Phandāna Jātaka (of Tesasa Nipata), the brief account of which is as follows:

Phandana Jātaka

“Your Royal Highnesses ....Long time ago, during the reign of King Brahmadata in Bārāṇasī, there was a village of carpenters just outside the city; and there was a brahmin who was a carpenter by profession, he brought wood from the forest and made them into chariots for his living.

At that time, there was a Kyo tree (Melicoca trijuna tree) in the region of the Himalayas. A bear used to go and sleep under that tree with ease and comfort after his meal. One day a dried branch broke due to a strong wind and fell on the bear's back, hurting it slightly. The bear ran away through fright but soon returned to find the cause of his injury. He did not see any enemy.

So he thought to himself: ‘There is no wild beast, such as lion, leopard or tiger, around here to harm me; and there can't be anyone except the tree spirit who might be jealous of mine sleeping under the tree, and have caused me harm. I will surely have my revenge on him,’ thus making a mountain out of a molehill. The bear hit the tree and scratched it with its paws, saying: ‘I have not eaten your leaves, nor broken your branches, you don't show any spite towards other animals taking rest under your tree, but you are jealous of me. What fault have I got. You just wait for two, three days and I will have your tree uprooted and cut up into pieces.’

Having threatened the tree spirit, the bear kept on knocking round in the neighbourhood, looking for a person capable of causing damage to the tree.

The brahmin carpenter, accompanied by a few hands, went into the forest in a small vehicle in search of wood for the construction of chariots. They left the vehicle in a place and went into the forest with hatchets and choppers. They went round looking for the right type of wood and eventually reached near the melicoca trijuna tree.

When the bear saw the brahmin carpenter, it thought: ‘Today, I shall have my retaliation against my enemy,’ and he went and stood at the base of the tree. As the carpenter passed by the tree, the bear seized the opportunity of addressing<sup>10</sup> him thus:

‘My dear man, you have come into the forest with a hatchet in your hand. Tell me frankly which tree you have in mind to cut down?’

When the carpenter heard the words of the bear, he uttered in amazement: ‘Dear boys, it is strange that a bear speaks the language of the humans, a thing I have hitherto never seen or heard.’ He thought to himself then, such a bear speaking the human language would know the kind of wood suitable for making chariots, and so he asked the bear:

‘Dear bear king, you have wandered all over, up the hills and down the valleys, please tell me honestly which kind of wood is most suitable for construction of chariots?’

10. The conversation between the bear and the carpenter was made in seven verses. The verses in Pāli, which are not so important, are not reproduced; only their translation is provided here.

When the bear heard of this, he felt that his wish was going to be fulfilled then and he replied in verse:

‘Pidauk (Pterocarpus Indicus) is not strong enough to use as frame work; cutch (Acacia Catechu) is equally unsuitable; Ingyin, the Sal tree (Shorea Siamensis) is the same; and Myaukngo (Lythrum fruticosum) is out of the question (equally weak). There is a certain kind of tree known as Melicoca trijuga; the wood of that tree is the strongest for the construction of chariots.’

The carpenter was delighted to hear it and so he thought to himself: ‘I’ve come into the jungle on a truly auspicious day and even a beast, like the bear, pointed out to me the most suitable kind of wood for the construction of chariots. What a fortune!’ and he asked the bear:

‘My dear bear .... how about the branches and leaves of that tree and its stem? Dear good friend, please tell me every thing so that I know all about that tree.’

The bear gave his reply in two verses:

‘My dear friend, brahmin, there is a certain tree whose branches and twigs bend downwards and keep on hanging down. They are pliant, durable and strong. I am now standing at the base of that tree, it is called Melicoca trijuna. Its wood is the right stuff for making circumference of wheel, axle, shaft and all other components of a chariot.’

After uttering these two verses, the bear made off with a happy mind to some other place suitable for seeking his prey. Then the carpenter started to make arrangements for cutting down the tree. The guardian spirit of the tree thought: ‘Although I had not thrown down anything on his back, the bear has been harbouring a grudge against me and sowed the seed of enmity for nothing. He has now plotted to cause destruction of my habitation. With the destruction of my dwelling, I am certain to be destroyed too. I shall have to bring about his destruction with a ruse.’ He then transformed himself into the form of a human labourer and approaching the carpenter asked him: ‘O man, you have got a beautiful tree; what do you intend to do, once you have cut it into wood?’ The carpenter replied: ‘I will make it into a chariot frame.’

‘Who has told you that the wood of this tree is good for making chariot?’ queried the tree spirit. ‘A bear told me so,’ was the reply. The tree spirit said: ‘That’s good. The bear has given you a good advice. Indeed, the chariot you are going to make, according to the advice of the bear, should turn out to be a fine looking one. I too should like to give you a suggestion, that is, strengthen your chariot frame work with a girdle of bear’s skin, removed from round its neck. This will make it stronger than if it were secured with tin plates, and increase your income from the chariots.’

When asked by the carpenter: ‘O my dear man, from where can I get the bear’s skin?’ the tree spirit said:

‘O man, are you still a young boy not to know that the tree is inanimate; it will remain here and will not run away. Just hurry after the bear who has told you about the tree and ask him by showing great respect: ‘O my Lord, which part of the tree you have shown me should be cut?’ and persuade him back to the tree. Then suspecting nothing, he would point out with his long stretched-out snout: ‘Cut here, cut here.’ At that moment, you cut him down with a sharp axe and put him to death. Then strip him off his leather, eat his flesh and attend to the business of cutting down the tree.’

Thus the seed of enmity was sown. On hearing the guardian spirit of the tree, the brahmin carpenter expressed his feeling of delight in these words: ‘O How marvellous, this is an auspicious day for me.’ He returned home after killing the bear and cutting down the tree.

The Buddha concluded His discourse by expounding the following Abhisambuddha verses in order to exhort and instruct the feuding kinsmen.

*Isso ca pana phandānaṃ aññamaññaṃ vivādena
aññamaññaṃghatayum*

Your Royal Highnesses .... In this manner, the tree spirit quarrelled with the bear; and the bear in turn disputed with the tree spirit. Their animosity finally led to their destructions.

*Evameva manussānaṃ Vivādo yathā jāyati
mayuranaccaṃ naccanti
yathā te issaphandaṇā.*

Your Royal Highnesses .... When people fight against one another, they do so like the bear and the tree spirit in the manner of a dancing peacock. Just as a peacock could not dance without exposing the private parts of its body, so the people fighting one another are not capable of concealing what is to be concealed .... (a reference to the derogatory remarks concerning the origin of the Sakyans and Koliyans made by the warring factions).

*Taṃ vo vadāmi bhaddaṃ vo
yāvantaṭṭha samāgatā samodatha mā vivadatha
mā hoṭṭha issaphandaṇā*

Your Royal Highnesses, may you always be blessed with glory and graciousness, you, who, have gathered together on the banks of Rohini, I exhort you to act after the manner of the waters of the two rivers, Ganges and Jumna, harmoniously mixing together with loving-kindness. Avoid fighting one another and caused mutual destruction. Do not follow the example of the bear and the tree spirit.

*Sāmaggimeva sikkhetha Buddhe hetam pasamsitam samaggirato Dhammaṭṭho
yogakkhemā na dhansati*

Your Royal Highnesses, strive only for unity. Every Buddha has praised the virtues of unity. He who delights in harmonious living, established in the ten modes of good conduct (sucarita)<sup>11</sup> is bound to achieve nothing less than the happiness of Nibbāna, the end of all attachments (yogas), which yoke one to rebirth.

The two rival factions of Sakyans and Koliyans were amicably reunited after hearing the discourse of the Buddha. In winding up the discourse, the Buddha revealed that He was the Chief Guardian deity of the whole forest who had personal knowledge of the conflict between the bear and the tree spirit.

Duddubha Jātaka

The Buddha then went on giving exhortation to the assembled crowd. “Your Royal Highnesses, do not believe what others say without giving careful consideration. All the quadruples of the Himalaya forest, which was three yojanas in extent, were once about to plunge into the great ocean for trusting, without reasoning, the word of a hare that ran away screaming: ‘The earth has crumbled! The earth has crumbled!’ You should never allow yourself to become a person who is taken in by what others say without careful consideration.” With these introductory words, the Buddha gave the discourse on Duddubha Jātaka of Catukka Nipata<sup>12</sup>.

Discourse on Laṭukika Jātaka

Then the Buddha went on to explain to them that sometimes it is possible that a weak one could get an opportunity to destroy a strong one while, on other occasions, the strong one gets the chance to wreak havoc with a weak one. Giving the instance where a young skylark had caused the death of a full grown elephant, He gave the following discourse on Latukika Jātaka of Pancaka Nipata:

“Excellencies .... Once upon a time, a Bodhisatta was born as an elephant during the reign of King Brahmadatta in Bārāṇasī. When it grew up, it had a fine appearance with a huge body. It lived in the forests of Himalayas, governing a herd of elephants numbering eighty thousand.

At that time a female skylark happened to have laid her eggs on the beaten tracks of elephants. The Bodhisatta elephant travelled, in the company of eighty thousand elephants, along the route at a time when the chicken skylarks were not yet capable of flying. Eventually, the Bodhisatta and his herd of elephants arrived at the spot where the skylarks were staying.

When the skylark saw the king elephant, she was worried about the safety of her chickens. She thought: “If I did not approach the king elephant, it would surely tread upon my chickens and kill them. I should immediately approach it with a request for a rightful protection of my chickens.” So with her wings closed together as if to make obeisance, she stood right in front of the king elephant and made her submission:

*Vandāmi tam kuñcara saṭṭhihayanam āraṇṇakam yuthapatim yasassim
pakkhehi tam pañcalikam karomi
mā me vadhī puttake dubbalāya.*

O Your Majesty, King of elephants .... one whose strength wanes only at the age of sixty, chief of the herd of elephants that roam in the forest, I salute you, paying my homage to you with clasped wings. I pray that my children be spared their lives by not treading upon them.

Whereupon the Bodhisatta gave her comfort with those words: “O young female skylark, don't be downhearted, I will protect your chickens so that no harm will come to them,” and he stood over the young ones shielding them with his body. All the elephants by-passed him and the young skylarks were saved. The Bodhisatta then called the female skylark and gave an advice before he left: “Young female skylark, a large rogue elephant, with no companions, will come this way after us. He will not take our words. When he comes along, you had better approach him also for the safety of your children, praying him to spare their lives.”

When the female skylark saw the rogue elephant coming along, she approached him with her wings clasped in homage and beseeched him thus as advised by the elephant King!:

*Vandami tam kuñjara ekacārim āraññakam pabbatasānugocaram

---

12. This Jātaka treats of the story of a hare who was unduly scared by the fall of a bale fruit on the palm leaf under which it was sleeping. It ran towards the ocean through fright screaming: ‘The earth has crumbled.’ Equally frightened without any reasoning, all the four-legged animals of the Himalayan forest ran along until they were stopped by the Lion King who saved them from the impending danger after careful investigation into the aspect of the matter. (For more details, may refer to the Five hundred and fifty Jātaka).

O elephant king, a lone wanderer of the forests, grazing in the valleys of rocky and sandy hills, I salute you, paying my homage to you with clasped wings. I pray that my young ones will be spared their lives by not treading upon them.

On hearing the female skylark's humble request, the rogue elephant replied:

Vadissami te laṭukike puttakāni kiṃ me tuvaṃ kahasi dubbalāsi satam saḥassanipi tadisīnam vāmena pādena papothayeyyaṃ

Hey, you female skylark .... (Why do you keep your young ones in my way? That's enough of your insolence). I shall tread upon them and crush them to death. How can you revenge on me when you are weak and I am powerful enough to pulverise one lakh of your kind with my left foot.

So saying the rogue elephant crushed the young ones of the female skylark to dust, and caused them to be washed away in the stream of his urine and departed, shouting with the voice of a crane.

Perched on the branch of a tree, the female skylark threatened: “Hey, you silly brute of an elephant! You have the upper hand this time and go away, crowing gleefully in the tone of a crane. You just wait! Within two or three days you will see my move. You are not aware that intellectual might is more powerful than physical force, I will let you know that fact within a few days.

balam hi bālassa vadhāya hoti karissāmi te nāgarājā anattam yo me vadhī puttake dubbalāya*

O elephant king .... not every thing could be accomplished by means of physical force alone; unwise use of physical strength could be suicidal. You have mercilessly crushed to death my helpless children; I will bring about your destruction within a few days.

After thus making the war-cry, the female skylark managed within two or three days to gain the friendship of a crow by waiting upon it. Being delighted by the skylark's pleasant behaviour, the crow asked her: “Is there any thing I can do for you?” The skylark replied: “What I want to ask you as a favour is to cause damage to the pair of eyes of the rogue elephant that used to roam about alone; that is the assistance I need.”

The crow gave his word: “I will do it.” The skylark then went to a big dark-blue female fly and formed friendship with it in a like manner. When the fly asked her what she wanted, she requested: “When my friend the crow has once damaged the eyes of the lone rogue elephant, it is my wish that you help me by laying your eggs in the sockets of the elephant's damaged eyes.” When the dark-blue female fly gave her assurance for co-operation, saying: “Yes, I will,” the skylark approached a frog and sought its friendship as before. The frog asked her what it could do to help her and she replied: “When the lone rogue elephant has gone blind through the assistance of my two friends, the crow and the fly, and is looking for water to quench his thirst, I wish you to croak from the top of the hill. When the elephant climbs up the hill after hearing your voice, you might get down to the bottom of the cliff to make sound from there. This is all the assistance I look for from my frog friend.” The frog gave, likewise, his promise to assist the female skylark.

On the following day, the crow pounded the eyes of the elephant with its beak as requested by the skylark; the dark-blue fly laid its eggs in the damaged eyes. Suffering painfully from damaged eyes now infested with maggots and from intense thirst, the lone rogue elephant groped blindly after water.

The frog then started croaking from the top of the hill, hearing the frog croaking, and thinking: “Where the frog croaks, there must be water,” the elephant climbed up the hill with great hope. The frog went down the cliff and started making noise from the bottom of the hill. Heading towards the cliff from where the sound seemed to come, the elephant went tumbling down the hill and died through the fall.

The skylark was delighted when it came to know the death of its enemy, the rogue elephant, and uttered, out of joy: “Oh I have seen the back of my enemy,” so saying, it strutted to and fro on the back of the elephant several times and made off to a place of its liking.”

The Buddha exhorted the two groups of the royal family, saying: “O your Royal Highnesses, you should not engage in hostilities with any one; as explained, even an elephant of great strength could be brought to ruin by the combined efforts of small powerless creatures, such as the crow, the dark-blue fly, the frog and the skylark,” and He continued to teach the following verse of Abhisam Buddha:

*Kakañca passa laṭukikāṃ
maṇḍhūkāṃ nīlamakkhikāṃ
ete nagam aghatesuṃ
passa verassa verinaṃ tasama hi verāṃ na kayirātha appiyenapi kenaci.*

O members of the Sakyan clan! Look at these small creatures, the crow, the skylark, the frog and the dark-blue fly; these four creatures, because they were united, had brought about the complete downfall of a powerful bull elephant. You can see the outcome of hatred accruing to a person who wish to engage in hostilities. Therefore, you should not carry on a feud with anyone, not even with someone you do not like.

In winding up the discourse, the Buddha revealed that: “The rogue elephant at that time was Devadatta of today and the noble leader of the elephant herd at that time was Myself.”

Discourse on Rukkha Dhamma Jātaka

Having expounded the three Jātakas, namely, Phandāna, Duddhubha and Latukika, the Buddha proceeded to expound two more Jātakas to bring home the advantages of unity:

“O Your Royal Highnesses .... You all are related to one another by blood; and it would be only right and proper for blood relatives to be closely united and work together in harmony. No enemy can harm you when you stand united. Unity is necessary even for trees that are inanimate, leave alone conscious creatures such as human beings. I will cite you a relevant instance:

Once upon a time, a forest of Sāla trees in the Himalayas was struck by a violent storm. But not a single tree suffered the slightest damage, as they stood in a body, securely fastened to one another by plants and bushes. The storm could not touch the trees but brushed against the topmost part of the tree and broke away. In contrast a lone tree complete with big trunks and branches was blown down, root and branch, by a strong wind for want of solidarity and united front in close association and collaboration with other trees, plants and bushes. It is essential, therefore, that you all stand in a body united through co-operation and co-ordination.”

Whereupon the members of the royal family requested the Buddha to expound the appropriate Jātaka in more details:

“Royal Highnesses .... It was during the region of King Brahmadata in Bārāṇasī that a Vessavana deva passed away and Sakka appointed another deva in his place. During this transitional period, the new Vessavana deva issued a fresh order permitting all the devas to accommodate themselves in the places of their own choice amongst trees, plants and thickets.

The Bodhisatta was then a sylvan deity in charge of a Sāla forest in the region of the Himalaya. He gave advice to his relatives thus: ‘My dear men, don’t you choose the trees growing in the bare plane as your dwelling places; you will be well advised to dwell on the trees surrounding the one which I have chosen as my abode in the forest.’

The wise ones among the deities occupied the trees surrounding the abode of the Bodhisatta as he had advised. The unwise deities agreed amongst themselves: ‘No useful purpose would be served by residing on trees amidst the forest away from human habitations. Only those living in the vicinity of villages and towns could better their prospects, both for gain and fame.’ So deciding, they chose to occupy trees along the main road in the bare plains.

After sometimes, a violent storm, accompanied by torrential rain, visited the area and all the trees including trees of great dimensions got their boughs and branches broken away and they fell down by the roots. When the violent storm reached the Sāla forest controlled by the Bodhisatta, they blew wildly all over the forest, but none of the trees fell because they were knitted closely together.

Those, who were rendered homeless, went holding their young ones by hand, to their friends dwelling in the sāla forest of the Himalayas and acquainted them with their miserable plight. Their friends in the Sāla forest recounted in turn, the story of their woes to the sylvan Deva Bodhisatta.

Whereupon, the Bodhisatta made it plain to them: “It is quite natural that the people who decided to dwell in such places against the advice of the wise, have to face such difficulties,” and expounded the following discourse in verse:

*Sāhu sambahulā ñāti
api rukkhā araññajā
vāto vahati ekaṭṭham
brahmahāntampi vanappatim*

O My relative devas .... when a great number of friends and relatives live close together, dependent upon one another, even the trees growing all over the forest, dwell comfortably free from oppression by the enemies. But the tree growing in isolation on the open plain, in spite of its huge trunk and many thick branches, cannot withstand the tempest which uproots it with all its branches and leaves.

After giving this discourse, the Bodhisatta passed away at the expiry of his life span.”

The Buddha concluded the discourse by exhorting them thus: “O Royal Highnesses .... all the relatives should first strive to achieve unity; having achieved it, live happy, harmonious life, suffusing one another with loving-kindness.” He finally revealed that: “The audience present today were the deities of the Sāla forest and I was the wise sylvan deity who gave them guidance.”

Discourse on Vattaka Jātaka (or Sammodamāna Jātaka)

The Buddha then made further exhortation .... “O Royal Highnesses, it is not at all proper to quarrel amongst own relatives. There was an instance in the past where even animals could conquer their enemies and live together harmoniously through unity, and they perished due to internal strife.” At the request of the kinsmen, the Buddha then gave an exposition of the Vattaka Jātaka.

“Excellencies .... Long time ago, a Bodhisatta was born as a quail and lived in a forest with thousands of companions during the reign of King Brahmadatta in Bārāṇasī.

A bird-hunter used to go to the place of the quails and enticed them by imitating their cry. Once the quails arrived and formed a gathering at a spot, he spread out his net over them. He then walked around the edge of the net to drive the quails to the centre of the net. The quails were then seized and put in a basket and taken away for sale. The hunter earned his living by catching and selling the quails.

One day, the Bodhisatta addressed all the quails in the group under his care:

“My dear quails, the bird-hunter has caused serious damage to our kind for several times now. I have now devised a plan to avert danger of being caught by the bird-hunter, and this is what each and every one of us should do. Once we are caught under the net thrown over us by the hunter, every one should shoot his head out of the holes in the netting and then simultaneously lifting the net and fly away. You should all perch on a cluster of bushes, in a safe place, where the net will remain entangled with them, We can make our escape from beneath the net and fly away.”

All the quails in his group accepted his advice saying: “Very well.” On the following day, all the quails lifted up the net simultaneously at the moment they were caught in the net of the hunter, and flew away. They threw the net on a bush and flew away in different directions.

The hunter could free his net from the bush only after dusk and went back home empty handed. The next day the quails acted in the same manner too. The hunter took a long time to retrieve his net and went home empty handed again. This event continued in this way for some time. The hunter's wife became cross with her husband and asked him: “You come home late and empty handed day after day. It is as if you have someone to be maintained like myself.”

“O my woman .... I have no one to maintain except you. The thing is that the quails are still there flying about the places. They are closely knit as before. As soon as I spread the net over them, they lift it up and carry it away and drop it into the thorny bushes. But, my dear, they cannot remain united for ever; so don't you trouble yourselves with suspicion on me. There will surely come a time when the quails will start quarrelling with one another, then I will catch them all and bring them to you to make you smile,” consoled the hunter, who recited the following verse:

*Sammodamānāgacchanti
jālamādaya pakkhino
yadā te vivadissanti
tadā ehinti me vasam*

My good lady, with harmonious unity and co-operation, the quails carry away the net I have thrown over them, drop it on the thorny bushes and make their escape. There will be a time when they start quarrelling amongst themselves. At that time, they will have to yield to my wishes.

Quails' Destruction through Dissension

A few days later, a quail accidentally treaded on the head of another quail as it came down into the pasture. The sufferer asked, in a threatening tone, and showing its anger: “Who is that that tread on my head?” The other quail replied meekly: “Please pardon me, my dear friend, I have done it through carelessness. Please don't be angry with me.” But the angry quail could not be pacified. The two began to make scurrilous attack upon each other very often, beginning from that day.

When the two quails were found to be in quarrelsome mood, arguing as to who could lift the hunter's net, the Bodhisatta foresaw a trail of consequences:

“Where there are heated arguments, there can be no peace and happiness. As of now, the quails will fail to take part in the lifting and carrying away of the net. The lives of numerous quails are at stake, the hunter will undoubtedly take advantage of the situation. It will not be proper for me to stay at this place any longer.”

He therefore departed from this place, taking along with him all the quails which are the associates forming his group. Only the group of quails, headed by the future Devadatta, remained in that forest.

The bird-hunter went to the same spot a few days later and made the sound in imitation of the quail, and threw his net over the quails headed by Devadatta. (Instead of working unitedly for their freedom), the quails started finding faults among themselves, quarrelling and challenging one another as to their superiority in strength and ability in lifting the net. The bird-hunter lost no time in capturing and taking them to his house as handsome presents for his wife.”

The Buddha, in winding up the discourse said: “Excellencies, strifes amongst relatives are, on no account, justifiable, it is the causal condition of destruction,” and finally revealed that: “Devadatta was the leading ignorant quail and I was the wise leader of quails of the other group at that time.”

Discourse on Attadaṇḍa Sutta

The Buddha after expounding the five Jātakas, proceeded to teach the Attadanda Sutta<sup>13</sup> of Sutta-nipatta Pāli Text, as the final discourse.

The members of the royal families of the two countries finally reconciled and appeased, and, with devotional faith and full of gratitude, agreed amongst themselves: “Had not the Buddha come and intervened, we would certainly have destroyed one another and made the blood flow in a stream. We have been saved from mutual destruction only because of Him. Above all, had He not chosen to renounce the world, He would have been enjoying the life of a Universal Monarch, ruling over the Four Continents surrounded by two thousand smaller islands. Accompanied by thousands of His sons of great intellectual and physical strength, He would have roamed over all His dominions followed by a large retinue. But our royal kith and kin of noble blood, the Buddha, had renounced all the pleasures and luxuries of a Universal Monarch to become a recluse and He had blossomed forth as a Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha. It would be only right and proper, now that He had become a Buddha, we should let Him have bhikkhus of royal blood to attend upon Him.” With this unanimous decision, the royal members of the two countries offered two hundred and fifty princes, from each country to the Buddha, for ordination.

The Buddha accepted them and ordained them as chi-bhikkhus and took them to Mahāvana Grove near the city of Kapilavatthu. From the following day onwards, He took alternate turns to receive alms-food from Kapilavatthu and Koliya in the company of these five hundred bhikkhus. The people of the two countries offered the Sangha large amount of alms-food.

Five Hundred Bhikkhus are Unhappy in The Sāsana

These five hundred bhikkhus had taken up the ascetic life not out of their own volition, but because they were unable to refuse the request of their parents and relatives. Thus, within a few days, the five hundred bhikkhus found their life tedious, uninteresting, and boring. News from their homes also did not help to make them happier in the monastery. “We beseech you not to take delight in the life of a bhikkhu; from the time of your departure, our private business have been deteriorating day by day,” wrote their wives to them.

Buddha taught Kuṇāla Jātaka to The Five Hundred Bhikkhus

The Buddha kept constant watch over these five hundred bhikkhus by personal contact, three times in a day and three times at night, a total of six times a day, just as a pheasant looks after her eggs, a fabulous beast Camari regards for its tail, a mother cares for her only son, a one-eyed man regards for his only good eye. He became well aware of the unhappy state of their minds and He considered: “These bhikkhus felt discontented and tedious even in the company of such a person as Myself, the Buddha, what kind of discourse would be suitable for them?” He perceived that Kunalā Jātaka, (which mentions frailties and weaknesses in the character of women) would be the best for them. Therefore, He made the decision: “I shall first take these bhikkhus to the Himalayas, then, by relating Kunala Jātaka, I shall bring home to them the imperfections and defects in the character of women. In this way, I shall remove the unhappiness and discontent which had risen in their hearts and give them the knowledge of Path, sotāpatti-nāna.”

The Buddha entered the city of Kapilavatthu in the morning for the usual round of alms-food, and in the afternoon He asked the five hundred bhikkhus: “Have you ever seen the pleasant forests of the Himalaya regions?” and they replied: “We have never seen them, Lord.” He asked them again: “Do you like to pay a short visit to the forest of Himalayas?” “Most Glorious Buddha, we do not possess any supernatural power; how would we go there then.” Whereupon He asked: “But if someone who has the power offers to take you there, would you like to go along with him?” The bhikkhus answered: “Yes, Lord, we will.”

The Buddha, exercising His supernormal power, took them all through the space towards Himalayas, and in the course of the journey, while still remaining in the sky, they were shown the golden, silver, emerald, vermilion mountains, mountains of glass, etc., the five great rivers and the seven great lakes. The Himalayas was of huge dimension, five hundred yojana high with an area of three thousand yojanas. The Buddha was revealing to the five hundred bhikkhus by His supernatural power only a small portion of the delightful splendours of the Himalayas. He also showed them four-legged animals such as lions, tigers, elephants, as well as enchanting parks and gardens teeming with various kinds of flora and fauna, abounding in numerous species of birds, aquatic and land flowers. They were shown also the sheer cliff on the east side of the Himalayas, the whole surface of which was golden and the cliff on the west completely covered with vermilion.

From the moment they had witnessed the rare spectacle and the strange sceneries of the mighty Himalayas, all these five hundred bhikkhus had virtually cut off their attachment to their former wives. Then the Buddha, with all the five hundred bhikkhus, descended on the western slope of the Himalayas where there was a massive vermilion slab, sixty yojanas in extent, on which was a huge Sāla tree (that will last to the end of the present world-system) with a height and width of seven yojanas. Under the shade of that tree, on a vermilion platform, three yojanas in width, the Buddha took His seat surrounded by the five hundred bhikkhus. With brilliant six-hued rays emitting from His body, He sat there looking like the morning sun whose rays were being reflected from the surface of the ocean. He then addressed the bhikkhus: “Bhikkhus, you may ask Me if there is anything in this vast region of the Himalayas you have not seen before.”

At that moment, a king of cuckoos, seated on a stick that was carried by a pair of youthful hen cuckoos with their beaks on either end of the horizontal stick, was seen coming down from a higher altitude. They were accompanied by groups of eight youthful hen cuckoos, each group taking their positions above their heads, below them, on their right and left and on their front and back. Struck with wonder at the sight of the strange spectacle, the five hundred bhikkhus made their request to the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, what kind of birds are they and how are they called?”

“Bhikkhus .... those birds are the descendants of a succession of generations of cuckoos that owe their origin to a species of bird I was born in long ago. Such youthful hen cuckoos had treated Me in like manner at the very outset, their number being three thousand five hundred in my days. The number has dwindled in time and there is now just enough to preserve the species.”

Then the bhikkhus requested the Buddha to recount how those three thousand five hundred cuckoos had attended upon Him in those forests. Whereupon He expounded the Kuṇāla Jātaka of Asiti Nipata in three hundred verses to draw lessons from.

Bhikkhus becoming Sotāpannas

By the end of the discourse, all the five hundred bhikkhus, the descendants of the Sakyan clan, attained sotāpatti-phala. At the moment of entering the sotāpatti-magga, all the bhikkhus became endowed with supernormal psychic powers such as flying through space, etc.

Certain ariya-puggalas, after realization of the Path and Fruition, practise the Concentration Meditation and attain the mundane jhānas with abhiññās; other ariyas, having attained mundane jhānas with abhiññās even while they were still worldlings, have no need to practise Concentration Meditation afresh; they can enjoy the privileges of mundane jhāna and abhiññās easily at will.

Still there is another type of ariyas who were not endowed with mundane jhānas and abhiññās while still ordinary worldlings and yet, the moment they realize the supra-mundane Path and Fruition, they become endowed with mundane jhānic and abhiññā powers which they can enjoy at will easily. Such jhānic attainments are termed 'Magga-siddhi-jhāna' meaning 'Jhāna attained through realization of magga'; and such abhiññās are called 'Magga-siddhi-abhiññās' meaning 'Abhiññās attained through realization of magga'.

Those five hundred bhikkhus, due to former applications and deeds of merit, achieved Magga-siddhi-jhāna and Magga-siddhi-abhiññās, without having to specially practise Concentration meditation for them. They can enjoy these privileges freely at will.)

The Buddha considered that the Path and Fruitional stage of sotāpatti should be sufficient for the five hundred bhikkhus for the time being and departed for the Mahāvana forest by His psychic power. The bhikkhus, who had relied upon Him on their outward journey, returned to the Mahāvana forest, by their own powers, accompanying the Buddha.

The Occasion of The Great Assembly (Mahāsamaya)

Taking His seat on the prepared throne in the Mahāvana Forest, the Buddha caused the bhikkhus to be assembled and addressed them:

“Dear bhikkhus .... come on, sit down, I shall teach you the meditation practice that leads you to the three higher stages of the Path (magga), through eradication of defilements.” He then instructed them on the meditation method for attainment of the three higher maggas.

The bhikkhus thought to themselves:

“The Buddha, being well aware that we were not happy leading the life of a bhikkhu in the Dispensation, took us to Kunala lake and then having removed our discontent and unhappiness led us to the first stage of sotāpatti-phala. And now that, in this Mahāvana forest, He has taught us the meditation method of attaining the three higher maggas, we should not become lax with the thought: ‘We are sotāpanna-ariya,’ but should strive hard like those pioneers who have gone before us attaining the state of perfection through application.”

They paid homage to the Buddha and left; in the secluded place at the base of trees, each of them spread their own small mats, and sat on them.

The Buddha perceived:

“These bhikkhus, being sotāpannas, know the technique of attaining the Path and Fruition and as such, they will not have any difficulty to achieve the higher stage of the Path and Fruition. Each and every one of bhikkhus who have now gone to practice the Vipassanā meditation will return in the evening to acquaint me with the virtues of arahatship he has gained. All the devas and Brahmās from the ten thousand universe will also gather together in this Universe at the same time. Then this will be an occasion of a Great Assembly (Mahāsamaya). It would be better for me to wait for such an assembly from a secluded place.”

Having considered in this way, He went to a secluded spot and sat on the reserved place abiding in phala-samāpatti.

The Five Hundred Bhikkhus attained Arahatsip

Of the five hundred bhikkhus, the one, who left first after receiving instructions on meditation, attained arahatship complete with four paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa before the rest. The bhikkhu, who left second after receiving instructions, attained arahatship with paṭisaṃbhida-ñāṇa like the first one. He was next followed by the third bhikkhu in a like manner. Thus all the five hundred bhikkhus had their knowledge of the Four Noble Truths blossoming out as arahatta-phala one after another like Paduma lilies blooming forth into beautiful flowers in order of maturity.

The first bhikkhu who attained arahatship, rose from his seat picking up the small mat on which he had been sitting with a view to go to the Buddha to acquaint Him with his attainment. The second and the third bhikkhu and all the rest of them followed suit and headed towards the refectory. Then they went in a long queue as if they had lined themselves according to seniority in monkhood, to where the Buddha was waiting for them.

The bhikkhu who arrived first sat on the small mat at a suitable place and prepared to address the Buddha with the virtues of the arahatta-phala he had attained. But first, he turned round to see if there was anyone coming behind him with the same idea, and saw the second bhikkhu, the third bhikkhu, and finally all the five hundred bhikkhus lined up in a row after him.

When all the bhikkhus had taken their seats at suitable places, each one looked at the other with a searching eye to form an idea of one another's intention and discovered, that "each one of them felt shy to address the Buddha about his attainment."

Two Qualities of Arahats

- (1) Noble arahats always have the welfare of all beings at heart and their sincere wish that "devas, humans and Brahmās acquire the penetrative Insight-wisdom which they attained."
- (2) They have no desire to reveal their attainment of arahatship for conspicuousness unlike the person who has discovered a pot of gold.

Expounding of Mahāsamaya Sutta

The Great Assembly of the five hundred bhikkhus took place in the cool evening on the full moon day of Jetthamasa. No sooner had the five hundred arahats taken their seats, the moon appeared, rising from the top of mount Yugandhara in the eastern hemisphere, free from five kinds of obstructions, namely, dew, mist, cloud, eclipse and smoke. The moon, in its fullness, assumed the form of a framed disc of a silver mirror or the frame of a silver wheel turning round and round on its edge, hanging high above the eastern horizon, shining with all its brightness as if to reveal the world that was made delightful and pleasurable by the appearance of the Enlightened Buddha. At that auspicious moment, the Buddha was still in residence in the forest of Mahāvana near Kapilavatthu of Sakka country, in the company of five hundred arahats.

The Gathering of Devas and Brahmas

The devas residing in the environs of Mahāvana, in great excitement, hailed one another: "O friends! Come, let us go. To pay homage to the Buddha is meritorious; to hear the Dhamma is beneficial; to pay respects to the Sangha is to acquire great merit; Come, friends, let us go." Thus clamouring, they congregate in the presence of the Buddha, making obeisance to Him as well as to the five hundred bhikkhus who had just attained arahatship.

Their rousing clamour, spread far and wide, reaching by stages from a haling distance, to half a gāvuta, to a gāvuta, to half a yojana, and to a yojana and thus extending from the centre of this universe to the surrounding ten thousand universes. All the devas and Brahmās, inhabiting these ten thousand universes, therefore congregated in this universe, excepting the few Brahmās, the Asaññasa (no consciousness) Brahmās, Arūpa (Formless) Brahmās and those Brahmās who happened to be absorbed in their jhāna attainments (samāpatti).

At that time, the universe was entirely packed with devas from celestial regions, reaching up to the Brahmā realms (like a needle case packed tightly with needles with no space left between them) who had come to attend the Great Assembly. The distance between the plane of Brahmās and the human world may be reckoned by dropping a boulder (of the size of seven tiers, crowning the graduated mansion known as ‘Lohapa’ of Sri Lanka) from the Brahmā land. It took four months for that boulder to reach the human plane. The space between the two planes was so tightly packed with the devas and Brahmās that there was no vacuum whatsoever, even for the sweet fragrance of flowers to float upwards or a mustard seed to find its way downwards.

When a Universal Monarch sat in congregation with all the monarchs from the vassal states, privileged and powerful rulers who arrived earlier could find their seats which were in the vicinity of the Universal Monarch (not too uncomfortable). But those who arrived later could occupy only back seats which were packed tight and provided little comfort. In a like manner, the space around the Buddha who was like a Universal Monarch, was comparatively not so tight. All the powerful Brahmās, such as Mahāsakkha Brahmas, could find their seats close by the Buddha. But even there, those privileged powerful Brahmās had to make themselves comfortable, occupying a tiny space the size of a yak tails end, in batches of ten, twenty, to sixty, by making their bodies subtler and subtler.

Late Arrival of Four Suddhāvāsa Brahmas

When the Buddha and the five hundred arahats, together with devas and Brahmās from ten thousand universes, had assembled (as stated above), four Suddhāvāsa (arahat) Brahmās rose from absorption in jhāna at the expiry of the pre-determined duration. When they looked round the Brahmā realms, they found the whole region lifeless (like a deserted mess room after lunch time). On investigating ‘where the Brahmās had gone’, they noticed that the Great Assembly was in progress.

The four arahat-Brahmās discussed among themselves: “This is a great assembly and we are left behind, and there will be no seats for late comers. Let us not go empty handed; let each of us prepare a verse for presentation to the Assembly. These gift verses will serve as an intimation of our arrival and as a gesture of our homage to the Buddha.” Having agreed thus, each Brahmā composed a stanza before they left the plane of Brahmās and then one arahat-Brahmā descended on the edge of the eastern hemisphere of the universe; another descended on the edge of the southern hemisphere of the universe; another one descended on the edge of the western hemisphere of the universe and the last one on the edge of the northern hemisphere of the universe.

- (1) The arahat-Brahmā who had descended on the edge of the eastern hemisphere entered into jhāna through meditation device of dark blue object (nila kasīna); and to signify his presence, emitted brilliant dark blue rays from his body that enveloped all the devas and Brahmās from the ten thousand universes as though they were covered by an emerald blanket. He then traversed along the approach passage, Buddha vithi, (free from any hindrance and reserved for easy access to the Buddha) and stood in front of the Buddha, paying homage by presenting the verse he had composed:

*Mahāsamayo pavamasamiñ
devakāyā samāgatā
āgatamhā imam Dhammasamyam
dakkhitāye apārajitasamgham*

Most Exalted, Glorious Buddha .... Today, a Great Assembly of devas and Brahmās from the ten thousand universes is being convened in the forest of Mahāvana to pay homage to the arahats who have conquered the Three Maras with pure devotional faith. Like all these devas and Brahmās, we have also arrived with great delight at this congregation to pay our respect to the invincible victors, the arahats, with pure devotional faith.

Having presented this stanza, he returned (for want of space in the vicinity of the Buddha’s throne) to the edge of the eastern hemisphere of the universe and remained standing there.

- (2) The Brahmā who had descended on the edge of the southern hemisphere of the universe entered into jhāna based on meditation device of golden yellow object (pita kasīna); and to signify his presence, emitted brilliant golden yellow rays from his body that enveloped all the devas and Brahmās from the ten thousand universes as though they were covered under a cloak of gold. Then after the manner of the first Brahmā, approached the Buddha and presented his verse:

*Tatra bhikkhuvo samādahaṃsu
cittamattano ujukamakamsu
sārathīva nettāni gahetvā
Indriyāni rakkhanti panditā*

Most Exalted, Glorious Buddha .... at this congregation of the devas and Brahmās, the five hundred arahats have kept their minds at peace and perfectly tranquilised through developing the highest state of supramundane concentration of attainment, appana-samādhi. They have kept their minds perfectly upright, free from mental deviations which may be likened to three deviations from straightness exemplified by zigzag track of urine of an ox, the comb shape crescent of the moon and the curvature of a harrow's handle. In the same way, a skilful charioteer of a chariot harnessed to well-tamed Sindara horses, held the reins gently without pulling them roughly, to get an easy, comfortable ride, these five hundred arahats, wise with Path Knowledge (maggā-ñāṇa), have guarded the sense doors, the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, against the inroads of defilements by means of the guardian Mindfulness. Most Exalted, Glorious Buddha .... we have come to this forest of Mahāvana with the object of paying homage to these five hundred arahats.

Then he went back to his place at the edge of the southern hemisphere of the universe like his predecessor and remained standing there.

- (3) Then the Brahmā who had descended on the edge of the western hemisphere of the universe entered into jhāna based on meditation device of red object (lohita kasīna); and to signify his presence at the Great Assembly emitted shining red colour from his body that enveloped all the devas and Brahmās from the ten thousand universes as though they have been wrapped up in a cloak of red colour. Then after the manner of his predecessors, approached the Buddha and presented his verse:

*Chetvā khīlam chetvā paligham
Iṇḍa khīlam ūhajjha maneja te caranti suddhā vimalā
cakkhumatā sudantā susunāgā*

Most Exalted and Glorious Buddha, the youthful arahats, who being well instructed, have been subdued and tamed to restrain their six faculties by the Buddha who is gifted with five kinds of eye: Buddha-cakkhu, the eye of a Buddha who sees the heart of humans; Dhamma-cakkhu, the eye of Truth which means attainment of the Path knowledge; Samanta-cakkhu, the eye of all round knowledge, Omniscience; Mansa-cakkhu, the physical eye which is exceptionally powerful and sensitive; Dibba-cakkhu, the deva-eye which is all pervading, seeing all that proceeds in the hidden worlds. These youthful arahats have done away with the thorns of passion, malice and delusion (lobha, dosa, moha) by the sword of the fourfold maggā-ñāṇa. They have struck off and destroyed the cross-bars and bolts (on the door of the chamber of existence) namely, lobha, dosa and moha, which hinder escape from the Saṃsāra. By the same weapon of maggā-ñāṇa, they have up-rooted the pillars, namely, lobha, dosa and moha, stoutly standing at the gate of the city of 'Sakkāya' (personality-belief), by means of the fourfold maggā. Being devoid of craving, free from taints and desires, they freely roam about in all the four directions without any hindrance of defilements. We have come to pay homage to these youthful arahats.

Then he went back to the edge of the western hemisphere of the universe and like his predecessors remained standing there.

- (4) Then the Brahmā who had descended on the edge of the northern hemisphere of the universe entered into jhāna based on meditation device of white object (odata kasina); and to signify his presence at the Great Assembly emitted rays of white colour from his body enveloping all the devas and Brahmās from the ten thousand worlds as though they have been wrapped up in robes made of Jasmine flowers. Then like the previous Brahmās, he approached the Buddha and recited the verse he had composed:

*Ye keci Buddhāṃ saraṇaṃ gatāse na te gamissanti apāyabhumiṃ
pahāya mānasāṃ dehaṃ
demkāyaṃ paripūressanti.*

Most Exalted, Glorious Buddha, any person who has taken refuge in the Buddha with confidence will not be reborn in the four planes of misery, viz., plane of suffering, of animal, of peta, of asura.

After presenting the verse, he went back to the edge of the northern hemisphere of the universe like his predecessors.

The Buddha observed that the Great Assembly of devas and Brahmās was taking place in the vast space which extended to the edges of the universe in width and to the plane of Akaniṭṭha Brahmā in height. He considered: "This is indeed a huge congregation of devas and Brahmās; the five hundred bhikkhus may not be aware of this fact. I will make it known to them presently." He therefore addressed them:

"Bhikkhus, all the devas and Brahmās from ten thousand universes have congregated here now to pay homage to the Omniscient Buddha whose coming (appearance), sugato, is just as excellent as those of the Supreme Buddhas of the past, and to the bhikkhus as well. Bhikkhus, just like this great assembly, similar congregations of devas and Brahmās (of the same magnitude, no more no less) had taken place during the time of Buddhas of the past also.

Bhikkhus, just like this great assembly, similar congregations of devas and Brahmās (of the same magnitude, no more, no less) will also take place during the time of the Supreme Buddhas in the future."

Devas and Brahmas as well as The Buddha formed Ideas of Their Own

The devas and Brahmās at the Assembly were of the opinion that, in consideration of the huge number of celestial beings present, the Buddha might mention only the names of powerful devas and Brahmās and those of minor importance might not be brought out. The Buddha, on considering what the devas and Brahmās might be thinking about, perceived what was going on in their minds, as though He had held their hearts with His hands thrust through their mouths, or just as the case of a thief being caught red-handed with the exhibit, and accordingly decided:

"I shall reveal the names and clans of all the devas and Brahmās from ten thousand world-systems who are present at this Great Assembly, irrespective of whether they are of great or small power."

Buddhas are very great and glorious personalities. There is nothing that is beyond their ken. All the six sense objects that make contact with the sense-organs of men and celestial beings to produce eye-consciousness, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind-consciousness are within the scope of their perception, with no obstruction whatsoever. The Buddha, therefore, had the power of differentiating between those who were fully matured and developed and ready to be released from the samsāra and those who were not yet ready to gain emancipation. He first (mentally) put aside all those beings who were not ready and gave His concentrated attention to those who would be benefitted by His teaching.

Again, amongst those who would gain release from samsāra, the Buddha divided them (mentally) into six groups, according to their inclinations, viz., devas and Brahmās with a propensity for lust, craving (rāga-cittam); devas and Brahmās with a propensity for aversion (dosa-cittam); devas and Brahmās with a propensity for delusion (moha-cittam); devas and Brahmās with a propensity for thought-conception (vitakka); devas and Brahmās with a propensity for faith (saddhā), and devas and Brahmās with a propensity for wisdom (paññā).

Then of these six groups, He decided that devas and Brahmās with an inclination towards lust, craving should be taught Sammā Paribbājaniya Sutta; those with tendency towards aversion, Kalahavivāda Sutta; those with inclination towards delusion, Mahābyuha Sutta; those with inclination towards thought-conception, Culabyuhā Sutta; those with inclination towards faith, Tuvaṭṭakapatipadā Sutta and those with wisdom tendency should be taught Purābheda Sutta.

He next determined which mode of teaching would be suitable for the assembled devas and Brahmās out of the four modes, namely,

- (1) teaching according to Buddha's free will, Attajjhāsaya sutta nikkhepa.
- (2) teaching according to the wish of the audience, Parajjhāsaya sutta nikkhepa.
- (3) teaching according to occasion or prevailing circumstance, Aṭṭhuppattika sutta nikkhepa.
- (4) teaching in the form of an answer to a particular question, Pucchāvasika sutta nikkhepa.

And He perceived that devas and Brahmās would gain emancipation through realization of the Four Noble Truths, on hearing a discourse taught by way of answering the question asked in harmony with their inclination. He then tried to see if any of the five hundred arahats was capable of raising such a question that would be in accord with the inclinations of the devas and Brahmās, and perceived that there was none among them. He also found out that the eighty senior Disciples and the two Chief Disciples were not capable of raising such a question.

He perceived that a Paccakabuddha was equally incapable of raising such a question. He then considered whether Sakka or Suyama Deva could fulfil His need, but they were also found to be incapable of raising such a question.

Finally, realising that only a Fully Enlightened Buddha like Him would be able to raise a question in accord with the inclination of devas and Brahmās, He looked into the innumerable world-systems with His infinite power of vision to see if there was another Enlightened Buddha in any of the universes, and He discovered that there was none of His equal in any of the universes.

(N.B. There is no wonder that He could find none to equal Him now (there being none). Indeed there was none of His equal, amongst the devas and humans, even at the time of His last birth. As baby Prince Siddhattha, he uttered the bold words: ‘Aggohamasmi lokassa. — I am supreme in the whole world.’ Needless to say that there was no one to equal Him now that He had become a Fully Enlightened Buddha.)

Creation of An Image of True Likeness of The Buddha

Perceiving there was not another Buddha like Himself, the Buddha considered that: “These devas and Brahmās would not get a penetrative insight into the Dhamma if I were to ask a question and then provide the answer myself. Only if another Buddha raised the question and I gave the answer to it, would it be a wonderful feat and the devas and Brahmās would get a penetrative insight of the Teaching. I would have to create an image of my true likeness.” For this purpose, the Buddha entered into the fourth rupāvacara (kiriya) jhāna which formed the foundation for development of supernatural power (abhiññā). Then arising from the jhāna, He made the resolution, through exercise of ‘Mahākiriya Nānasampyutta Adhiṭṭhan javana’ thought-process, that a Buddha of complete likeness of Him, in all respects, such as handling the bowl and robe, looking straight forward and glancing side ways, bending and stretching the limbs, should come into being. Thus He created another Buddha, an exact replica of Himself, as though it had emerged from the surface of the full moon which was then just rising from the top of Mt. Yugandhara in the eastern hemisphere.

Varying Views held by Devas and Brahmās

At the sight of the created Buddha (known as Nimitta Buddha), the devas and Brahmās expressed their views saying: “Friends, another moon has appeared besides the existing one.” When the Nimitta Buddha was seen emerging from the surface of the moon and coming closer to them, they changed their views and said: “Friends, that is not the moon but the appearance of the sun.” As the image came nearer, they said: “Friends, that is not the sun but the mansion of a deva.” When it was coming closer and closer, they said: “Friends, that is not a mansion but a deva”, and again they said: “Friends, that is not a deva but a great Brahmā,” and finally as it came quite close to them, they concluded: “Friends, that is not a great Brahmā, but, in fact, it is another Buddha coming to us.”

Of the celestial beings, ordinary (puttḥujana) devas and Brahmās thought to themselves: “When the universe was packed to its capacity by devas and Brahmās congregating to pay homage to a single Buddha, the number of devas and Brahmās for two Buddhas would be beyond imagination.” But the ariya devas and Brahmās concluded that there could not be two Buddhas in one and the same universe at the same time; therefore the other Buddha must be a creation in His own likeness by the living Buddha.”

In the meanwhile, the Nimitta Buddha came closer to the Buddha as the devas and Brahmās were looking on, and sat face to face with Him, on a seat kept in reserve on equal level, without paying homage to the Buddha.

There were thirty two characteristics of a great person on the body of the Buddha, and the Nimitta Buddha also bore the same characteristics. Six-hued rays emanated scintillating from the body of the Buddha; and the same kind of six-hued rays also emanated scintillating from the body of the Nimitta Buddha. The rays of the Buddha got reflected from the body of the Nimitta Buddha, just as the rays of the Nimitta Buddha were reflected from the body of the Buddha. The flashes of the rays from the body of the Buddha and those of the Nimitta Buddha shot up to the Akkanittha Brahmā plane and retracing their paths, rested on the heads of the devas and Brahmās before they scattered towards the edge of the universe. The whole universe assumed the form of a scaffolding, made of bent rafters of gold, enclosing a stupa, looking graceful and glittering.

All the devas and Brahmās from the ten thousand universes, grouped together in this single universe, enveloped in the chamber formed of the meshing rays emanating from the two bodies of the Buddha and the Nimitta Buddha.

The Nimitta Buddha, in His sitting posture, put forward a question, after a formal address in verse in praise of the Buddha for His conquest over defilements (kilesa) on the throne of Enlightenment under the Bodhi Tree.

Before proceeding to deal with the question presented by the Nimitta Buddha, (i.e. before teaching the Sammaparibbājanīya Sutta), the Buddha, in order to make the minds of devas and Brahmās malleable, pliable, firm and imperturbable, decided to greet them, as it were, by announcing their names, families and clans, etc., without any distinction as regards to rank or status. Therefore, the Buddha proceeded to give the discourse on ‘Mahāsamaya Sutta’, which began with words, ‘acikkhissamai bhikkhave devakāyanam namāmi’ etc., which means ‘Bhikkhus, I shall disclose the identity of the audience by announcing their names, the names of their families, clans, etc.’

(Mahāsamaya Sutta has been dealt with in great details by various eminent scholars giving the Pāli Text and the translation (including word by word translation, nissaya, based on the Mahāvagga Pāli Text). Special mention must be made of the treatise entitled ‘Exposition of Mahāsamaya Sutta with Pāli Text and word-meanings’ by the Venerable Bhadanta Nandiya, Presiding Thera of Mahāvisutarama Monastery of Pakokku. There is a section, at the tail end of the treatise, on six inclinations dealt with by the Buddha in the six discourses such as Sammaparibbajaniya following the Mahāsamaya Sutta; their Pāli text and word for word translation are also provided therein.)

Large Number of Devas and Brahmās achieved Emancipation

At the conclusion of the discourse on Mahāsamaya Sutta, one hundred thousand crores of devas and Brahmās attained arahatship, and those who attained sotāpanna ariyaship were beyond calculation (according to Mahāvagga Commentary).

Venerable Sayadaw U Budh's Note of Clarification

When we look at Mahāsamaya Sutta as a whole, we find that the discourse was given with emphasis placed on the nomenclature of the devas and Brahmās, mentioning their family and clan names; and the question may arise:

In the absence of exposition of Ultimate Truth how should devas and Brahmās realise the Four Noble Truths and achieve emancipation (attain the state of sotāpannas, etc.) by hearing only their family and clan names?

Here is the answer: (1) The Buddha was aware that by hearing the discourse on Mahāsamaya Sutta, the mind of devas and Brahmās had become imperturbable, malleable, free of hindrances, exulted and pellucid, and therefore at that moment expounded the Four Noble Truths which He himself had discovered. Having thus heard the discourse on the Four Noble Truths, devas and Brahmās became ariyas. (2) In other words, by hearing the Mahāsamaya Sutta, there arose in the mind continuum of the devas and Brahmās, continuous mental states one after another, the preceding one serving as the cause for the arising of the following, which developed joyful satisfaction (pīti), tranquillity (passadhi), happiness (sukha), concentration (samādhi), knowledge according to reality or absolute knowledge, yathābhūta-ñāṇa; getting thoroughly tired of worldly life, nibbida-ñāṇa; fading away of lust or passion, virāga-ñāṇa; knowledge of release, vimuccana-ñāṇa or Knowledge of the Path, Magga-ñāṇa; Knowledge of emancipation, vimutti-ñāṇa or Knowledge of Fruition, Phala-ñāṇa; insight arising from Knowledge of the emancipation, vimutti nānadassana or Paccavekkhana-ñāṇa. It was only because of development of series of these mental states that devas and Brahmās became ariyas.

In providing these clarifications, the Venerable Sayadaw U Budh quoted the authority of pertinent Commentaries.

Mahāsamaya Sutta was held in High Esteem by Devas and Brahmās

Mahāsamaya Sutta has been held in high esteem by celestial beings. Therefore a wise person who wishes welfare and prosperity in both mundane and supra-mundane matters should recite this sutta on auspicious occasions such as construction and occupation of houses, monasteries and villages.

(When we think of why Mahāsamaya Sutta was held in high esteem by devas and Brahmās, we find that) The Buddha was naturally the chief personality at the Great Assembly which comprised of a variety of beings from the lowly earth deities to the most powerful Harita Brahmās. Mahāsamaya Sutta was, in fact, the opening address by the Buddha in His capacity as the Chairman of the Great Assembly.

The Great Assembly was attended by three categories of celestial beings: those of the highest rank and power, those of the middle status and those from the lowest strata. To an audience of different social status, it would be a tactful measure for the Chairman to evince interest in the members of the lowest rank by announcing first their presence to the congregation, followed by mentioning those of the medium status and finally the most powerful devas. Any attempt to introduce the devas of highest rank and power at the outset by announcing their family and clan names might cause displeasure and dissatisfaction among those of the lower rank.

As it happened, the Buddha had made it a point to mention the members of the lowest rank of devas, such as the earth deities, at the beginning of the address of welcome, followed by giving recognition of the presence of the devas of medium status, and closing His address by giving attention to those of the highest rank. He thus gave delight to all classes of the audience, the lowest rank feeling happy that they were welcome first and the devas of position and influence satisfied that they were given prominence by being mentioned at the crucial closing of the proceedings. This can be regarded as how the Buddha had set a fine example for the guidance of those who are responsible for delivering address of welcome to a great gathering.

In view of the facts stated above, all the devas have since been looking forward to hearing the Mahāsamaya Sutta, as they wander about in the four directions of the universe.

The following is an illustration of how Mahāsamaya Sutta is held in high esteem by the devas.

There was a cave known as ‘Nagalena’ in the precincts of ‘Kotipabbata’ monastery. A celestial damsel was dwelling on an ironwood tree standing at the gate of the said cave. One day a young bhikkhu dwelling in the cave was reciting the Mahāsamaya Sutta and the female deva listened ardently to the recitation of the Sutta. When the bhikkhu's recitation came to a close, the celestial damsel uttered ‘Sādhu, Sādhu’ at the top of her voice and a dialogue ensued between the youthful bhikkhu and the female deva:

(Celestial Maiden) CM: Venerable Sir, it is me, a female deity

B: Why have you said, ‘Sādhu’?

CM: It is because, I had had the good fortune to hear Mahāsamaya Sutta for the first time, when the Buddha propounded it in the forest of Mahāvana and for the second time, I heard it today. I understand that you have learnt the Sutta well, exactly as taught by the Buddha, not making the slightest variation from the original even for a single letter. (I said Sādhu on that score).

B: Had you heard the recitation of Buddha by yourself?

CM: Yes, I had, Reverend Sir.

B: It is said that there was a great assembly of devas and Brahmās at the time of recitation by the Buddha of this Sutta. From which place did you hear the recitation?

CM: Venerable Sir, I was then a resident of the forest of Mahāvana near Kapilavatthu, but I was unable to acquire a place in the whole of Jambudīpa because the powerful devas and Brahmās crowded in. I was compelled to go across to Sri Lanka, and as I was attempting to listen to the discourse standing at the port of Jambukola, powerful devas came crowding in again. I was again pushed further and further backwards until I got to a small village of Rohana near Mahāgama where standing in the ocean to the depth of my neck, I was finally able to hear the recitation.

B: O Celestial maiden, how could you see the Buddha at Mahāvana forest which was at such a great distance from where you happened to be at the time?

CM: Venerable Sir, I did see the Buddha really; it appeared as if the Buddha was looking at me fixedly from the forest of Mahāvana all throughout the time of expounding the discourse so much so, I felt afraid and abashed and I felt like hiding myself between the foamy waves.

B: It is said that one hundred thousand crores of devas and Brahmās attained arahatship on that day (when Mahāsamaya Sutta was delivered). Had you attained arahatship too?

CM: No, Venerable Sir, I had not.

B: Then I think you had attained Fruitional stage of anāgāmi!

CM: No, Sir, I had not.

B: Then I think you had attained the Fruitional stage of stage of sakadāgāmi!

CM: No. Sir, I had not.

B: O Celestial maiden, It is said that (hearing the Mahāsamaya Sutta) countless number of devas and Brahmas attained the three lower paths; I am sure you must have at least become a sotāpanna.

CM: (As one who had indeed attained the Fruitional stage of sotāpanna) the celestial maiden felt shy and said: ‘Venerable Sir, you should not have asked me such a question’, (thus side-tracking the issue.)

The young bhikkhu then asked the celestial maiden: “Can you manifest yourself to me?” She replied: “Venerable Sir, not the whole body but only the top of a finger and so saying, she thrust one of her fingers through a key hole, exposing just the tip of it. The whole cave was then brightly illumined as though thousands of moons and suns had thrown beams of light into it. (The celestial maiden did not manifest her whole person so as to save the young bhikkhu from the danger of temptation, which would ruin his life as a recluse.)

Then the celestial maiden departed after giving her respects and urging the young bhikkhu not to be remiss in his effort to practise precepts prescribed for bhikkhus.

This is how Mahāsamaya Sutta is being held in high esteem by the devas and Brahmās.

Preaching The Discourses in Harmony with The Inclinations of The Audience

After delivering the Mahāsamaya Sutta, the Buddha proceeded to give discourses to the same Assembly on the following suttas in accordance with the dispositions of different groups of devas and Brahmās.

- (1) Samma paribbājaniya Sutta was taught to the devas and Brahmās who had propensity towards lust (rāga), (by way of a dialogue between a Nimitta Buddha and the Buddha himself). One hundred thousand devas and Brahmās attained arahatship at the conclusion of the discourse and countless devas and Brahmās attained the three Lower Paths at the same time.
- (2) Kalahavivāda Sutta was taught to the devas and Brahmās with inclination towards aversion (dosa), such devas and Brahmās achieved emancipation in a like manner.
- (3) Mahābyūha Sutta was taught to those who had inclination towards delusion (moha), such devas and Brahmās gained emancipation likewise.
- (4) Cullabyūha Sutta was taught to those who were inclined to thought-conception (vitakka) with the same results.
- (5) Tvvaṭṭakapaṭipada Sutta was delivered to the audience with a tendency of Faith, confidence (saddhā) (in the Three Gems) with same results.
- (6) Purābheda Sutta was taught to those who were inclined towards wisdom (paññā) in the same manner and with similar results.

(For full particulars in respect of these six suttas, reference may be made to Myanmar version of Suttanipata Pāli Text and especially, to the treatise entitled ‘Exposition of Mahāsamaya Sutta with Pāli Text and word meanings’ by the Venerable Bhadanta Nandiya, Presiding Thera of Mahāvisutarama Monastery of Pakokku.)

THE BUDDHA'S FIFTH VASSA AT VESALI

Having accomplished an incumbent duty of a Buddha by teaching Mahāsamaya Sutta, Sammāparibbājaniya Sutta, etc., to the five hundred arahats of Sakyān descent and establishing seven hundred thousand crores of devas and Brahmās in arahatta-phala, and countless number of them in the three lower Paths, as stated above, the Buddha took up residence at Kutagara monastery, which had terraced roofing and crowning pinnacle, in the country of Vesali to observe the fifth vassa.

Two Forests with The Name of Mahāvana

(There were two forests bearing the name of Mahāvana: one near Kapilavatthu and the other near Vesali. Of these two, the one (where the Buddha taught the Mahāsamaya Sutta) near Kapilavatthu extended from the edge of Kapilavatthu to the Himalayas on one side and to the ocean on the other side. The one near the city of Vesali was a great forest with its marked boundary on all sides.)

King Suddhodāna attained Arahatsip

When the Buddha was observing the fifth vassa in the Mahāvana forest near Vesali, King Suddhodāna entered Nibbāna after attaining arahatsip<sup>1</sup> under the white umbrella in his golden palace.

Requesting for Permission for Ordination of Women.

Step-mother Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī had approached the Buddha since the time of His first visit to Kapilavatthu with a request for admission of women to the Order by formal ordination. Since then she had made the requests for three times repeatedly and the Buddha had rejected her request every time.

The reason for such rejection was because the Buddha had decided to grant admission of women to the Order not easily but only after pains-taking efforts on the part of women to gain permission for ordination. Only then would they realize that becoming a bhikkhuni in the Dispensation was a thing difficult of attainment and would safeguard their bhikkhuni status with constant vigilance. He wished them to cherish the hard won admission to the Order after a great struggle.

Thus, when Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī made her first request, which was repeated three times to the Buddha at the Nigrodha monastery of Kapilavatthu, her request was rejected by Him for reasons as stated above. At each attempt, she had to abandon her hope and return to the royal palace.

Now an opportunity had presented itself for her to make another attempt when the Buddha had taken up residence at Vesali to keep the fifth vassa.

As stated in the previous chapters, the five hundred bhikkhus of royal blood, prior to their attainment to arahatsip, had messages sent to them by their former spouses, requesting them to return and live a household life again. These ladies made their earnest appeal again by sending messages, as before, to the five hundred bhikkhus who had become arahats now. But the arahat-bhikkhus sent the reply: "We are no longer in a position to lead a worldly life."

The five hundred deserted wives considered that 'it would not be appropriate to seek for

1. An account of King Suddhodāna's attainment of arahatsip under the white umbrella in his golden palace and entering Parinibbāna has been dealt with in detail in the treatise entitled 'Tathāgata Udāna Dipani.' In view of this, it is only briefly mentioned here as treated in the Anguttara Commentary.

new married life' and decided unanimously to go to Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī to appeal to her 'to obtain permission from the Buddha for admission to the Order as bhikkhunīs.' Accordingly, they went in a group to the step-mother Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī and made their appeal to her.

Their request reminded her of her failure to obtain permission for the women to receive ordination when the Buddha was taking up residence at Nigrodha monastery on a previous occasion and so she had a hair-dresser to shave their heads, including that of her own, and asked the ladies to wear dyed clothes to assume the form of bhikkhunīs while they were still in the royal palace. Then they made arrangements to set out all together for Mahāvana forest of Vesali where the Buddha was then residing.

The distance between Kapilavatthu and Vesali was fifty yojanas; and when Sakayan and Koliya royal families considered arrangements for their journey, they concluded: "It would not be possible for these princesses and royal ladies, who were brought up so regally and gently, to make the journey on foot," and they arranged to provide them with five hundred sedans to solve the problem.

The five hundred ladies agreed amongst themselves that such a mode of travelling might tantamount to an act of disrespect to the Buddha and they therefore made the journey of fifty yojanas on foot. Royal families of both countries arranged for regular provision of food at every stop and sufficient number of escorts for their security en route to Vesali.

Having made the difficult journey of fifty yojanas, their delicate feet were swollen with boils that took turns to rise and burst, looking as if they were covered with seeds of clearing-nut, Strychos potato rum. All the five hundred fair ladies, headed by Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, arrived at Vesali with swollen feet, bodies besmeared with dirt and dust, with tears streaming down their cheeks and in sore distress, stood in a group at the gate of the Kutagara monastery in the forest of Mahāvana. (They dared not enter the precincts of the monastery at once).

(Step-mother Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī thought to herself that she had taken on the dress of a bhikkhunī without the permission of the Buddha; and the news of her action had already spread throughout the land. It would be well if the Buddha would be pleased to admit her into the Order. But, failing that, she should have to withstand reproaches. That was the reason why she stood bewailing at the gate without daring to seek entry).

When Venerable Ānanda noticed Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī in such a plight at the gate, he came to her and inquired: "O dear Step-mother, why do you look so miserable? Have the royal relatives of Sakya and Koliya families met with tragedies and are ruined? Why are you in an unsightly appearance such as this, with swollen feet, and looking shabby, a grief stricken face, standing helplessly and weeping at the gate?"

Whereupon, Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī replied: "O... Venerable Ānanda, we have been standing at the gate with tears for failure to get the Buddha's permission for women to receive formal ordination, so that they might lead the life of bhikkhunīs in the Dispensation of Dhamma-Vinaya." Ānanda soothed her by saying a few words of encouragement:

"Step-mother... if that is the case ... I will go and approach the Tathāgata for admission of women into the Order by formal ordination, so that they might lead the life of bhikkhunīs in the Dispensation of Dhamma-Vinaya; please remain at the gate till I come back," and so saying Venerable Ānanda went to the Buddha and made this request:-

"The Most Exalted Buddha... Step-mother Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī is standing at the gate with her feet swollen, her body covered with dirt and dust, her heart soared, tears streaming down her cheek, and in a miserable plight for failure to obtain your permission for womenfolk to receive formal ordination, so that they might lead the life of bhikkhunīs within the sāsana. May I pray solemnly that they be granted Your permission for receiving formal ordination!"

The Buddha said in response: "That is not a proper thing... dear Ānanda and I advise you not to be interested in the matter of admitting womenfolk into the order as bhikkhunīs."

With an undaunted will, Venerable Ānanda made similar requests for the second time, for the third time, but received the same words of discouragement from the Buddha.

A Renewed Request

Venerable Ānanda thought of a new approach, after failure to obtain permission for admission of womenfolk to the Dispensation of Dhamma-Vinaya for three times, and accordingly went to the Buddha and addressed Him:

“Most Exalted Buddha... could womenfolk attain ariyaship ranging from Fruitional Stage of sotāpatti, sakadāgāmī, anāgāmī to arahatta, by leading the life of bhikkhunīs within the frame-work of Dhamma-Vinaya sāsana?”

Whereupon, the Buddha replied: “Ānanda.. womenfolk could attain Ariyaship ranging from Fruitional Stage of sotāpatti, sakadāgāmī, anāgāmī to arahatta, by leading the life of bhikkhunīs within the frame-work of Dhamma-Vinaya sāsana.”

“Most Exalted Buddha..., if womenfolk were capable of attaining the four Stages of ariyaship by way of their being bhikkhunīs within the frame-work of Dhamma-Vinaya sāsana, may I submit a case that is worthy of the Tathāgata's sympathetic consideration in support of my request:-

Most Exalted Buddha... Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī had rendered great service to you besides being your step-mother. She was responsible for feeding, nursing you and for your physical and mental wellbeing ever since the time of your birth. She used to tidy you up by showering with scented water twice a day. Indeed, she was responsible for feeding you exclusively with the milk that flowed from her breast.”

(Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī gave birth to Prince Nanda a few days after Mahā Maya Devi had given birth to the Bodhisatta. She entrusted her own child, Nanda, to the care of wet nurses, and she volunteered to act as Bodhisatta wet nurse and caretaker; hence this additional weight applied to his request!)

“Most Exalted Buddha... I humbly pray for favour of granting your permission for the womenfolk to receive ordination as bhikkhunīs within the frame-work of Dhamma-Vinaya sāsana.”

The Buddha finally acceded to Ānanda's entreaties, saying: “Ānanda, if Mahā Pajāpati accepts the Eight Special Rules (Garu-dhamma), let such acceptance mean her admission to the Order.

The Eight Special Rules are:

- (1) A bhikkhunī, even if she enjoys a seniority of a hundred years in the Order, must worship, welcome with raised clasped hands and pay respect to a bhikkhu though he may have been a bhikkhu only for a day. This rule is strictly to be adhered to for life.
- (2) A bhikkhunī must not keep her rains-residence at a place that is not close to the one occupied by bhikkhus. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
- (3) Every fortnight, a bhikkhunī must do two things: To ask the bhikkhu-sangha the day of Uposatha and to approach the bhikkhu-sangha for instruction and admonition. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
- (4) When the rains-residence period is over, a bhikkhunī must attend the Pavarana ceremony at both the assemblies of bhikkhus and bhikkhunīs, in each of which she must invite criticism on what has been seen, what has been heard or what has been suspected of her. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
- (5) A bhikkhunī who has committed a sanghadisesa offence must undergo penance for a half-month, pakkha manatta, in each assembly of bhikkhus and bhikkhunīs. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
- (6) A bhikkhunī must arrange for ordination by both the assemblies of bhikkhus and (bhikkhunīs for a woman novice only after two year's probationary training under her in the observance of six training practices. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.

- (7) A bhikkhunī should not revile a bhikkhu for any reason whatsoever. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.
- (8) Bhikkhunīs are prohibited from exhorting or admonishing bhikkhus with effect from today. Bhikkhus should exhort bhikkhunīs when and where necessary. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.

These are the Eight Special Rules. If Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī accepts the Eight Special Rules, let such acceptance mean her admission to the Order.”

The Buddha thus permitted the establishment of bhikkhunī-sāsana after expounding the Eight Special Rules for their guidance.

Ānanda learned the Eight Special Rules from the Buddha and returned to Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī at the gate and told her what had transpired at his meeting with the Buddha:-

“Great step-mother .... if you accept the Eight Special Rules, such acceptance means your admission to the Order. The Eight Special Rules are:

- (1) A bhikkhunī, even if she enjoys a seniority of a hundred years in the Order, must worship, welcome with raised clasped hands and pay respect to a bhikkhu though he may have been a bhikkhu only for a day. This rule is strictly to be adhered to for life.

Etcetera (Pelayya)

- (8) Bhikkhunīs are prohibited from exhorting or admonishing bhikkhus with effect from today. Bhikkhus should exhort bhikkhunīs when and where necessary. This rule is also to be strictly adhered to for life.

Great step-mother, you can count yourself as one who has been duly admitted to the Order of Bhikkhunī, the moment you adhere strictly to these Eight Special Precepts.”

Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī responded: “Venerable Ānanda .... just as a young maiden who is in the habit of decorating herself with flowers, with her hair washed and brushed or a man in like manner, would eagerly receive lilies, Moe-swe or Lai-tu flowers, with outstretched hands, for planting on their heads if and when offered; so also I am prepared to adhere to the Eight Special Rules (Garu-dhamma), with great delight and due respect till I breathe my last.

Thereupon, the Venerable Ānanda approached the Buddha again with profound respect and stood at a suitable place and addressed: “Most Exalted Tathāgata... Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī has vowed to adhere strictly to the Eight Special Rules as laid down, with due diligence and respect up to the end of her life.”

(Her enthusiastic acceptance of the Eight Special Rules constitute automatic admission to the Order; she became a bhikkhunī without formal ordination in a Sima. Such procedure of admission into the Order is known as “Attha garu-dhamma patiggahana Upasampadā.”)

Permission Granted for Ordination of Bhikkhunī

Step-mother Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī went to the Buddha and sat at a suitable place with due respect and asked: “Exalted Buddha... what should I do with the five hundred princesses of royal blood?” He gave her certain instructions. She left after hearing the dhamma and making obeisance to Him. Then the Buddha told the bhikkhus about His instructions to Mahā Pajāpati and laid down the following rules:

“Bhikkhus, I give permission to bhikkhus to help in ordination of female candidates to become bhikkhunīs.”

The bhikkhus proceeded to help in ordination of the five hundred royal princesses with Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī as their preceptor (upajjhaya). They were known as “ekataw upasampaññā” there being insufficient number of bhikkhunīs to participate jointly with bhikkhus in the ordination ceremony.

When the ordination ceremony was over, Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī attained Fruition stage of arahatship through hearing Sankhitta Sutta (Āṅguttara), and the five hundred bhikkhunīs attained ariyaship according to their wishes, ranging from sotāpatti, sakadāgāmi, anāgāmi to arahatta through hearing Nandakovāda Sutta (Majjhima).

(The ordination of distinguished bhikkhunis, such as, Queen Yasodharā, Princess Janapadakalayani, Queen Khemā, Dhammadinna, wife of a rich man, Bhaddakapila, will be described separately when we come to the “Jewel of Sangha”).

Victory over The Wandering Ascetic Saccaka

The Buddha conquered the wandering ascetic Saccaka while taking up residence at Kutagara monastery in the forest of Mahāvana near Vesali. An account of this wandering ascetic, Saccaka, will be reproduced here from Catukka nipatta, Culalcalinga Jātaka Commentary and Mulapaṇṇāsa, Culasaccaka Sutta Commentary.

Long time ago, seven thousand, seven hundred and seven descendents of Licchavi royal family of Vesali took turns to rule the country. All those royal descendents were very much inclined to investigate into various ascetic views prevailing at that time. Once, a wandering mendicant, who professed five hundred views, arrived in Vesali. These royal descendents held him in high esteem and treated him well. A female mendicant, who also professed five hundred views, arrived in the country of Vesali at about the same time.

The descendents of the royal family arranged a debate between the two mendicants. The debate ended in a draw as one could not defeat the other since they were equally matched. A peculiar idea struck the Licchavis: “Should the two be united in marriage, they could expect of them an off-spring of great talent.” So they persuaded them to remain in their country without taking the trouble of wandering about. They treated them with respect and arranged for their maintenance.

As years rolled by, the couple produced four daughters and one son. The names of the daughters were, (1) Sacca, (2) Lola, (3) Avadharika, (4) Paticchada and that of the son was Saccaka. (According to Cula Saccaka Sutta Aṭṭhakathā, the names of daughters are (1) Sacca, (2) Lola, (3) Patacara and (4) Acaravati)

When they came of age, they were given instructions on views held by their parents: five hundred paternal and five hundred maternal views, a total of one thousand. Special parental advice was also given to the four daughters:

“My dear daughters .... if you find anyone who could refute your views, you might offer yourself as his wife if he is a lay man; should he, however, happened to be a bhikkhu, you might lead a homeless life under him.”

After the death of their parents, the wandering Saccaka, being more intelligent than his four elder sisters, studied more and more unorthodox views in addition to the one thousand that he had inherited from his late parents. Without wandering forth he kept on residing in Vesali by giving instructions to young royal princes. Fearing that his belly, which was full of ‘wisdom’ might burst at any moment, he had it wrapped up with iron plates.

His elder sisters held the view that Jabudipa island was conspicuous by the presence of Jabu-tha-bye tree (the golden Eugenia tree). So they used to carry Thabye flowers and fresh leaves as they moved from town to town in search of rivals in the matter of doctrinal views. They used to plant a few branches of Thabye on a heap of sand or earth at the entrance to a town, announcing: “Anyone capable of refuting our views can smash it,” by way of a challenge, before they entered the town.

As they wandered from place to place, they eventually arrived at Savatthi. Here, again, they planted a branch of Thabye at the gate and made a challenging announcement: “Anyone, whether a laity or a bhikkhu, who can refute our ideology, can destroy this heap of earth and this branch of Thabye by his feet.” They left their word with the children whom they found loitering round the gate, and went into the town.

The Venerable Sāriputta's Feat of Intellectual Power

On that day, the Chief Disciple, the Venerable Sāriputta, went for the usual round of receiving food fairly late in the morning, as he had been sweeping certain places in the monastery, filling pots with drinking water and nursing the sick within the precincts of Jetavana monastery. As he reached near the gate, he came upon those branches of Thabye. He, therefore, asked the nearby children about the strange spectacle. They gave a full account of it to the Venerable.

Whereupon, the Venerable Sāriputta asked them to smash the Thabye branches. The boys replied: “Reverend Sir... we dare not do it... we are afraid ...” Venerable Sāriputta urged them again by saying a few words of encouragement: “Boys .... don’t be afraid; should they ask you as to who was behind you, just let them know that I, Sāriputta, the Chief Disciple of the Buddha, had asked you to do it, and tell them also that if they want to challenge me in debate, they should come to Jetavana monastery.” The boys summoned their courage and smashed the Thabye branches as instructed. Venerable Sāriputta went on his round of receiving alms and returned to the monastery.

When the four sisters came out of the town, they asked the boys: “Who has asked you to destroy our Thabye branches?” They told them all about it.

The four women went back into the town, each moving along a different route, announcing: “We learn that the Chief Disciple of the Buddha, known as Sāriputta, is ready to engage in a debate with us. Will those wishing to hear the debate come along...” Many people came out and went along with them to the Jetavana monastery.

Venerable Sāriputta felt that presence of womenfolk in the residential area of bhikkhus was not permissible, and so he went to the central part of the precincts of the monastery to meet them. On arrival, the womenfolk asked: “Did you ask the boys to smash up our Thabye branch?” “Yes... I did it,” was the reply. Whereupon those women challenged the Venerable Sāriputta to a debate on ideology. The Venerable accepted their challenge and asked them as to who should start questioning. They replied: “The onus of questioning rests with us.” To which the Venerable Sāriputta said: “Yes, you, being womenfolk, start questioning.”

The four women took positions, one on each of the four sides, and thrust a barrage of questions, thousand in number, which they had learnt from their parents. Venerable Sāriputta gave prompt answers to every of their questions, just like cutting off the stalk of lily with a double-edged sword, leaving no problem unsolved. He then invited more questions from the four women, who being subdued, replied: “Most reverend Sir... We know this much only.”

Venerable Sāriputta said: “Well, wanderers ... I have answered all the one thousand questions that you have asked, and now I will ask you only one question and will you answer it?” Knowing by now somewhat about the Venerable's standing, they dared not reply courageously: “Please do, Venerable Sir, we will answer your questions.” but, instead, they said meekly: “Reverend Sir... please do. We will answer if we possibly can.” Before putting forward his question, Sāriputta made it plain to them that the question which he was about to ask was not of higher standard but one meant for prospective novices who have to learn them after becoming sāmañeras and asked this question: “What is meant by one Dhamma?” (Ekam nāma kim).

The four ascetic women could not make head or tail of the problem. Venerable Sāriputta asked them: “Heretic women... answer the question,” and they admitted their inability: “Reverend Sir... we have not the vaguest idea of the answer.” The Venerable told them: “Now that I have answered your one thousand questions while you cannot answer a single question of mine, who, then, is the victor and who are the vanquished?” Their reply was: “Reverend Sir... you are the conqueror and we are the conquered.” Venerable Sāriputta asked: “What would you do in such circumstances?” They told the Venerable of what their parents had asked them to do in the event of their defeat (as related in the preceding chapters), and expressed their desire to receive ordination under the patronage of the Venerable.

Venerable Sāriputta, then gave them this instruction: “This is not the right place for you womenfolk to receive ordination and you will be best advised to go to the monasteries of bhikkhunīs with our introduction and ask to be ordained there.” Accordingly, they went to the monasteries of the bhikkhunīs with the introduction of the Venerable and received ordination. (They received ordination under the patronage of Uppalavan Therī, according to Jātaka Commentary) They attained arahatship within a short period of time through mindful, earnest effort in the practice of the Path. (The Buddha expounded an account of this episode in Culakalinga Jātaka, vide Catukka Nipatta. For further particulars, please refer to five hundred and fifty Jātaka).

(N.B. This episode happened only when the Buddha was taking up residence at Jetavana monastery of Savatthi, some time after the establishing of bhikkhunī-sāsana with the Buddha’s approval and also in compliance with Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī’s express request when He was residing in Mahāvana forest, Vesali. This interesting episode has connections with the story of wandering Saccaka, hence its exposition here.)

The Story of Wandering Ascetic Saccaka

As narrated above, the four women ascetics had a younger brother called wanderer Saccaka, who was acting as an instructor of the royal princes of Vesali.

It was during the period when the Buddha was staying at Kutagara monastery in Mahāvana forest, near Vesali, that wanderer Saccaka, son of sectarian Nigandha, was proclaiming himself as one skilled in debating, one who was very learned; and people also took him to be a holy person. He was boasting to the Vesali citizens:

“I have never come across any person claiming himself to have bhikkhu followers, to be a sectarian, a sectarian leader, a samana Brāhmana or one worthy of Homage, a Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddha, who could resist without perspiring from their arm-pits when I refute and rebuke them on grounds of views. Even senseless logs or wooden blocks could not remain unshaken when I talk about things in terms of views, leave alone the living creatures!”

Wanderer Saccaka was, in fact, going about the city and boasting himself as one who was out to find faults with Samana Gotama. On one morning, as he was strolling about and taking walking exercise, he noticed the Venerable Assaji on his round of receiving alms, at a distance. He thought to himself:

“I am a person, who has been contemplating how to debate with Samana Gotama’s Teaching though I cannot do it yet, since I have no means of knowing His views. I must therefore try to get to know His views before I could challenge Him in a proper manner. Venerable Assaji is well versed in Samana Gotama’s views and I should make Him to declare their doctrine firmly before I could find fault with Gotama and rebuke Him.”

He approached the Venerable Assaji with that end in view, and entered into conversation with the him after exchanging friendly greetings: “O Assaji... how does Samana Gotama exhort His disciples? In how many ways does He give them instructions in minute detail?”

Whereupon, Venerable Assaji explained him in this way:

“O descendent of Aggivessana, wanderer Saccaka, .... the Buddha exhorted His disciples in this manner. He gave detailed instructions in various ways:-

Bhikkhus,..... Corporeality (rūpa) is impermanent, sensation is impermanent, perception is impermanent, volitional activities are impermanent, six-fold consciousness is impermanent. Corporeality is not self, sensation is not self, perception is not self, volitional activities are not self, six-fold consciousness is not self (attā). All conditioned things are not permanent; all dhammas are without self.

O descendent of Aggivessana, wanderer Saccaka,.....the Buddha had exhorted His disciples in this way. He had given many detailed instructions in various ways.”

The above is the Venerable Assaji’s reply to heretic Saccaka’s query.

[Points of special interest which are worthy to note: From the foregoing statement, it will be seen that, in his reply to Saccaka’s query, Venerable Assaji mentioned facts of 'Impermanence' and 'Unsubstantiality' or Non-self, but nothing was said about the fact of 'Suffering'. The reason for the omission of the fact of suffering has been explained in the Commentary as follows:-

"Had Venerable Assaji mentioned the fact of suffering as corporeality is suffering, sensation is suffering, perception is suffering, volitional activities are suffering, six-fold consciousness is suffering, Saccaka might get a chance for disputation. This is because, figuratively speaking Path and Fruition are regarded as suffering (saṅkhāra-dukkha). Hence the omission of the fact of suffering. Otherwise, Saccaka would have asked: "O Assaji what is the object of your receiving ordination?" Then Venerable Assaji's reply would be: "For the sake of Path and Fruition." In such a case, he would be exposed to censure: "O Assaji..., your sāsana, after all, does not lead to emancipation, in reality, your so called sāsana simply is a place of oppression and destruction; your so called sāsana is a kind of Ussada plane of misery! Therefore, your minds are void of desire for joy. Indeed, you all have been wandering round striving anxiously after suffering." It was for this reason that Venerable Assaji had purposely avoided the employment of the figurative term (pariyāya), and adopted the abstract term (nippriyāya) that could not have another meaning, hence exclusive presentation of 'Impermanence' (anicca) and Unsubstantiality (anatta)."]

Whereupon, Saccaka said: "O Assaji what improper things do I hear? We have heard what Samana Gotama has been preaching. Perhaps we could meet with honourable Gotama sometime when there might be some discussion. Perhaps we could then rid Him of this evil view."

At that time the five hundred Licchavi princes were assembled at the Assembly Hall to transact some business. Saccaka thought to himself: "I was unable to decry the views of Samana Gotama in the past for not knowing anything about it. Now, I have learnt about them from His great disciple Assaji. I know them fully well, I had better go to His place and reproach Him for His views."

He went first to the Assembly Hall where his five hundred Licchavi princes were holding a meeting. He bid them to come out from the chamber, shouting:

"Come forth, honourable Licchavis! Come forth honourable Licchavis! Today, there will be a discussion between Samana Gotama and myself about His view. It is going to be a grand show! Assaji, one of the five bhikkhus and a well-known disciple of Samana Gotama, has stood firmly on the view of Impermanence and Unsubstantiality. If Samana Gotama also stood firm on the same view of anicca and anatta,

- (1) Just as a powerful man taking hold of a long fleeced ram by its fleece, might pull, push and pull it about, even so will I pull and push and pull Samana Gotama about with my arguments and refutations of His view.
- (2) Just as a powerful workman of a liquor shop, taking a big mat from the liquor shop, might throw it into a deep lake and seizing it by the corner, might pull it, push it, and shake it, even so, will I pull, push and shake Samana Gotama about with my arguments and refutations of His view.
- (3) Just as a powerful drunkard, taking hold of a liquor strainer by its edge, might shake it up, shake it down, and toss it about, even so, will I shake up, shake down and toss about Samana Gotama with arguments and refutations of His view.
- (4) Just as an elephant, which gets infirm only when it is sixty, might get down into a deep pond and play the game of washing hemp, even so, will I play with Samana Gotama as in the game of washing hemp with my arguments and refutation of His view.

(N.B. When hemp stalks are in the process of being transformed into fibres, they are made into bundles and dipped in the water for softening. After three days, when they are soft and pliant, workmen come with provisions, such as drinks and eatables, for enjoyment when the work is over. They take hold of bunches of hemp

The royal elephant, imitating the action of hemp workers, goes deep into the pond and drawing water with its trunk, blows it on its head, on its back, on either side of its body, and in between its thighs. Hence the term, (Sana dhovika) playing the game of washing hems.)

“O Licchavi princes come forth come forth. Today there will be a debate between me and Samana Gotama on His view. Its going to be a grand show!” Thus Saccaka invited his disciples.

Among the Licchavi princes there were (1) those who expressed their conviction that ‘Samana Gotama is not capable of refuting the views of Saccaka, it is only Saccaka who will be able to refute the view of Samana Gotama and (2) those who said: “What kind of a man is Saccaka that he would be able to refute the Buddha? It is the Buddha only who will be able to refute Saccaka.”

Then Saccaka made his way towards Kutagara monastery in the company of five hundred Licchavi princes. It was noon then and many bhikkhus were walking to and fro to repulse sloth and torpor after having rich food. [In other words, these bhikkhus were meditators in the day time (divā padhānika) who usually took a walk to and fro to expose themselves to the sun at noon and then bathed. They found this practice most helpful in developing concentration in their meditation.]

Saccaka approached these bhikkhus and asked: “Friends where does Honourable Gotama take residence at the present moment? We would like to see Him.”

Early at dawn on that day, the Buddha, after abiding in mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti, looked into the ten thousand universes and perceived through His Omniscience, that Saccaka would be coming along with many Licchavi princes to rebuke Him concerning His view. He, therefore, took His bath early in the morning and went out for receiving alms, accompanied by bhikkhus. On return, He did not go into the Scented Chamber but went straight into the Mahāvana forest and sat under a shady tree for the convenience of the visiting crowd, led by heretic Saccaka.

Those bhikkhus whom Saccaka had contacted were the meditating bhikkhus, who had just returned from the Buddha. They, therefore readily replied indicating with their clasped palms pointing towards the Buddha, saying: “O Saccaka, the Buddha is sitting under a tree in the Mahāvana forest to spend the day.”

Thereupon, Saccaka went into Mahāvana forest in the company of a huge mass of people. He approached the Buddha, and after a cordial exchange of greetings with Him, sat at a suitable spot. (It should be noted that in addition to the five hundred Licchavi princes who were his disciples, the huge crowd following him, now consisted of numerous citizens of Vesali who were interested to witness the debate between the two distinguished personalities.)

Those who came along with Saccaka may be divided into five categories: (1) Some people paid homage to the Buddha and sat at suitable places. (2) Some exchanged greetings with Him, saying words that would remain always fresh in the their hearts throughout their lives, and sat at suitable places. (3) Some bowed with palms towards Him and sat at suitable places. (4) Some announced their names and lineage and sat at suitable place. (5) Some simply sat down in complete silence.

Having sat down at a suitable place, Saccaka addressed the Buddha: “May I, with your approval, submit a question concerning a certain subject?” The Buddha replied: “Ask, Aggivessana, whatever you like.” (This is the sort of invitation to questions, peculiar to Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas, and beyond the range of Paccekabuddhas and Sāvakas.)

Saccaka started questioning: “O Honourable Gotama..., how do you exhort your disciples? What part of your many Teachings is most emphasised for your disciples?” To which Buddha replied:

“O descendent of Aggivessana, Wanderer Saccaka..., I exhort my disciples in this manner. This part of the many teachings is most emphasised for my disciples.

Bhikkhus, corporeality is impermanent, sensation is impermanent, perception is impermanent, volitional activities are impermanent, six-fold consciousness is impermanent. Bhikkhus corporeality is not self, sensation is not self, perception is not self, volitional activities are not self, six-fold consciousness is not self (attā). All conditioned things are impermanent; all conditioned and unconditioned things (dhamma) are not self (attā).

O descendent of Aggivessana, Wanderer Saccaka..., this is how I exhort my disciples; this part of the many teachings is most emphasis for my disciples.”

Saccaka said: “A simile occurs to me.” The Buddha then told him: “O descendent of Aggivessana, reveal it (boldly and vividly).”

“Just as seeds and trees cannot grow without depending and resting on the earth that affords support, or just as a manual worker cannot accomplish his task without depending and resting upon the earth that affords support.... O Honourable Gotama.... even so, this individual person produces merit or demerit based on corporeality (that is attā or self); this individual person produces merit and demerit based on sensation (that is attā or self); this individual person produces merit or demerit based on perception (which is attā or self); this individual person produces merit or demerit based on volitional activities (which is attā or self); this individual person produces merit or demerit based on six-fold consciousness (which is attā or self).”

Thus Saccaka presented his view on attā (Soul) theory by way of similes: (He had likened the five-fold aggregate to the earth; sentient beings are dependent on the five-fold aggregates like the earth. They produce merit or demerit based on the five-fold aggregate.) “The Honourable Gotama has thus discarded the very evident and manifest attā and declared it to be anatta (non-self).” Thus Saccaka presented his Soul theory firmly supported by seeming similes.

The supporting similes presented by Saccaka are notable, quite valid and firm. With the exception of the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas, there is no one capable of refuting his criticism and condemning his Soul theory. In fact, there are two types of people: (1) those who are tractable by Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas only and (2) those who are tractable by Sāvakas. Those in category (2) can be corrected by the Buddhas and the disciples, but those in category (1) can be guided by the Buddhas alone. Wanderer Saccaka belonged to the first category and could be instructed only by the Buddha. The Buddha had, therefore, decided to personally rectify and refute his view:

“The descendent of Aggivessana, Saccaka.... Do you say that corporeality is myself (attā), that sensation is myself (attā) that perception is my body (attā), that volitional activities are myself (attā), that six-fold consciousness is myself (attā)?”

Saccaka came to realize then that “Samana Gotama has put me in difficulty, making me to declare, confirm and admit my soul theory (attā vāda) in the presence of an audience. Should anything untoward happens, I will alone be condemned for my soul theory,” and thinking of citing the people of Vesali as co-adherents of attā, he replied:

“O Honourable Gotama — Indeed, I do say: ‘Corporeality is my attā, sensation is my attā, perception is my attā, volitional activities are my attā, six-fold consciousness is my attā and the general mass of citizens of Vesali also say this.’”

The Buddha, being a hundred thousand times superior to Saccaka in matters of beliefs, would not let him make other people to share the same fate with him. Instead, He would make His conquest over Saccaka alone, and said to him:

“Saccaka what has the great mass of people to do with this? I urge you, Saccaka, to explain your own view.”

(What the Buddha meant to say was this: “Not all of these people are out to refute My view. You are the only one who have come to refute My view. They are here because you have invited them to witness the debate. The onus of expressing the view rests with you, and don't let them share the same fate with you.”)

Saccaka was thus pressed to repeat his own view: “O Honourable Gotama ..... Indeed, I do say: ‘Corporeality is my attā, sensation is my attā, perception is my attā, volitional activities are my attā, six-fold consciousness is my attā.’

After causing Saccaka to explain his own view, the Buddha proceeded to ask:

“Saccaka, since you have admitted that the five-fold aggregates are attā, I will ask you in turn about this. Answer Me as you wish. Saccaka..... what do you think of the question I am about to ask? Would an anointed king like Pasenadi Kosala, or the crowned King Ajātasattu, ruler of Magadha, son of Queen Vedehi, have the power in their respective realm to order the execution of one deserving to be put to death, to order the confiscation of one whose property deserves to be confiscated and to banish one deserving of banishment?”

In answer to the above question, Saccaka replied:

“O Honourable Gotama, a king like Pasenadi Kosala, or the crowned king like Ajātasattu, ruler of Magadha, son of Queen Vedehi, have the power in their respective realm to order the execution of one deserving to be put to death, to order the confiscation of one whose property to be confiscated and to banish one deserving of banishment?

O Honourable Gotama.... even those Federated State Governments like Vajjis or Mallas would have power in their respective realm to order the execution of one deserving to be put to death, to order the confiscation of one whose property deserves to be confiscated and to banish one deserving of banishment? What more need we say of an anointed king such as King Pasenadi of Kosala or King Ajātasattu of the Kingdom of Magadha, the son of Queen Vedehi? He would have the power, O Gotama, he deserves to have the power.”

(The Buddha had purposely brought Saccaka to bay in order to completely crush his soul theory (Atta vāda). Saccaka being unwise had even gone to the extent of “sharpening the weapon meant for his execution” by mentioning the Governments of Vajjis and Mallas in support of his statement).

“O Saccaka, how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Corporeality is my attā (self).’ If so, can you cause it to obey your words, saying: ‘Let my corporeality should be thus; let my corporeality should not be thus?’ ”

When the Buddha asked in such a point blank manner, Saccaka remained completely silent.

(N.B. Saccaka had discovered his grave mistake. He thought to himself: “Samana Gotama had brought about the destruction of my view. I was foolish enough to have created a chance for Samana Gotama to defeat me in my own game. I have been ruined beyond redemption. In case I say: ‘I can prevail my power upon my corporeality,’ the Licchavi princes would stand up and rebuke me for my ugly figure (body) compared with their own beautiful, admirable bodies which resemble those of celestial beings of Tāvātimsa. In case I choose to say: ‘I cannot prevail my power upon my body,’ Samana Gotama would stand up and rebuke me: ‘O Saccaka you already have said that you have control over your body, and you have retracted your own profession.’ He has placed himself on the horns of a dilemma. He therefore kept complete silence.)

For the second time the Buddha asked Saccaka to answer the same question:

“How do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Corporeality is my attā (self).’ If so, can you cause it to obey your words, saying: ‘Let my corporeality should be thus; let my corporeality should not be thus?’ ”

Saccaka remained completely silent, and did not answer the Buddha’s question for the second time in succession.

(If no answer was given to a reasonable question put by a Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha for three times in succession, it constitutes a grave act of excruciation against the Buddha, and the offender's head is liable to be split into seven parts, according to the course of the principle Law of Nature, Dhamma-Niyāma.)

Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas had fulfilled the pāramīs for four asaṅkhyeyyas and a hundred thousand aeons, out of great compassion for all beings, and, as such, the Buddha did not repeat the question for the third time, but changed the subject of discussion: “Saccaka.... speak up now. This is not the time for you to keep silent. The head of one, who does not answer a Buddha's reasonable question for three times in succession, is liable to get split into seven parts spontaneously.”

Then Sakka could not help coming to the scene under the guise of an ogre holding a burning, blazing, flaming thunder bolt and stood right on top of Saccaka's head, as though threatening to punish him should he fail to answer the Buddha's reasonable question for three times. The strange spectacle was visible only to the Buddha and Saccaka (no one else could see it).

(N.B. Sakka had come holding a thunderbolt in his hand and stood above Saccaka. Having great compassion for him, like the Buddha, and to persuade him to give up his wrong views by threatening him in the guise of a terrible ogre wielding a thunderbolt. He made his appearance, not because he actually wanted to do harm to Saccaka but because no untoward mishap to anyone should ever occur in the presence of a Buddha.) — Majjhima Ṭikā —

(The reason why Sakka came under the guise of an ogre was that, he had a desire to cause Saccaka to turn into a new leaf and accept the Right View. Sakka was in the company of Sahampati Brahmā when the latter approached the Buddha with a formal request to preach the Dhamma. Both of them requested the Buddha to preach the Dhamma, and they, on their part, undertook to see to it that reluctant people are persuaded to act according to His instructions. “Let yours be the authority of the Dhamma, and ours will be the law of temporal authority.” Hence the appearance of Sakka under the guise of an ogre in fulfilment of his undertaking.) — Majjhima Commentary —

When Saccaka saw Sakka under the guise of an ogre, his body perspired profusely through fright, beads of sweat streaming down, and waves of sounds swirled right round in his stomach. He looked around to see if there was any one also witnessing the strange phenomenon and saw none. He thought it would be unwise to shout out ‘a great ogre’ when no one saw it, and would be like creating a chance for the people to turn against him saying: “We also have eyes but you are the only one seeing the ogre. You see it only because you dispute with Samana Gotama.” He was so shaken that his hair stood on end and goose flesh developed all over his body. He found no one but the Buddha to take refuge in, and seeking shelter, protection and refuge only in the Buddha, he thus spoke to the Buddha: “Be pleased to ask me, Honourable Gotama; I will answer.”

The Buddha asked him:

“Saccaka.... how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Corporeality is my attā.’ If so, do you have power over that corporeality and can you say: ‘Let my corporeality be thus; let my corporeality be not thus?’ ”

Saccaka replied: “Honourable Gotama.... I do not have the power.” Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka.... think over it again, ponder over it again before you give an answer. What you have said before does not agree with what you have just said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not collaborate one another.” and He proceeded to ask:

“Saccaka.... how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Sensation is my attā.’ If so, do you have power over that sensation and can you say: ‘Let my sensation be thus; let my sensation be not thus?’ ”

Saccaka replied: “Honourable Gotama.... I do not have the power.”

Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka.... think over it again, ponder over it again before you give an answer. What you have said before does not agree with what you have just said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not collaborate one another.” and He proceeded to ask:

“Saccaka.... how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Perception is my attā.’ If so, do you have power over that perception and can you say: ‘Let my perception be thus; let my perception be not thus?’ ”

Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka.... think over it again, ponder over it again before you give an answer. What you said before does not agree with what you have just said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not collaborate one another.” and He proceeded to ask:

“Saccaka.... how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Volitional activities are my attā.’ If so, do you have power over those volitional activities and can you say: ‘Let my volitional activities be thus; let my volitional activities be not thus?’ ”

Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka.... think over it again, ponder over it again before you give an answer. What you said before does not agree with what you have just said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not collaborate one another.” and He proceeded to ask:

“Saccaka how do you like the question I am about to ask? You have said: ‘Six-fold consciousness is my attā.’ If so, do you have power over that six-fold consciousness and can you say: ‘Let my six-fold consciousness be thus; let my six-fold consciousness be not thus?’ ”

Then the Buddha warned him: “Saccaka.... think over it again, ponder over it again before you give an answer. What you said before does not agree with what you have just said; and what you have just said does not agree with what you said before. They do not collaborate one another.”

The Buddha continued to exhort Saccaka by expounding a discourse which involves questioning and answering three times, a mode of teaching known as ‘Teparivatta dhamma desanā.’

Saccaka answered: “Impermanent, O Gotama.” “That which is impermanent, is it painful (dukkha) or pleasant (sukha)?” “Painful, O Gotama.”

“Wanderer Saccaka..... what do you think of this? Is sensation permanent or impermanent? Is perception permanent or impermanent? Are volitional activities permanent or impermanent? Saccaka .... how do you think of the question that I am about to ask. Are the six kinds of consciousness permanent or impermanent?” Saccaka answered: “Venerable Gotama .... impermanent.” “That which is impermanent, is it painful or pleasant?” “Painful, O Gotama.”

Would it be proper to consider the six kinds of consciousness, which are impermanent, painful and subject to change as, ‘This consciousness is mine (through clinging), this consciousness is I (through conceit), this consciousness is my attā (through wrong view).’”

Saccaka answered: “Venerable Gotama, it is indeed not proper.”

Just as an expert snake charmer caused the snake concerned to suck its venom out of the bitten part of the body of the victim, even so the Buddha had caused Saccaka to admit, by his own mouth, the fact that the five khandas are impermanent, painful and insubstantial, and not permanent, pleasant and substantial as he had primarily maintained by word of his mouth and in the presence of the same audience which comprised Licchavi princes. (The venom, that is, the false view of attā, which had appeared out of the mouth of Saccaka, had been made to be sucked out by the same mouth of Saccaka and an admission to be uttered that it is anatta, not self, in the presence of the audience.)

In this manner the Buddha had Saccaka to definitely admit that the five khandhas are impermanent, painful and insubstantial in the presence of throngs of people, and being desirous of subduing him to accept the Truth with his head hanging down, the Buddha went on to ask:

“Heretic Saccaka, how would you like the question that I am about to ask? When a person clings to dukkha, adheres to dukkha, cleaves to dukkha and considers dukkha (the five-fold aggregates) as this dukkha is mine (through clinging); this dukkha is I (through conceit) and this dukkha is my attā (self) (through wrong view), could he himself accurately understand dukkha (with three prinnas)? Could he remain abiding in complete extinction of dukkha?”

Saccaka answered: “O Honourable Gotama... How could it be possible! It is an impossibility!” Whereupon, the Buddha went on to ask:

“Wanderer Saccaka .... how would you think of the question I am about to ask? If that is so, being clung to those dukkha (of five aggregates), attached to those dukkha (of five aggregates), cleaving to those dukkha (of five aggregates), do you not hold the wrong view, and consider that this dukkha (of the five aggregates) is mine (through clinging), this dukkha (five aggregates) is I (through conceit), this dukkha (five aggregates) is my attā or self (through wrong view). In view of all this, you are on the wrong track in respect of view?”

Saccaka answered: “O Honourable Gotama .... How could it not be so! I do consider it so.”

Then the Buddha gave further exhortation to Saccaka:

“Saccaka, it is as if a man, desiring heart-wood, seeking heart-wood, and wandering about, might enter the forest with a sharp hatchet. He might see a plantain tree with a straight stem and devoid of a budding stalk. He cut off the bottom part and then cut off its crown. Then he might peel the bark of the stem. Having peeled the bark of the stem, that man would not get even the sap wood, let alone heart-wood.

In the same way, Saccaka, as I question and cross-question you for reasons in regard to your view, you prove to be empty, futile and a great failure.

O Saccaka, you have been boasting among the citizens of Vesali, through empty pride thus: ‘I have never come across such persons as Samana Brāhmanas or Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas, one who could resist me without perspiring from their arm-pits when I refute and rebuke them on grounds of views; and even senseless logs or wooden blocks could not remain unshaken when I talk about things in terms of views, leave alone the living beings.’ “

The Buddha then exposing His golden coloured body to the assembly and said: “Saccaka ... there is no trace of perspiration on my body.”

(N.B As a matter of course, a compounded body perspires at one time or the other; hence, the Buddha said: “...there is no trace of perspiration on body at the moment.”

As regards ‘exposition of the golden coloured body’ it does not mean that the whole body was exposed to view. It is customary among the Buddhas to have the button-knob properly fixed to the button-ring of the robe when they take their seat before an audience. The Buddha, on this occasion, held the robe above the upper part of the throat and dropped just four inches of it to permit the emergence of red rays, whirling round like a stream of liquid gold or flashes of lightning, right round the His head, resembling a golden tabor and shooting skywards.

The Buddha had done such a thing to dispel doubt, if any, on the part of the people. If the Buddha did not disclose the true aspect by exposing (His body), certain people might gainsay “we can see beads of perspiration streaming down Saccaka's body; Samana Gotama had said He had no sweat but we cannot know if it is true because His body is completely cloaked in a double-layered robe.”)

When the Buddha had said thus, Saccaka sat speechless with a sad look, drooping shoulders and downcast head and at his wit's end.

Licchavi Prince Dummukha's Statement.

Then a Licchavi prince, Dummukha, seeing Saccaka speechless with a sad look, drooping shoulders and downcast head and at his wit's end, addressed the Buddha: “Most Exalted Buddha, a simile has come into my head.” The Buddha urged him: “Dummukha, reveal it.” Prince Dummukha addressed the Buddha thus:

“Most Exalted Buddha.... there was a pond near a village or a marketing place. A crab was living in that pond. Many boys and girls, coming out from that village or town, might approach the pond and might go down into the pond. Taking the crab out of the water, they might put it on dry ground. And, Venerable Sir, as often as that crab would thrust out a claw, these boys and girls would cut it, break it and smash it with sticks and potsherds. Just as that crab, with its claws cut, broken and smashed, would be unable to get back into the pond again as before, even so, Venerable Sir, Saccaka will be unable now to come round to the Buddha to make refutations and assertions as You have cut, broken and smashed all the distorted, conceited, twisted views of Saccaka.”

Whereupon, Saccaka asked Dummukha: “Dummukha... stop it, Dummukha... stop it; (you are a person with rough speech;) we are not speaking to you, nor are we discussing with you. I have been discussing with the Venerable Gotama.” He thus objected to Dummukha's participation in the conversation.

(When other Licchavi princes heard the simile quoted by Prince Dummukha, they remembered the contemptuous treatment received at the hands of Saccaka while undergoing training under his care. They thought the table had turned and it was the most opportune time for them to revenge on their common enemy by quoting different similes, in the manner of delivering blows to a fallen enemy. So they waited their turn thinking of similes they would quote.

Saccaka had a presage of what the princes were planning and what was in store for him. He knew: “These princes were impatiently waiting their turn. If each of them gets the chance to come out with his simile, I will never be able to raise my head again in such crowds.” He therefore planned to avoid such a mishap by approaching the Buddha with a request to solve a problem before they could intervene as planned. It was with this intention that he had deterred Prince Dummukha from intervention and approached the Buddha with the request:)

“Venerable Gotama ... please leave aside my words, as well as those of many samaṇas and Brahmas. Such words may be taken as idle talks. To what extent does a disciple of yours practise according to the Teaching, following the instruction and abide by the Teaching of Gotama, having overcome uncertainty, having dispelled all doubts, having gained the courage of conviction and not dependent on others in matters of faith?”

“Wanderer Saccaka, in this sāsana, a disciple of mine, sees any or all corporeality with right understanding as they really are, whether past, future, or present, in oneself or outside oneself, gross or subtle, mean or exalted, far or near, in these eleven different manners, through vipassanā-ñāṇa, maggā-ñāṇa, thus: ‘This corporeality is not I, this corporeality is not mine, this corporeality is not my attā, self,’ ...p... all sensation ...p... all perception ...p... volitional activities ...p... Sees any or all six-fold consciousness with right understanding as they really are, whether past, future, or present, in oneself or outside oneself, gross or subtle, mean or exalted, far or near, in these eleven different manners, through vipassanā-ñāṇa, magga-ñāṇa. Thus, this consciousness is not mine; this consciousness is not I; this consciousness is not my attā, self.”

Wanderer Saccaka ... it is to such an extent does a disciple of mine practise according to the Teaching, following the instruction and abide by the Teaching, having overcome uncertainty, having dispelled all doubts, having gained the courage of conviction and not dependent on others in matters of faith?”

(According to Canonical terms, the three Lower Fruition stages are termed Sikkha-bhūmi, i.e. the Sikkha personalities (trainees); Canonical term of Arahatta Fruition stage is termed the Arahatta-puggalas or the abode of ariya-puggalas exclusively.

Herein, the term ‘sees’ signifies a continuing process, not having completed the act of seeing. Although Saccaka was not acquainted with the terms employed in the sāsana, it occurred to him that ‘sees’ is somewhat short of ‘realization’, and so he addressed the Buddha again.)

“Venerable Gotama...to what extent (in what manner) does a bhikkhu, become an arahat, having eliminated āsavas, having accomplished magga practices, having done what is to be done, having laid down the burden (of aggregates, defilement and conditioned existence), having attained his own goal of arahatta-phala, having destroyed all the fetters of existence, and having become emancipated through full comprehension?”

The Buddha replied:

“Wanderer Saccaka, in this sāsana, a disciple of mine, sees any or all corporeality with right understanding as they really are, whether past, future, or present, in oneself or outside oneself, gross or subtle, mean or exalted, far or near, in these eleven different manners, through vipassanā-ñāṇa, magga-ñāṇa, thus: “This corporeality is not I, this corporeality is not mine, this corporeality is not my attā, self, ...p... all sensation ...p... all perception ...p... volitional activities ...p.. Sees any or all six-fold consciousness thus: this consciousness is not mine, this consciousness is not my attā, self,” and becomes emancipated having no clinging.

Wanderer Saccaka ... it is to that extent does a disciple of mine become an arahat, having eliminated āsavas, having accomplished magga practices, having done what is to be done, having laid down the burden (of aggregates, defilement and conditioned existence) having attained his own goal of arahatta-phala, having destroyed all the fetters of existence, and having become emancipated through full comprehension?

Wanderer Saccaka ... such a bhikkhu, with the mind thus emancipated becomes endowed with three eminent qualities, namely, eminence<sup>2</sup> in insight, eminence in practice and eminence in emancipation.

Wanderer Saccaka, a bhikkhu with his mind thus emancipated, reveres, esteems, honours, and venerates the Buddha saying:

*Buddho boddhāya desesi danto yo dhammathāya ca
samathāya santo dhammam tinnova taraṇāya ca
nibbuto nibbānathaya
taṇ lokasaranam name.*

2. Eminence in insight means insight into Nibbāna; eminence in practice means perfect practice, the Ariya Path of Eight Constituents; eminence in emancipation means the attainment of arahatta-phala.

Our Teacher, the Buddha, having gained Enlightenment with regard to the Four Noble Truths expounds the Dhamma to enlighten sentient beings.

Our Teacher, the Buddha, having subdued or tamed Himself, expounds the Dhamma to tame sentient beings.

Our Teacher, the Buddha, having extinguished the flame of defilements Himself, expounds the Dhamma to sentient beings to help them extinguish the flame of their defilement.

Our Teacher, the Buddha, having crossed over Four Great Oghas (floods of sensual desire, rebirth, wrong views and ignorance), expounds the Dhamma for crossing over.

Our Teacher, the Buddha, having achieved total extinction of kilesa, expounds the Dhamma to sentient beings, for their achievement of total extinction of their kilesa.

Offering of Alms-meal to The Buddha by Wanderer Saccaka

When Buddha had thus explained the Exalted State of the Fruit of Arahatta, Saccaka addressed Him:

“O Venerable Gotama ... we have, indeed, offended you and were impudent to think that we could dispute your views and refute them. We have tried to disparage you with harsh and discourteous words.

O Venerable Gotama ... for example, a person might find safety after attacking an elephant in must. But there could be no safety for a man attacking the Honourable Gotama.

O Venerable Gotama ... a man who attacks a blazing mass of fire might find safety but there could be no safety for a man attacking the Honourable Gotama.

O Venerable Gotama ... a man who attacks a dreadful and poisonous snake might find safety, but there could be no safety for a man attacking the Honourable Gotama.

O Venerable Gotama ... we have, indeed, offended you and were impudent to think that we could dispute your views and refute them. We have tried to disparage you with harsh and discourteous words.”

(N.B. Saccaka said, “...there could be no safety for a man attacking the Honourable Gotama.” This meant that anyone, who chanced to pass strictures on the Venerable Gotama in a debate on views, cannot escape from being destroyed and had to depart with his views completely demolished. It should be noted that the Buddha had not caused harm to the life of anyone, like a big elephant, a great bon-fire or a venomous snake.

Saccaka had made such a statement, with three similes, not intending to praise the Buddha, but to blow his own trumpet. For example, a King, who had caused the death of an enemy might speak highly of the defeated by remarks, such as: “That man is such a brave and courageous one”, just to glorify his feat of arms.

Saccaka had, in like manner, praised the Buddha, who was difficult to be approached by an ordinary being, by the similes of a big elephant, a great bon-fire and a venomous snake, just to show that he was the only wise man with great courage to have challenged the Buddha to a debate on views.)

When Saccaka had thus indirectly praised himself, he turned to the Buddha and presented an invitation: “Venerable Gotama ... May the Honourable Gotama be pleased to accept my offering of alms-meal, together with the community of bhikkhus at my place tomorrow”. The Buddha accepted his invitation by keeping silent.

Saccaka then turned to the Licchavi princes and said: “Let Licchavi princes listen to me. The Venerable Gotama has accepted my invitation to the food offering ceremony at my place tomorrow. You might bring me whatever you think is suitable for them.” When the night passed, they all brought five hundred pots of cooked food to him. Then Saccaka, having made ready sumptuous food, hard and soft at his place, sent a messenger to inform the Buddha: “O Honourable Gotama, it is time for meal; the alms-food is ready.”

Then in the morning, the Buddha, having rearranged His robes and taking His alms-bowl and (great) robe, went to the place of Saccaka and took the seat prepared for Him, together with the community of bhikkhus. Saccaka served, with his own hands, sumptuous food, both hard and soft, to the bhikkhus headed by the Buddha, till they were completely satisfied and could not take any more.

When Saccaka knew that the Buddha had finished taking the meal, he sat down in a suitable place and addressed Him:

Saccaka had made such wish under the impression that only Licchavi princes were entitled to enjoy the fruits of the act of merit, which was performed with the food donated by them. But it was Saccaka himself who should enjoy the reward because he had actually made the offering to the Buddha and the Sangha with what he had received from the Licchavi princes. The Buddha therefore removed his wrong impression by saying:

“Wanderer Saccaka, the merit goes to the Licchavi princes for gifts offered to a recipient like you, who is not free from rāga, dosa and moha.

Saccaka, the merit goes to you for gifts offered to a recipient like Me, who is free from rāga, dosa and moha.”

Thus the Buddha impressed upon his mind the idea of consequences of deeds of merit (so as to let it become part of his nature).

Expounding of Mahā Saccaka Sutta

The above is Cula Saccaka Sutta. This is not the only Sutta that the Buddha had expounded. Mahā Saccaka Sutta was also expounded to him at a later date. Mahā Saccaka Sutta deals with two modes of meditation, namely, contemplation of the body (corporeality) and contemplation of the mind, and two types of persons, namely, Sammūhā-puggala meaning ‘bewildered person’ and Asammūhā-puggala meaning ‘one who is without bewilderment.’ For full particulars, please refer to Mulapaññāsa Pāli Text.

Natural Bent

The Buddha expounded Cula Saccaka Sutta and Mahā Saccaka Sutta. The former is as long as a section for recitation at the Buddhist Council while Mahā Saccaka Sutta is as long as one and a half section for recitation at the Buddhist Council. In spite of these long discourses and exhortation by the Buddha, Saccaka did not attain any stage of the Path and Fruition nor did he receive ordination. He did not take refuge in the three Jewels either. A question might be asked as to why then the Buddha had preached him such exhaustive suttas?

The Buddha preached the discourses to sow the seed of the Noble Truths in him so as to reap the harvest of the Path and Fruition, in due course. This is an explanation in detail: The Buddha perceived that Saccaka lacked sufficing conditions for the attainment of the Path and Fruition during his life time. But he was destined to attain arahatship two hundred years after the Buddha's Parinibbāna when the sāsana would be in full bloom at Sihala (Sri Lanka). He would be born to the family of a minister of a king. When he became of age, he would become a bhikkhu and after learning the Tipiṭaka and practising the Vipassanā meditation attains arahatta-phala, endowed with paṭisambhida-ñāna. He would be popularly known as Kala Buddha Rakkhita Thera. Perceiving thus his future destiny through His knowledge of the future, anagata-ñāṇa, the Buddha had instilled into his heart a spark of Truth so that it might develop into a natural tendency in due time.

3. The main beneficial results mean future existence (in the form of five aggregates) in deva realm or happy circumstances in the human world; the subsidiary consequences mean wealth, properties, regalia etc. necessary for sumptuous living conditions.

When the sāsana was in full bloom at Sihala, he would pass away from the celestial plane and was reborn to the family of a minister at a village that was responsible for the provision of food for a Great Monastery known as Dakkhinagiri. He would receive ordination when he came of age and studied the Tipiṭaka. He eventually rose to the status of a senior bhikkhu in charge of a section of the Sangha. He would go to pay homage, in the company of his numerous disciples, to his preceptor, who was responsible for his ordination.

The preceptor would decide to censure his own disciple, Buddha Rakkhita, for neglecting the practices for liberation, though he had studied the Tipiṭaka. The teacher then decided therefore, not to sit face to face with the disciple.

Going to his master's monastery on the following day, Kala Buddha Rakkhita Thera would ask his teacher: "Revered Sir ... now that I have come to see you after completion of the full course of learning the scriptures, I find that you do not seem to have the desire to see me. May I know if there is anything wrong I have done?"

His teacher would answer: "Buddha Rakkhita ... do you think that you have accomplished all the tasks incumbent on a bhikkhu just because you have studied the five Nikāyas and the Tipiṭaka?" Whereupon, he would seek for instructions by asking: "Revered Sir ... if so, what should I do?" His preceptor would give the following instructions: "You must give up all the obligations to your followers (ganapatibodha) which obstruct your progress, and cut off all the remaining defilement by repairing to Cetīya Mountain Monastery and devote entirely to the bhikkhu-dhamma, i.e. meditation.

Kāla Buddha Rakkhita Mahāthera would do as he was advised by his old master and in due course he attained the Exalted State of Patisambhida arahat. He would continue to reside at the Cetīya Mountain Monastery amidst many disciples, and became well-known as the Master of the King and the commoners, as well.

King Tissa Listened to The Discourses

At one time, King Tissa was keeping his religious practice in a cave known as Raja on the hill of the Cetīya. He left words with a bhikkhu who was attending upon the Kāla Buddha Rakkhita Mahāthera: "Revered Sir ... Kindly let me know when the Venerable Kāla Buddha Rakkhita attends to questions or preaches Dhamma." On a day fixed for preaching, Kāla Buddha Rakkhita went to the precincts of Kandhaka stupa and sat on the Dhamma throne prepared at the base of an ebony tree.

Kala Buddha Rakkhita recited the introductory stanza and started to preach the Kāla Karama Sutta as laid down in Catukka nipatta Aṅguttara Pail Text. The bhikkhu attendant to the Mahāthera went to King Tissa and informed him of the preaching of the Dhamma by the Mahāthera.

King Tissa reached the site of Dhamma teaching while the Mahāthera was still reciting the introductory stanza. He stood listening the discourse on the fringe of the big audience, in the guise of a commoner, throughout the three watches of the night. He said: "Sādhu, Sādhu" at the conclusion of the discourse. The Mahāthera recognized him to be the King and asked: "How long have you been here?" "Revered Sir ... from the outset of the discourse," was his reply. When the Mahāthera said: "Your Majesty ... you have done a difficult thing indeed." To this, the King made this solemn reply: "Revered Sir ... this is not a difficult thing at all for me to keep standing and listening the discourse for a night. In fact, I had been taking note of every word and following the discourse without my mind being led astray at any moment, from start to finish. I swear that this statement of mine is true. Had I told a lie, I might be stripped off my sovereignty over this island of Sihala, without having any more authority even over a tiny spot of land the size of the tip of a whip." He thus made a solemn vow very boldly.

Infinite Attributes of The Buddha

Kāla Karama Sutta illustrates the attributes of the Buddha, and therefore King Tissa asked the Mahāthera: “Revered Sir ... should we take it that you have described all the attributes of the Buddha in full or are there any more besides these?” The Mahāthera replied: “Your Majesty... attributes of the Buddha are infinitely incalculable, many times more than what I have just described.”

(1) The King then requested: “Revered Sir ... kindly explain to us with an example.” The Mahāthera gave an example in response to the King's request. “Your Majesty ... suppose there is a state paddy field measuring one thousand pais<sup>4</sup>. The amount of seeds present in an ear or spike of corn is infinitesimal compared with the number of seeds borne by the rest of corn spikes in the whole field; even so the attributes of the Buddha that remain undescribed by me are innumerable times greater than what I have just described.”

(2) The King said: “Revered Sir ... please give us another example.” The Mahāthera said: “Just as the amount of water that would pass through the eye of a needle, which is dipped in alignment with the current of the river Ganges, is negligible when compared with the remaining volume of water that flows down the mighty river, even so the attributes of the Buddha that I have described is negligible compared to those that still remain undescribed.”

(3) The King said: “Revered Sir ... please give us some more example.” The Mahāthera said: “A tiny bird of sky-lark species can be seen flying merrily about the sky. Just compare the area of space that is covered by its spread-out wings with the remaining open space, and, tell me which portion of the space is greater?” The King readily responded: “Revered Sir, how can you have said it to me ... it goes without saying that the amount of space occupied by the spreading wing of the bird is negligible when compared to the remaining infinite portion of the space (sky).” The Mahāthera told the King: “Your Majesty, even so, the attributes of the Buddha that remain unrevealed by me are far greater than what I have just described.”

The King then addressed the Mahāthera: “Revered Sir ... you have taught well by comparing the infinity of attributes of the Buddha with the infinity of the space. May I express my profound respect and deep sense of gratitude to you. We are incapable of making a fitting homage to you. May I therefore offer you kingship and sovereign power over the island of Sihala with an area of three hundred yojanas! This is an humble offer of a poor man.” (The King had evaluated his kingship vis-a-vis the invaluable discourses on the Attributes of the Buddha; hence he likened the offering of his kingship as a poor man's gift.)

Kāla Buddha Rakkhita Mahāthera made this remark in response to the King's offer: “Your Royal Highness ... you have, indeed, shown your profound respect and deep sense of gratitude to me, and I now return the kingship, which you have offered to me with all its glories, to you with my blessings: my sincere wish is that you rule the people of the Sihala and govern them with righteousness.”

(This Kāla Buddha Rakkhita, the arahant, had set an example to the members of the Order. The kingship and regalia or emblems of royalty, offered out of deep devotional faith and reverence to bhikkhus are not to be accepted since they are appurtenances and luxurious belongings of worldly people. They should be returned to the donors.)

During the fifth vassa, the Buddha had made the first and second visit to Sihala to give exhortations to the dragon King Culodara and his nephew Mahodara. But as the Buddha made a third visit to the island during the eighth vassa, we have deferred inclusion of the first two visits in order to give a combined account of the three visits when we describe the events of the eighth vassa.

THE BUDDHA'S THE SIXTH VASSA AT MT. MAKULA

The Buddha took up residence at the forest of Mahāvan in Vesali country during the fifth vassa emancipating those sentient beings who were deserving. He left there after conclusion of the vassa, and travelled towards the countries of Savatthi and Rājagaha on a similar mission.

Two Kinds of Journey

There are two kinds of journey undertaken by the Buddha, according to circumstances, namely, (1) the kind of journey made suddenly, turita cārika and (2) an itinerary with stops at villages and towns, covering distances from one to two yojanas regularly per day, aturita cārika.

Turita Cārika: The journey undertaken suddenly when perceiving someone deserving of emancipation. There are many instances such as, the Buddha setting out all of a sudden to receive Venerable Mahā Kassapa covering three gavutas; then He covered a journey of thirty yojanas in no time to save Ogre Alavaka; He did the same thing at the time of saving Angulimala, a notorious robber; He covered forty-five yojanas swiftly to preach to King Pakkusati after He had become a bhikkhu; He covered one hundred and twenty yojanas in no time to save King Mahā Kappina; He covered seven hundred yojanas in no time to save Dhaniya, the wealthy owner of bullocks and his wife. Such journeys made suddenly on such missions are termed Turita cārika.

Aturita Cārika: When the Buddha left a certain place at the end of a period of vassa, and set out on a journey, He usually touched in at every intermediate towns and villages to receive alms or to preach, covering a distance of one or two yojanas per day. Such a journey honouring all people along the route by receiving alms or preaching to them is known as Aturita cārika.

Three Circumferential Dimensions of The Buddha's Journeys

The Buddha used to make three types of journey with varying circumferential dimensions, viz., (1) a journey covering the most widespread territory, Mahā-maṇḍhala, (2) a journey with a medium coverage of territory, Majjhima-maṇḍhala, (3) a journey with the smallest coverage of territory, Anto-maṇḍhala.

Of these three types (1) Mahā-maṇḍhala has an area of 900 yojanas; (2) Majjhima-maṇḍhala has an area of 600 yojanas (3) Anto-maṇḍhala has an area of 300 yojanas. This will be clarified:

(1) The Buddha held the Pavāraṇā ceremony at the end of vassa on the full moon day of Thadingyut, Assayujo. Should there be no special reason to wait, such as to save a worthy sentient being from the round of existence, He started His journey on the first waning moon of Thadingyut, in the company of a large number of bhikkhus, covering one or two yojanas per day. He continued on wandering thus for nine months till the full moon day of Waso (Asalho) of the next year.

At each stop en route to the destination, enthusiastic donors from all directions, within an area of one hundred yojanas came in groups to pay homage with offerings. Those who came late scarcely got the chance of extending invitation to the Buddha to their places. These two other regions formed part and parcel of this mahā-maṇḍhala zone. The Buddha stayed a day or two at villages and towns within the vast zone of mahā-maṇḍhala, to bless the people of the locality by receiving alms from them and by preaching to them the Dhamma, He thus developed their merit to escape from the round of rebirth. Thus the Buddha usually spent nine months en route before He ended His itinerary. The journey lasting nine months covered a distance of three hundred yojanas from the beginning to the end. With this area of three hundred yojanas as the centre, people from places three hundred yojanas on the left side of the route as well as those on the right also had the opportunity of doing meritorious deeds such as offering alms and listening to the Dhamma. Thus, these areas may be considered as also been visited by the Buddha. Hence the statement above that a mahā-maṇḍhala journey measures nine hundred yojanas, as explained.

(2) In case the bhikkhus had not reached maturity in their practice of concentration and insight meditation, 'Pavāraṇā' Ceremony of Sangha which fell on the full moon of Thadingyut, was put off till full moon of Tazaungmon, Kattika. Then only on the first waning moon of Tazaungmon, the Buddha would start the journey attended by the bhikkhus. If for some other reason He wished to go on a majjima-maṇḍhala range of journey, He would tarry till the full moon of Tazaungmon (a full four months) at wherever He had kept the vassa, and then set out on the journey. In the above manner, the Buddha would spend the eight-month journey honouring the populace with His visits and preaching the Dhamma. The journey of eight months would cover two hundred yojanas from the beginning to the end. Each area on either side of the road measured two hundred yojanas. People from these areas also had the opportunity of doing meritorious deeds such as offering alms and listening to the Dhamma. Thus these areas may be considered as also been visited by the Buddha. Hence the statement above that a majjima-maṇḍhala journey has an area of six hundred yojanas, as explained.

(3) Although Buddha had spent four months observing the vassa at a certain place (i.e. up to and inclusive of the full moon of Tazaungmon), if deserving beings were still lacking in maturity of faculties, He continued His stay at the same place for another month. When necessary, such time of grace was prolonged, month after month, even for four months right up to the full moon of Pyatho (Phusso), as occasion demanded, and then only did He leave that place in the company of a great number of bhikkhus, to set out on the anto-maṇḍhala journey.

As in the previous case the Buddha spent these respective months, blessing people by His visits and preaching. The length of time necessary for traversing the country was reduced from seven to four months, for reasons as described above. Because of the shortage of time, that seven, or six, or five, or four month journey had a distance of one hundred yojanas. As in the above manner, the areas on either side of this one hundred yojanas journey were also visited. Hence it is said: "Anto maṇḍhala journey ranges altogether three hundred yojanas."

It should be borne in mind that the Buddha had set out on anyone of these itineraries not for receiving the four requisites, namely, robe, food, shelter, medicine, but out of compassionate consideration and with the sole purpose of affording opportunity to the poor, the ignorant, the aged, the sick, who would have no means of paying homage to Him at any other time. Of them, some would be pleased just to see Him, some would like to offer flowers and sweet scents, or a morsel of hard earned food, and there would be those who had given up wrong view to take up the Right View. Such encounters with Him would bring about lasting peace, prosperity and happiness for these people.

This was how the Buddha, after having kept the fifth vassa in the Mahāvāna forest at Vesali, travelled to Savatthi and Rājagaha with the villages on their outskirts (by way of any of the three kinds of journey) for the uplift of all living beings and administering the Elixir of the Dhamma with His preaching. He kept the sixth vassa at Mount Makula Monastery, which was situated by the side of the ocean and was shaded and walled by a forest of star flower trees, saving all deserving human and celestial beings and Brahmās from the sufferings of sentient existence.

The Sandal-Wood Bowl

The Buddha, having kept the sixth vassa at the Mount Makula monastery, left for Rājagaha and took up residence at Veļuvana monastery there.

At that time, a rich man of Rājagaha, being desirous of disporting himself in the River

Ganges, caused a huge net to be constructed in the form of a casket surrounding all four sides of the place where he was to disport, to protect himself against all possible danger from both above and below the spot and against the risk of his jewellery being washed.

At that time, a red sandal-wood tree was drifting down the Ganges from the upper reaches of the river. The current of the river had caused it to fall by washing away the sand at its base. The tree lost its size, shape or form as it dashed against the cliffs and rocks while floating down the swift current during the course of a long journey. It had been battered, broken into pieces, tattered and finally a heartwood piece of red sandalwood, with the constant abrasion, had taken the form of a block of wood with a smooth surface. As it floated down, it was caught in the rich man's net with all the duckweeds wrapped around it. The servants and attendants brought it to their master, the rich man.

At that time, the rich man of Rājagaha was a man without any religious belief; he did not hold the Right View (Sammā-dit̥ṭhi) or the Wrong View (Micchā-dit̥ṭhi) either. He brought the bowl of sandalwood to his house and had the upper layer chipped off with an adze. They found the reddish heartwood emitting the sweet fragrance of sandalwood. It set him thinking: "I have so many kinds of sandalwood in my house, and what should I do with this one!" and it eventually dawned on him:

"In the world today, there are many people, who profess themselves to be arahats. I have no idea as to who is a real arahat. I will have a lathe to be installed in my house and get the block of sandal-wood made into an alms-bowl; the wood dust from the lathe I will use, but the bowl I will donate as charity. I will put it into a containing frame and keep it hanging from a pole made by tying a series of bamboos, end to end, to a height of sixty cubits, and announce: 'Anyone who can prove himself to be an arahat by flying into the air through jhānic power and securing the bowl can have it for his own. And the arahat who can actually come by air and claim the bowl as announced, I, together with my family, will accept him and worship him as our teacher.' "

He, accordingly, had the sandal-wood made into an alms-bowl, and kept it hanging in a framework from a series of bamboos tied together to a height of sixty cubits, announcing: "Any real arahat in the world may receive this bowl by flying through the space (sky)."

The Six Sectarial Teachers

At that time, there were residing in Rājagaha six sectarian teachers who professed themselves to be arahats and sages of their own sects. They were:

(1) Purana Kassapa:

His proper name is Purana, and he belonged to a clan known as Kassapa, and he came to be known as Purana Kassapa.

This is a brief account of this sect teacher: There was a rich man who had ninety-nine slaves, and Purana was born as the 100th slave, hence he was named Purana or "Centenary Slave." He was considered an auspicious slave for being the hundredth one, and he was not criticized for his misdeeds or blamed for negligence of duty.

With all that, he absconded with a conceited idea: "Why should I stay in this house?" and ran straight into a gang of robbers who stripped him bare. He had not enough decency to clad himself in leaves or grass. He went into a village with his body altogether nude. People misplaced their faith in him, speaking highly of him: "This recluse is an arahat; he is so self-denying and continent; there is no one like him." They went to him with offerings of hard and soft food. He thought to himself: "Mine being nude is the cause of gaining such gifts." From that time on, he remained unclothed even when he had clothings offered him. He became fixed in his belief that nakedness was a condition of a recluse. He had five hundred men who became his disciples by adopting such a way of life. In this way he became a leader of a sect, an illustrious teacher, a god to his followers.

N.B. When we examine the life of this sect leader closely, we find that he absconded from his master's place only to run straight into a gang of robbers, who stripped him bare. That was how he was reduced to the state of nakedness. But unintelligent people thought that nakedness constitutes holiness and pronounced him an arahat. When accepted as such, he began to style himself as a great sage, a god, even though he had nothing to show in the matter of spiritual development and practice. He and the following five sect leaders, in their self-acclaimed positions, had made speculations and pronounced them as creeds of their own. For details, reader may refer to 2-Samañña phala Sutta of Silakkhanda Vagga of Digha Nikāya.

(2) Makkhali Gosala

His proper name was Makkhali, Gosala was added to his name as he was born at the village of Gosala (or as he was born in a cow-shed where bullocks were kept during the rainy season).

A short account of his life:

He was a slave, like Purana. One day as he was going across a muddy spot with an oil-pot on his shoulder, his master warned him to be careful not to slip and fall: “My lad, don’t slip: My lad ... don’t slip.” But he was so careless that he did slip and fall and so he tried to run away because of fear of his master.

When his master caught him by a portion of his nether garment, he abandoned his clothings and escaped through the fingers of his master. (The rest of the story is identical with that of Purana Kassapa.)

(3) Ajita Kesa-kambala:

He was also the teacher of a sect. His proper name was Ajita. He used to wear a garment, kambala, made of human hair (kesā), and he came to be known as Ajita Kesa-kambala.

(4) Pakudha Kaccayana:

He was also the teacher of a sect. His proper name was Pakudha. He belonged to Kaccayana clan, so he came to be known as Pakudha Kaccayana. He eschewed cold water. He used either warm water or vinegar to tidy up after defecating, or to wash away dirt or dust. He considered himself to have breached the precepts whenever he had crossed a stream or a river. Such lapses had to be atoned for by piling sand in small heaps and taking the precepts before he could continue his journey.

(5) Sancaya Belatthaputta:

He was also the teacher of a sect. The Venerables Sāriputta and Mahā Moggallāna lived with him when they started leading the life of a wandering ascetic. His proper name was Sancaya. He was the son of a man called Belattha, and he came to be known as Sancaya Belatthaputta.

(6) Nigantha Nathaputta.

He was also the teacher of a sect. He professed: “We have no defilements binding us; we are free from fettering defilements.” Hence the term ‘Nigantha.’ (In fact they were far from being free from defilements). His father was called Natha and he came to be known as Nigantha Nathaputta.

The sandal bowl was kept hanging from the top of a pole made up of a number of bamboos, to a height of sixty cubits. A general announcement was made to the effect that “anyone who has become an arahat in this world may receive the bowl by flying through space with jhānic power.” Whereupon, the teacher, Purana Kassapa came to the rich man of Rājagaha and said: “Rich man .. I am an arahat and am also one with power and so give the bowl to me.” He made such a bold claim without any rhyme or reason. The rich man of Rājagaha tactfully made a meaningful reply: “Venerable Sir ... I have already offered the bowl to any real arahat who possesses power. If you be a real arahat and if you have such power, bring down and take away the bowl with your powers.” (Since Purana Kassapa was not an arahat replete with jhānic power, he had to return with his hopes dashed to the ground).

The other teachers also came to claim the bowl in like manner as Purana Kassapa: on the second day there came Makkhali Gosala; on the third, Ajita Kesakambala; on the fourth day, Pakudha Kaccayana, on the fifth, Sancaya Belatthaputta; they all met the same fate as Purana Kassapa, since they could not fulfil the condition set out by the rich man.

On the sixth day, Nigandha Nathaputta summoned his disciples and confided to them: "Go ye to the rich man of Rājagaha and tell him: 'The bowl is only fit for our Great Sage; do not make our Great teacher come all the way through space for a negligible wooden bowl such as that; do exempt our Great Sage from such a task and offer it to him.'" He thus sent his disciples to the rich man of Rājagaha.

His disciples went to the rich man of Rājagaha and told him as instructed by their teacher. Whereupon, the rich man gave them a firm reply: "Only those who can come through space may get the bowl."

Nigantha Nathaputta had a desire to go there personally and so he confided these instructions to his disciples:

"I will make a sham attempt by lifting one of my legs and hands, as though I am about to shoot up into the sky, and you all come saying: 'O Great Sage .. What are you going to do .. please do not demonstrate the secrets of the virtues of arahatta-phala for the sake of a wooden bowl,' and then you will push and make me fall to the ground."

He thus confided to them his plans.

After conspiring with his disciples, Nathaputta went to the rich man and said: "Rich man .. this bowl is not fit for anybody else, why should you want me to fly in the air for a paltry wooden bowl. Do offer it to me." "Venerable Sir... just fly up to the sky and take it," was the rich man's terse reply.

Whereupon, Nathaputta said: "If that is the case I will shoot up into the sky" and turning to his disciples he asked them to move aside and he lifted one of his hands and feet. Then his disciples hastened to their teacher and said to him: "O Great teacher ... what do you mean by this! ... it is not worth demonstrating the virtues of arahatta-phala for the sake of a worthless wooden bowl" as previously arranged. They pulled him by his hands and feet and caused him to fall to the ground. Nathaputta, while still lying on the ground, told the rich man: "O rich man ... you have seen that my disciples would not allow me to fly into the sky. I urge you to offer me that bowl." But the rich man was not to be moved. He calmly repeated: "Please take it only by flying into the sky."

Thus the six teachers made six attempts for six days in succession, but to no purpose.

Venerables Mahā Moggallāna and Pindola.

On the seventh day, the two Venerables, namely, Venerables Mahā Moggallāna and Pindola came out of the Veļuvana monastery to enter the City of Rājagaha for the usual round of receiving alms food. When they were putting on robes while on a huge rock near the city, they overheard the calumniating remarks of some drunken persons:

"Friends ... those six sectarian teachers used to go round announcing themselves as arahats in the past. It is now the seventh day since the rich man of Rājagaha made the announcement: 'If there is an arahat, let him come through space to take the bowl,' after hanging the sandalwood bowl from a series of bamboo poles tied together to a height of sixty cubits. Not even one person declaring: 'I am an arahat' has been able to fly into the sky. Only today we know well there are no arahats in the world."

On hearing that remark, Venerable Mahā Moggallāna asked the Venerable Pindola: "Friend ... do you hear the derogatory remark of those drunken persons? His sweeping calumniating remark also affects the prestige of Buddha-Sāsana. You possess power; you are mighty; Go and bring the sandalwood bowl by flying through space." Whereupon, Venerable Pindola Bharadvaja replied: "Friend ... The Buddha had elevated you to the Chief position (Etadaggamī) with respect to your supernormal power, and, as such, I wish you to do it yourself. I will accomplish the task only if you do not undertake it." (This shows that Venerable Pindola had given priority to Venerable Mahā Moggallāna out of respect for his seniority). Whereupon, Venerable Mahā Moggallāna willingly permitted the Venerable Pindola to accomplish the task all by himself.

Venerable Pindola Bharadvaja obtained The Sandal-Wood Bowl

Having obtained permission from Mahā Moggallāna, Venerable Pindola entered into the fourth jhāna state, it being the basis of supernormal psychic power and arising therefrom, he caused the huge slab of rock, on which they stood to put on their robes, to rise into space by means of his super-normal will. The rock, with neatly and elegantly trimmed sides, was made to fly like a piece of silk cotton-wool and circle round seven times above the city of Rājagaha which had an area of three gavutas. The huge slab of rock seemed to be an enormous lid covering the city of Rājagaha.

The citizens were frightened at the sight of a huge rock hanging over their heads and thinking “the huge slab of rock has covered and pressed us” ran helter-skelter and took shelter under nearby places, covering their heads with flat trays. When the huge rock had made its seventh round above the city, Venerable Pindola made himself visible through the rock. Whereupon the citizens appealed to the Venerable: “Venerable Sir ... please hold the rock fast, lest it destroys all of us.” Even as the people looked on, the Venerable caused the huge rock to return to its original position by kicking and tossing it with his toes.

When Venerable Pindola stood in the sky right above the residence of the rich man. The latter, on seeing him, crawled on his breast on the ground and invited the Venerable to descend. Once the Venerable was in his house, he had the bowl brought down and filled it with four kinds of nourishment, ‘Catu-madu’, to its brim. He then offered it to the Venerable with due respect.

People came rallying round (Venerable Pindola)

As the Venerable was on the way to the monastery with the bowl, people who had missed the opportunity of seeing the super-normal power, for their being away in the fields, came rallying round the Venerable and requested: “Venerable Sir ... please let us see the supernormal performance like the others.” They followed him right up to the monastery witnessing the miracle as demonstrated by the Venerable.

The Buddha prescribed A Ruling Prohibiting Demonstration of Miracles

On hearing uproarious noises, Buddha asked the Venerable Ānanda: “Dear Son Ānanda ... whose clamour are those?” The Venerable Ānanda replied: “Most Exalted Buddha... Venerable Pindola had flown up into the sky and brought down the sandalwood bowl offered by the rich man of Rājagaha. Hearing the news many people have followed at his heels. Those clamorous voices are the voices of the people.”

Whereupon, the Buddha caused the Sangha to be assembled and asked Venerable Pindola: “Dear Son Pindola ... is it true that you had obtained the sandalwood bowl of the rich man of Rājagaha by means of a miracle (patihāriya)?” When Pindola replied it was true, the Buddha censured him, giving many reasons and preached some discourses by way of exhortation, and then He prescribed a ruling: Na bhikkhave Iddhipatihāriyam dassetabbam, yo dasseya āpatti dukkatassa — Bhikkhus ... no bhikkhu shall display a miracle; the defaulter is guilty of transgression, “Dukkata Āpatti.” He then continued that the sandalwood bowl be broken into pieces and distributed amongst the bhikkhus to be powdered for use as eye medicine, and prescribed another ruling that no bhikkhu should make use of wooden bowls, any defaulter would be guilty of transgression, “Dukkata Āpatti.”

The Impudent and Arrogant Boast of The Heretic Sects

Upon hearing that Buddha had prohibited the bhikkhus from demonstrating miracles, heretics were confident that all the disciples of the Buddha would not breach such a ruling even on pain of death. They considered how they could take advantage of such a situation.

They went about the streets and alleys of the town bragging to the people: “In the past, to uphold our prestige, we had not made any attempt to display our super-normal power for (the sake of) a wooden alms-bowl. Only the disciples of Recluse Gotama have shamelessly done such things. It is said that Recluse Gotama, being a wise man, had caused all trace of the bowl to be lost by having it broken into pieces, and has also prescribed a ruling prohibiting the bhikkhus from performing miracles. We can now take advantage of the situation and challenge Gotama to perform a feat of miracles.”

On hearing the above news, King Bimbisāra approached the Buddha and discussed the question with this dialogue:

King: Most Glorious Buddha... did you prescribe a rule prohibiting the bhikkhus from performance of miracles?

Buddha: Yes... I did, gracious King!

King: Sectarians have been going round boasting that they would challenge the Buddha to feats of miracles. What would you do now?

Buddha: If they are going to stage performance of miracles, I too shall stage performance of miracles.

King: Have you not prescribed a ruling prohibiting the performance of miracles?

Buddha: Gracious King ... I have not prescribed the rule for Myself, I have prescribed the ruling exclusively for my disciples!

King: Could a ruling be prescribed exclusively for the disciples, except the Buddha?

Buddha: Gracious King ... in such a case, I will put a question to you: Are there mango trees and fruits in your garden?

King: Yes, there are ... Revered Sir.

Buddha: What action would you take against a person who chanced to pluck the fruits and eat them?

King: I will have to punish him in that case.

Buddha: Have you any right to enjoy the fruits by yourself?

Kings: Yes, I have ... Exalted Lord, no action need be taken against me when I enjoy my own property.

Buddha: Gracious King ... just as your authority prevails in this country with an area of three hundred yojanas, so My authority extends to one trillion world-systems (āṇākhetta). There cannot be any ruling for Me; only My disciples are subject to restrictions. I shall perform miracles.

King: Exalted Buddha... when will you perform the miracles?

Buddha: Gracious King .. four months from today, on the full moon day of Waso (Asalho), miracles will be performed by Me.

King: Exalted Buddha... at which place?

Buddha: Gracious King ... near the Kandamba mango tree in the country of Savatthi.

(The term Kandamba, means white mango tree; what the Buddha meant by Kandamba rukka was the mango tree planted by a gardener by the name of Kandamba.

The Buddha had chosen that place firstly, because this is the place where all the previous Buddhas used to perform miracles; secondly, to enable a greater number of people to witness the Great Event. The Buddha had decided this place which was a distance of forty-five yojanas and the time, after a lapse of four months.)

The Sectarrians' Schemes and Pretences

When the heretics heard of the bold declaration by the Buddha (that He would perform miracles on the full moon day of Waso, near the Kandhamba mango tree, in the country of Savatthi) they foresaw that they would be doomed forever. They, however, devised ways to mislead the people by false pretensions. They therefore agreed amongst themselves to dog the steps of the Buddha en route to Savatthi, and “to tell people (should they ask for explanation) that they had declared to stage a parallel performance of miracles in competition with the Recluse Gotama,” but that the Recluse Gotama was now running away from them in fear and thus they were dogging His footsteps not to lose sight of Him and give Him the chance to escape. “With this scheme of ours, we will even receive much gain and fame,” the heretics entertained the hope.

The matter of performance of miracles cropped up some time about the full moon day of Tabaung, Phagguno, in the year (108) one hundred and eight of the Great Era. It was about the First waning of Tabaung that the Buddha went on alms-round in Rājagaha and left that city for Savatthi in the company of disciples.

The heretics also started their journey simultaneously and travelled almost together, trailing behind the Buddha all along the way, receiving food and partaking from the same place, starting off and halting at the same time, sleeping at the same place and resuming the journey after breakfast at the same time the next morning. When asked by the people: “What makes you go along with the Buddha?” They gave the same answer as stated above. Crowds of people went along intending to witness the performance of miracles.

The Buddha travelled along the route, and on arrival at Savatthi, took residence at the Jetavana monastery. The heretics, having travelled along with Him, built a pavilion of heartwood of clutch wood out of the fund of one lakh raised by their disciples at their request. They decorated the pavilion in grand and novel way with blue lotus blooms and boastfully announced that this would be their centre for the performance of miracles.

King Pasenadi Kosala went to the Buddha and asked: “Most Exalted Buddha, the heretics have already got a pavilion built. May I have your permission to build a pavilion for you.” He replied: “Gracious King ... you need not build it. I have a donor at hand who is prepared to build it.” “Is there any person capable of building a pavilion for you other than myself?” “Gracious King .... Sakka (the King of Devas) will build it,” was the reply. The King asked: “Most Exalted Buddha.... at which place would you be pleased to perform miracles?” “Gracious King near the Kandamba mango tree,” was the reply.

The heretics were greatly shaken when they heard of the news “the Buddha will perform miracles near the mango tree,” and so they discussed with their supporting lay people to buy and fell all the mango trees, even day-old sprouts, growing within a radius of one yojana around the city of Savatthi.

An Account of Kandamba Mango Tree

The Buddha entered the city of Savatthi, accompanied by His disciples, to receive food on the morning of full moon day of Waso, (Asalho).

Incidentally, the royal gardener, named Kanda, was scaring away crows which were attracted by the scent of a big ripe mango fruit within the folds of an old nest of red ants on the mango tree. He eventually picked it with the idea of offering it to the King. On his way, he beheld the Buddha and then a fresh idea dawned on him:

“If the King were to enjoy this mango fruit, his reward would be something like eight or sixteen pieces of money, which would not keep me going for the whole of my life; if this was offered to the Buddha, I would get, in return, immeasurable benefit throughout the cycle of rebirths.”

With this devotional faith, he offered it to the Buddha while on his way to the King. Whereupon, the Buddha turned round and looked at the Venerable Ānanda, who being perceptive understood what the Buddha wanted him to do. He handed the stone alms-bowl that had been offered to the Buddha by the four Great Brahmas. The Buddha then lowered the bowl to accept the gift offered by the gardener Kanda. Then the Buddha showed signs of wishing to sit down at the spot.

Venerable Ānanda spread a robe over the spot for the Buddha and went ahead to prepare some mango squash and offered it to Him. After partaking of the mango squash, the Buddha called upon the royal gardener and said: “Lay devotee Kanda ... scrape the earth and have that mango seed planted here.” When Kanda had sowed the seed, the Buddha washed His hand right on top of the mango seed.

As soon as Buddha had washed His hands over the seed, a sprout of the size of the stock of a harrow came up; the sprout continued to grow gradually to a height of fifty cubits even as they looked on. The main stem put out four main branches sideways, into four directions, and the fifth shooting upwards each one measuring fifty cubits. The main branches, in turn, put out small branches and abundance of fruits, till gradually the whole tree was full of bunches of ripe fruit.

All the bhikkhus who arrived later could also partake of the fruits (there being enough and to spare). On hearing the marvellous appearance of the strange mango tree, King Pasenadi Kosala issued a royal order to the effect that no one must cut the tree and caused a number of security personnel to be posted around the tree.

(The mango tree was named after the gardener, Kanda, who planted the tree, hence “Kandamba Rukkha.” The Buddha was referring to this mango tree when He had told King Bimbisāra and King Pasenad Kosala that He would perform miracles near Kandamba mango tree, in answer to their query. This was a fact unknown to the heretics, and they had therefore arranged with their followers for the destruction of all mango trees, inclusive of sprouts, in and around the city of Savatthi, at their own expense so that the Buddha could not perform miracles.

Drunken men of the locality also had their share of fruits to enjoy with great satisfaction. They turned to the heretics and they decried their low and selfish motives saying: “Ha ..... you ruined heretics, you have destroyed all the mango trees, and uprooted even day-old sprouts in and around the city of Savatthi, for fear that the Recluse Gotama would perform miracles near (a white mango tree that you had in mind); but the miracles will take place near the mango tree planted by gardener Kanda,” and they attacked the heretics by throwing the seeds of the mangoes they had eaten at them.

The Pavilion of The Heretics was destroyed by The Wind ‘God’

Sakka (Indira) ordered the wind god: “Blow down the pavilion of the heretics, uprooting even the posts and dump it in the garbage.” The wind god did as he was told.

Sakka asked the sun god to cause intense heat for the sectarians by taking his mansion down a little. The sun god did as he was bid.

The wind god was asked again by the Sakka to create a whirlwind exclusively at the place of the heretics. The wind god did as he was bid, with the result that the heretics were soaked with perspiration and covered with dust, and they resembled the big red ant-hills.

Sakka then asked the rain god to pour torrential rain together with hail stones. The rain god did as he was bid, with the result that the heretics looked like oxen with white and red spots all over their bodies.

The heretics, with their pavilion wrecked beyond repair, could not withstand the intense heat and the force of the whirlwind accompanied by hail, they became crestfallen and helpless under the hopeless conditions, and there was no alternative but to run away helter-skelter wherever their legs could carry.

Purana Kassapa drowned Himself

Thus the six heretic teachers ran away in different directions. Meanwhile, a male servant servitor devotee of Purana Kassapa, who was a farmer, thought: “Now it must be time for my noble teachers, to perform miracles. I will go and see the miracles.” He released the oxen from the plough, and carrying the pot in which he had brought his gruel early in the morning, a rope and the goad, he arrived at the spot where his Sage was expected to show his feat of miracle. When he saw Purana Kassapa running hastily he asked him: “Most Rev. Sir .... I have come to witness your performance of miracles, and where are you bound for?” Purana Kassapa replied: “What good could my miracle do? Just hand me the pot and the rope.” Taking the rope and the pot he ran straight to the banks of a nearby running stream, got the pot filled with sand, and tying the pot tightly round his neck with the rope sprang into the running current to end his life. This was marked by some bubbles floating on the surface of the stream while he was reborn in the plane of misery known as Avīci.

A Lesson

It is natural that:

- (a) those who are ignorant, unenlightened are destined to suffer for a long time, through many transient existences;
- (b) those noble, virtuous, intelligent and enlightened persons enjoy the maximum of peace, joy and benefits.

Such is the nature of the world.

Addresses made by The Buddha's Disciples at The Feats of Miracle

Towards the evening on that day, Sakka realized that it was his duty to arrange for the creation of a jewelled pavilion for the Buddha and so he commanded Vissukamma to create a great pavilion extending over twelve yojanas, profusely covered with blue lotus blooms and adorned with seven kinds of jewels. The Sangha and the laity would assemble around the Buddha in this pavilion.

Towards the evening on that day, the Buddha left His Scented Chamber to take up temporary residence at the pavilion, which was created by Vissukamma, getting ready for the demonstration of the feat of miracles, and on arrival sat on the jewelled throne of the size of one yojana and under a white celestial umbrella of the size of three yojanas.

It will be recalled that a period of four months had elapsed since the last full moon day of Tabaung when the Buddha had given intimation to King Bimbisāra of His desire to demonstrate a feat of miracle near the Kandamba mango tree. This piece of news had spread far and wide ever since, and now all the bhikkhus, bhikkhunīs and male and female lay devotees had gathered around the Buddha on four sides, i.e., at the front, back, left and right, and 12 yojanas long on each side; 24 yojanas from end to end and 72 yojanas in circumference. All the celestial beings from ten thousand world-systems had also assembled at this place at the same time.

A Female Lay Devotee, Gharani's Address

At the assembly, Gharani, a female lay devotee and an anāgāmin with great power, stood in front of the Buddha and paying obeisance with palms together, made her address: “Most Exalted Buddha... when there is a daughter of yours such as myself, we see no need for you to exert yourself. May I be kindly permitted to demonstrate a feat of miracle?” Whereupon, He asked: “Dear daughter Gharani ... how would you demonstrate your feat of miracle?” She replied:

“Most Exalted Buddha... I shall cause the earth portion of the universe into water thereby turning the entire world-system into a uniform mass of water. I shall transform myself into a water hen and dive to reappear at the eastern edge, then likewise at the western, northern and southern edge of the universe, and then at the centre of the universe.

Whereupon, a certain person might ask as to who I am, and the people would answer: ‘She is Gharani, daughter of the Buddha, a female anāgāmin.’ This would lead the people to say: ‘This display of power is only the prelude, the power of a daughter of the Buddha, a young woman. The power of the Buddha must indeed be infinite.' In consequence, all the heretics would naturally lose courage and flee without even daring to glance back at You."

The Buddha told her: "Dear daughter Gharani, I knew you have the power to demonstrate such a feat of miracle, but the bouquet of flowers (attached to the winning post) was not meant for you." Gharani considered that the Buddha had not given her permission for good reasons; it might be that there was someone far superior than her in respect of power in the performance miracles. So she remained at a suitable place.

The Buddha contemplated: "If, in this manner, I should ask my sons and daughters, in the mildest of these spectations, covering twenty-four square yojanas, they will rise up bravely and with the mien of a lion king, make such wildly confident declarations. In this way, the attribute of my sons and daughters will be already revealed." He therefore asked other disciples, both males and females, about their individual achievements. The disciples courageously disclosed the way in which they would display their feat of miracles in His presence.

Cula Anāthapiṇḍika's Address

Amongst those male and female disciples, who made such bold statements, Cula Anāthapiṇḍika was one who had this to say: "Most Exalted Buddha... when there is a anāgāmī disciple of yours such as myself, there is no need to exert yourself. Let me be kindly permitted to demonstrate a feat of miracles."

Whereupon, Buddha asked him: "Dear son Anāthapiṇḍika ... in what form would you demonstrate a feat of miracles?" The lay disciple, Anāgāmin Anāthapiṇḍika replied:

"I will transform my body into that of Brahmā's body, which measures 12 yojanas, and then by slapping one of the upper arms with the open palm of the other hand, produce the thunderous sounds of a great rain storm in the midst of the throngs of people present here.

Whereupon, people would ask: 'What sort of sound is that?' and the others would answer: 'This is the sound of the clapping of the arms by the young rich man, Anāthapiṇḍika, who is an anāgāmī-disciple of the Buddha.' This would lead the heretics to say: 'This is only the prelude, the power of a young lay-disciple. The power of the Buddha cannot even be guessed.' In consequence, they would naturally lose courage and flee without even daring to glance back at You."

He told him: "Dear Anāthapiṇḍika... I know that you have the power to display the feat of miracles; but you had better wait."

A Seven Year Old Samaneri, Cira's Address

A young samaneri of seven years old, known as Cira, who had acquired patisambhidā-ñāṇa, after paying obeisance, requested the Buddha: "Most Exalted Buddha... may I be permitted to display my feat of miracles?" He asked her: "Dear young daughter Cira, in what form would you display your feat of miracles?"

"Most Exalted Buddha... I will bring three mountains, namely, Sineru, Cakkavalapabbata and the Himalayas to this spot, where the feat of miracles is being demonstrated, and place them in a row. I will transform myself into a Braminy duck and coming out from these mountains fly about freely without any hindrance.

Whereupon people would ask: "Who is this little girl?" and the others would answer: 'This is Cira, a young samaneri of the Buddha.' This would lead the heretics to say: 'This is only the introductory performance, the power of only a seven-year old Samaneri. The power of the Buddha cannot even be conjectured.' In consequence, they would naturally lose courage and flee without even daring to glance back at You."

(Such remarks are applicable to subsequent cases of similar nature and no attempt will be made to reproduce them hereafter.) The Buddha gave the same reply, and she was not permitted to display her feat of miracle.

A Seven-Year Old Arahat Sāmaṇera, Cunda's Address

Next, a young seven-year old arahat sāmaṇera, Cunda, who had acquired patīsambhidā-ñāna, after paying obeisance, made a request: “Most Exalted Buddha... may I be kindly permitted to display my feat of miracles?” He asked: “Dear son Cunda, in what form would you display your feat of miracles?”

“Most Exalted Buddha... I will shake the gold Eugenia tree (which is regarded as the victory pennant of the universe) by its stem and bring the fruits that fall to feed the audience here; and again, I will bring flowers from the coral tree Erythrina indica in Tāvatiṃsa and give them to the audience here.”

The Buddha gave the same reply as before and did not permit the young novice to display his miracle.

Next, Uppalavana Therī requested the Buddha to display her feat of miracle and the Buddha asked her: “In what form would you demonstrate?”

“Most Exalted Buddha... I will create an audience extending to the length of 12 yojanas, occupying a space of 36 yojanas in circumference. I will transform myself into a Universal Monarch and surrounded by a Universal Monarch's attendants come to pay homage to you.”

He replied: “I know that you have the power” but did not grant permission for demonstration as in the previous cases.

The Venerable Mahā Moggallāna's Statement

Next, Venerable Mahā Moggallāna requested permission to demonstrate a feat of miracle. The Venerable's request took the form a dialogue between the Buddha and himself:

Moggallāna: Kindly permit me to perform a feat of miracle.

Buddha: Dear Son Moggallāna ... how would you demonstrate?

Moggallāna: I will reduce the Mount Meru to the size of a mustard seed, shelve it in between the fissures of my teeth and chew it in the presence of the spectators.

Buddha: How else would you demonstrate?

Moggallāna: The earth will be rolled up like a small thin mat and I will keep it in between my fingers.

Buddha: Any other way?

Moggallāna: Like a potter's wheel (for grinding earth), I will turn up the great earth and feed the populace here with the fertile top soil that lies under the surface.

Buddha: How else?

Moggallāna: This earth will be put on the palm of my left hand, and human beings will be placed on another island continent.

Buddha: Any more?

Moggallāna: Most Exalted Buddha .... I will use Mount Meru like the shaft of an umbrella and placing the earth on top of it like the folds of an umbrella, I will walk in space to and fro, holding both in one hand, like a bhikkhu with an umbrella in his hand.

The Buddha told Venerable Mahā Moggallāna: “Dear son Moggallāna ... I know you have great power to demonstrate feats of miracles,” but did not permit him to perform them. The Venerable Mahā Moggallāna came to understand: “Permission was not given to him because the Tathāgata had in mind greater and nobler miracles than his to perform.” So he remained at a proper place.

The Buddha further pointed out to the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna: “Dear son, this victory bouquet is not earmarked for you. I, the Buddha, have the power to accomplish any task that lies beyond the achievement of any other person. It is no wonder that there is no match for Me when I have become a Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha. I had no equal even when I was born as an irrational creature and my pāramī accomplishment was still immature.” At the request of Venerable Moggallāna, the Buddha propounded Kanha Usaba Jātaka (vide Ekanipata: 3-Kurunga vagga, the ninth Jātaka).

Creation of A Walk

After recounting the Kanha Usaba Jātaka, the Buddha created a jewelled Walk, which extended from one end to the other end at a group of ten thousand world-systems, standing from east to west in a row. The ten thousand Mahā Merus in the ten thousand world-systems served as posts in the creation of the Walk. The eastern perimeter of the Walk rested on the edge of the eastern-most world-system; the western perimeter of the Walk rested on the western end of the western-most word system. The width of the Walk was twelve yojanas. The bordering surfaces on either side of the Walk were golden in colour; the middle portion of the entire Walk was filled with earth of rubies, and the rafters, beams, purloins were finished with various kinds of shining gems, the roofing was of gold, and balusters lining the Walk were of gold; ruby and pearl grains were spread like sand on entire surface of the structure.

On each of the four sides of the Walk, extending to 12 yojanas, was the audience of human beings. The number of devas, humans and Brahmās was uncountable. It was in the midst of such an audience that the Buddha demonstrated the Twin Miracles. The following is an excerpt, in abridged form, from the Pāli Text.

- (1) When there were flames of fire appearing from the upper part of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the lower part of the body and when there were flames of fire appearing from the lower part of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the upper of the body.
- (2) When there were flames of fire appearing from the front part of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the back part of the body and when there were flames of fire appearing from the back part, there were streams of water flowing from the front of the body.
- (3) When there were flames of fire appearing from the right eye, there were streams of water flowing from the left eye and when there were flames of fire appearing from the left eye, there were streams of water flowing from the right eye.
- (4) When there were flames of fire appearing from the right ear, there were streams of water flowing from the left ear and when there were flames of fire appearing from the left ear, there were streams of water flowing from the right ear.
- (5) When there were flames of fire appearing from the right nostril, there were streams of water flowing from the left nostril and when there were flames of fire appearing from the left nostril, there were streams of water flowing from the right nostril.
- (6) When there were flames of fire appearing from the edge of the right shoulder, there were streams of water flowing from the edge of the left shoulder and when there were flames of fire appearing from the edge of the left shoulder, there were streams of water flowing from the edge of the right shoulder.
- (7) When there were flames of fire appearing from the right hand, there were streams of water flowing from the left hand and when there were flames of fire appearing from the left hand, there were streams of water flowing from the right hand.
- (8) When there were flames of fire appearing from the right side of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the left side of the body; and, when there were flames of fire appearing from the left side of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the right side of the body.
- (9) When there were flames of fire appearing from the right leg, there were streams of water flowing from the left leg; and, when there were flames of fire appearing from the left leg, there were streams of water flowing from the right leg.

- (10) When there were flames of fire appearing from each of the ten fingers and the ten toes, there were streams of water flowing from the spaces between each of the ten fingers and the ten toes; and, when there were flames of fire appearing from the spaces between each of the ten fingers and the ten toes, there were streams of water flowing from each of the ten fingers and the ten toes.
- (11) When there were flames of fire appearing from some individual hairs of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the other individual hairs.
- (12) When there were flames of fire appearing from some individual pores of the body, there were streams of water flowing from the other individual pores.

From these different parts of the body there was emanation of six different colours of light, namely, dark blue, gold, red, white, crimson, resplendent, in pairs, in streams or in groups.

(N.B. The Buddha developed tejo-kasīṇa-jhāna based on fire (tejo) meditation device for the appearance of flames of fire from the upper part of the body and developed āpo-kasīṇa-jhāna based on water (āpo) meditation device for the flow of streams of water from the lower part of the body. The same principle was applied in reversing the order of performance of the Twin Miracle.)

It should be borne in mind that the flames of fire did not get mixed with the streams of water and vice versa. They remained in their own orbit. Since there can be no two simultaneous thought moments in one instant of time, creation of flames of fire and creation of streams of water took two separate moments, taking turns in alternation, although they would appear to synchronize and be taking place simultaneously in the minds of ordinary average persons. The mental creation happened in very great speed although separately. This may be attributed to (a) the moment between each state of mind of the Buddha being extremely short, (b) speed of mind, (c) having reached the climax of mastery in the attainment of jhānas. The flames of fire and streams of water emitted from the Buddha's body went up to the summit of the universe and descended on the edge of the ten thousand world-systems.

Loka Vivarana Patihāriya (The Miracle of Unveiling of The Universe)

Following the demonstration of the Twin Miracle, the Buddha performed the miracle of unveiling of the Universe. This is how it was performed. He entered the rūpā-vacara kiriyā fourth jhāna based on white object meditation device (odata-kasīṇa); arising therefrom, He made the resolution: "Let there be illumination throughout the ten thousand universes." Instantaneously, the whole universe, right from the human world up to the Akkaniṭṭha Brahmā realm became illuminated.

All the human beings could have full view of the universes from Catumahārajika Deva region to Akkaniṭṭha Brahmā realm even as they stayed in their own residences. They could see all the celestial beings therein going about their daily life in their many special and various planes with all the lakes, gardens, thrones, couches, tiered-roof mansions, carriages, regalia, in happy joyous mood, disporting themselves fully enjoying a luxurious life in their jewelled brilliant flying mansions of their own creation, themselves and everything radiantly bright.

In the sixteen rūpā-vacara planes, some radiant Brahmās, still and serene as statues made of assorted jewels, were seen enjoying the tranquillity of samāpatti, while others were seen engaged in discussing the profound and delicate essence of the Dhamma. They were clearly seen with human eyes by virtue of the Glories of the Exalted One.

In the same way, down and deep in the earth, there are eight great infernal planes, and each plane has four sides or minor regions of punishment, sixteen in all, known as Ussada niraya. In between every three universes is a minor region of punishment known as Lokanta niraya. These are regions of utter darkness. In each plane of misery, there are beings in great agony, serving terms of punishment according to their deserts, depending upon the intensity of their guilt. All the people on this earth could see these planes of misery and miserable beings clearly, by virtue of the glories of the Exalted One.

All the devas and Brahmās in the ten thousand universes, who had arrived by means of their great powers, could be seen paying homage to the Buddha with hands raised and heads bowed in adoration and with minds filled with overwhelming wonder and devotion. They uttered stanzas in praise of the splendours and glories of the Buddha and spoke words of exuberant joy and happiness.

All these strange phenomena, such as the Twin miracles, six Radiations from the body of the Buddha and ten thousand universes could be seen by all the people on this earth, caused much delight and reverential faith.

Miraculous Display of Iridescence in Six Colours.

(1) (NĪLA) Dark-blue radiation: The Buddha, who had demonstrated the Twin Miracles, had caused, by virtue of yamaka patihariya-nāṇa, radiation from His body: the dark-blue radiation emanated from where the hair and the beard grew and the iris of the eye, with the result that the whole sky appeared to have been sprinkled and scattered with powder of antimony or covered by the butterfly pea (Clitoria ternatea) and the blue lotus flowers; it resembled a moving fan made of bluish-green rubies; the whole sky was flooded with the sapphire blue light.

(2) (PĪTA) Yellow Radiation: emanated from the skin and the sockets of the eyes and all the golden parts of the Buddha. The entire environs were brightened by a golden colour as though the whole area was poured over with liquid gold or covered by a garment of gold, or as if saffron was sprinkled and golden silk cotton flowers strewn over it.

(3) (LOHITA) Red Radiation: emanated from flesh and blood and certain parts of the eyes and other red parts of the body. The entire environmental area was brightened by the red light as though dyed with vermilion or coated over with red liquid of lac, or covered with red velvet, or as if cloaked with flowers of Pentapeters phonecea, and Indian coral were strewn over it. The whole area was strangely and beautifully brightened by this radiation.

(4) (ODATA) White Radiation: emanated from the bones, teeth, the eye-tooth of the Buddha and the whites of the eyes. The whole area looked as though covered with milk flowing constantly from silver pots, or with a silver ceiling hung with silver leaves and plates laid out layer upon layer, or a silver fan in motion, or as if wild jasmine, white lores, streblus asper, jasmine, Arabian jasmine were strewn over the place.

(5) (MANJETHA) Crimson Radiation: emanated from the palms of the hands and soles of the feet, thereby beautifully brightening up the environs as though covered by a net of coral and flowers of the barleria prionitis species.

(6) (PABHASSARA) Resplendent radiations: emanated from a single hair on Buddha's fore-head, nails of the fingers and toes, and all parts that shone, thereby brightening up the region as though filled with many constellations of the evening star and with flashes of lightning and currents of electricity. It was indeed a wondrously beautiful scene.

— Excerpts from Patisambhida Maggaṭṭhakatha, Second Vol. —

The emanation of the six-hued radiance was indeed a strange phenomenon which resembled the continuous flow of streams of liquid gold, silver and ruby from a fountainhead shooting up to the roof of the universe and then descending to the edge of the universe. All the thousands of universes merged into a great elegant wonderful and beautiful golden mansion as it were with beams, rafters of assorted precious jewels.

The Buddha delivered Discourses while walking on The Walk

On that day, the Buddha preached discourses in harmony with the inclinations of the people, at intervals while demonstrating the Twin Miracles on the Walk, which was laid from east to west, across the thousands of world-systems. He suspended the performance of miracles to allow a short interval of rest for the audience who, in return, said: 'Sadhu' as a gesture of gratitude. It was during these intervals that He looked into the dispositions of each and every member of the audience, who formed a sea of beings. To this end, He observed the mental process of each one of them by the exercise of cittanupassanā, noting the sixteen different mental attitudes of each individual. One may imagine the speed of mind of the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas.

As stated above, the Buddha performed miracles and preached the Dhamma in harmony with the disposition and inclinations of the people (beings), only after He had looked into and considered their mind process, with the result that numerous beings were emancipated from the sentient existence through realization of the Four Noble Truths.

Indeed, it was the occasion of a great triumph of the Dhamma, “Dhammābhisamaya.”

Creation of Buddha's Own Double

The Buddha looked into the minds of individual persons, amongst a great company of beings, to find out if there were any who were capable of raising questions according to His own desire (so that He might furnish the right answer, in return) but He could not find anyone. So, He created His own double, that gradually grew into two, then into three into four, into hundreds, by multiplication.

There was an exchange of series of questions and answers between himself and the created Buddhas, alternately taking turns to raise questions and to answer. The created Buddhas took up different postures, some were standing, some lying down, some walking and some sitting, while engaging in the dialogue.

The glow and splendour of the six hues of radiations, together with flames of fire and streams of water of the twin miracles of the Buddha, and brilliancy of the created Buddhas, combined to light up the whole stretch of the sky, producing a confused array of gorgeousness to an extent that lay beyond the capability of the sāvakas.

A great number of devas and Brahmās spoke eulogies in praise of the glory, greatness and grace of the Buddha. The whole sky rang with the songs of the celestial beings. They poured showers of celestial flowers, the music from the thousands of musical instruments of the celestial beings combined with those of the human beings rent the air. It was indeed, as if a single grand festival of all beings was being celebrated.

Twenty Crores of Humans, Devas and Brahmās gained Emancipation

Such an uncommon feat of Twin Miracles was demonstrated by the Buddha by virtue of asādhāraṇa-ñāṇa, wisdom peculiar to the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas and not shared with Paṅcāloka Buddhas and sāvakas. Having had the opportunity to witness the miracles as well as listen to the preaching delivered at intervals, twenty crores of human beings, celestial Brahmās and other beings were emancipated at this great gathering of the Feat of Miracles.

An opportunity will be taken here for the reproduction of a relevant Stanza composed in adoration of the attributes of the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha, in Pāli and vernacular, to promote the sense of devotional faith in the Buddha.

Buddha's Ascension to Tāvātimsa

The Buddha looked into the past, while still in the act of demonstrating the miracles, as to where His predecessors usually observed vassa after demonstrating the miracles, and eventually perceived that “they ascended to Tāvātimsa to observe vassa and to preach the Abhidhamma to the celestial being who were their respective mother in their respective previous existence.” Whereupon, He decided to ascend to Tāvātimsa, and as soon as He raised His right leg, the peak of Mount Yugando, with a height of forty-two thousand yojanas moved to place its peak under the soles of His right foot, spontaneously. When the left foot was lifted, the summit of Mount Mahā Meru, with a height of eighty-four thousand yojanas, came underneath His left foot automatically.

(NB. No one had seen the summits of Yugando and Mahā Meru bending to place themselves beneath the feet of the Buddha; nor did He take unseemly strides to reach Tāvātimsa. This is purely a matter of supernormal power, exclusively the domain of Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas and beyond all other beings to conceive.)

The Buddha had thus reached Tāvātimsa with only two steps. Tāvātimsa is on top of Mount Meru, and to reach its summit is to reach Tāvātimsa itself.

Sakka's Erroneous Idea

As soon as Sakka saw the Buddha, he mistakenly thought: “The Buddha might take up residence on the emerald slab to observe vassa and devas and Brahmās would benefit by it. In such a case, no one would even have the chance of touching the emerald slab for the duration of the vassa. The emerald slab is of enormous size, being sixty yojanas in length by fifty yojanas in breadth by fifteen yojanas in height. When the Buddha resides on it for the whole vassa, it would resemble the scene of a sparrow resting on a big flat tray, leaving a good amount of space vacant.

Having read the thought of Sakka, the Buddha dropped His double stitched robe on the slab which became completely covered by it. Sakka was still of the idea ‘that a good amount of space would still be wasted after the Buddha had sat on it, because even though the robe covered the whole slab of emerald, the Buddha’s person would occupy only a small space.’ The Buddha knew what was going on in the mind of Sakka and like a mahāthera sitting on a small stool and observing ascetic practice, He sat cross-legged on the emerald slab and occupied the whole slab with no space left.

Sakka realised his mistakes and blamed himself for not knowing his own limitations: “What kind of person, the Buddha is? We can never fully comprehend nor can we discern to the full the magnitude of His glorious attributes. Even one such as the Buddha, replete with attributes beyond our mind’s power to conceive, I have conceived erroneous thoughts and ideas!” In open acknowledgment of his wrong, he paid obeisance with deep devotion and profound respect to the Buddha.

Many People cried and lamented as The Buddha went out of View

In the human world, the people were struck with wonder when the Buddha suddenly went out of view. While they were witnessing the marvellous feat of miracles, as though hundreds of thousands of suns and moons had set and disappeared and so they discussed as to the cause of the disappearance of the Buddha among themselves.

*Gato nu cittakuṭamī vā kelāsam vā Yugandharamī na no dakkhemu sambuddham
lokajettham narāsabham*

The noblest leader of the three worlds, most Exalted and renowned Buddha, the Omniscient, has gone out of view even now while we were witnessing the great feat of miracles! We wonder if He has retreated far from this clamorous crowd to a place of seclusion like the Cittakuti mountain, or to the silver mountain of Kelasa or to Yugandhara?

They wept and uttered the above stanza as they were discussing among themselves.

There were other people who opined that “the Buddhas delight to dwell in seclusion. The Buddha must have reflected: ‘In spite of liking seclusion, I have gone and exhibited the strange and wonderful feat of miracles to this great multitude’, and feeling embarrassed had retreated to a certain place of seclusion where no one could see him.” They wept and uttered the following stanza:

*Pavivekarato dhīro
 nayimam lokam punehiti na no dakkhemu sambruddham

Now that the Omniscient Buddha has retreated to a place of solitude where disturbances of the five senses are calmed, He will never again return to this frenetic human world, full of worldly temptations of the five human senses. The Noblest Leader of the three worlds, Most Exalted and renowned Buddha, the Omniscient has gone out of view, even while we were worshipping.

People asked the honourable Mahā Moggallāna as to the present residence of the Buddha. Although he knew that the Buddha was in Tāvātimsa, he directed them to Mahāthera Anuruddha for an answer so that credit might be given to him. When they asked the Mahāthera, they were told that the Buddha had taken up residence on the throne of Sakka, under the Kathit tree (Erythria Indica) in Tāvātimsa, preaching the Abhidhamma Piṭaka to the celestial devas headed by a deva, who was the mother of the Buddha in his previous existence. When asked about the return to earth of the Buddha, they were told that He would return on the Mahā Pavāraṇa day (traditional assembly of Sangha at the end of vassa) which falls on the full moon day of Thadingyut (Assayujo), and after preaching the Abhidhamma Piṭaka throughout the vassa.

These people decided: “We will not leave without paying homage to the Buddha,” and so they erected temporary pavilions with leaves and shrubs in that locality. The sky itself served as the roof and mother earth absorbed all refuse extirpated by them, and the whole area was in a sanitary condition.

The Buddha had given prior instructions to the Venerable Moggallāna to preach to these people, and the lay devotee, Cula Anāthapiṇḍika, was charged with the responsibility of providing them with food. He provided them with broth, food, sweet meats, beetle tobacco, tea-leaves, sweet scents, flowers clothing and all articles of human use, with nothing wanting. As arranged in anticipation, Mahā Moggallāna preached them throughout the period of vassa.

Devas and Brahmās from Ten Thousand World Systems gathered around The Buddha

Devas and Brahmās from ten thousand world-systems gathered around the Buddha to hear the teaching of the Abhidhamma from the Throne of Sakka, under the Erythrina Indica tree in the celestial world of Tāvātimsa. There was no one among the devas and Brahmās who surpassed Buddha in appearance; indeed He surpassed all others in comeliness.

When the most gracious and glorious Buddha sat on the throne of Sakka, Santusitta Deva descended from Tusitā plane and sat respectfully in front and on the side close to Him. He was the mother of the Buddha in his previous existence.

Biographies of Ankura Deva and Indaka Deva

Indaka Deva, who arrived after Santusita Deva, was seated on the right side close to the seat of Buddha, and Ankura sat on the left side in close proximity to Him. Ankura Deva was obliged to make room for more powerful devas and Brahmās every time they arrived until he was at a place twelve yojanas away from the Buddha. But Indaka could retain his status quo.

Biography of Ankura Deva

The genesis of his biography may be traced back to a dark period (that followed the extinction of Buddha Kassapa's sāsana). He was the youngest of the eleven children of Prince Upasagara and Princess Devagabbha. Prince Upasagara was the son of King Mahā Sagara of Uttaramadhuraj country, and Princess Devagabbha was the daughter of Mahākansa, ruler of Asitanjana, a province of Uttarapatha country. His eldest brother was Vasudeva and eldest sister was Ujanadevi.

When he came of age, his elder brothers made him the ruler of a town with a grant to receive revenues of that town. This being his share of the spoils of victory after his elder brothers made a conquest of the whole of Jabudipa with their political power. But he, in turn, surrendered the town to the eldest sister, Princess Ujana. He simply asked for exemption from taxation on merchandise involved in his private trading within the borders of their provinces. He led the life of a free trader. He was happy and contented with his lot.

Once, he was put into a great difficulty through shortage of provisions during his journey across a desert. There was a guardian deity of a banyan tree, who had the power to produce every necessary thing one could desire with only just a gesture of his right hand. He was a grateful deity and he fulfilled the needs of the prince and his people by producing their needs by (a show of the finger) pointing with his right hand, in repayment of his debt of gratitude towards the prince in a previous existence. The Prince, out of curiosity, asked him about his mysterious power and he replied: "I was a poor tailor living near the house of a rich man, Asahya, in the town of Roruva. Once the rich man gave a great alms-giving to the needy and I gladly assisted the poor who came my way by pointing my hand towards the direction of the charity pavilion of the rich man. I am thus enjoying the fruit of my voluntary labour! Thus, all things necessary for human use such as food, clothing flow copiously, as desired, from my right hand."

In emulation of the guardian deity of the banyan tree, Prince Ankura, on arrival back to the country of Dvaravati, as a great alms-giving, donated alms to everyone in the whole of Jabudipa (ten thousand yojanas in extent). Such an act of charity bore an adverse affect on the machinery of taxation. It, indeed, paralysed the system of tax levying or any description and his elder brothers had to advise him to do charity with a sense of proportion. He shifted to the city of Dakkhinapatha in Damittha country to resume his acts of charity along a stretch of land measuring 12 yojanas, by the side of the ocean. All along that stretch, he had a row of pots of alms-food resting on tripods and almost touching one another. He lived to be ten thousand years, giving charity all the while and passed away. He was reborn in the celestial plane of Tāvātimsa bearing the same name, Ankura.

Although Ankura had given much for such a long time, he did not get much in return, and this is because his recipients were destitute of virtue existing during a dark period void of the sāsana, just like a farmer who had sown his seeds on barren ground. (This is a brief sketch of the life of Ankura. For full particulars, please refer to Burmese translation of Peta Vatthu Pāli Text: 2 - Ubbari Vagga: 9 Ankura Peta Vatthu.)

Biography of Indaka Deva

It was during the time of our Buddha Gotama and while Ankura Deva was enjoying the life of a celestial deva in Tāvātimsa, a young man by the name of Indaka offered, out of faith and devotion, a ladleful of rice to the Venerable Anuruddha who was on his round of receiving food.

After his demise, he was reborn as a powerful deva in Tāvātimsa, endowed with the ten privileges of celestial beings in reward for his meritorious deed done during the sāsana of Buddha Gotama, like a farmer who had sown his seeds in a fertile field. He was known by the same name, Indaka. The ten privileges of celestial beings are: (1) celestial objects of sight, (2) of hearing, (3) of odour, (4) of taste, (5) of touch, (6) longevity, (7) abundance of attendants or companions, (8) good appearance, (9) wealth or prosperity, (10) supremacy.

Ankura Deva had to make room for more powerful devas and Brahmās attending the Great festival of Abhidhamma, he was pushed back right up to 12 yojanas from the Buddha, whereas Indaka Deva could retain his seat without having to make room for any other celestial beings.

When the Buddha saw the difference of status of Ankura Deva and that of Indaka Deva, He thought it would be a good thing to bring out, for the sake of edification of beings, the differences in the benefit accrued from deeds of merit done during the flourishing sāsana of Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas and that from deeds of merit done during the dark period void of the sāsana. The Buddha, therefore, asked Ankura: "Ankura .... How is it that you have to stay 12 yojanas away from Me, though you had made offerings of food produced from a line of pots on tripods laid across a stretch of land 12 yojanas in extent for ten thousand years?”

*Mahādānaṃ tayā dinnam Ankura diḡhamantare atidūre nisinnosi
āgaccha mama santike*

O Ankura lay devotee .... why do you have to move back and make room for powerful devas and Brahmās on their arrival at this Great Abhidhamma Festival, although you have to your credit merits for offering food produced from a line of pots laid across a stretch of land 12 yojanas in extent, for ten thousand years? Now you are 12 yojanas far away from Me. Come now and stay in My presence!

Buddha's utterance of this interrogative stanza reached the earth and was heard by those in the world of men. (vide Dhammapada Commentary)

Ankura Deva's reply to Buddha's question constitutes one and a half stanzas (6 padas) and the supplementary verse by Mahāthera Sangitikaraka constitutes half a stanza (2 padas or two lines) amounting to two stanzas, and these were systematically recorded in the proceedings of the Buddhist Council in Pāli as follow:

*Codīto bhāvitattena Ankuro etadabravi kim mayham tena dānena
dakkhiṇeyyena sunnatam*

*Ayam so Indako yakkho dajjā dānaṃ parittakaṃ atirocati amhehi
cando tārāgane yatha.*

Having been questioned by the Buddha who had practised two types of meditation conducive to mental and physical composure, Ankura Deva, who had done meritorious deeds during a long dark period which was void of sāsana respectfully made a reply, as follows:

“Most Exalted Buddha.... there is a kind of deed of merit done assiduously during a dark period void of the sāsana when there was not a single virtuous person deserving of offering of alms. How could my meritorious deed done for a long time during the dark period void of sāsana help me stand in good stead!!!

Although Indaka Deva, who is in your presence, had offered just a ladleful of rice to the Venerable Anuruddha, with faith and devotion, he has received a reward that surpasses mine like a silvery moon that out-shines a multitude of stars; and for the same reason, he has the good fortune to enjoy the ten privileges of devas which are superior to those like us who had done meritorious deeds during the dark period void of the sāsana!”

Whereupon, the Buddha asked Indaka Deva: “Indaka .... you have been sitting on my right side without making any move? Why you don't have to make room for powerful devas as and when they arrive, now and again?” This is Indaka's reply: “Most Exalted Buddha, my case may be likened to that of a farmer who had sown a small amount of seeds in a fertile plot, and by the same analogy, I had the good fortune to have a recipient worthy of offering,” and he went ahead to utter four stanzas in praise of qualities and qualifications (attributes) of recipients of gifts: -

*bijam bahumbi ropitam
na phalaṃ vipulaṃ hoti napi toseti kasakam.*

*Tatheva dānam bahukam dussīlesu patīhitam na phlam vipulam hoti
napi toseti dāyakam.*

Although a great amount of seeds is sown in a plot on a hillock which is rocky, salty, caustic, barren and broken, the yield would be negligible and disappointing to the farmer.

By the same analogy, notwithstanding the vastness of offering made to a recipient, who is destitute of virtue during a dark period which is void of the sāsana, the benefit accrued therefrom would be negligible and disappointing to the donor.

*Yathapi bahaddake khette
bijam appampi ropitam sammā dhāraṃ pavecchante phalam toseti kassakam*

*Tatheva sīlavantesu gunavantesu tādisu
appakampi kataṃ kāram
puññaṃ hoti mahāphalaṃ*

Most Exalted Buddha.... just as the yield of products pleases a farmer who works hard in sowing seeds in a fertile field (of first class soil) that receives a regular shower of rain every fifteen days; or (of medium class soil) that receives regular showers every ten days, (a third class soil) that receives regular shower of rain every five days.

So also, reward accrued from a meritorious deed of offering gifts to ariya-puggalas, who are virtuous and self-composed, will turn out to be great and prosperous, as in the case of the yield of the seeds grown in a fertile field.

Thus Indaka had drawn a distinction between deeds of merit done in favour of two different kinds of recipients at two different periods by way of four stanzas. Whereupon, the Buddha said: “Ankura .... it is only right and proper that one makes a choice of both the gift and the recipient. A fitting reward could only be materialized by the choice of type of gifts and the type of recipient, just as good seeds are sown in fertile soil. Of course, you could not make offerings in the manner just described since you happened to be born in a wrong period when there was no sāsana, opposed to the right period when there is sāsana. Wherefore, your meritorious deeds were not as fruitful as those of Indaka.” The following four stanzas were uttered by the Buddha for the sake of clarification:

*Viceya dānam databbam
yattha dinnam mahāpphalaṃ viceya dānam datvāna
saggam gacchanti dāyakā*

*Viceya dānam sugataapasattham ye dakkhiṇeyya idha jīvaloke
etesu dinnāni mahāpphalāni
bijāni vutthāni yathā sukkette*

O Ankura Deva.... offerings made to persons of virtue with faith and generosity bring about abundance of reward. Choice of recipients should be made before offerings are made. Offerings of gifts to the selected persons with faith and generosity invariably lead the donor to the world of devas.

Choice of both gift and recipient has been highly praised by a succession of Buddhas. There are virtuous persons with longevity in this world. Gifts dedicated to such persons of virtue with faith and generosity will invariably bring about wealth and happiness to the donors while in the worlds of men and deva before his attainment to the Final Goal of Nibbāna, as in the case of sowing the choicest seeds of five kinds, bijaḡam<sup>1</sup>.

The Buddha went on to preach four more Stanzas that lead to Nibbāna through the avenues of Path and Fruition stages:

*Tiṇadosāni Khettāni
rāḡadosā ayaṃ pajā tasamāhi vīta rāḡesu
dinnam hoti mahāpphalaṃ*

There have been instances where potential seeds ‘bijaḡam’ have been thrown on the fields full of grass and weeds. In the same way, gifts have been offered to devas and humans who are destitute of virtue and full of passion (rāḡa). Therefore, offering of gifts should be made to the ariya-puggalas who are void of passion (rāḡa), with a view to enjoy worldly life in the planes of devas and humans before attainment to the Final Goal of Nibbāna.

*Tiṇadosāni Khettāni
tasamā hi vītadosesu

Just as there are arable lands full of grass and weeds, so there are devas and humans who are destitute of virtue and full of anger. Wherefore, one should see to it that gifts are offered to those who are free from malice, so that one may enjoy the worldly life of devas and humans before attainment to the final goal of Nibbāna.

*Tiṇadosāni Khettāni
tasmā hi vītamohesu

Just as the arable lands are naturally full of grass and shrubs, so devas and humans are full of delusion. So gifts should be offered only to the ariya-puggalas, who are devoid of delusion, so that one may enjoy the worldly life in the planes of devas and humans before attainment to the final Goal of Nibbāna.

*Tiṇadosāni Khetāni
Icchādosā ayaṃ pajā
tasmā hi vīgaticchesu

Just as arable lands are naturally full of grass and shrubs, so devas and humans are naturally imbued with five kinds of desire for pleasures of the five senses. Wherefore, gifts should be offered to the ariya-puggalas who are void of iccha. Such an act of merit invariably brings about a pleasant life in the planes of devas and humans and even to attainment of the final Goal of Nibbāna.

At the conclusion of the discourse, Ankura Deva and Indaka Deva attained the fruition state of sotāpatti; the discourse was of great benefit to all devas and Brahmās, as well.

Chapter 25

THE BUDDHA'S SEVENTH VASSA AND TEACHING THE ABHIDHAMMA AT TĀVATĪMSA

Having established Ankura and Indaka Deva in the Fruition stage of sotāpatti, the Buddha continued to stay on to observe the 7th vassa, sitting crossed-legged on the throne of Sakka in Tāvātīmsa and preached the Abhidhamma, day and night, to all those devas from ten thousand world-systems, who rallied around Him, with Santusita Deva as their head. He started with the 'Law of good action' and its result (kusala dhamma); bad action and its result (akusala dhamma); neutral or amoral or indeterminate action (abyakata dhamma); teaching round the clock, like the river of the sky flowing continuously, for the duration of the vassa.

(N.B. Buddhas used to deliver before noon discourses in praise of food offered, such discourses could be as long as Digha-nikāya and Majjhima-nikāya put together. The discourses preached to the devas and Brahmās who arrived in the afternoon have the combined lengths of Samyutta-nikāya and Anguttara-nikāya.

This is because the thought-process of the Buddha is very fast, with very few intervening bhavaṅga consciousness. And the Buddha's lips are proportionately and firmly set, the lip movements are precise. The tongue is long, slender and delicate. All these features contribute to production of a voice, so melodious at a very fast rate.

It is stated that when an ordinary average person had spoken a word, the Venerable Ānanda had spoken eight words as much; when Venerable Ānanda had spoken one word, the Buddha had spoken sixteen words as much. It has thus been calculated that the Buddha's rate of speech is 128 times faster than that of an average person)

Thus, with such unimaginable fast rate of speech, it is no wonder that the Buddha preached the long discourses, in appreciation of offering of food, before noon and more lengthy discourses to devas who arrived in the afternoon. The Abhidhamma that the Buddha had preached during that vassa of three months is thus endless and incomparable.

Keeping The Body well maintained while preaching The Abhidhamma

In case a question such as this arises: "How did the Buddha maintain His body when He was engaged in preaching the Abhidhamma during the whole period of vassa lasting three months?" The brief reply is, He did it by regular provision of nourishment.

The following is an extensive answer:

All Buddhas are mindful of such matters; they usually followed the progress of time in the world of man while in the act of preaching the Abhidhamma. When the time came for going on the alms-round, He created a Buddha after His own image, acting after His own manner in handling the bowl and holding the robe and with a voice like His own. He caused the created Buddha to preach the Abhidhamma to the extent prescribed by Himself.

The Buddha then left for the Anotatta lake with His bowl and robe. On His arrival at the Anotatta lake devas presented Him with a twig frayed at one end. After brushing His teeth with the twig, He took a bath in the Anotatta lake. After His bath, He stood on the slab of orpiment and donned the well-dyed double stitched robe. He then took the brown stone-bowl that was offered by the Four Great Devas of Catumahārājika Deva plane, under the Rājayatana tree (at the seventh place of the seven places at which Buddha Gotama spent seven days each after attaining Buddhahood. Each deva had offered one bowl and the four were pressed into one with four rims by the Buddha with His hands.) He then proceeded to Uttara Kuru (north island) for receiving alms-food, and on return, He partook the food on the peaceful bank of the enchanting delightful Anotatta lake. After His meal, He proceeded to the forest of Sandal trees to spend the day.

The Venerable Sāriputta, the General of the Dhamma, went to the Sandal forest to attend on the Buddha and stood at a place that was free from six faults. Whereupon, the Buddha told the Venerable: “Dear son Sāriputta... I have taught this much of the Dhamma.” He would only give the gist and the guidelines, but the Venerable Sāriputta, being endowed with four paṭisambhida-nāṇa, could fully grasp of the Dhamma outlined by the Buddha, like a man who is shown the vast ocean by someone with an outstretched hand. He had the ability to understand it in a hundred, a thousand ways.

(The Buddha returned to Tāvātimsa in the afternoon to resume preaching there. With the exception of the powerful devas, no one knew that a created Buddha was preaching the Abhidhamma in the place of the real Buddha and that the real Buddha had gone to the human world and had returned from it. The created Buddha was an exact replica in all respects: in emission of rays, in voice and in the manner of speaking.)

The Venerable Sāriputta taught The Abhidhamma to His Five Hundred Bhikkhus Disciple

The Venerable Sāriputta, having learnt the Abhidhamma briefly from the Buddha daily, taught it in a form (neither too brief nor too elaborate) to his five hundred bhikkhu disciples, who had been common bats in a previous existence.

This is a short account of their previous life: They were little common bats dwelling in a cave, hanging down from its roof, in the time of Buddha Kassapa. They heard the recitation of the Abhidhamma by two bhikkhus, who were well versed in the Abhidhamma. They had not even the slightest idea of what was meant by the waxing and waning of the moon, but, their attention was drawn to the recitation of the Abhidhamma by the bhikkhus' pleasant and harmonious tone. (The bats had no idea of what was meant by Abhidhamma, the aggregates, sensation, dhātu (elements), truth, not even the waxing and waning of the moon, but since the tone of the recitation by bhikkhus served as a good object of their dying consciousness (kamma-nimitta) for the following life, they were reborn in the plane of devas).

They enjoyed the life of devas from the time of Buddha Kassapa up to the time of Buddha Gotama, not being born even once in the lower planes of woes. At the time of the present Buddha, they were reborn in the world of humans. They witnessed the Twin Miracle, which aroused their faith and devotion and made them receive ordination under the personal supervision of Venerable Sāriputta. Everyday, Venerable Sāriputta taught them the Abhidhamma in a fairly extended form of what he had learnt from the Buddha in an abridged version.

The preaching of the Abhidhamma by the Buddha in the world of devas came to a close simultaneously with the completion of the full study of the Abhidhamma taken up by the five hundred bhikkhus under the Venerable Sāriputta in the world of humans.

Everyday the Buddha informed the Venerable Sāriputta of the nature and extent of the Abhidhamma taught by Himself and the nature and extent of the Abhidhamma taught by the created Buddha in Tāvātimsa and instructed him to teach his five hundred disciples as necessary, before He returned to resume preaching from the point where the created Buddha had concluded.

The teaching of the Abhidhamma came to a close at the end of the vassa, on the full moon day of Thadingyut, with the result that eighty thousand crores of devas and Brahmas were emancipated through realization of the Four Noble Truths. Santusita Deva, the Buddha's mother in the human world, attained the fruition state of sotāpatti.

People shifted from Savatthi to The Town of Sankassa

On the ninth waxing moon of Thadingyut, people lingering within the area of thirty-six yojanas, went and asked the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna: “Venerable Sir, .... it would be right and proper that we enquire the time of the Buddha's return (to earth); we will not go back (to our own homes) until we have paid homage to the Buddha.” Venerable Mahā Moggallāna said: “Very well,” and dived right into the earth and went right up to the base of Mt. Meru. He willed that people should see him ascend to Tāvātimsa rising from within Mt. Meru. Then like a fine golden string threaded through a ruby he was clearly visible to the people, ascending from within the centre of the mountain to Tāvātimsa.

People who saw Venerable Mahā Moggallāna during the course of his ascent to the summit through the inside of the mountain measured his progress in terms of yojanas saying: “Now he has ascended one yojana, he has ascended two yojanas,” etc. On arrival at Tāvātimsa it was as if the Buddha’s feet rested on the head of Venerable Moggallāna who then approached the Buddha with profound respect and addressed: “Most Exalted Lord... people will not return to their home without paying homage to You and are anxious to know the time of Your descent to the world of humans.” The Buddha asked: “Dear son Moggallāna, where, at present, is your elder brother the Venerable Sāriputta?” Whereupon Venerable Moggallāna replied: “Most Exalted Lord, he has been keeping vassa at Sankassa town.” The Buddha made the following reply:

“Dear son Moggallāna... I will descend at the gate of Sankassa on the seventh day from now, that falls on the full moon day of Thadingyut, the time for the celebration of mahā-pavarana. The distance between the two towns is thirty yojanas, but tell the people they need not bring any food for the journey, just as they would observe the precepts and go without taking any food or provisions to the monasteries at the head of the towns and villages but to listen to My Teaching (sermons) on this day. Venerable Mahā Moggallāna replied “Very well .... Most Exalted Lord.” On arrival back to earth, he relayed Buddha’s message to the people.

Buddha descent at The Gate of Sankassa Town by Triple Stairways

The Buddha made known His departure to Sakka: “Lay devotee Sakka, King of Devas.... I shall be returning to the world of humans” by way of formal leave taking. At the close of vassa, on the full moon day of Thadingyut, Sakka created a set of three stairways, one of gold, another of ruby and another of silver, side by side, with the bases at the Gate of Sankassa town and with their upper end resting on the summit of Mt. Meru. (1) The stairway on the right hand side was reserved for the devas, (2) the silver stairway on the left-hand side was reserved for the great Brahmās, (3) the ruby stairway in the middle was exclusively for the Buddha.

The Buddha, on the eve of departure, stood on the summit of Mt. Meru and performed the Twin Miracle of water and fire, and looked up at the sky. The whole region, right up to the realm of Akaniṭṭa Brāhma, appeared as an open space, unobstructed and clearly visible and when He looked downwards, He could see the Avīci at the bottom of the eight planes of misery; when He looked forward and side-ways, in all directions, thousands of world-systems could be seen without any obstruction whatsoever. The strange scene was witnessed by all the devas, humans and Brahmās. Thus all the devas and Brahmās could see the human beings and human beings could see them.

The Buddha caused the emanation of the six-hued rays from the body as He descended from Tāvātimsa to the world of humans, and there was no one in that crowd of spectators of thirty-six yojanas in circumference, who did not aspire to Buddhahood when they noticed the grandeur, greatness, grace and glory of the Buddha.

The devas came along down the gold stair-way on the right hand side. The Brahmās came along down the silver stairway on the left-hand side. The Buddha alone descended by the ruby stairway in the middle. Pañcasikha Deva on the right side of Buddha, paid homage by playing his Beluva harp; Suyama Deva also came along on the right side, fanning the Buddha with a fan made of hair of the yak’s tail; Santusita Deva came along on the same side fanning the Buddha with a fan studded with rubies, Sakka on the right hand side also blew the Vijayuttara, conch shell. Devas from the rest of the world system also came along paying homage in adoration in various ways. Brahmās came along by the silver stairway, holding the Brahmā’s white umbrella over the head of the Buddha as a gesture of profound respect.

Thus the Buddha descended to earth in the manner described above, and on arrival, stood at the gate of the town of Sankassa. Those people, who were gathered at Savatthi city, left after the morning meal, looking forward to seeing the Buddha on Pavarana day, at the end of the vassa. They eventually reached the gates of Sankassa town as quickly and effortlessly as if they were going to the monastery at the head of their village.

Preaching of Sāriputta Sutta

The Venerable Sāriputta was the first person to pay homage to the Buddha as soon as He had set His right foot on the earth on arrival from Tāvatiṃsa. All those, who were also present, followed suit subsequently. The spot where the Buddha had set His right foot on the earth was later regarded as a sacred place and termed Acala Cetiyatthāna.

The spot, where the Buddha set His right foot on reaching the earth, on His return from Tāvatiṃsa at the end of the vassa, after teaching the Abhidhamma in keeping with the practice of Buddhas, is also regarded as one of the sacred places termed Avijahitaṭṭhāna (i.e. Every Buddha after preaching the Abhidhamma in Tāvatiṃsa during the whole of vassa, on return to earth by the three Stairways, had always first set His right foot on the very spot where the triple stairways were placed at the gate of Sankassa.)

The Four Avijahitaṭṭhāna (Four Sacred Places)

Here, being appropriate and to be specially noted, a brief mention will be made of the four Avijahitaṭṭhāna. The permanent sacred sites utilized by all Buddhas for the same purposes with unchanging uniformity are known as Avijahitaṭṭhāna. They are four in number, namely:

- (1) The site of the Mahābodhi tree, the Victory Throne (Aparājita throne) where all Buddhas had conquered the Five Maras. (i.e. the very spot where there arose the Aparājita throne for our Buddha Gotama had been site of the Aparājita thrones of all Buddhas. There is no change of location. )
- (2) Isipatana, Migadāya where our Buddha Gotama preached the Dhammacakka, the first Discourse: (This is the location where all the Buddhas had also preached the Dhammacakka. It is not preached at any other place).
- (3) The spot on which the Buddhas usually first set their right foot on their return from Tāvatiṃsa after preaching the Abhidhamma there. (The gate of Sankassa town is that sacred place in our Buddha Gotama's time.)
- (4) The location of Buddhas' bedstead (where the four legs of Buddhas' bedstead usually rested without change.) The Scented Chamber of Buddha Gotama in the monastery of Jetavana was the site of where His bedstead lay).

As regards the monasteries of the Buddhas, they differ in size due to the circumstances prevalent at the time. To clarify:

- (a) BUDDHA VIPASSI: A plot measuring one yojana, donated by a rich man, Punabba Sumittā, at a cost of gold bricks placed edge to edge on the surface of the plot.
- (b) BUDDHA SIKHI: A plot measuring three gavutas, donated by richman Sirivatta, at a cost of gold bars touching one another throughout the plot.
- (c) BUDDHA VESSABHU: A plot measuring half a yojana, donated by richman Sotthija, at a cost of gold-cups (gold teeth of harrow) touching one another throughout the surface of the plot.
- (d) BUDDHA KAKUSAN: A plot measuring one gāvuta, donated by richman Accuta, at a cost of gold blocks (moulded like elephants' feet) touching one another throughout the plot.
- (e) BUDDHA KONAGAMANA: A plot measuring half a gavuta, donated by richman Ugga, at a cost of gold bricks placed edge to edge throughout the surface of the plot.
- (f) BUDDHA KASSAPA: A plot measuring twenty ussaba, donated by richman Sumangala, at a cost of gold tortoise figure placed side by side throughout the plot.

- (g) BUDDHA GOTAMA: A plot measuring eight pais, donated by richman Suddatha, also known as Anāthapiṇḍika, at a cost of gold coins touching edge to edge throughout the plot.

— Excerpts from Buddhavaṃsa Athakatha and Vinaya Cula Vagga Athakatha —

Although the size of the location of the monasteries differs through the passage of time, the location of the Buddha's Scented Chamber remained the same without any change (The above is a short account of the four sacred places (Avijahitaṭṭhāna).

Devas and Humans are filled with Adoration for The Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas

As stated before, the Venerable Sāriputta approached the Buddha after He first set His right foot at the head of the Stairway, paid homage to Him and addressed Him: “All the devas and laity here are filled with adoration for You, so much that they all long for Buddhahood.” Whereupon the Buddha replied: “Dear Son Sāriputta, it is true that all the devas, humans and Brahmās love and revere the Buddhas for their being great, gracious and glorious,” and then He uttered the following stanza, in preparation to a discourse which He would be teaching:

*Ye jhānappa sutā dhīra
devāpi tesam pihayanti

Dear son Sāriputta .... All the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas have gained mastery over jhāna practices in five ways and they delight in these jhāna absorptions. They also abide usually in phala-samāpatti that has, as its object, the Absolute Truth of Nibbāna, which is free from all dukkha. Even the devas and Brahmās of the celestial regions have made the remark with great adoration and esteem for the Buddhas, who are always abiding in full mindfulness: “How great would it be, if we who have had this rare opportunity were to become Buddhas?”

According to Dhammapada Commentary, thirty crores of devas, humans and Brahmās were emancipated at the conclusion of the discourse. The five hundred disciples of the Venerable Sāriputta attained arahatship as a result.

The Buddha revealed The Attributes of Venerable Sāriputta

While still standing at the head of the Stairway, the Buddha contemplated thus:

“People, who gathered here at this assembly, do know that the Venerable Moggallāna is the greatest in the matter of (jhānic) powers; the Venerable Anuruddha in supernatural vision; the Venerable Punna is a celebrated Teacher in Dhamma; but no one knows the attributes of the Venerable Sāriputta.” Therefore, He thought it would be proper to bring the knowledge and wisdom of Sāriputta to the limelight in some way or the other. He asked Sāriputta questions relating to the problems of ordinary average people (putthujana), those of ariya-puggalas (sekkhas) in the three lower Paths and Fruition stages, and those of arahats (asekkhas), in the presence of all those present at the time. The Venerable gave prompt answers to each and every question, stage by stage, concerning ordinary average persons, ariya-puggalas, in the three lower Path and Fruition stages and the arahats, the perfected ones, with the result that all those present came to realise the Venerable's state of exaltation in wisdom!

Expounding of Parosahassa Jātaka

The Buddha then proceeded to propound thus: “Sāriputta has not exceeded the average level of intelligence only now, but he had also excelled others in the matter of knowledge and wisdom, in the past existences,” making a reference to Ekata Nipatta, Litta Vagga, and Jātaka Commentary. He then related the Parosahassa Jātaka in its abridged form.

Once upon a time, there lived in a forest, at the foot of a hill, more than one thousand hermits who lived on herbs, fruits and roots. Once their teacher fell sick, and the most senior disciple went out in search of medicine, leaving instructions with his juniors to attend on their teacher with due care and diligence.

The great teacher passed away before the return of the senior disciple. Upon a request being made by the disciples regarding jhāna-samāpatti on the verge of his demise, the old sage told them: “Natṭhi kiñci” meaning “There is none”, implying the third jhāna, Akiñcaññayatana. Anyone wishing to abide in the third arūpa-jhāna known as Akiñcaññayatana-jhāna termed “Jhāna-samāpatti” must first and foremost contemplate on the concept of “non-existence” of the first arūpa-jhāna repeatedly. This in fact was what the great master had in his mind when he said: “Natṭhi kinci.”)

But the disciples had missed the point and utterly misunderstood the great master and looked down upon him as one who had not attained any stage of jhāna-samāpatti and they did nothing about the burial rites concerning his remains.

(N.B. The great sage was accomplished in akiñcaññayatana-jhāna (by which incorporeal Brahmā realm is attainable) but when asked by his disciples he simply said: “Natṭhi kiñci” and passed away to be reborn in Ābhasara (corporeal) Brahmā realm which is attainable by the second rūpavacara-jhāna. This is because the four Arūpa Brāhma realms are not befitting of the Bodhisattas, abhabba.)

On his return with suitable medicine, the senior disciple was told that the great teacher had passed away. He asked his juniors if they had asked him anything. They replied: “Aye .... we had; “Natṭhi kiñci” was his reply, and he must, therefore, have gone without attaining any jhāna whatsoever.”

The senior disciple explained to them thus: “You have no idea of what the great master meant. Our great teacher is endowed with akiñcaññayatana, the third arūpa stage of jhāna.” He thus gave them a correct interpretation again and again to convince them.

But his correct answer simply fell on deaf ears. When the great teacher, the Bodhisatta then an Ābhasara Brahmā, came to know about the unhappy situation, he contemplated that he should reveal the truth by removing the doubt entertained by those ignoramuses, who were groping in the dark. Therefore, the great sage descended from the Ābhasara Brāhma Loka to the world of humans. Poising himself high above the roof of the hermitage with great power, and wishing to praise the senior disciple's wisdom, he uttered the stanza:

kandeyyūṃ te vassasatāṃ apaññā ekova seyyo puriso Sapañño yo bhāsītassa vijānāti attham.*

Those without any knowledge may cry for a hundred years (they will have no idea whatsoever of what their master meant to say). The only person, among an assemblage of over a thousand persons, capable of understanding what was meant, is worthy of praise.

The great teacher returned to the world of Brahmās after preaching the discourse. All the hermits attained jhāna-samāpatti as a result of his visit, and they were reborn in Brāhma Loka after death.

In winding up the discourse, the Buddha revealed that Sāriputta was then the senior disciple and He was the Great Brahmā in the realm of Ābhassara Brāhma Loka.

(This is an abridged form of Parosahassa Jātaka; for full particulars please refer to Ekataniṣṭha Jātaka Vatthu.)

Expounding of Sāriputta Sutta

After the Buddha had preached the preceding discourse, Venerable Sāriputta put forward a questionnaire concerning suitable and desirable place (abode), lawful resort (for alms), practice (meditation), etc. for the benefit of his disciples who were undergoing training under his personal supervision. These were presented to the Buddha in eight stanzas and the Buddha gave a series of answers comprising thirteen stanzas<sup>1</sup>.

Sāriputta Sutta (Abridged form)

(1) I, Sāriputta, have hitherto never seen or heard of a Great Sage of a sect, who had come into his mother's womb from the celestial abode of Tāvātimsa, who speaks so pleasantly and is endowed with the power of performing miracles, with all the greatness, graciousness and glory of a Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha.

(2) All the devas, humans and Brahmās have seen Him truly as one who has dispelled the darkness of delusion, as one who is peerless and unique enjoying the calm state of jhāna, and the serene and tranquil state of Nibbāna. All the devas, humans and Brahmās have looked upon Him as the possessor of Five Eyes<sup>2</sup>

(3) Most Exalted Buddha... who is free from the two defilements of clinging and wrong view, one who is not to be moved or shaken by worldly vicissitudes, one who has never tried to attract the attention of people by trickery through performing miracles, who has come to the gate of the city of Sankassa as the Sage of a Sect .... I, Sāriputta, have come to this place with the object of presenting to you problems for favour of solution in the interest of my disciples.

(4,5) (a) How many fearful and offensive sense objects are there, that are harmful to a noble bhikkhu, who retires through fear and loathing of the grave dangers of birth, etc., to the quiet base of a tree, a cemetery, a secluded couch or a short-legged bedstead in a cave?

(6) (b) How many kinds of danger are there to suppress, which a noble bhikkhu may encounter as he speeds his way to the strange yet unattained land of Nibbāna, in his lonely forest hermitage on the outskirts of a town or village?

(7) (c) What are the words which a noble bhikkhu may speak? (d) What are the lawful resorts for a noble bhikkhu? (e) What are the practices a noble bhikkhu should develop with intensity as meditation?

(8) (f) How should a noble bhikkhu observe the precepts with steadfastness, mature judgment and clear mindfulness to discard the dust of defilement, just as a goldsmith purifies gold?

(Thus the Venerable Sāriputta presented eight stanzas, of which the first three stanzas are in praise of the attributes of the Buddha, i.e. 1 - 3 and the remaining five regarding the practice which his five hundred bhikkhu should observe.)

(1) Dear son Sāriputta .... there are two things that a person of good birth who is going after Path knowledge, and who retires to a place of seclusion through fear of transient existences, ought to know: (i) the way to live in peace and tranquillity and (ii) the practice to be cultivated. I will preach you these two things as I know them from practical knowledge and not by inference.

(2-3) Dear son Sāriputta .... a person of intellect and mindfulness should not get frightened or be shaken when he comes into contact with five kinds of dangers, such as: (1) gadfly, mosquito, fly, (2) snake, scorpion, centipede, mice, (3) burglars and robbers (4) quadrupeds, such as lions, leopards and tigers, (5) people outside of the Teaching without faith in the three Gems who cause inconvenience by their annoying antagonistic views and questions. One should not get alarmed or frightened by those five kinds of terrible objects, just described.

(It will be noted that, in answer to question (a) the five kinds of dangers are given, namely, (1) gadfly, mosquito, (2) snake scorpion, centipede, mice, (3) burglars and robbers, (4) quadrupeds, such as, lions, leopards, tigers, (5) those heretics who caused inconvenience by their senseless antagonistic views)

 2. Five Eyes: (i) Maṅsa, human eye, (ii) Dibba-cakkhu, celestial eye, (iii) Pañña Vipassanā (Four Noble Truths), (iv) Samānta, All seeing eye, (v) Buddha-cakkhu.

Further, a noble bhikkhu in striving for the attainment of Nibbāna by following a good true path should suppress the following five “internal enemies” in addition to those just described.

(4) (1) Disease, (2) hunger, (3) cold, (4) heat, and (5) when the noble bhikkhu experienced inconvenience through contact with any of these dangers, he must resist or put up with them, as such sensations and ailments are conducive to the arising of the ten modes of wrong conducts (by deed, word and thought). He should protect himself by means of Earnest Effort (sammappadhāna).

(In answer to the question (b) the Buddha mentioned these 5 kinds of “internal enemies”, viz., (1) disease, (2) hunger, (3) cold, (4) heat and (5) a group of ten modes of wrong conduct arising through them.

Having dealt with (a) and (b), the Buddha proceeded to deal with (c), (d), (e), and (f) in nine stanzas as enumerated below.)

(5) A noble bhikkhu must always refrain himself from stealing and lying; he must wish for the well being of both, i.e., (i) those who still have taints of craving (tasa) and (ii) those who have already eradicated craving (thavara). He must dispel all the ten modes of wrong deeds, in short, the group of unwholesome acts, as they are the associates of Mara.

(The Four modes of moral conducts as prescribed in this verse are: Avoidance of stealing and lying, wishing for the well being of all fellow men and abandonment of immoral conduct.)

(6) A noble bhikkhu must not yield to anger (kodha) and unrestrained conceit (atimāna). The root causes of these two unwholesome factors are six in number, viz., Ignorance (avijjā), wrong attitude (manasikāra), self-conceit (asamimāna), lack of sense of shame (ahīri), lack of dread of evil consequences of misdeeds (anottappa), and distraction (uddhacca). These root causes must be up-rooted or extirpated. In addition, sense of affection (liking) and hatred (disliking) must be overcome by a state of balance of the mind or equanimity.

(By this, four practices are described, namely, anger and conceit must be discarded; and the six root causes of these must be removed; and objects of affection and hatred must be avoided by means of equanimity)

A noble bhikkhu is required to cultivate comprehension and develop the ten contemplation. With the force of joyful satisfactions (pīti), developed thereby, the aforesaid enemies, both internal and external must be abandoned.

(This is Buddha's exhortation for expulsion or destruction of internal and external enemies shown in (a) and (b) by means of contemplation of ten (anusati) recollections<sup>3</sup>. Pīti arising from meditation should be utilized as a means of developing forbearance. This is a means of overcoming those forces of enemy)

(7) One should overcome disinterestedness in a hermitage of seclusion and development of meditation by such means of expediency to ensure full measure of success. Such means of expediency should also be adopted in defeating the four causes of crying enumerated below:

Four Causes of Lamentation

(i) What kind of food shall I have to eat today (is it rice, or barley cake, or dinner-rol or fish, or meat)? (ii) At what place shall I have to eat (at the palace of a king, or the house of a brahmin or of a rich man)? (iii) I had to sleep miserably last night (on a-piece of plank, or on a coarse mattress, or a piece of leather or a heap of grass). (iv) In what kind of luxurious place shall I have to sleep tonight (on an ornamented bed, or a four legged bedstead)? These four kinds of reflections or speculations are known as four causes of

(8) A bhikkhu, cultivating the practice of sīla, samādhi and paññā, being free from impediments (paḷibodha), such as, attachment to clan, sect, shelter and requisites, should abandon the worries connected with food and with matters relating to lodging. These four types of worries should be given up.

(A noble bhikkhu is apt to cry under pressure of such anxieties or worries. He is therefore required to cut off all four impediments such as attachment to clan or the donor, members of his sect, dwelling place and requisites.)

When a bhikkhu acquires food and robe lawfully at proper times, he should have the sense of judgment or moderation in accepting and using them with a view to promoting the sense of contentment.

(As regards the matter of judgment or moderation, a bhikkhu should take into consideration the quantity of objects for offering, the extent of donor's intention, and the extent of one's requirement. In case where the quantity of objects for aims outweighed the intention of the donor, the donee should be content with a limited amount of alms. When the amount of aims available is comparatively smaller than what the donor has in mind to offer, the donee should still receive only limited amount of aims. Where the amount of alms is large enough to satisfy the wishes of the donor to offer large amount of aims, the donee should still receive just enough to meet his own requirements. Hence the term (Patiggaha mataññuta) receiving just the amount required: Utilization or consumption of the four requisites by way of retrospection is known as Paribhoga mataññuta).

(9) A noble bhikkhu, having guarded himself against unwholesome states by observing the two sets of observance in respect of receiving and utilization of the four requisites, should enter the towns and villages with agreeable deportment of bodily posture, and avoid the use of harsh words, even in dealing with those who have calumniated him.

(It means that a noble bhikkhu (i) should receive and utilize alms in accordance with the two modes of moderation, (ii) should move about with proper deportment in towns and villages, and, (iii) should refrain himself from the use of harsh words even when one deals with those who had calumniated him.)

(10) A noble bhikkhu should keep his eyes cast downwards, should not wander here and there, should endeavour to attain jhāna that has not been attained, to acquire the five kinds of mastery over jhāna that has been attained; should sleep mindfully, only four hours a day and only in the middle watch of the night, (and spend the rest of the day, sitting or walking while observing the precepts incumbent on a bhikkhu). Through such activities, equanimity is developed by means of the fourth jhāna. The mind being well composed, sensuous thoughts (kāma-vitakka), sensuous perceptions (kāma-saññā) and restless movement of hands and feet termed kukkucca are restrained.

(11) Any instruction given by one's preceptor, "this is not right and proper," should be noted, regarded with sincere delight and gratitude. Ill-will or unfriendly attitude towards one's associates should not be entertained. It should be eradicated as a thorn is eradicated. Only faultless speech should be made, never talk beyond the scope of discipline (sīla, samādhi, paññā) or beyond the limits of time. (One will be liable to be criticized and reproached for breach of precepts and moral conduct, for wrong view, wrong mode of livelihood. It is, therefore, necessary to refrain from such immoral conducts, even in thought, not to say of physical or verbal acts.)

(12) Dear Sāriputta .... Besides this, in this world, there are five kinds of dust, viz., attachment to visible form (rūpa-rāga), attachment to sound (sadda-rāga) attachment to smell (ganda-rāga), attachment to taste (rasa-rāga), and attachment to touch (phothabbā-rāga). All such attachments should be removed by the practice of sīla, samādhi and paññā with mindfulness. Constant practice will enable the bhikkhu to overcome these five dusts.

precepts. Only those who observe these precepts can overcome these five kinds of dust, no one else can do so.)

(13) Once these five kinds of dust are done away with, the bhikkhu will no longer take delight in the five objects of sensual pleasures. That bhikkhu, with mindfulness, emancipated from the grip of hindrances, contemplates at appropriate time on the conditioned as impermanent, unsatisfactory and unsubstantial (non-soul) with resolute steadfastness. His mind will become composed, and will penetrate through the dark mass of defilements.

The Buddha has thus answered the questions of Sāriputta with a view to pave the way stage by stage, that invariably leads to the Fruition stage of arahattaship. The five hundred disciples of Sāriputta attained arahatta-phala at the conclusion of the discourse, and thirty crores of devas and humans were emancipated through realization of the Four Noble Truths.

Buddha was calumniated by A Female Wandering Ascetic named Cincamanavika

As stated in the preceding paragraphs, the Buddha, after emancipating five hundred disciples of the Venerable Sāriputta and thirty crores of devas and humans through realization of the Four Noble Truths, proceeded to Savatthi to take up residence at the Jetavana monastery and to resume preaching Dhamma to rational beings who went there.

It was at that time, a lowly, wily, female wandering ascetic by the name of Cincamanavika made a malicious, slanderous charge against the Buddha. The following is an account of that calumnious attack.

The number of disciples of the Buddha increased by leaps and bounds, like a rising tide, during the first twenty years of His Dispensation, termed Paṭhama Bodhi or The First Period of Enlightenment. And the number of devas, humans and Brahmās who attained the Four Stages of Fruition (ariya-bhūmi) also increased with time; and the attributes of the Buddha, such as Araham, spread right up to the roof of the world; the volume of offerings made to the Buddha and the Sangha grew so much while the power of heretics waned and the offerings made to them dwindled to a vanishing point, just like the diminishing glow of fire flies as the sun rises up in the morning.

The sectarian stood at road junctions and made attempts to induce or court the people to make offerings to them, saying:

“Lay devotees .... Bhikkhu Gotama is not the only one who has attained Buddhahood; we have attained Buddhahood, as well! ... Is merit gained by making offerings to the Recluse Gotama only? You can gain merit by making offerings to us as well. Therefore, you should make offerings to us also.”

Their appeals were of no avail, and they, therefore, assembled for a secret meeting “to devise ways and means to calumniate Recluse Gotama, so that people might not make offerings to Him through lack of respect and esteem.”

At that time, there lived in Savatthi, a wandering female ascetic by the name of Cincamanavika. She was so named because she was born of a moisture-laden tamarind tree; hence she was popularly known as “damsel who takes conception in a tamarind tree, Cincamanavika.” She is said to be as pretty and gracious as a celestial maiden and her body emitted radiation that spiralled around her body.

As the discussion was in progress, a cruel, stupid sectarian put forward a plot to slander the Buddha and bring about His destruction by employing Cincamanavika as an instrument to achieve their selfish ends. This plot was approved and accepted as an effective device for cutting off the flow of gifts to the Recluse Gotama.

When the wandering ascetic woman, Cincamanavika, went to their parks and stood before them in a worshipping posture, she was totally ignored by the heretics. She was anxious to know what was held against her. She, therefore, addressed them: “Good Sirs,... I worship you three times, what wrong have I done to you and what is my offence? What is the cause of your silence?”

This was their censorious reply: “Sister Cincamanavika... don't you know that the Recluse Gotama has been going round and doing harm to us by depriving us of our gifts?”

Whereupon, Cincamanavika said: “I know nothing about this. What can I do for you in this matter?” They gave her this express reply: “Cincamanavika .... if you have our welfare at heart, you might calumniate the Recluse Gotama by using your personal charm as an instrument to destroy His fame, honour and gifts.” She was thus charged with the task of performing a dirty job.

Cincamana's Wily Tactics

Cincamana pledged boldly: “Very well, good Sirs, ... you may rest assured that I will accomplish the task entrusted to me. Have no more worries over this matter,” and she left the park of the heretics. She then started to bring her wily tactics into action. She dressed herself in a costume that was as red as the colour of a flying insect and made her way towards Jetavana monastery with a bouquet in her hand, at about the time when people were leaving the monastery after hearing the discourses. People casually asked her: “Where are you headed for?” she replied: “What would you gain when you know my destination?” arousing people's suspicion on her. She actually went her way into the parks of heretics in the proximity of Jetavana monastery and spent her nights there. At the time people were arriving from the city of Savatthi to pay an early homage to the Buddha, she prepared herself to look as if she had spent the night at the Jetavana monastery and was making her way back to Savatthi. When asked as to where she had passed the night, she gave a similar answer: “What would you gain when you know where I slept last night?” to create suspicion in their minds.

She went on keeping the same routine everyday. After a lapse of one and a half month she began her campaign of imputation by replying: “I passed the night with the Recluse Gotama in His Scented Chamber.” That caused the ordinary people to wonder whether she might be speaking the truth. Some three or four months later, she pretended pregnancy by tying her abdomen with rags and covering herself with red dress. And she started telling people that she got pregnant by the Recluse Gotama, an accusation wrongly believed by unthinking people.

Foul Accusation In Front of Four Kinds of Audience

After a lapse of eight or nine months, Cincamanavika tied a disc of wood, which was cut into the shape of half of an egg, round her body and wore a red costume to assume the form of a pregnant woman. She struck her hands and feet with the jaw bones of a cow to appear like a worn out fatiguing expectant mother. She then made her way one evening to where the Buddha was sitting on the Throne of Dhamma and preaching to four kinds of audience. She stood right in front of the Buddha and made the following malicious accusation:

“Big Recluse, .... You have been calmly preaching to the people keeping compressed lips! As for me, I have become an expectant mother through association with You. You have a heart to remain without thinking about arrangement's for confinement or for collection of butter-oil. If You don't care to do such things Yourself, You should have charged King Kosala or Anāthapiṇḍika or to Visakha, the donor of the monastery with the task to do the needful for me. You have remained irresponsible and callous towards Your own blood, but You know how to amuse Yourself by sensual pleasures.”

Cincamana thus levelled a malicious accusation against the Buddha in the presence of a huge congregation like a stupid woman trying to destroy the moon with a lump of faeces in her hand! Whereupon, the Buddha suspended His preaching and, like a lion king, refuted her charge with a raised voice:-

“Sister Cincamana .... Only you and I know whether what you have just said is true or false.”

Cincamana was not to be daunted, she made another wave of attack by these words:

“Truly enough, big Recluse .... this is a matter between You and I only, this advanced stage of pregnancy.”

Sakka descended to solve The Problem

Whereupon, the emerald throne of Sakka began to grow warm causing him to deliberate as to its cause; he perceived that “Cincamana had made a malicious allegation against the Buddha.” Thinking: “I will go and thresh out the matter myself in the presence of the people,” he therefore descended, accompanied by four devas, to where the Buddha was preaching. These four devas transformed themselves into four rats and bit off the strings on the wooden disc, and as the wind blew off Cincamana's clothes upwards, the wooden disc dropped right on top of her ten toes, breaking them severely.

Cincamana swallowed up by A Fissure appearing in The Earth

All those present condemned her and spat on her; holding stones, spears and sticks, they dragged her out of the precincts of the monastery. Once she was out of sight of the Buddha, the earth split into two to claim her body. She was soon wrapped up in the flaming tongues of Avīci fires that swallowed her into the bottom of the great Hell, Mahā Avīci.

When the people saw the heretics in their true colours, they made lesser offerings to them, while the alms received by Buddha grew without limitation.

Propounding of Mahā Paduma Jātaka

On the following day, all the bhikkhus assembled in the Central Hall and were discussing the topic of the day: “Friends ... Cincamana had been ruined for her false allegations against the most glorious Buddha, who is worthy of Homage that the world could make.” The Buddha went to their place and asked: “Bhikkhus... what is the subject of your discussion?” On being informed by the bhikkhus that they were discussing the fate of Cincamana, the Buddha recounted her past story making reference to Mahā Paduma Jātaka saying: “This is not the first time that she had made false allegation against Me and suffered in consequence thereof,” and proceeded to propound the Mahā Paduma Jātaka.

Mahā Paduma Jātaka of Dvadassa Nipata

Once upon a time, King Brahmadatta ruled the country of Bārāṇasī, when the Bodhisatta took conception in the womb of the queen. When he was born, he was named Prince Mahā Paduma, as his face resembled a newly blossomed lily of paduma species.

When he came of age, he was sent to Takkaśīla to learn the arts and crafts; and on completion of his studies, he returned to his country and found that his mother had passed away and that his father had made another woman his chief queen. He was formally declared as the Crown Prince, the sole heir to the throne.

Sometime later, the King had to go to the border areas to suppress insurrections. He told the queen: “Chief Queen .... I am going to the border areas to suppress insurrections and you shall remain in this royal palace with ease and comfort.” Whereupon, the Queen said: “I do not like to stay behind, I would like to accompany you to the front line.” The King explained to her the dangers of battlefields: “Chief Queen... you had better stay in the royal palace until my return without any feeling of melancholy through lonesomeness; I will leave instructions with the Crown Prince to attend on you with due diligence.” The King then went to the disturbed areas, and returned after driving away the rebels, and rehabilitation of the effected areas, but he did not immediately enter the city on arrival instead, he stayed in a temporary accommodation outside the City for a time.

When the Bodhisatta, Crown Prince Mahā Paduma heard of the news of his father's return, he made arrangements to welcome his father by decorating the city and setting the palace in order. Having done all this, he entered the apartment of the Chief Queen all alone. On seeing the amazing beauty of the Prince, the Chief Queen felt an intense attraction towards him. The Prince paid his respect to the Queen and asked: “O Royal mother ... how can I be of help to you?” The Queen replied: “Don't you call me ‘mother’,” and so saying she got up and held the prince by the hands and ordered him ‘to get up on to the bed.’ “The two of us will enjoy sexual pleasure to the full before the King returns.”

As one who treasured his morality, the Prince gave a stiff reply:-

“O! Royal Queen mother ... you have become my mother ever since the demise of my mother. You are a married woman, I have never in all my life looked at a woman with a legal husband with concupiscence, and how would a self-restrained person like me commit such a hideous crime in collusion with you?”

After making three or four vain attempts to make the Prince yield to her temptations, the Queen resorted to threatening him, asking: “Won't you obey my order?” “Yes .... I won't,” replied the Prince boldly and bluntly. Whereupon, she made it plain to him: “I will lodge a false allegation against you with the King, so that he will break your head into pieces.” “You may slander me as you like but I won't yield to your temptations,” he left her chamber after putting her to shame.

The Queen, being conscious of her own guilt, made up her mind to save her own skin by lodging a false allegation against the Prince with the King without delay, as her life was at stake, lest the prince might reveal her secrets before she could see the King. She got her body scratched all over with her own fingers and lay on her bed without taking any food, feigning illness. She instructed her attendants how they should answer the King when he asked them about her, in due course.

The King entered the City after circumambulating the city and sat on the throne. When he could not see his Queen, he enquired about her and her attendant reported that she was not well. He went to her chamber and asked: “Darling Queen .... what ails you?” She pretended not to hear his words for two or three times and, at last, she made this reply: “O King what has made you to press for an answer that I loathed to give. Please keep silent to save me from shame. My case is quite different from those of the other married women.” On hearing such an insinuation, the King asked her: “Do tell me at once who has done wrong to you and I will break the head of the criminal,” in a severe tone. In response to the King, she asked this question: “O King .... under whose charge was this city kept when you left?” “It was left under the charge of my son, the Crown Prince,” replied the King. The Queen then started to tell her fabricated story to calumniate the Crown Prince: “Your Majesty... the very person you had left in charge of the city, Prince Paduma, entered my room all alone and tried to make me yield to his temptations, and when I beseeched him meekly not to offend his mother, he retorted rudely: ‘Is there any other King than myself .... I will keep you in house and enjoy sexual pleasure to the full with you.’ When I refused to yield to him, he pulled me by my hair, beat me all over my body and then throwing me down on the floor, he outraged me and left my chamber.”

The King ordered The Execution of Prince Mahā Paduma

The King lost his sense of reasoning through anger, like a venomous cobra, and ordered the execution of the Prince. The executioners entered the residence of the Prince, beat him most severely, bound his hands at the back and brought him out of his house with a ring of red-primrose round his neck, like a prisoner given the life sentence.

The Prince knew that the Queen was responsible for the whole affair. He followed the executioners complaining: “O executors... I have done nothing against the King, I am innocent.” The whole city was shocked and tensed with fear, and the citizens exchanged views among themselves: “The King has misunderstood Prince Mahā Paduma, and ordered his execution on the strength of his wife's false allegation.” They rallied round at the feet of the Prince, crying and sobbing aloud: “O Crown Prince... the kind of sentence passed upon you is not just and reasonable.” They kept on weeping and crying at the top of their voices around him.

When the executioners had brought the Prince before him, the King, in a fit of temper, at once ordered the execution of the Prince, by throwing him into a steep chasm (usual place where robbers were usually thrown down) with his head down. In passing the order, the King remarked that, the Prince, though his own son, was guilty of impersonating him and offending the Queen. Whereupon, the Crown Prince protested: “Royal father... I am not guilty of such allegations... please do not cause my destruction on the strength of your wife's allegation." But his appeal fell on the deaf ears of the King.

The citizens were not alone to weep over the fate of the prince but sixteen thousand courtiers, also wept muttering: "Darling son .... Mahā Paduma .... it is a great pity that such a punishment has been meted on you for no fault of yours." All the princes, princesses, ministers, brahmins, rich men, all rank and file made joint appeal to the King: "O Your Majesty .... Mahā Paduma has peerless character, is a righteous heir to the throne, both by right and by tradition, do not cause the destruction of the heir to the throne on the strength of your wife's allegation, without investigating into the matter in the name of justice, is our prayer."

Their appeal was made in seven stanzas as follows:-

- 1) *Nadaṭṭhā parato dosam anumthulani sabbasso
issaro panaye daṇḍam
sāmaṃ appatīyekkhiya.*

Noble King .... a Ruler should not order the destruction of life and limbs of an accused without personal knowledge; without investigation into the allegation against the accused.

(N.B. In the time of Malta Samata (One raised to the status of a Supreme Ruler by the people) there was no order or penalty exacting more than one hundred pieces of money; no penalty demanding the destruction of life and limbs beyond corporeal punishment or banishment. Punishment of more severe forms were adopted by cruel rulers at later times. Therefore, the ministers had made the above appeal with reference to the said precedence.)

- 2) *Yo ca appaṭivekkhitvā
daṇḍam kubbati khattiyo
sakaṇṅkam so gilati jaccandhova samakkhikaṃ.*

A noble King, who happened to cause the destruction of life and limbs of an accused without proper investigation being made into the allegation, is likened to a person born blind who had swallowed a fly contaminated, unwholesome food with attendant troubles; such an act is tantamount to partaking of food enmeshed with thorns.

- 3) *Adaṇḍhiya dandhayati
dandhiyañca adaṇḍhiyaṇṇ andhova visamaṃ maggaṃ
na jānāti samāsamaṃ*

A King who happened to punish an innocent person who does not deserve any punishment, and has allowed a guilty person to escape unpunished, through power-intoxication, is considered to have taken an uneven path full of dangers, like a person, born blind. He has no discrimination between the even path of ten meritoriousness and the uneven path of demeritoriousness and is destined to be punished in the plane of misery.

- 4) *Yo ca etāni tṭhānāni
suḍḍithamanusāseyya
sa ve voharitumarahati.*

A King, who examines cases according to correct procedure, and adjudge or adjudicate the guilt or otherwise of cases, trivial or great, in the name of justice, is a ruler invested with qualification expected of a king fit to rule over a domain of territory.

- 5) *Nekantamudunā sakkā ekantatikhi nena vā attam mahāṅte thapetuṃ
tasmā ubhayamācare*

Noble King ... it is not possible for anyone to remain forever in a position of responsibility by always exercising extreme measures, either soft or rough. A ruler needs a careful balance of judgement to discriminate between what requires gentle handling and what demands stern treatment.

- 6) *Paribhūto mudu hoti
etañca ubhayam ṅñatvā
anumajjam samācare.*

Noble King ... one, who governs his people with kindly disposition, constantly is open to contempt and disrespect by his subjects. On the other hand, a ruler, who governs his subjects harshly oppressively, is liable to provoke hostility and hatred in the people he governed. A King should be able to discriminate between the two extremes and resort to the middle course in the interest of peace and tranquillity.

- 7) *Bahompi ratto bhāseyya
na ithikāranā rāja
puttam ghāteumarahati.*

O Noble King .... one who is inflamed by passion may speak in many different ways; one who is inflamed by malice may also speak in many different ways. Therefore, there is no justification in causing the death of the Crown Prince without proper consideration and mainly on the strength of false accusation by a woman acting under the influence of burning passion and malice.

The minister's submissions and solicitations failed to move the King. Prince Paduma himself tried several times for the revocation of the Royal order in different ways, but to no avail. The King stood firm on his judgement and ordered: "Go ye all to the chasm and throw down this ignorant blunderer forthwith."

- 8) *Subbova loko ekato
itthi ca ayamekikā
te nā ham patipajjissam gacchatha pakkhipathe va tam.*

All the citizens took sides with the man of standing, the Crown Prince, and my Chief Queen is all alone, and in the circumstances, I will take side with the Queen. Go ye all to the chasm and get the traitor, Prince Paduma, thrown into the 'Robbers' pit forthwith.

Upon hearing this summary order, none of the female members of the crowd could not help crying. All the people raised their arms in protest and shouted slogans as they followed the Prince with their hair spreading over their bodies in distress. The foolish King was under the impression that the people would stand in the way of throwing the prince into the pit; so he went along with the weeping crowd under escort right up to the pit. He caused the Prince to be borne with his head down and the feet up and flung cruelly into the pit in his very presence.

Power of Bodhisatta's Mettā

Under the influence of the Bodhisatta's mettā, the guardian deity of the mountain made himself visible and consoled the prince: "Prince Paduma .... don't you worry," and he held him in his arms close to his chest, so that the Prince might be comforted by the pervading warmth of a deity. He then descended the cliff and placed the Prince on the expanded hood of a dragon king who was dwelling at the foot of the mountain.

The dragon king took the Prince to the Kingdom of dragons and shared with him the ease and comfort in the country of the dragons. Having stayed in the company of dragons for a whole year, the Bodhisatta intimated his desire to leave: "I am going to the world of humans." The dragon king asked: "To which place you intend going?" "To the Himalayas," was the reply. The dragon king took the Prince to the Himalayas and after providing him with the requisites of hermits and bhikkhus, he returned to his country. The Bodhisatta as a recluse spent his days developing jhāna-abhiññās and living on herbs, fruits and roots.

After some time, a hunter of the City of Bārāṇasī came upon the abode of the hermit and recognized that he was the Crown Prince. He asked the hermit: "O noble Prince .... are you not Prince Mahā Paduma?" "Yes, I am .... my dear man," was the reply. The hunter paid homage to the Bodhisatta and stayed with him for a few days before he returned to the city of Bārāṇasī: On arrival, he went to the King and reported: "O your Majesty .... your son, Prince Mahā Paduma is living in the forest of Himalayas as a hermit. I have seen him and stayed with him for a few days." Whereupon, the King asked: "Have you seen him personally?" "Yes, your Majesty .... I have," was the hunter's response.

The King proceeded to that place in the company of a great number of army personnel and stayed at the edge of the forest in a temporary shed hoping to seeing his son. When he met face to face with the hermit sitting in front of his hut, like a golden image, he paid respect and sat in a suitable spot. The ministers exchanged greetings with the hermit. The Bodhisatta presented the King with fruits and exchanged greetings in an amicable manner.

The King began to ask, by means of a verse: "Dear son... I had caused you to be thrown into a precipice named Corapapata with your head down and I wonder how you managed to keep yourself alive?"

9) *Anekatāle narake
gambhīre ca suduttare pātito giriduggasmim
kena tum tattha nāmari.*

Dear son ... how did you manage to survive after you had been thrown upside down into a precipice with a depth of several lengths of palm-trees, that was difficult of escape?

Then a dialogue between the father and the son ensured:-

10) *Nāgo jātaphano tattha thānavā girisānujo paccaggāhi mam bhogehi
tenāham tattha nāmarim*

Royal father ... a powerful dragon that sprang into being on the sides of mountain valleys received me on its expanded hood from the hands of a guardian deity of that locality. That was the reason why I escape from the danger of being smashed to death after I had been thrown into that precipice of unfathomable depth.

The royal father was greatly delighted by the Bodhisatta's reply and said solemnly: "I am a vile person to have offended a righteous son like you at the instigation of my wife. I humbly plead for favour of your pardon for my blundering offence against you," with his head bent at the feet of the Bodhisatta. Whereupon, the Bodhisatta convinced his father:

“Your Majesty ... please do get up ... I forbear all your offences, and my sincere wish is that you avoid becoming such a person again, behaving blindly without consideration and investigation.” The King said in reply: “Dear son ... your acceptance of kingship with all its glories over the territories alone will signify your forbearance towards me.”

11) *Ehi tam patinessāmi, rajaputtam sakam gharam,
rajjam kārehi bhaddante,
kim aranne karissasi.*

My Royal son, Prince Mahā Paduma ... I am taking you back as the rightful heir to the throne of the Kingdom of Bārāṇasī. May you reign with glory and greatness. I pray thee to accept the Kingship and sovereignty over the domains: how could you promote the welfare and prosperity of the citizens in such a wilderness cut off from civilization!

The following is the Prince's reply in verse:-

12) *Yatha gilitvā baḷisaṃ uddbareyya salohitam uddharitvā sukhī assa
evam passāmi attanam.*

O King father... just like a man who had accidentally swallowed a hook brought it out with all the blood immediately before it had gone far enough to reach the vital heart, so that he might keep his mind and body in a state of peace and tranquillity. So I see myself as a person who had accidentally swallowed a hook but had taken it out in time to live in peace and tranquillity.

13) *Kiṇ nu tum baḷisaṃ byūsi kim tum lyusi salohitam kin nu tum ubbhatam vyusi
tam me akkhāhi pucchito*

Dear son ... what do you mean by hook? What do you mean by blood? What do you mean by immediate vomiting? I beseech you to enlighten me by answering these questions for me!

14) *Kāmāham balisam byūmi hatthiassam salohitam cattāham ubbhatam byumi
evam janahi khattiya*

O Royal father... I have seen, by reason of wisdom, the five sensual pleasures as hook; the worldly wealth or possessions, such as elephants horses, chariots, etc., as blood; renunciation of the five sensual pleasures, as immediate vomiting; you may try to understand these things discriminately by contemplative knowledge.

After he had given the above answer, he continued to give his father an instruction for guidance in administering justice: “Noble King ...as already mentioned above, I have nothing to do whatsoever with the kingship of the Bārāṇasī, and what I wish to commend to you is to rule by strict adherence to the ten codes of conduct<sup>4</sup> for a ruling monarch, without

4. Ten codes of conduct of a king: alms giving, morality, liberality, straightness, gentleness, self-restraint, non-anger, forbearance, austerity and non-opposition.

the influence of four wrong courses of actions<sup>5</sup>.

The King returned to The Country and punished His Queen

The King, after several vain attempts to persuade his son to return to his country, made his way back to his capital, crying and weeping all along the route. In the course of his journey, he questioned his ministers: "Who is responsible for the severance of my son from me?" They all unanimously replied: "You have sustained the loss of such a worthy and honourable son through your Chief Queen." On his arrival at the city, he immediately caused the Queen to be flung over the precipice upside down before he entered the royal palace. He ruled over the country and the people wisely and justly ever after.

The Buddha, after preaching the above discourse, proceeded to say: "Bhikkhus, in this manner Cincamana had decried Me by abusive language in a previous existence":

15) Cincamānavika māta
Devadatto ca me pitā
Ānando pandito nāgo
Sāriputto ca devatā
Rājaputto aham āsim̐ evam dhāetha jātakam.

Bhikkhus .... Cincamana was then the Queen, the stepmother, the brother-in-law Devadatta was then the king, Ānanda was then the wise dragon, Sāriputta was then the guardian deity of the mountain, and I was then Mahā Paduma. The Jātaka was brought to a close by this last verse.

End of Mahā Paduma Jātaka

The Buddha proceeded to reveal the fact that, there is no immoral act that a liar dare not commit: "Bhikkhus ... one who has abandoned the course of telling the Truth and pursued the course of telling lies, has also forsaken the advantages of attainment of Nibbāna and rebirth in the worlds of devas and humans, and as such, there is no immoral act that they loath to perform!"

Ekam̐ dhammaṅ atītassa
masavādissa jantuno
vitim̐ṅaparalokassa
nathi pāpaṃ akariyaṃ.

Bhikkhus ... one who has breached the course of not telling lies has also forsaken the advantages of Nibbāna and rebirths in the realms of devas and humans, and as such, there is no immoral act that these people, destined for planes of woes, will not dare to perform.

At the conclusion of the discourse, a large multitude of beings attained sotāpatti fruition state, etc.

The Original Cause of Wicked Cincamana's Accusation.

The following is an exposition of the original cause that actuated wicked Cincamana to make the accusation:-

Prior to an infinite period of four asankhyeyyas and a hundred thousand aeons (before the definite prophecy of enlightenment had been made) the Bodhisatta was a person of distracted mind, with wrong attitudes through constant association with bad people of the most hopeless type. On one occasion, he chanced to slander an arahat named Nanda, a disciple of Buddha Sabbabhibhu, by accusing him of having unlawful association with a woman. This was a very grave offence of slandering a noble person, ariya.

5. Wrong Courses of action: those dominated by desire, by ill-will, by delusion and by fear.

As a result of such false accusation against an ariya (ariyūpavāda), he had to suffer in the plane of misery for many a year, and, once release from it and reborn in the world of humans, he was subjected to false accusations, existence after existence, and in the last existence as a Buddha, by wicked Cincamanavika in the presence of four kinds of audience.

(Apādāna Pāli 1st. Vol., Avataphala vagga: 10-Pubbakammalotika Buddha apadan gives full account on this matter as expounded by the Buddha himself.)

An Account of Female Wandering Ascetic Sundari

As stated above, heretics outside the Teaching, because of paucity of offering for them, had the wicked woman Cincamana to slander the Buddha. They made another attempt to slander the Buddha by a similar ruse when they engaged a good looking sectarian woman named Sundari at a time when the Buddha was residing in Savatthi (vide Udāna Pāli Text 4 Maghiya vagga 1: 8. Sundri Sutta Pāli and Commentary)

While the Buddha was residing at Jetavana monastery, all devas, humans and Brahmās paid homage to Him and the Sangha; they revered, honoured and made offerings to them. The four requisites of robe, food, monastery and medicine were always in ample supply for them. For the Buddha and the Sangha, their accumulation of meritorious deeds in the past was immense and also their practice of the True Path in the present existence was also productive of good merits. The beneficial results from these two wholesome sources, combine together to produce an incessant flow of requisites and offerings for them, just like the huge volume of water pouring forth from the confluence of two big rivers.

In sharp contrast, the heretics suffered from deficiency of four requisites and other offerings. This is attributed to their lack of meritorious deeds in the past and the wrong practice they followed in the present.

At that time, there lived in Savatthi a young heretic maiden who was in her most impressive youth excelling others in comely appearance; hence she was named Sundari, though her behaviour deed, word and thought were deplorable.

The heretics gathered together to devise ways and means to slander the Buddha and the Sangha out of covetousness. They all took part in the discussions with that end in view:

“Dear Sirs .... we have been ruined beyond redemption since the coming of the Recluse Gotama and we have suffered much from paucity of gifts, because people have almost forgotten our existence. What has prompted the people to make such wonderful offerings to the Recluse Gotama with such profound respect and enthusiasm?”

One of the heretics present at the meeting offered his opinion: “Dear sirs, the Recluse Gotama is a direct descendant of Noble Mahā Sammata., through an uninterrupted Khattiya lineage of pure Sakya clan. That must be the reason why people have honoured him and made offerings so profusely.” Another heretic had this to say: “It is because a variety of miraculous events took place at the time of His birth.” Likewise many heretic leaders presented their individual views: “It is because, when His father, King Suddhodāna made Him pay homage by raising His two hands in a worshipping posture towards the Devila hermit, just after His birth, His feet miraculously flew aloft and rested on the matted hair of hermit. And when His parents placed Him under the cool shade of a rose-apple tree while the Ploughing Ceremony was in progress, while the shades of many other trees moved with the sun; the shade of the rose-apple tree under which the Prince reposed stood unchanged even after noon-tide.” “It is because He is extraordinarily handsome,” said another, while yet another speculated: “It might be because he had forsaken the Throne of the Universal Monarch with all its glories and renounced the world through seeing the Four Great Signs, that the people have been paying homage and making offering in greater volumes.”

They went about beating the bush without finding the real cause of immense respect being paid to the Buddha by the people because they were totally ignorant of the Buddha's incomparable attributes: pāramī, cāga, cariya. After exchange of fruitless discussions, one of the fiercest heretics came forward with a plot to destroy the fame and gains of Gotama with the aid of a woman.

“Dear sirs .... there is no one in this world who is immune from desires for sexual pleasures derived from a woman and the Recluse Gotama, being young and good looking like a deva, will certainly get entangled with a maiden of His age and appearance, if and when available. Even when He cannot be completely tempted, people will begin to have doubt about His moral uprightness. Come let us send wandering woman Sundari on a mission of bringing ruin to the Recluse Gotama's reputation throughout the land.”

Upon hearing this suggestion, all the heretics spoke in support of him: “Your plan is excellent, indeed. This will bring about the down-fall of the Recluse Gotama. He will have no alternative but to run away aimlessly with His head hanging down.” They all decided to turn the resolution into action and went en masse to the place of Sundari.

On seeing the heretics, Sundari asked: “Why have you come here all in a group?” They all went to a corner and sat there without giving her any reply. She approached them in a submissive manner and asked them again and again: “Have I done any thing wrong and, if so, what is my offence?”

At last, they gave this reply: “We have not given you any reply since you have neglected us when we have been oppressed by someone.” Sundari asked them: “Who has oppressed you?” Whereupon, they revealed their case: “Don't you see the Recluse Gotama wandering around and depriving us of offerings, to our great disadvantage?” “Good Sirs, in this matter, how can I be of assistance.” They replied: “Sister, can you really work for the good of your own relatives like us?” trying to tie her down to a commitment.

(They had employed the word 'relatives' to win her over, though there was no blood relationship apart from the fact that all of them were leading a homeless life. The heretics are indeed terrible.)

Whereupon, Sundari said: “Good Sirs... what should I do for you, there is nothing that I cannot do. I am prepared to sacrifice my own life to do anything that would be of advantage to my relatives like you.” (She had thus pledged herself to fulfil their wishes and she could not shrink back, like a deer that had got itself entangled in a bush.) The heretics told her: “Sister, you have pledged to do anything that would be of advantage to us. Being in your most impressive youth, at the first stage of life, do anything to the best of your ability that will ruin the Recluse Gotama by means of your own gorgeous personality.” Thus playing up to her vanity, they sent her away on the mission with a hint “that she should pay constant visit to Jetavana monastery.”

Foolish Sundari, like a person who wishes to dance with a ring of flowers on the teeth of a saw, like one who attempts to catch a bull elephant in musk by its trunk, like one who extends warm welcome to the King of Death with his forehead, got herself besmeared with sweet scents and bedecked with flowers, wandered her way towards the Jetavana monastery, at the time when people were coming out of the precincts of the monastery after hearing the discourses. When asked, she said: “I am going to the Recluse Gotama with whom I usually stay together in His own Chamber.” But she dared not enter the monastery and instead, made her way to the nearby hermitage of the heretics. She returned by the same route to the city when people were going to the monastery. When asked, she told them that “she had just come out of the chamber of the Buddha with whom she had stayed the night, giving Him sexual gratification.”

After a few days, the heretics, being satisfied with the part played by Sundari, bribed drunkards and instigated them to kill Sundari and to conceal her body under heaps of decayed flowers in a ditch adjacent to the Buddha's chamber. The drunkards carried out their instructions. The heretics then spread the news of missing Sundari, and went to King Kosala and reported that their female disciple, Sundari, was missing and could not be found. The King asked them if there was any place of suspicion. They informed him that they had their suspicion located in Jetavana monastery. The King then ordered for a search to be made in Jetavana monastery.

The heretics went with their disciples to the Jetavana monastery and pretended to look for the wandering woman Sundari. They found the dead body of Sundari beneath the heaps of decayed flowers in a ditch and brought the corpse to the King's presence on a decorated bedstead. They made the King believe that "the disciples of the Buddha had slain the young Sundari and left her corpse beneath the heap of decayed flowers to conceal the evil deed of their Master, Recluse Gotama." The thoughtless King passed a summary order without any formal investigation, to the effect that "the corpse be carried and shown around the city, street by street, to make all the citizens aware of the case."

Encouraged by the ill considered judgement of the King, the heretics carried the corpse of Sundari on a decorated bedstead and went all over the city, from street to street, from one junction to another, announcing:-

"Know all men and women. See for yourselves what the descendants of Sakyan race have done. They are shameless; they are of evil nature, they have no morals; they are wont to tell lies; and they indulge in sexual intercourse, and, yet they made false claims pretending to be good bhikkhus, saying without shame: 'We observe precepts, we are virtuous, we are of good conduct, of morality, developing noble practices, speaking only what is true.' But for these recluses there is no more precepts; noble precepts are the things of the past, How can there be any element of virtue in them? How can there be noble practice? They are bereft of precepts, bereft of noble practices. Why has man slain a person of fair sex after ravishing her?"

They also made the citizens of Savatthi to make similar slanderous charges. When the citizens saw the bhikkhus, they made accusations against them as instigated by the heretics:

"These bhikkhu-princes of Sakyan race are shameless, without virtue, stupid, regular liars, they indulge in sexual practices, they pretend to be virtuous, righteous, straight forward, noble, truthful and moderate persons. In actual fact, they are without virtue, without precepts, precepts for bhikkhus are no more but things of the past. How can there be any noble precepts or elements of virtue in them? They have no noble qualities whatsoever. Why should a man slay a woman when he had finished enjoying sex with her?"

The citizens had thus condemned the bhikkhus when they were seen in the city, using vulgar languages and humiliated them in an aggressive manner.

On their return from Savatthi, after regular rounds of alms-food, the bhikkhus went to the Buddha and addressed Him:

"Most Exalted Lord ... when the people of Savatthi saw the bhikkhus they accused them in vulgar language: 'these bhikkhus of Sakyan race are shameless, without virtue, regular liars, they indulge in sexual practices, and they pretend to be virtuous, righteous, straight forward, noble, truthful and moderate persons. But they are, in fact, without virtue, without precepts, without noble practices or habits, the precepts for bhikkhus are no more but things of the past. How can there be any precepts or noble qualities whatsoever? Why had man spoil a woman when he had ravished her?' "

Thus the bhikkhus told the Buddha how they had been calumniated, reviled, abused, oppressed in very harsh language (not fit for the ears of noble people). The Buddha explained to them that these people will reap as they sow, by offending the bhikkhu and said: "Bhikkhus ... such voices of slander will last only for seven days and they are bound to disappear after seven days. You shall refute these people who had calumniated, reviled, abused, oppressed you in very harsh language (not fit for the ears of noble people) by uttering the following stanza:"

*yo vāpi Ratvā na karoni cāha
ubhopi te pecca samā bhavanti nīhīnakammā mānājā parattha*

A person who is in the habit of speaking falsehood by saying, I have seen it, I have heard of it, I have met with it, I know about it, though he has not personally seen it, heard of it, though he has no knowledge of it; and a person who denies commission of his own offence are equally guilty and both of these vile people who had done low, base deed are liable to be reborn in the plane of misery after death.

The bhikkhus learnt the stanza from the Buddha and uttered it in the presence of those citizens by way of refutation.

The Citizens began to see The Truth

On hearing the verse of refutation uttered by the bhikkhus, it dawned on the citizens: “The bhikkhus, belonging to the Sakyan race, had not committed the murder as charged by the heretics through proclamation all over the city. There is one thing that deserves consideration, that is, these noble persons did not even care to take any steps whatsoever to retaliate upon us for abusing them, reviling them, slandering them by using vulgar languages, not fit for their ears. Instead, they are seen to have put up with false allegations and have thus shown forbearance (khantī) by gently, meekly carrying on with their wholesome deeds (soracca). And, above all, they simply preached to us and explained to us, who have blindly and inconsiderately slandered them, reviled them, the evil consequences of lying and denying commission of one's own offence, to prove that they are innocent, by way of an avowal of truth.

The citizen had thus regained their senses and became reasonable once again. After hearing the stanza, it dawned on them: “We have not personally witnessed the fatal event and what we have heard may or may not be true. And there is one point that called for special consideration: these heretics are bent only on wishing ill to the bhikkhus, their undoing and ruination. We should not make one sided statements believing the words of the heretics. We really do not know the truth about these bhikkhus.” They began to have sense of detestation and repentance for their conduct towards the bhikkhus. The scandalous accusations did not last long, after seven days died away completely.

The Murder Case of The Heretics brought to light

King Kosala had caused a squad of secret service personnel, who were spread throughout the city, to bring those responsible for the death of Sundari to justice. On one occasion, the murderers were drunk on the liquor which they bought with the money they received from the heretics for slaying Sundari. Two murderers quarrelled with one another and started mud slinging and one of them shouted at the other: “So you are enjoying drinks with the money you got from the heretics for killing Sundari and keeping her dead body under the heaps of decayed flowers.” (Drunkenness led a thief to expose his own criminal act of stealing an ox, as the saying goes!). The secret police arrested them and brought them to King Pasenadi Kosala.

The King asked: “Did you kill Sundari?” They admitted: “Yes we did ... your Majesty.” The King went on to ask: “Who had instigated you to commit the crime?” They replied: “At the instigation of those heretics, from outside the Teaching.” The heretics were sent for and a formal investigation was made. All the heretics admitted their guilt. And the King passed the judgment, ordering the heretic to go round the city and proclaim:

“ ‘We had engaged the murderers to kill Sundari with the sole purpose of bringing about the ruination of the Recluse Gotama. Recluse Gotama is absolutely innocent; His disciples are also absolutely faultless. We are solely responsible for the killing of Sundari.’ You, heretics, must go all over the city and get this message publicly announced by word of mouth.”

In obedience to the order of the King, the heretics did as they were bid. The citizens lost respect for them and were disgusted with them. The heretics had to undergo punishment for the charge of murder. The citizens honoured, revered and esteemed the Buddha and His Sangha more than ever before. They made offerings to the Buddha and the Sangha with greater devotional faith.

Buddha's Utterance of Joy

Then a great number of bhikkhus approached the Buddha and sat in a suitable place after paying obeisance to Him. They then addressed Him: “Most Exalted Bhagava .... it is, indeed, an unprecedented event deserving of praise by the snapping of the fingers. Most Exalted Buddha.... your prophecy: ‘Bhikkhus .... those voices would not last long; they would last only for seven days and they would disappear after a period of seven days’ has proved to be true, the voices are no more.”

The Buddha was well aware of the fact that there never is a case where a wise virtuous person could not tolerate even the most heinous accusation by lowly, stupid persons. This feeling of supreme confidence led to repeated development of joy of satisfaction so much so that it reached the point of bursting forth an utterance of a verse of joy (udāna):

Tudanti vācāya janā asaññatā sarehi sañgāmagataṃva kuñcaram sutvāna vākyan phrusam udīritam adhivāsaye bhikkhu aduṭṭha citto

Bhikkhus .... a bhikkhu, who has renounced the world for fear of the evil consequences of transient existence, should overcome evil forces by toleration, like a war elephant that could resist and repulse the arrows from the side of its foe in a battle field, when attacked by those lowly, stupid persons without any restrained conduct in deed, word and thought, stupid abusing, slandering and accusing, as if attacking you with a double edged sword.

Past Misdeed as Cause of Accusation by Sundari

Here a question might arise as to “Why the Buddha had not revealed the fact that the heretics were at the bottom of the whole affair, though he had full knowledge of this case of conspiracy?” The answer is as follows:- There is no point in telling this to ariya puggalas. The noble individuals have, from the outset, complete faith in the nobility of the Buddha and the Sangha. And there might be certain persons amongst the ordinary worldlings who would not accept the words of the Buddha when He was revealing the facts of the case. Disbelief in the Buddha mounts to be an unwholesome act in thought, which may cause them untold harm and suffering for a long time to come. Hence the Buddha's reticence at the time.

In other words, it was not the regular practice of Buddhas (Dhammatā aciñña) to foretell the events and their related sequences. They are not wont to point out a particular person as a culprit in a criminal case. They dealt with such matters only in an objective way (vide the verse for refutation mentioned above). They were not in a position to deter the misfortune that was destined to befall upon them either. They had, therefore, taken up an indifferent attitude towards accusations by the people and of Sundari's assassination, which formed the cause of those accusations.

And, there is yet another question that may be asked as to the origin of this unwholesome fate of being accused in this most disgraceful manner, when there was tremendous amount of merit to the credit of the Buddha for incalculable wholesome acts done throughout forty crores and one lakh of world-systems! This is the answer:-

The Buddha was a habitual drunkard, named Murali, in a previous existence, at the earlier stage of life as a Bodhisatta. He moved about in the company of immoral, wicked persons and eventually acquired unwholesome mental attitude. One day, he noticed a Paccakabuddha, known as Surabhi, in the act of rearranging his robes, preparing to entering the town for alms-round. Incidentally, a woman was seen to have gone past the Paccekabuddha. Murali, with a habitual wrong frame of mind happened to make a casual remark: “This bhikkhu has the habit of indulging in sexual enjoyment.”

He had suffered in the realms of woes for several lakhs of years for that offence; and He had to pay for remnant of His past misdeed by being maliciously accused by the people of having indulged in sexual intercourse with heretic Sundari, even after attainment to the Most Exalted State of an Enlightened Buddha. (There are twelve modes of similar retributions which the Buddha had to make up for His past misdeeds, in previous existences. These are laid down in serial order in Apādāna Pāli Text)

THE BUDDHA'S EIGHTH VASSA AT THE TOWN OF SUSUMARAGIRA

As stated before, the Buddha observed the seventh vassa on the emerald stone slab at Tāvatiṃsa and preached the Abhidhamma throughout the vassa. At the conclusion of that vassa, the Buddha descended to the world of men by triple stairways and preached the Sāriputta Sutta, etc., at the base of the stairways, near the gate of the City of Sankassa, for the benefit of devas, humans and Brahmās present. The Buddha then observed the eighth vassa in the forest of Bhesakala near the town of Susumaragira in Bagga province.

(The country of Bagga, where the Buddha observed the eighth vassa, was one of the sixteen historic countries in the Majjhima desa. Susumaragira was named after a big crocodile that raised its voice from the river at the moment of laying the foundation-stone of the town. The forest where the Buddha observed the eighth vassa was named after the location of what was once the abode of an ogre by the name of Bhesakala. The forest was a sanctuary.)

Nakulapitu and His Wife attained Sotāpatti

At a time, when the Buddha was taking up residence in the company of bhikkhus in the forest of Bhesakala, near Susumaragira, wealthy man Nakulapitu and wife Nakulamatu came along with the pilgrims of the town to pay homage to the Buddha and to hear the discourses. On seeing the Buddha for the first time, the couple “recognized him to be their own son.” They approached the Buddha and addressed: “Beloved son .... where have you been roaming about for such a long time after leaving us, your parents, behind?” (as though they had been recounting the events of the same existence, with a mingled feeling of joy and reproach, to their own son.)

(N.B. Nakulapitu was either the Buddha's father, paternal younger uncle or elder uncle or elder maternal uncle in each of the past five hundred existences. Likewise, his wife was either the Buddha's own mother, maternal elder aunt, younger aunt and paternal elder aunt in each of the past five hundred existences. (Their paternal and maternal affection for the Buddha, that remained latent for so long, had produced the perception of Him being their long separated son.)

The Buddha waited till the couple regained their mental equilibrium and then preached them the Dhamma which established them in the Fruition stage of sotāpatti (vide Anguttara Commentary).

(The account of the wealthy man Nakulapitu and his wife will be mentioned again in the chapter on the Jewel of the Sangha.)

The Story of Prince Bodhi

(The story of Prince Bodhi is given here in consultation with two treatises, namely, Majjhima Paññās Commentary on Bodhi Raja Kumara Sutta and Dhammapada Commentary, Second Vol. 12 Atta vagga on Bodhi Raja Kumara.)

Prince Bodhi was the son of King Udena. He learnt the art of managing elephants and wielding gore (iron hook) from his royal father. As such, he became an expert in elephant taming. (It is proposed to deal with his account here in abridged form. For full particulars, please refer to Dhammapada Commentary translation by the Venerable Canda Joti Mahāthera.)

During the reign of King Parantapa, in the country of Kosambī, the Queen was one day taking sun bath with the king in an open space. She was at an advanced stage of pregnancy and was wearing a red blanket. Suddenly a big monster bird came sweeping down and snatched away the Queen, mistaking her for a piece of meat. The Queen made no attempt to voice for help lest it might drop her at the cost of her life.

The bird dropped her at the fork of a tree, its usual place of feasting. When the Queen shouted at the top of her voice, clapping her hands at the same time, with the result that the huge bird flew away from fright. The Queen gave birth to a child at the fork of the same tree. She continued to clad herself in the red blanket due to constant shower of rain all night.

There was a hermit living in the vicinity of the tree. The hermit went to the base of the tree at dawn, as he had heard the voice of the Queen the night before and asked her about her race and birth. Once he knew all about it, he made a ladder for her to come down, and took her to his hermitage. The boy baby was named "Udena" as he was born in a moist atmosphere of rains and mountainous region.

One day, as she received the hermit on his return from the forest, she tempted him to yield to her feminine charms as she was anxious about her own future. As a result, both lived together as man and wife. Years rolled by and King Parantapa of Kosambī passed away. The ex-hermit discovered the King's death by means of his astrological knowledge and intimated the matter to the ex-Queen: "Your King had passed away. Do you want your son to stay on in this forest or to return to Kosambī and claim the throne of his father and remain there as a ruler?" The ex-Queen acquainted her son with the true aspect of his life to ascertain his attitude. When she learnt of her son's desire to become a king, she confided to the ex-hermit.

The hermit was well versed in incantation that had the power of wielding influence upon elephants. He learnt it from Sakka: Once Sakka came and asked the hermit: "Is there anything that caused you to feel worried?" The hermit replied: "Yes ... we have been faced with the danger of annoying elephants." Whereupon, Sakka taught him incantations and gave him a harp, to overcome his trouble. His instructions were that, when the hermit wanted the elephants to go away, he should tune the harp in a certain way and recite a certain verse and when he wanted the elephant to come to him, he should tune the harp in a different way and recite a different verse. The ex-hermit taught the prince how to make use of the harp and to utter the incantation in case of emergency. The prince climbed up a banyan tree to see for himself how the incantation worked. When he saw the elephants coming towards him, he struck the right chord of the harp and uttered the appropriate incantation and, truly enough, the elephants ran away through fright.

On the following day, he caused the elephants to come, by playing the harp and uttering the incantation as instructed. The elephants came running to him in response to his command. The elephant king lowered its shoulder for the prince to step on it. Riding the elephant king, the prince selected young, stout and strong elephants capable of engagement in a battle field. He requested for the red blanket of his mother and her ring to serve as evidence of his lineage. Then paying homage to his parents, he left the forest. He stopped at every village in his attempt to build up an army by announcing: "I am the legal son of the late King Parantapa; anyone wishing wealth and prosperity may join me." Surrounding the city with his army, he laid claim to his father's throne: "I am the legal son of the late King Parantapa. Hand over the throne to a rightful successor." To support his claim, he showed the red blanket and the ring of his mother to those who seemed to have doubt about his claim. In this manner, he was able to ascend the throne without let or hindrance. Udena was very much fond of capturing elephants. He would go without hesitation to any place to capture elephants on being told about the presence of fine elephants.

King Candhapajjota, a rival of Udena, was desirous of learning the art of managing elephants from King Udena. He caused the construction of a wooden elephant and kept trained soldiers inside of the sham elephant which served as a trap to catch Udena as and when he came out to catch elephants. His plan succeeded and Udena was taken prisoner. King Candhapajjota sent his daughter, Vasuladatta, to King Udena to learn the art of elephant management and the two eventually fell in love with each other. King Udena eloped with the Princess Vasuladatta and lived in the town of Susumaragira in the province of Bagga. Princess Vasudatta gave birth to Prince Bodhi, who learnt from his father, King Udena, the art of elephant management and became an expert in it.

Prince Bodhi caused The Construction of A Palace known as Kokanda

Prince Bodhi caused the construction of a palace with a turreted roof known as Kokanada. The turret was of peculiar and unprecedented design and won the admiration of the people. The Prince asked the master builder: "Have you constructed a turret of a similar design elsewhere or was it the first of its kind ever constructed by you?" He replied: "Your Majesty .... this is the first of its kind I have ever constructed." Whereupon, Prince Bodhi was worried with the thought: "Should the carpenter build a similar turreted mansion for someone else, my palace would no longer be the object of praise and wonder by the people." An evil, cruel thought entered his head to plot the destruction of the architect and deprive others of having a similar palace built for themselves. He was thinking of doing away with the builder either by killing him, or by cutting off his hand and feet or extracting his eye-balls.

Prince Bodhi happened to confide his brutal plot against the carpenter to one of his close boyhood friend, named Sanjikaputta, who was of kindly disposition and considerate. Sanjikaputta felt certain Prince Bodhi meant what he said, but he was quite against the idea of destroying an innocent man of arts and crafts of great prominence. He made up his mind to avert the imminent danger and so he went to the carpenter and asked: "Have you finished with the work of constructing the turreted palace for prince Bodhi or is there anything still left to be done?" When the carpenter said: "All complete," he confided, "Prince Bodhi wishes to do away with you, please be careful about your own security."

The master carpenter said words of gratitude: "O dear Lord .... you have, indeed, done very well by such words of kindness," and he told him: "I will do everything as demanded by the circumstances." When Prince Bodhi asked him: "Big master carpenter .... is there anything yet to be done in connection with the turret?" "Your Majesty, not completed yet, there is a lot to be done," was the reply. Whereupon, the Prince asked: "What kind of job was left to be done?" The carpenter said in reply: "Your Majesty .... details will be given later, just provide me with necessary timber immediately." The prince demanded: "What kind of timber do you want me to supply?" "Your Majesty .... just light wood, such as Yamane.. those light and dry wood," was the reply. The Prince, not suspecting anything, supplied him with light and dry wood as demanded.

The master carpenter subsequently asked the prince: "Your Majesty .... please do not visit my place of work forthwith, as the kind of job I am about to handle is very delicate, so much so that I will have no leisure to enter into conversation with anybody, excepting my wife charged with the task of conveying food." The prince gave his consent, saying: "Very well."

The master carpenter stayed in a work cabin and cut the soft wood to measurement and built a 'Flying Vehicle' in the form of a Garuda bird. On completion of the job, he asked his wife to turn their assets (household property) into hard cash and jewellery and to have the family kept in a state of readiness. Prince Bodhi posted security forces around the place where the turret was supposed to be under construction. When everything was ready, the master carpenter had his family gathered together at the workshop and after taking their morning meal, went aboard the flying vehicle and flew away. Even as the guards were reporting the matter to the Prince: "Your Royal Highness... the master carpenter is gone.." the carpenter and his family had descended in a region of the Himalayas and settled there permanently. The new settlement developed into a city and he ruled the region as its king. He was known as King Kathā Vahana.

The Inauguration of Prince Bodhi's Turreted Palace

Prince Bodhi had in mind to invite the Buddha and His Sangha to the inauguration of his palace. Therefore, he caused it to be decorated and smeared profusely with sweet scents. Then he had a white carpet laid from the lowest rung of the ladder. (The prince had no off-springs. He thought that there was the chance of getting a son or a daughter should the Buddha care to tread on the white carpet; if not otherwise. That was the idea behind the laying of the white carpet.)

When the Buddha arrived at the palace door, the Prince paid homage to Him in a traditional manner and received His bowl with his hands, saying: “Exalted Buddha.... please enter.” But the Buddha would not enter the palace. The Prince requested the Buddha for three times in succession. At the third time, the Buddha turned round and looked at the Venerable Ānanda who at once realized that the Buddha would not tread upon the white carpet. He therefore, turned to the Prince and asked him to remove the white carpet since the Buddha would not tread upon it.

(Facts relating to Prince Bodhi's object of laying the white carpet and the Buddha's refusal to tread upon it are fully explained in Majjhima Nikāya Commentary. Here is an abridged form of the exposition:

The Prince's object: Prince Bodhi had no off-spring. He had heard that any handsome offerings made to the Buddha usually bring about fitting rewards. He, therefore, made the resolution that he would get an off-spring should the Buddha care to tread on the white carpet; if not, otherwise.

Prince Bodhi's former kamma: The Prince was an inhabitant of a small island in one of his previous existences. He had a wife who had a similar frame of mind. They killed and ate helpless small birds by mutual consent. The Prince stood the chance of getting children had he married a woman other than his previous wife just described. Since he and his wife were jointly responsible for the destruction of the young birds in the past, they were equally guilty of taking the life of the infant birds. The Buddha was well aware of all this and hence His refusal to tread upon the white carpet that was purposely laid on that occasion.

There are still some other points to ponder here:

- (1) The Prince was predestined not to get any off-spring due to deterrent acts, and nothing could interfere with the course of cause and effect, even though the Buddha treaded upon the carpet laid by the Prince with an erroneous idea. He might, through ignorance, make an additional mistake by forming an idea that nothing could be gained by making offerings to a Buddha, notwithstanding the adage that “every offering made to a Buddha brings about fitting rewards.” He might be led to form such mistaken ideas on this aspect.
- (2) Such a practice might be a cause for complaint by members of other sects: “Those bhikkhus are wandering around hither and thither and treading on the white carpets and there is nothing that they dare not do.”
- (3) Amongst those bhikkhus who might have occasions to tread on the white carpets during the life time of the Buddha, there are bhikkhus replete with supernormal faculties that enabled them to know the mind of the people. Such bhikkhus would tread on carpets as and when they should be tread upon! They would refuse to do so, when circumstance did not allow. Once the Buddha had passed away, the chances of attaining the Path and Fruition endowed with the knowledge of the future would be rare for sentient beings, if not remote. Their faculty of reasoning will deteriorate and they will not be able to decide whether the white carpets could be treaded with advantage and vice versa. It would be well if they had enough foreseeing power to decide as necessary. If not, the lay devotees might naturally form the idea that: “During the life time of the Buddha, offerings made to the Sangha invariably fulfil their wish, whereas nothing accrued from the offering made to the bhikkhus of our time. Perhaps they are not devoted to practise of the path nowadays.” Such thought might make them unhappy.

It was for these reasons that the Buddha had not treaded on the white carpet, and the Venerable Ānanda had also stated: “The Buddha did not tread on the white carpet in consideration of the facts stated above and because of concern for the bhikkhus of the generations to come,” with emphasis being placed on (3) above.)

The Prince had the white carpet to be removed and conducted the Buddha to the mansion and offered Him gruel, soft food and sweet meats. When the feasting ceremony was over, the Prince addressed the Buddha: “Most Exalted Buddha.... it occurred to me that, the state of peace and tranquillity can only be attained by strenuous effort.” Whereupon, the Buddha replied: “Prince .... I was also of the same idea when I was a Bodhisatta,” and explained to him the part of His life from the time of taking up austere practices to the time of preaching the Anatta Sutta to the Five Vaggis, who consequently attained the fruition stage of arahatship.

Prince Bodhi took Refuge in The Three Gems

When the Buddha had preached the discourse dealing with the establishment of the five Vaggis in arahatship, Prince Bodhi asked Him:

“Most Exalted Buddha, for one who has a leader (teacher) in the person of You, how long has he to work for the attainment of Fruition stage of arahatship and, enjoy peace and tranquillity?” The Buddha replied: “Prince, in this connection I would ask you a question and you may answer as you deem fit and proper: ‘Aren't you skilful in managing elephants and wielding of the goad?’ ” The Prince replied: “Yes Lord, I am skilful in elephant management and wielding of the goad.”

The Buddha went on to ask the Prince:

“Prince ....supposing a person, knowing that you are skilful in the art of elephant management and wielding of the goad, come to learn the art of elephant management under you and he has these defects: -

- (1) Lacking in confidence: He has not enough confidence to attain the desired standard or goal.
- (2) Disease: He is suffering from a disease bad enough to prevent him from attaining the desired goal.
- (3) Pretension: He makes false pretension or puts on vain and boastful airs, that deters him from attaining the desired goal.
- (4) Lacking in effort: He is lacking in earnest effort to attain the desired goal.
- (5) Lacking in intelligence: He is not intelligent enough to attain the desired goal.

Would that person be able to learn the art of elephant management and wielding of the goad from you?”

The Prince replied: “Most Exalted Buddha... it will not be possible to train a person with any one of the five defects to attain the desired goal, leave alone the question of training one with all those five defects.”

Again, the Buddha put a set of alternative questions:

“Prince supposing, the person who comes to you to learn the art of elephant management and wielding of the goad has the following qualifications:

- (1) Confidence: He has enough confidence that enables him to reach the desired objective.
- (2) Disease: He is free from any disease, or one with sound health to enable him to reach the desired objective.
- (3) Pretension: He does not make false pretensions, or he is one with an honest mind that enables him to attain the desired objective.
- (4) Effort: He is one with earnest effort that enables him to reach the desired objective.
- (5) Intelligence: He is a man of intelligence capable of attaining the objective.

Will it be possible for you to train a person with such qualifications to achieve the desired objective?”

Prince Bodhi replied: "Most Exalted Buddha... it will be quite possible for me to train a person to achieve the desired objective even when he has only one out of the five qualifications, the more so if he is one with all the five qualities.”

Five Elements of Effort (Padhāniyaṅga) required of Those who practise Meditation.

The Buddha then proceeded to preach:

“Prince in a similar manner, there are five qualities to be striven after by one who practises meditation:-

- (1) In this sāsana, a bhikkhus has complete confidence in the Arahatta-magga Nāna and Omniscience of the Buddha, with the understanding that the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha is replete with the nine attributes (of Arahām, being worthy of the highest veneration; of Sammā Sambuddha, being Perfectly Self-Enlightened; etc.; of Bhagavā, being endowed with the six great qualities of glory).
- (2) He is free from disease, and possesses an equable frame of mind and body, and is endowed with a gastrointestinal system (pācaka-tejo) which can digest food easily, conducive to practice of meditation.
- (3) He is free from pretensions and deceptions, presenting himself as he is to the Buddha or to his associates.
- (4) He is diligent in the work of doing away with what is bad and striving after what is good. He is energetic and steadfast in his effort. He possesses unrelenting zeal to perform deeds of merit, free from fault.
- (5) He is possessed of wisdom and is one with penetrative knowledge (Path-insight into the state of ‘rising and falling’ of the conditioned, (udayabbaya-nāṇa), that eradicates the suffering of the round of rebirths).

Prince ...., as already stated, a person who has these five qualities (termed ‘Padhāniyaṅga: faith, freedom from illness, honesty, diligence, and knowledge of rising and falling of the conditioned, termed, ‘Udayabbaya’) is capable of realizing arahatta-phala within seven years under the guidance of a leader (teacher) in the person of the Buddha and can live happily.

Prince..., if a period of seven years is considered to be too long, a person who has these five qualities can realize arahatta-phala within six, five, four, three, two, one year under the guidance of a leader (teacher) in the person of the Buddha and can live happily.

Prince..., should a period of one year is considered too long, one possessed of these five qualities can realize arahatta-phala stage within seven months under the guidance of a leader (teacher) in the person of the Buddha and can live happily.

Prince..., should a period of seven months is considered to be too long, one endowed with these five qualities can realize arahatta-phala within six, five, four, three, two, one month, half a month (15 days) under the guidance of a leader (teacher) in the person of the Buddha and can live happily.

Prince..., should a period of 15 days is considered to be too long, one endowed with these five qualities can realize arahatta-phala within seven days, six days, five, four, three, two, one day under the guidance of a leader in the person of the Buddha and live happily.

Prince..., should a period of one day is considered to be too long, one endowed with these five qualities can realize arahatta-phala within half a day that is, one endowed with these five qualities and instructed by the Buddha in the evening realize Arahatta-phala in the morning, when instructed in the morning will realize the arahatta-phala in the evening.

This was the answer given in response to the question by Prince Bodhi.

Here are some points connected with the five Padhāniyaṅga Factors from a verse written by Ledi Sayadaw to be learnt by heart:

Faith, health, honesty,
Diligence, insight into state of flux,
Qualities to be striven after,

For attainment of Arahatta-magga!

Of these five mundane factors, confidence or faith (saddhā) may be divided into Four classes:-

- (1) Agama saddhā: Faith of Bodhisattas that has remained unshaken since the time of making the resolution to become a Buddha.
- (2) Adhigama saddhā: Faith of the ariya-puggalas that remains unshaken since the time of realization of magga-ñāṇa.
- (3) Okappana saddhā: Faith in the Buddha as one who is perfectly Self-Enlightened; in the Dhamma which has been well-taught; in the Sangha for its uprightness.
- (4) Pasāda saddhā: Simple adoration through respect for the moral virtues of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha.

Of these four modes of saddhās, Okappana saddhā should be considered as the Faith factor forming a constituent of the Padhāniyaṅga.

When Prince Bodhi had heard of the practical and personal knowledge of the Dhamma preached by the Buddha, he said these words of adoration and praise: "One who practises as taught by the Buddha in the evening is able to attain Path and Fruition in the morning; one who practises as taught by the Buddha in the morning is able to attain Path and Fruition in the evening. The Buddha is wonderful, the Dhamma is wonderful; the way of preaching the Dhamma, which is good in the beginning, good in the middle and good in the end, is wonderful, indeed." Thus the Prince said in praise of the way in which the Buddha had preached the Dhamma.

When the youth, Sanjikaputta, heard of Prince Bodhi's address of appreciation of the discourse, he spoke against the Prince: "This Prince Bodhi has said that Buddha is wonderful, the Dhamma is wonderful for being good in the beginning, good in the middle and good in the end, and he also praised the way in which the Dhamma was preached. With all that, the Prince does not seem to have taken refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha."

Whereupon, the Prince explained to him in detail:

"My dear man .... Sañjikaputta... please do not say so; please do not say so my dear man Sañjikaputta, please take note of certain facts which I am about to tell you now, that I had heard from my mother in the past:

When the Buddha was taking up residence at Ghositarama monastery in the country of Kosambī, my mother respectfully approached the Buddha and made a solemn request: 'Most Exalted Buddha.... please be so kind as to do honour to my coming child, a son or a daughter, whom I am bearing now, and who takes refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha by accepting him/her as a lay devotee (upasakā or upasikā, as the case may be) from the time of his/her birth to the time of death.'

My dear man, Sañjikaputta ..... when the Buddha was taking up residence in this very sanctuary of Bhesakala forest in the province of Bagga, my governess approached the Buddha carrying me in her arms and made a request: 'Most Exalted Buddha... this Prince Bodhi takes refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha, please be so kind as to regard this Prince as a lay devotee from today till he breathes his last.

My dear man, Sañjikaputta .... in addition to the two requests made by my mother and my governess, I do hereby for the third time take refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha. The Most Exalted Buddha, may you regard me as a devout lay devotee from today for the rest of my life!

(A question might arise as to the effectiveness or otherwise of the requests made by his mother and the guardian on his behalf. Strictly speaking, they were not effective due to lack of volition (cetanā) on the part of the person concerned. There is no such thing as taking refuge in the three Gems without volition

Does it mean that the two previous requests became null and void? As a matter of fact, they were not absolutely valueless, they served as a stepping stone to devotional faith and placed the Prince in good stead. He became aware of the attributes of the three Gems when his parents acquainted him with what they had done for him in anticipation of his birth. He virtually became a confirmed lay devotee the moment he was aware of the attributes of the Triple Gems and placed his confidence in them.)

Prince Bodhi attained Sotāpatti

After that, Prince Bodhi sat at a place free from six faults and addressed the Buddha: “Most Exalted Buddha.... I am one of your devotees: my mother had requested for the first time for favour of your accepting me as a lay devotee before I was born and my governess had repeated a similar request for the second time holding me in her arms when I was a baby. I have also renewed the request for the third time when I came of age. With all that you have refused to tread on the white carpet laid by a devotee like me, may I be enlightened as to the cause of all this!”

Whereupon the Buddha asked him: “Prince .... what was your object of laying that white carpet?” “Exalted Buddha.... I had done it with the thought and wish that if I would be bestowed with a son or a daughter, You would decide to tread on it,” was his admission.

The Buddha said in response: “That was the reason why I did not tread upon it.” The Prince again asked: “Glorious Buddha.... am I destined to go without any off-spring, a son or a daughter?” “Aye ... prince,” replied the Buddha.

The Prince asked: “What was the cause of it?” The Buddha gave him a hint: “This is because you had been forgetful and had indulged in the five sensual pleasures in association with your wife, as a partner, in a past existence!” The Prince requested the Buddha to enlighten him as to when and in what existence had he been forgetful and indulgent in the five sensual pleasures. The following is the Buddha’s reply to his request:

“Once upon a time, hundreds of people went across the ocean by means of a big boat. The boat was wrecked in the middle of the journey and all the travellers perished with the exception of a couple who managed to land on an island by means of a plank.

The island was inhabited by quite a large number of birds, and the couple, being pressed by hunger, managed to satisfy their hunger by baking the eggs of the birds for their meals. When they found that eggs alone would not do, they killed young birds for their meals, throughout their first, second, and third stages of their lives. They did not realize at all that their indulgence in pursuit of luxurious living constituted a wrong deed.”

Having revealed their past immoral deeds, the Buddha proceeded to evaluate their guilt saying:-

“Prince... Had you and your wife realized your wrong deeds at a certain stage of life, you might stand a chance of getting offspring at a corresponding stage of your present existence.

Had either of you realized the wrong deed, there is a chance of getting off-springs on that score.

Prince .... one, who holds oneself dear, will virtually become aware of the advantages of moral acts in all stages of life, failing which, he might guard himself against wrong deeds at one or the other stage of his life.”

The Buddha then went on to preach:-

*Attānañce piyam jaññā, rakkheya naṃ surakkitaṃ
tiṇṇaṃ aññataraṃ yāmaṇ
paṭijaggeyya paṇḍito.*

Rajakumar .... a wise person, who knows to hold himself dear, guards himself from any shortcomings, in his own interests for the present and future existence. One should see to it that he cleans himself from the dust of ten wrong deeds, in his own interests in one or the other of the three stages of life.

(The passage: “A wise person who knows to hold himself dear, guards himself” should be understood clearly: In the case of a lay devotee (an ordinary person), he should not consider himself to be well protected by simply shutting himself in the topmost chamber of a mansion with its doors and windows securely fastened and security guards well posted on the outside. In a similar manner, a bhikkhu should not consider himself safe in a cave with its doors and windows securely fastened.

As a matter of fact, a lay devotee guards himself well only by giving alms and observe the precepts as far as possible. A bhikkhu guards himself by performing his routine duties towards his associates and elderly bhikkhus, and striving to learn the Teaching and practise meditation in the interests of their progress and security.

The passage that reads: “One should see to it that he cleans himself in one or the other of the three stages of life” means; it is imperative that a bhikkhu or a lay person should strive to gain merit by observance of precepts of his own prescribed standard in all stages of life or failing which, at one of the stages of life.

When one cannot perform meritorious deeds at playful young age, he should do it at the second stage of life. Failing which, due to the burden of a household life, he should do it at the last stage of life without fail. Such a person is considered to have worked out for his self-purification. One, who fails to work out for his own purification, is considered to be one who does not ‘hold himself dear’ and to be paving his own way to the plane of misery.

In case where a bhikkhu fails to observe bhikkhu precepts and practise meditation at the first stage due to pressure of work and studies, he should do so at the second stage. When he could not find time to observe bhikkhu precepts and practise meditation due to heavy burden of advanced studies at the second stage, he should, on no account, fail to do it at the third and final stage of life. Only then could he be considered to be a person who works out his own purification, one who holds oneself dear and would be free of bitter regret. This is the correct interpretation of these lines under reference.)

At the conclusion of the discourse, Prince Bodhi attained the fruition stage of sotāpatti, and the discourse proved to be beneficial to those present on that occasion.

Mara entered The Belly of Venerable Moggallāna

Once upon a time, Mahā Moggallāna was taking up residence at a monastery in the Bhesakala forest sanctuary, near the town of Susumaragira in the province of Bagga. While he was taking a walk in an open space, Māra, the Evil One, chanced to enter his belly and sat on top of the larger intestine. Mahā Moggallāna felt that his belly weighed heavy like a mass of stone. The belly was tight and weighty as though it was full of cooked gram or a bag full of damp and watery gram. He considered that should the heaviness in his stomach be due to indigestion, it would not be proper to keep on walking in the open. He eventually retired to the chamber and sat on a reserved seat.

The Venerable kept on deliberating as to the cause of the trouble in a normal way. Had he made any attempt to rub his stomach after contemplating on the purity of his sīla and making a will to do away all the pain caused by indigestion or disturbances of internal system, the stupid Māra would have been torn into particles. But he did not make any attempt to allay his pain in that manner, instead, he simply kept on deliberating its cause in a normal way.

After thus scrutinizing the cause of his stomach pain, when he noticed the evil Māra was sitting on top of his larger intestine, he said: "Evil Māra... get out; Evil Mara... get out.. don't you try to give trouble to the Tathāgata! Don't you try to bring trouble upon yourself and suffer the consequences for a long time." (The Venerable had said this because, any attempt to give trouble to the children means giving trouble to the parents. In a like manner, to give trouble to the disciples amounts to giving trouble to the master. That was what the Venerable meant when he says "Don't you give trouble to the Buddha ".)

Māra was thinking that "this bhikkhu has been saying: 'Evil Māra.. get out, don't you give trouble to the Tathāgata! Don't you try to give trouble to the disciple of the Tathāgata. Don't you try to bring trouble upon yourself and suffer the consequences for a long time,' without seeing me at all." He was also of the impression that even the Buddha would not have the power to notice him, leave alone His disciple. Whereupon, Mahā Moggallāna made it plain to Mara: "Evil Māra, I know you and I know what has been going on in your mind .... don't you think that I have no power to know about your thought. You are Evil Mara, you have been presently thinking I know nothing about you, when I said: 'Get out Evil Māra... don't try to give trouble to the Tathāgata. Don't you try to bring trouble to the disciple of the Tathāgata! Don't you try to give trouble to the disciple of the Tathāgata. Don't you try to bring trouble upon yourself and suffer the consequences for a long time.' You have been thinking that even the Tathāgata would not have the power to notice you, leave alone a disciple like me. Isn't that what was going on in your mind?"

Māra came to realize that the Thera had actually noticed him and knew his thought, otherwise he would not have said: "Get out Evil Māra .... don't you try to give trouble to the Tathāgata.... don't you try to give trouble to His disciple .... don't you try to bring trouble on yourself and suffer the consequences for a long time," and so he came out of the Venerable's stomach and got himself hidden on the outside of the door.

When the Venerable noticed him standing outside of the door, he said to him: "Evil Māra, I see where you are at present. Don't you think I can't see you. I see you standing on the outer-side of the door." Then it occurred to the Venerable:-

"Odour emitted from the human body can cause inconvenience to celestial beings one hundred yojanas away in the region of atmosphere (air) (see Di: 2:260) Māra belongs to the realm of Paranimmita Vasavatti which is inhabited by powerful devas who are noted for their purity and delicate body. But, since Māra had accommodated himself on top of the filthy intestine, it may be assumed that he is out to do me harm and cause my destruction. For a being with such a frame of mind, there should not be any immoral act that he is loathe to do!

He does not seem to have any sense of shame and dread of consequences of evil acts. It would, therefore, be wise, in the circumstances, to let him know that we were relatives by blood and to make him meek and sober before he can be persuaded to leave."

With this end in view, Mahā Moggallāna acquainted Mara with the fact that he was his nephew by revealing the course of his own unwholesome life in a previous existence.

Mahā Moggallāna's Unwholesome Life of The Past

"Evil Māra... there was an event of interest that occurred in the time of Buddha Kakusandha. I was a Mara by the name of Dusi and my sister was Kali and you were then the son of my sister. Thus you were my nephew then."

(In this connexion, Mahā Moggallāna recounted a succession of paternal and maternal relatives from knowledge handed down from generation to generation. In the case of human beings, a son ascended the throne of his father by inheritance, but this is not the case with beings of the celestial world. A celestial being springs into life to take the place of another celestial being as and when his predecessor dies, according to his merits. The present Vasavatti Māra, was a nephew of Dusi Māra. After passing away from that existence, he performed good deeds and consequently became Vasavatti Māra, according to his merits. It was not that Dusi Mara's nephew was still remaining in existence in that realm.)

Having acquainted Māra of how they were related by blood in a previous existence, Mahā Moggallāna went on to reveal the fact that he, in the capacity of Dusi Mara, had committed a heinous act, and he had to suffer in the plane of miseries for a long time (vide Piṭaka Burmese translation of Mūlapaṇṇāsa Pāli Text).

“Evil Māra .... I was Dusi Māra during the time of Buddha Kakusandha, whose chief disciples were Vidhūra and Sanjīva. The chief disciple, Vidhura, excelled the rest in matters concerning the Law (Dhamma); hence he was named Vidūra, meaning a wise thera. Sanjīva Thera would abide in nirodha-samāpatti with ease wherever he might be, either in a forest, at the base of a tree, or at a secluded place. Once it so happened that cowherds, farmers and passer-by mistook him for a dead bhikkhu in a sitting posture, while he was in the middle of enjoying nirodha-samāpatti. They all collected fire-wood, dried grass and cow-dung and placed them on his body, got them alight as an act of cremation and departed.”

(Anāgāmins and arahats wishing to enjoy nirodha-samāpatti perform four preliminary functions of willing (1) that such possessions of his as are not on his person, may not be destroyed by the five enemies, such as fire, etc.; (2) that he may wake up even before the messenger arrives and be ready when his services are required by the Order; (3) that he may wake up even before the messenger arrives and be ready when called or sent for by the Buddha; (4) that he will not pass away while he is still absorbed in samāpatti, (this is achieved by preliminary ascertaining of the time of expiry of his life-continuum). It is not necessary to will for the safety of what he is wearing, etc., as not a single thread of his robe would be affected by the fire caused by the cowherds and others.)

“Evil Mara .... on the following morning, Sanjīva emerged from samāpatti, and came out treading on the burning red hot cinders of the colour of agati flower, shaking off dust from the robe, and entered the village for a round of receiving food. Cow-boys, farmers and passer-by who had cremated him the day before, were struck with wonder when they noticed the mahāthera on his round of receiving alms. They told among themselves: “This is a sort of miracle which had never occurred before; the bhikkhu was seen to have died in sitting posture the other day, and he is miraculously back to life again.” Evil Māra... all those people had therefore called the mahāthera by the name of Sanjīva for his being back to life again; Sanjīva.”

Māra Dusi's Heinous Acts

“Evil Māra... Dusi Māra hit upon a plan to create a situation that would agitate the minds of the good natured bhikkhus by cruel means. He thought to himself: ‘I have no knowledge of whence those virtuous, righteous bhikkhus come from and where they are bound for; I will incite the brahmin householders to decry those bhikkhus who are reputed to be virtuous and righteous, to speak evil of those bhikkhus among themselves, using abusive language, despising, condemning, decrying, and deriding the bhikkhus. Such behaviour on the part of the brahmin householders would disturb and derange them, thereby creating a chance for me to cause harm to them.’ ”

Evil Māra...that Dusi Māra went ahead to incite the brahmin householders to act according to his instructions by calumniating and humiliating the bhikkhus, with the result that brahmin householders started to speak ill of the bhikkhus through misunderstanding:

“Those bhikkhus with foul means of livelihood, those shavelings of dirty, low castes, born of the arched upper part of a Brahmā's foot, sitting down lazily, gloomily pretending to be enjoying jhāna, with bent necks and faces drooping down.

They may be likened to an owl lying in wait for rats in the foliage of a tree, a fox looking slyly for fish along the bank of a river, like a cat lying in wait for its prey at the mouth of a drainage pipe or at a garbage container, like an ass, with a hole in its back, moping near a garbage dump at a corner of a fencing; those bhikkhus shavelings of dirty, low castes, born of the arched upper part of a Brahmā's foot, sitting down lazily, gloomily pretending to be enjoying jhāna, with bent necks and faces drooping down.'

They thus abused the bhikkhus, by using abusive and harsh words, they calumniated the bhikkhus according to the instruction of Dusi Māra, through misunderstanding.

Most of those people were reborn in the planes of woes, such as niraya or hell, the worlds of animals, petas, and asuras, according to the sum of guilt.

(We should consider the following points with reference to the passage: "Most of those people were reborn in the four planes of woes" in order to arrive at a correct view of the case.

If those people were possessed by Dusi Māra and were made to abuse the bhikkhus as his 'agents', they were not guilty of such an offence because of lack of intent or volition on their part in doing so. Dusi Māra was solely responsible for this immoral act and it follows that those people were not liable to be reborn in the planes of misery on that score!

What actually happened was this: Dusi Māra did not attempt to possess them and use them as his agents, but he created a situation that compelled them to turn against the bhikkhus through misunderstanding. He created scenes that showed the presence of women in the vicinity of the bhikkhus; scenes that showed the presence of men in the vicinity of bhikkhunīs; bhikkhus in the act of fishing with traps and nets, of catching birds with traps, of hunting with hordes of hounds in the forest, enjoying drinks in the company of women at the liquor shops, dancing and singing; women lingering in the vicinity of bhikkhus and young men in the vicinity of the residence of the bhikkhunīs at dusk.. (These were the tactics adopted by Dusi Māra).

People noticed such incompatible, discordant scenes whenever they went to the forests, to the parks and to the monasteries, so much so that they were thoroughly disgusted with the bhikkhus and agreed among themselves not to make any further offerings to them saying: "These bhikkhus indulge in acts inappropriate for them. How should we gain merit by making offerings to such base persons?"

They reviled the bhikkhus whenever they saw them and they were thus reborn in the planes of misery for their unwholesome deeds toward bhikkhus.)

"Evil Māra .... when Buddha Kakusandha came to know that His bhikkhus had been outraged by the people under the undue influence of Dusi Māra, He urged His disciples to cultivate the four sublime abodes (vihāra): (1) Mettā: Loving kindness, (2) Karuṇā: Compassion, (3) Muditā: Altruistic Joy, (4) Upekkhā: Equanimity. The bhikkhus cultivated the four Factors of jhāna, the Brahmā Vihāra, with due diligence as instructed by the Buddha.

When Dusi Māra found out that such a tactic could not influence the minds of the bhikkhus, whose past existences and future destinations were beyond his range of intelligence, he decided, once again, to reverse the mode of his tactics by influencing the people to pay homage and make offerings, with ulterior motive to disturb and derange the bhikkhus, thus giving him opportunity to harm them. (His tactic will be dealt with later on).

Evil Māra .... those brahmins did as they were bid, paying homage and offering alms to bhikkhus.

Evil Māra .... most of those people were reborn in the celestial planes of happiness for such acts of merit."

(Some points of interest with regard to the attainment by the people to the planes of happiness:-

Just as Dusi Māra created unpleasant scenes on the previous occasion, so he created pleasant and agreeable scenes to promote devotional faith of the people in the bhikkhus:

He created scenes depicting the bhikkhus in different postures; some were flying in the sky, some standing or sitting with crossed-legs, some stitching robes, others preaching or learning canonical literatures, and spreading robes over their bodies for warmth in the sky as well as young novices plucking flowers in the sky. (This is another tactic of Dusi Māra).

When the people noticed the bhikkhus engaged in such activities wherever they went, in the forests, in the gardens or in the monasteries, they told the people in the town their own experience saying, “These bhikkhus, even young novices are of great glory and powers and worthy of offering. It is greatly beneficial to make offerings to such glorious, worthy bhikkhus.”

People made offerings to the bhikkhus in the form of robes, food, monasteries and medicine and earned great merit; they were reborn in the celestial planes of happiness after death for such acts of merit!

“Evil Māra .... it was how Dusi Mara used his undue influence on the people to pay homage and make offerings to the bhikkhus once again.”

After revealing this part of that fateful event to Mara, Buddha Kakusandha turned to the bhikkhus and urged them to practice meditation: “Come bhikkhus, abide practising meditation by repeated contemplation on the unpleasantness of the physical body (asubha); repulsiveness of material food (ahare patikula); unpleasant, undelightfulness, unsatisfactory nature of the world (anabhirati), insubstantiality and impermanent nature of the conditioned phenomena (anicca).”

“Evil Māra .... in obedience to the exhortation of Buddha Kakusandha, all the bhikkhus meditated on asubha, ahare patikula, anabhirati, anicca in the forests or secluded corners and at the base of the trees, with the result that they attained arahatship in due course.”

(N.B. Buddha Kakusaṇḍha visited all the residential places of the bhikkhus in the world, regardless of the number of bhikkhus at one place, and urged them to take up meditation. The bhikkhus practise these four kinds of meditation as foundation of their spiritual work and went on to cultivate insight meditation, ultimately gaining arahatship.)

“Evil Māra .... sometime afterwards, Buddha Kakusaṇḍha went on alms round, attended by the Right-hand chief disciple, Mahāthera Vidhura, when Dusi Māra, failing to achieve an opportunity to harm bhikkhu by instigating the householders to revile them or also to honour them, made his last bid to destroy the Sangha by himself. He took possession of a youngster and threw a handful of stones at Mahā Thera Vidhura. The stones hit the Mahāthera's head cutting the skin and touching the skull, as the result of his assault.

Evil Māra .... the Mahāthera Vidhūra followed Buddha Kakusandha with streams of blood running down his head, unmoved or unshaken by the incidence. Thereupon, Buddha Kakusaṇḍha turned around bodily to look at him, with the look of an elephant and condemned the offender: “This foolish Dusi Māra does not know his own limits,” and at that very moment Dusi Māra passed away from the world of devas. He was reborn in the plane of misery.”

The bones of ordinary people are joined together with their edges touching one another; in the case of Paccekabuddhas bones are joined together by hooks at the end of each joint, in the case of Buddhas bones are joined together by rings on either side of the joints. It is for this reason that Buddha Kakusandha had to make complete turn of the body before He could look at the object behind His back, like a golden figure turning round by mechanism. Buddha Kakusaṇḍha thus turned round and made that remark: “This Dusi Māra does not know his own limits. He has done an extremely, heinous act.”

In connexion with the passage: “At this moment Dusi Mara passed away from the world of devas and was reborn in the planes of misery” it should be understood that, devas of the celestial planes usually die in their respective planes at the expiry of their terms of life. It should not be taken, therefore, that Dusi Māra died in the world of human. It should be understood that he went back to the celestial plane and passed away from there to be reborn in the plane of misery.

It should be borne in mind that, although Dusi Māra died the moment Buddha Kakusaṇḍha turned round to look at the scene of crime, it does not mean that he lost his life on that score. As a matter of fact, his life term was cut off as if by a huge axe because of his atrocious offence against a Buddha's chief disciple who was possessed of great virtues and vast attributes.)

“Evil Māra .... Dusi Mara had to serve his term of punishment in the three planes of misery, namely, Chaphassāyatanika, Saṅkusamāhata and Paccatavedanīya.”

(N.B. The denizens in this type of hell, had their sense-organs (eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, chest (heart) pierced by tapered iron-rods, and, as a result, they were constantly subjected to excessive pains at the site of each sense organs termed ‘pains through contact’; and that plane of misery is accordingly known as ‘Chaphassāyatanika plane of misery’. The same hell is also known as ‘Saṅkusamahāta plane of misery’ because it has abundant supply of tapered iron-rods to punish the denizens. Another name for it is Paccatavedanīya, because of its nature of self-infliction even without anyone to impose the suffering.)

“Evil Mara ....warders of this hell used to come at regular intervals, and told me that when two javelins had come together at my chest it would mark the completion of a thousand years.”

(N.B. The passage: “When the two javelins have come together” needs to be explained. The denizens of this type of hell measure three gavutas in size. The executioners, in two groups, started to punish them by piercing and lacerating his body with javelins (tapered iron-rods) from the chest, saying: “This is the spot where your thoughts had arisen to do evil.”

Each javelin was of the size of a palm tree in diameter; each party of executioners comprised fifty in number. One group went from the chest towards the head causing severe pains by lacerating with javelins all their way. The other group made their way towards the feet from the chest in like manner. Each party took 500 years to reach the head or to the feet, or one thousand years to make a complete round trip when the two groups come together again at the chest.)

“Evil Mara .... I had to suffer tormentation in that Great Hell for hundreds of thousands of years, and on being released, I had to pass through a sub-section of that hell, named Ussāda, where I was subjected to punishment more severe than in the Great Hell, for ten thousand years before the final release.

Evil Māra .... I had the body of human beings and the head of fish throughout the term of tormentation in that Hell (The head of man is round and on it the javelins are liable to slip off whereas the head of fish is long and flat and serves as a good target.”

After recounting the events of the past, Venerable Mahā Moggallāna proceeded to preach the Māra in twenty one stanzas to make him repent his own follies:

(a) “The hell where Dusi Māra was punished for offending the Arahāt Vidhūra, the disciple of the Buddha, as well as the Buddha Himself has the nature of being tormented by piercing with iron javelins; these javelins will give punishment automatically, even without executioners.

Evil Māra .... You are liable to be tormented in such a hell for offending the disciple of the Buddha, who has understood the cause and effect of any deed.

(b) There are certain abodes situated in the middle of the ocean. They have the pleasant appearance of gems with brilliant colours. A great number of celestial maidens can be seen singing and dancing in those abodes.

Evil Māra .... you have offended the chief disciple of the Buddha, who is fully aware of these abodes, pleasures enjoyed by those celestial maids, and causal conditions of those pleasures.

- (c) That bhikkhu had caused the Pabbayon monastery, donated by Visākhā, mother of the rich man Migara, to be shaken, even while being watched by the company of Sangha at the instance of the Buddha.

Evil Māra .... you will have to suffer the consequences of your offence against the bhikkhu accomplished in abhiññā and paññā.

- (d) That bhikkhu had caused the Sakka's Vejayanta palace to be shaken with his big toe, with the aid of his supernormal power, thereby frightening all the devas.

Evil Māra .... you will have to suffer the consequences of your offence against the bhikkhu accomplished in abhiññā and paññā.

- (e) That Bhikkhu had gone to the Vejayanta palace of Sakka and asked him this question: "Sakka.. do you know the fact of emancipation that is void of all forms of desires?" Sakka, on being asked thus gave the right answer.

Stupid Māra .... you will have to suffer the consequences of your offence against a disciple of the Buddha, who is accomplished in abhiññā and paññā which enabled him to ask such a question.

- (f) That bhikkhu had asked the Brahmā a question near the Sudhamma Dhamma Hall: 'Dear lay devotee... are you still of the erroneous view that there is no powerful bhikkhu or recluse capable of coming to the realms of the Brahmās? Have you ever seen the overwhelming rays of the Buddha that excel those of the illuminations of the Brahmās, of their mansions and of their costumes?'

The Brahmā answered: 'I no longer hold the old erroneous views. I see the rays of the Buddha that surpass the illuminations of the Brahmās and of their mansions and of their costumes. Why should I insist anymore that I am permanent, or an immortal being?'

Evil Mara ....you will have to suffer the consequence of the offence against the disciple of the Buddha, who is accomplished in abhiññā and paññā which enabled him to ask such questions.

- (g) That bhikkhu had contacted, through abhiññā based on vimokkha-jhāna, the summit of the Mahā Meru and the four islands continents, East, West, South and North, at the time of suppressing the dragon King, Nandopananda: (the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna had covered the Mahā Meru and the four islands continents through the agency of a created dragon at that time).

Evil Mara .... you will have to suffer the consequences of your offence against the disciple of the Buddha, who is accomplished in abhiññā and paññā which enabled him to ask such questions."

(N.B In dealing with the Māra, the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna was referring to himself as if he was another bhikkhu, and such a mode of preaching is termed Annapadesa method.

The Venerable Mahā Moggallāna managed to subdue Mara by exhibition of his supernormal power (abhiññā) in seven ways from (a) to (g):

- (a) with reference to Māratajjaniya Sutta of Mūlapaṇṇāsa Pāli Text;
- (b) with reference to his supernormal power to go on tours of preaching as in Vimāna Vatthu and Peta Vatthu.
- (c) with reference to exposition of Mahā Moggallāna Sutta in Mahā Vagga Saṃyutta Pāli Text.
- (d) & (e) with reference to Culatanhāsāṅkhaya Sutta of Mūlapaṇṇāsa Pāli Text.
- (f) with reference to Aññatara Brahma Sutta of Sagātha Vagga Saṃyutta.
- (g) with reference to Visuddhi Magga Commentary, Second Vol., on the suppression of the dragon King, Nandopananda.

- (h) Fire does not make any effort to burn the foolish person. It is the foolish person who gets himself burnt by touching the fire. Just as the foolish person gets himself burnt by touching the fire, so will you be causing to be burnt yourself by offending the Buddha.
- (i) Māra .... you have done sinful act by offending the Chief Disciple of the Buddha. Do you fancy that your sinful act will not produce any fitting result?
- (j) Evil Mara .... The amount of unwholesome acts standing against you increases with the progress of time. Evil Māra .... have you not got tired of doing harm to the Buddha? (you should have taken lesson from the evil acts of your uncle Dusi Mara who had to suffer in realms of misery. You should at once cease your acts of harm to the disciples of the Buddha.

The Venerable Mahā Moggallāna thus exhorted the Māra, citing examples, so as to repent his follies and dread the consequences for a long period, in the forest sanctuary of Bhesakala, with the result that Mara, with a heavy heart, disappeared on the spot.

An Account of The Lay Devotee Brahmin Pancagga

After observing the eighth vassa and emancipating sentient beings, who were worthy of emancipation, by teaching Bodhi Raja Kumar Sutta and other discourses in the Bhesakala forest sanctuary, near the town of Susumaragira, the Buddha left for Savatthi to take up residence in the Jetavana Monastery.

There was a brahmin lay devotee by the name of Pancagga Dayaka. He was so named because of his habit of offering five kinds of stuff that came first and foremost in the process of production: (1) first ears of grains from his fields; (2) the first harvested grain; (3) the grain stored first in a granary (4) the cooked meal from the first pot (5) the first stuff laid on the breakfast table. (Pañca - five earliest products or stuff, and dāyakā - donor, hence Pañcagga-dāyakā). The following is an illustration:-

- i) He used to offer the first ears of corns, barley or oats from his fields to the Buddha and His Sangha in the form of gruel prepared with milk, in the belief that offering the first products will yield early benefits. This is the offering made of the first crop from the field.
- ii) When the grain was mature and ripened, he had the grains put in a heap after threshing and winnowing and prepared them into meals and offered them first to the Buddha and His Sangha. This is the offering made of the grains from the first heap of the harvest.
- iii) After storing the harvested crops in many granaries, when the first granary was opened, he had some grains from the first lot taken out and prepared them as meals for offering to the Buddha and His Sangha. This is the offering made of the grains from the first granary.
- iv) The cooked food collected from each and every cooking pot was first offered to the bhikkhus. Until such an offering had been made to the Sangha, no one was permitted to partake of the food from the pots. This is the first offering made from the cooking pots.
- v) He never take his breakfast before collecting certain amount for offering to the Buddha and His Sangha in the morning, and in the afternoon he collected certain amount from his dining table for offering to beggars, in whose absence, the collected food stuff was given to dogs. This is the offering made before he ever took his meals.

Thus he came to be known as Pañcagga-dāyakā, one who made offerings on five kinds of first occasions.

One early morning, the Buddha looked into the world by means of asayanusaya-ñāna and indriya-propriya-ñāna and perceived the previous supporting conditions of pañcagga-dāyakā and his wife to be established in the sotāpatti-magga, and so He had Himself tidied up and remained in His own chamber, on that particular morning.

(All the bhikkhus in the monastery used to assemble at the Chamber of the Buddha at the time of going for alms-round every morning. They always went for receiving alms in the town with the Buddha leading. But the Buddha used to remain in the Chamber behind closed doors whenever He wanted to go all alone. On such occasions, bhikkhus went on alms-round all by themselves after circumambulating the Scented Chamber with tacit understanding that the Buddha would not go with them for reason known to Himself.)

On that day the Buddha remained in His Chamber, behind closed doors, at the time of going for receiving food. He came out only when it was time for pañcagga-dāyakā to have his meal.

He entered the city of Savatthi all by Himself, and the citizens knew that someone would be blessed by Him that day. They did not come out as usual to invite Him for alms-offering.

The Buddha went along the route from door to door, and stopped at the door of Pañcagga-dāyakā at the time when the Brahmin was holding a bowl of food to be eaten and his wife was in a state of preparedness to fan her husband while enjoying the food. His wife was the first person to notice the Buddha standing in front of their house. She tried to keep the Buddha out of sight of her husband by keeping the fan in between the Buddha and her husband. She knew that if her husband saw the Buddha, he would offer all the food in his bowl to the Buddha, thereby requiring her to make fresh preparation of food for her husband. At the same time, she was assailed with confusion and irreverence. The Buddha knew all about it and directed the rays from His body towards the couple. When the husband saw the golden coloured rays, he asked her: "What's all this?" and he looked around and eventually saw the Buddha standing at the door of the house. Whereupon, the wife dropped the fan and hastened to the Buddha and paid homage and worshipped Him, in accordance with the time honoured traditional way. The Buddha uttered a stanza in praise of her while she was in the act of standing up, as warranted by the favourable circumstance:

*Sabbaso Nāmarūpasamiṃ
Yassa natṭhi mamāyitam asatā ca na socati
sa ve bhikkhūti vuccati.*

One who has cut off clinging to mental and corporeal elements (nāma-rūpa) without holding the erroneous views of 'I' or 'my own' and 'he' or 'she' is free from sorrow and lamentation. Because of cessation of nāma and rūpa, he has penetrated the dark mass of defilements and deserves to be regarded as a holy, noble bhikkhu.

The wife of the Brahmin was established in the Fruition stage of soṭāpanna at the conclusion of this discourse.

The Buddha was invited by the Brahmin into his house and offered a seat. He then offered Him his share of the food, pouring water as a token of dedicating food to the Blessed One, saying: "Most Exalted Buddha, you are the most Homage-worthy personage in the world with devas and humans. May you receive my offer of food by the alms bowl." The Blessed One fulfilled his request by receiving the food offered in His bowl and partaking it. The Blessed One then uttered the following stanza after His meal, noting that the time was appropriate.

*Yadaggato majihato sesato vā
piṇḍam labhetha paradathepajivī nalam thulum no be nipaccvādi tam vāpi mira muni vedayantu*

A bhikkhu lives on food enthusiastically offered by donors, either from the first portion or the middle portion or the last portion of the pot, as a normal means of livelihood. A bhikkhu gratefully does accept the food regardless of which part of the pot that morsel of food comes from. He is not over pleased to receive the first portion of food nor is he disturbed by being offered the leftovers. He has abandoned the likes and dislike. Such a person, who is regarded only by wise people as one who has eradicated the āsavas, is indifferent to the world and worldly incidents.

Pañcagga-dāyakā attained the Fruition stage of sotāpatti at the conclusion of the discourse.

(These are excerpts from Sutta Nipata Commentary, exposition on Muni Sutta, which is not in agreement with exposition in Dhammapada Commentary).

Buddha's First Visit to Sihala Island

(An account of the Buddha three visits to the Island of Sihala (Sri Lanka), in abridged form, as mentioned in Mahāvamsa, Vol. I.)

The Buddha observed the first vassa after attainment of Buddhahood in Isipatana, Migadaya, near Bārāṇasī. From thence, he proceeded to the forest of Uruvelā to emancipate the hermit Uruvelā by exhibition of miracles. At that time, the citizens of Anga and Magadha were going to pay their annual homage to the hermit with gifts. The hermit did not wish the Buddha to come to the great festival of offering. His thoughts were known to the Blessed One. So on that very day the Buddha went to Uttaraguru island to receive offering of food, and from thence He returned to the Anotatta lake to have His meal, and at night-fall (ninth month of Enlightenment) He went on to Sihala island.

His visit coincided with the conference of ogres held at a spot, which is the location of the garden of Mahānagavana of today, measuring three yojanas in length by one yojana in breadth in the central part of the island, along the shore of a river. The Buddha went to the place where the ogres were holding conference and while standing directly above their heads, on the spot where the Mahīyaṅgana Ceti stood today, caused heavy rain to fall and strong winds to blow and darkness to descend to frighten them.

Ogres were very much frightened and they beseeched the Buddha to grant them a place of refuge, free from danger. The Buddha consoled them by telling them that He would relieve them of their anxieties and troubles, if He was offered a place on the island to stay. Whereupon, they replied: “Lord of peace and tranquillity... we hereby offer You this very spot and we beseech You to give refuge to all our race on this island.”

The Buddha restored peace and calmed the fears of the ogres by causing the rain, storm and black-out to cease and descended to the earth and spreading a leather rug, sat on it. When the Buddha spread the leather-rug over the place, ogres ran away to escape from the unbearable heat emanating from the blazing carpet and took refuge in remote areas of the island. The Buddha caused the island of Giridīpa to come close to Sihala to accommodate the restless ogres. Once all the ogres had settled there, He caused the island to move back to its original site.

The blazing leather-rug was removed as soon as the Sihala Island was rid of all ogres. Then all the good devas assembled on the island and held a conference among themselves. The Blessed One preached them the Dhamma with the result that crores of being realized the Four Noble Truths and countless number of devas took refuge in the Three Gems with strong faith.

Buddha gave a Handful of Hair to Mahā Sumana Deva at His Request

Mahā Sumana Deva, a resident of the Sumanakuta Mountain, attained sotāpatti by hearing the Dhamma at the conference, just mentioned above. He requested the Buddha for some memorable object of worship. The Buddha rubbed His head with His fingers to get a handful of hair and gave it to Mahā Sumana Deva. After that, the Buddha returned to Uruvelā forest.

Mahā Sumana Deva brought the handful of hair in a gold casket and kept it at a spot that was strewn with varieties of jewellery; it was where Mahīyaṅgana Ceti is standing today. The gold casket containing the handful of hair was enshrined in a small stupa built of amethyst.

In due course of time, the Venerable Sāriputta's disciple, named Venerable Sarabhu, brought the neck-bone of the Buddha from a pile of sandal-wood fuel by his supernatural power to this place. He sanctified it by enshrining it in the original stupa of smaller dimension and raised its height to twelve cubits, assisted by a company of bhikkhus. The Venerable Sarabhu then returned after reconstruction of the stupa.

Years rolled by and Prince Uddha Culabhaya, younger brother of King Devānapiyatissa rebuilt the old stupa to a height of thirty cubits, enveloping the smaller ceti. Later, King Duṭṭhagamani again reconstructed that stupa making it eighty cubits high. Thus, Mahīyangana Ceti grew to a greater height by successive modification through the years.

Buddha's Visit to Nāgadīpa Island

At a time when the Buddha was residing at Jetavana monastery in Savatthi, during the period of the fifth vassa, there was a battle being fought, involving huge armies for the possession of an emerald throne between Mahodara dragon king and his nephew, Culodara dragon prince. When the Buddha perceived this unhappy state of affairs, He woke up early and taking His robe and alms-bowl, He went to the theatre of war, which was the island of Nāgadīpa, to save the nāgas from destruction.

Mahodara dragon king was a powerful king who claimed sovereignty over the nāga country, with an area of five hundred yojanas in that part of the ocean.

Mahodara dragon king gave away his sister, Kanha, in marriage with another dragon king who was ruling over the Vattamana mountain region. In due time, they produced a son named Culodara.

Culodara's maternal grand mother gave her emerald throne to Culodara's mother before her death. Consequently a war broke out over the possession of the throne between King Mahodara and his nephew Culodara. These inhabitants of the mountain region were also powerful rulers in their own region with their own big army.

There was a dryad, named Samiddhi Sumana Deity, living in a Linlun tree (Buchanania lati folia), near the arched entrance to Jetavana monastery. He accompanied the Blessed One all along the way to Nāgadīpa Island, carrying the Linlun tree as an umbrella, to protect the Blessed One from weather, with the permission of the Blessed One.

This will be further clarified: Samiddhi Sumana Deity was a human being living in Nāgadīpa Island in his previous existence. Once, he noticed a Paccekabuddha having His meal at the spot where Rajayatana Ceti (popularly known as Linlun ceti) is standing today. He offered the Paccekabuddha, out of reverence, a bunch of branches for use in washing and cleaning the bowl after His meal.

For this deed of merit, he became a dryad of the Linlun tree near the arched entrance to the garden of Jetavana, owned by Prince Jeta. The Linlun tree stood outside the monastery since the time of its construction.

The Buddha had brought Sumiddhi Sumana Deity together with the Linlun tree was for his own benefit and in the interest of the Island.

The Buddha, on arrival at the Island, sat in the middle of the site of war in the sky and caused complete darkness in the area to frighten the combatants in the battle. Then He caused the area to become bright and clear again to relieve the dragons of fear and anxiety. The dragons, on seeing Him, felt happy and rallied around Him and worshipped at His feet with profound respect.

When the Buddha preached them the Dhamma in the interest of peace and tranquillity, the two rival dragon kings were very much delighted and interested in the preaching, so much so that they made an offering of the emerald throne to Him by their mutual agreement.

Then the Buddha came down and sat on the throne and partook of the delicious food offered by the nāgas and preached to them the Dhamma again, with the result that eighty crores of nāgas, both of land and water, took refuge on the Three Gems with great faith.

Buddha's Second Visit to Sihala Island

(A Request by Dragon King, Maniakkhika)

Maniakkhika, the dragon king of Kalayani region, a maternal uncle of Mahodara, also had arrived at Nagadipa Naga King Island to take part in the raging war. He had already taken refuge in the Three Gems at the time of the Buddha's first visit to the Sihala Island. He made a solemn request to the Buddha: "Exalted Lord... you have, indeed, done a great deed of kindness to us by your exhortations. Had you not come to this place, we would have, by now, been reduced to ashes. Our ardent wish is that, out of compassion, you do an honour to the place of my dwelling, Kalayani, by your visit when you come to the Island of Sihala on the next occasion."

The Buddha kept silent to signify His acceptance of the invitation.

Then the Blessed One urged them to build Rājayatana Ceti on that spot as a memorial to the happy occasion. He presented the Linlun tree and returned the emerald throne with instructions to hold them as sacred objects of veneration.

"Dragon lords.. these two objects should be held in high reverence as relics of my utensils, (Paribhoga Ceti) in your own interest and for your continued prosperity."

The Buddha, after leaving those instructions, returned to Jetavana monastery of Savatthi.

These events marked the second visit to the Island of Sihala by the Buddha.

Buddha's Third Visit to Sihala Island

Three years later, Maniakkhika, the dragon king, went to Savatthi to invite the Buddha cordially to Sihala Island, while He was taking up residence at Jetavana monastery.

It was on a full moon day of Kasson (Vesakha), during the eighth year of Buddha's attainment to Buddhahood (and one day after Maniakkhika's arrival). The Buddha, on being informed of time for meal, put on His robe and went across to Sihala, together with five hundred bhikkhus.

Dragon King Maniakkhika, accompanied by his dragons, conducted the Buddha and His bhikkhus to a jewelled pandal near the site where Kalayani ceti is now situated and offered delicious food of the celestial world to Him and His bhikkhus with profound respect.

After preaching to Maniakkhika and all the dragons, the Buddha travelled through the sky to the Sumana hill and left an impression of His foot, in order that future generations might hold it as a sacred place (Pāda ceti). He went to the base of the hill in the company of bhikkhus to spend the day and proceeded to Dighavapi.

During His sojourn at Dighavapi, He and His bhikkhus enjoyed phala-samāpatti on the spot where Dighavapa Ceti is standing today. This is one of the sacred places held in high reverence by the people from the days of yore. From here, the Buddha proceeded to the Garden of Mahā Meghavana.

On arrival at Meghavana garden, together with His five hundred bhikkhus, the Buddha sat and enjoyed phala-samāpatti together with His bhikkhus. On the spot where the Buddha sat, a sapling of original Mahābodhi tree was planted.

From there, they proceeded to the location of Mahāceti and together they enjoyed phala-samāpatti. Rising from this samāpatti, they proceeded to the present location of Thupayon Ceti and enjoyed phala-samāpatti together again.

Rising from this phala-samāpatti, they went to Kyauk Ceti (Stone stupa), which still stands today, and preached the Dhamma to all the devas who happened to be gathered there at that time. After which, together with His five hundred bhikkhus, the Buddha returned to Jetavana monastery.

These events marked the Buddha's third visit to Sihala Island. This is the account of Buddha's three visits to Sihala Island.

Chapter 27

AN ACCOUNT OF RICH MAN GHOSAKA OF KOSAMBĪ COUNTRY.

(This short account of the rich man of Kosambī country has been compiled in the light of Dhammapada Atthakatha, Vol. I and Ankuttara Atthakatha, Vol. I, where full accounts are given.)

Prior to the appearance of the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha, a deadly infectious disease (ahivataka) broke out in the country of Allakappa, and the toll of this plague ranged anything from ten to twenty in a family at a time. Those who evacuated to the other countries escaped death. One of the citizens left Allakappa together with his wife and a baby son. But they suffered from shortage of food in the middle of crossing a barren land and were in a state of exhaustion. The parents took turns to carry the baby for some time.

The husband was of the idea that crossing the desert would not be possible with an extra load of the baby on their shoulder. So he kept himself a bit behind the wife by slowing down his speed as though pressed by the call of nature. He placed the child on the ground in a sitting posture and resumed his journey. When the wife did not see her son in his hands, she enquired about the child, asking: "My lord... where is my kiddy?" The husband replied: "What good could he do for us under such a condition of stress and strain. We could produce many children so long as we are alive!" The wife screamed in anger: "Such a brute you are .... I will not go along with a cruel person like you." The husband confessed his inconsiderate act and apologized to her: "Please pardon me for my fault." They continued their journey again after picking up the child.

The fatigued couple, with the load of a baby, managed to cross the sandy plain with great difficulty. By evening, they reached the hut of cowherds; who had cooked rice with pure milk for their own enjoyment. When they saw the couple and the child, they at once realized that the strangers were hunger-stricken, and offered them a big pot full of rich milk gruel. The wife was moderate in eating and so she ate just the right measure of food while the greedy husband ate very much, beyond his limit, so much so, that he died of indigestion the next morning. As he was very much attached to the people in the cowherds hut before his death, he took conception in the womb of a bitch.

The bitch gave birth to a lovely puppy in due time. It was well looked after by the cowherd as though it was his own child. The two were very much attached to each other and the puppy followed the cowherd wherever he went.

One morning, a Paccekabuddha stopped at the door of the cowherd to receive alms-food. The cowherd paid respect and offered food and requested the Paccekabuddha to stay and he (cowherd) would provide Him the requisites. The Paccekabuddha took up residence in a grove not far from his dwelling. The cowherd used to take the puppy along with him whenever he went to visit the Paccekabuddha. He used to strike the boulders and dry stumps with a stout staff, en route to the dwelling of the Paccekabuddha, to frighten away the beasts of prey. The puppy took careful note of his master's activities.

On one occasion, the cowherd made it plain to the Paccekabuddha that he might not attend on Him personally everyday for one reason or other. He assured the Paccekabuddha that the little dog would come to His dwelling to accompany Him to and from his hut, on his behalf, in case of his failure to do it himself.

One day, the cowherd sent his little dog to accompany the Paccekabuddha from the forest to his hut. The little dog went there, and, on arrival, lied with its belly stretched at the feet of the Paccekabuddha. The Paccekabuddha realized that the little dog was sent to fetch him. Hence, He took His robe and alms bowl. Being desirous of testing the intelligence of the dog, He deliberately went in a wrong direction. Whereupon, the little dog went in front of Him and blocked His way. It gave way only when the Paccekabuddha resumed the right direction. He barked aloud at the same spots where his master used to strike the boulders and dried stumps with a stout staff to frighten away the beasts of prey.

The Paccekabuddha used to give it a big lump of food out of His own bowl every day. The dog was very much attached to the Paccekabuddha for showing such kindness to him.

At the end of the vassa, the cowherd offered a piece of cloth to the Paccekabuddha for making robes and said: “Reverend Sir... the vassa has come to a close and I would leave it to You to stay on at the same place or go to any place of Your own choice, as please You.” As the Paccekabuddha appeared to have a desire to leave for another place, the cowherd accompanied Him to a certain distance and returned to his hut. When the little dog discovered that the Paccekabuddha had left for good, it died of broken hearted and was reborn in the deva realm of Tāvatiṃsa.

He was endowed with a voice that excelled that of the other devas of the celestial world, as a reward for barking aloud and frightening the beasts of prey as he passed through forest in the company of the Paccekabuddha in his previous existence. It was therefore known as Ghosaka Deva for having a voice that covered the whole of deva realm.

While Ghosaka Deva was enjoying the luxurious life of a deva in Tāvatiṃsa, Udena was the King of Kosambī country, in the world of humans. (Life of Udena has been dealt with elsewhere in this treatise).

Then Ghosaka Deva died and was conceived in the womb of a courtesan in Kosambī, during the reign of Udena. When the courtesan came to know that she had given birth to a son, she had the newly born babe cast on the garbage dump.

One of the supervisors of workmen, in the employment of the rich man of Kosambī, noticed the child in the middle of a flock of crows, on his way to his master's house. He was impressed by the look of the lovely child and thought there was a bright future for the child. Therefore, he picked up the baby and sent him to his house, under the care of one of his workmen while he continued his way to his master's house.

On that morning, the rich man of Kosambī met a wise man on his way to the palace of the King Udena. The rich man asked the wise man: “Master ... have you studied the astrological signs of the stars and their trend?” The astrologer examined the movements and behaviour of the planets on the spot and replied: “Anyone born today is destined to become the rich man of Kosambī, as he is born in conjunction with such and such stars and planets.”

On hearing the predictions of the astrologer, the rich man of Kosambī turned to his attendants and gave instructions: “My dear men ... the predictions of this wise man are always axiomatic and determinate. My wife is an expectant mother, and, you better go to my house and find out if she has given birth to a child.” The attendants rushed to his house and hurried back to tell him that his wife has not yet given birth to a child. He sent his men out again to find if there is any child born in the city on this day.

The attendants went all over the town to find out if there was any child born on that day. They discovered that there was a newly born babe in the house of his own labour supervisor. When this was brought to his notice, the rich man sent for the supervisor, and on his arrival, asked a few questions.

Rich man: Is it true that there is a baby in your house who is born today?

Supervisor: Yes... master.

Rich man: Give me that child.

Supervisor: I can't give... master.

Rich man: Take one thousand pieces of money in exchange for the baby!

The labour supervisor tried to speculate mentally: “This baby may or may not live long, the question of life and death is beyond my power of decision.” In view of this matter of uncertainty, he decided to accept the money in exchange for the baby.

The rich man conceived an idea: “Should my wife give birth to a girl, he would be treated as my own son; should she give birth to a boy, he would be killed.” After a few days, the wife of the rich man gave birth to a boy.

Brutal Acts of The Rich Man of Kosambī

- (1) He thought of placing the adopted son (Ghosaka, son of a courtesan) in the cow-shed to be killed by the treading of oxen. He accordingly asked his servants to place the kid at the gate of the cowshed. The boy was placed at the exit of the cow-shed, as instructed by the rich man.

A big bull, the chief of the herd was the first to come out of the compound and finding the baby lying helplessly on the ground, it shielded him, by standing over him with its four legs placed around him like a fence, from the imminent danger of being trodden by other oxen. On seeing Ghosaka, the cowherds expressed their opinion among themselves: “This child must be a favoured child of fortune, even animals seem to know his attributes” and so they took him to their house to be looked after by them with mutual consent.

- (2) The rich man enquired as to the fate of the baby and was told that he was safe, under the care of the cowherds. He regained possession of baby by giving the cowherds one thousand pieces of money in exchange for him. He then commanded his men to throw away the baby at the cemetery.

The baby was abandoned in the cemetery at a time when the rich man's goat-herd was tending a herd of goats there. A milking she-goat caught sight of the baby, she left the herd and kept herself in such a posture as to afford an opportunity for the baby to suck her milk. She left the baby only after feeding him in the manner just described. On departure from the pasture in the evening, she went again to feed the baby again, in the same manner. The goat-herd's attention was drawn by the strange movements of that she-goat on that day, and saw for himself that the she-goat was feeding the baby as if it was her own kid. The goat-herd thought to himself: “This baby must be a favoured child of fortune, even animals seem to know his attributes,” and so he brought the baby to be looked after in his own house.

- (3) On the next morning, the rich man sent his men to find out what had happened to the baby. When he was told that the baby was safe under the care of a goat-herd, he sent his men to redeem the baby in exchange for one thousand pieces of money and commanded them to place the baby on the cart-track, in the busy part of the town, so that he might be killed by being trodden by the carts of a trader on the following day.

His servants did as they were told. A train of carts came into the town as expected but the oxen that drew the first cart saw the baby in their track, so they stood still with their legs fixed like four pillars. The leader of the trade band saw the strange spectacle and was greatly moved by it, so much so that he picked up the baby to be looked after by himself, as the baby appeared to be a favoured child of fortune with a bright future.

- (4) The rich man sent out his men to find out if the baby had been killed, by being trodden by the carts of the trader, and when told that the boy was safe under the care of the leader of the trade band. He again asked them to redeem the child in exchange for one thousand pieces of money and to throw the baby down a steep cliff at a distance from the town.

The baby was thrown upside down by the servants, but the child fell right on top of a work-shop of those who manufactured mats from reeds. The mats made of reeds proved to be as soft as cotton that had been ginned a thousand times due to his deeds of merits in the past. The leading workman opined that the baby was a favoured child of fortune with a bright future, and so he brought the child to his house for adoption.

- (5) The rich man sent out his men again to enquire into the state of the child. When he came to know all about the baby, he asked his servants to recover the baby in exchange for one thousand pieces of money, and to bring him to his house.

In due course of time, the rich man's own son and Ghosaka came of age. The rich man again made a plot to kill the lad in conspiracy with his trusted potter. He therefore went to the potter and confided to him that there was a stupid son in his house whom he wanted to do away with secretly by hook or by crook. The potter said: "O rich man... you shouldn't have uttered such a speech, a speech full of sin."

The rich man thought that the potter would not do anything for nothing, and so he paid him one thousand pieces of money to make him yield to his persuasions. He was successful because there is no one who will not be corrupted by bribery. The potter accepted the money and told the rich man: "I will arrange for the pot-kilns to be kept ready on such a such a day, and you might send the boy to me on that date of appointment."

The rich man kept on marking time and on the day of appointment, he asked the youth Ghosaka: "My dear son, I require many pots and I have arranged with our potter to supply them by certain date, you might go now to the potter and ask him to do as he was bid by me, without any delay." Ghosaka replied: "Very well," and left the house.

One's Own Malice brings about One's Own Ruin

On seeing Ghosaka on the road, the rich man's own son came running to him and asked for help: "Elder brother .... I've lost many marbles while playing a game with my play-mates. I do pray that you try to recover the loss I've sustained." Whereupon, Ghosaka said: "I can't do it now, because our father has sent me on an errand." The rich man's own son made another request: "If so, just play for me and recover the lost balls. I will go on the errand on your behalf." Whereupon, Ghosaka said: "In that case, you might go to the potter's place and convey the message of your father to the potter in minute detail while I play with the boys to recover the marbles you lost to them."

The rich man's son went and conveyed his father's message to the potter, on behalf of Ghosaka as agreed. The potter said he would carry out his father's orders. He took the boy into his house and hacked him into pieces with an axe and put the pieces of the dead boy's body into a mud pot which was later kept along with unbaked mud-pots in the kiln.

Ghosaka lad had won quite a lot of marbles and waited for the return of his younger brother for a time. When the younger boy failed to turn up, he went to the neighbourhood of the potter's place to look for him and returned home when no trace of his younger brother could be found.

The rich man was astonished to see the return of Ghosaka at a distance and was at a loss to know what had happened. He got up before Ghosaka could even take a seat to explain the matter. "Dear son... did you not go to the potter's place?" The youth replied: "No, father, I didn't go." He asked him again: "Why did you not go?" The youth explained the reason why he did not go and why the younger brother went there on his behalf, in detail.

The rich man felt as if he was reeling under the weight of the great earth and scolded him: "My dear son, .... what do you mean by that?" and so saying he hurried to the place of the potter with a greatly agitated mind. When he got to the house of the potter, he could not breathe out full facts of the tragedy and so he simply uttered: "Look .. my man, look my man." But the potter gave him a stiff reply: "Rich man ... what do you mean by that... when it is too late!" The rich man had to return home without any further ado. He was reduced to a mental wreck from that time.

- (6) The rich man of Kosambī did not take meal together with Ghosaka from that time onwards, and deliberated as to how to do away with his son's rival. He wrote a note and asked Ghosaka to deliver it to one of his labour supervisors at a certain village and to tell him verbally that the contents of the note must be translated into action at once. He also instructed the lad to contact one of his boyhood friend, a rich man of Gamaka, and stop at his home for the meals en route to his destination. Ghosaka lad had come of age by that time.

Ghosaka paid respect to the rich man. On arrival at the village of Gamaka, he found his way to the rich man's house and stood worshipping in front of him. The local rich man was shaving his beard by the side of a window. When he noticed the lad, he asked: "Young man from where have you come?" He replied with due respect: "Father .... I am the son of rich man of Kosambī." The Gamaka rich man was delighted to see the son of his boyhood friend.

By that time, one of the maids of the daughter of the rich man was on her way to the market to fetch some flowers for her mistress. She was stopped by the rich man who asked her: "Maid... tarry a little, you might wash and brush the feet of this Ghosaka lad and arrange for the provision of bed for him." The maid did as she was bid and then went to the market to fetch some flowers as usual.

On seeing the maid with a collection of flowers, the daughter of the rich man scolded her: "You have loitered on the road today...What on earth had made you take such a long time in fetching the flowers?" Whereupon, the servant girl replied:

"Ahem, Mistress, I've never seen such a beautiful youth before. He is said to be the son of your fathers boyhood friend. It is beyond my power to express his handsomeness and graciousness. Your father had asked me to wash his feet and provide a bed in the middle of my way to the market to fetch flowers for you, hence the delay."

(The daughter of the rich man of Gamaka happened to be the wife of the lad Ghosaka four existences ago. On hearing about the youth, she was assailed by uncontrollable affection for him.)

The daughter of Gamaka rich man, accompanied by her maid, went to the bed-room and found Ghosaka sound asleep. She noticed a note tied to the edge of his waist-cloth and, out of curiosity, detached it quietly and read it. She discovered that the youth had brought a note that would cause his own life. She had it torn into pieces and wrote another one in substitution for the original one, before the lad woke up:

Dear Labour Supervisor... I am sending my son to you. My boyhood friend, Gamaka, the rich man, has a daughter who has attained the age of puberty. I want you to collect all the yields accrued from our own estates and regroup them into lots of one hundred each kind for presentation at the matrimonial ceremony between the daughter of Gamaka rich man and my own son, and I wish you to act as my duly accredited representative on that happy occasion.

I also wish you to give me an account of the matrimonial ceremony with a statement of expenditure incurred in connection with the marriage, in due course.

Kosambī Rich man
Kosambī Country

She had the fresh note nicely stamped with a fabricated seal and tied it to the edge of the waist-cloth of the lad as though nothing untoward had happened to it during his sound sleep.

Ghosaka lad spent for a day in that house and resumed his journey after taking leave from the rich man. On arrival at the place of the labour supervisor, he promptly handed over the note with the information that the contents of the note should be translated into action at once. The labour supervisor, after reading the note, summoned all the villagers and addressed the gathering: "My dear men .... although you do not seem to care much about me, my own master, the rich man of Kosambī, has entrusted me with the responsibility of arranging, on his behalf, a matrimonial ceremony for his son, Ghosaka, and the daughter of Gamaka rich man. It connoted that, all the products issued from this area should be collected and grouped into lots of one hundred each kind for presentation to the couple as his gifts.

When everything was set, he arranged for the matrimonial ceremony to be performed in a traditional manner and sent a report to the rich man of Kosambī, to the effect that the matrimonial ceremony had been conducted and that everything had been done in compliance with his instructions, with a detailed statement of accounts attached thereto.

On hearing the news, the rich man of Kosambī felt like one suffering from burns and uttered: “Alas! I have been ruined beyond redemption.” He suffered both from physical and mental agony and was eventually attacked with acute dysentery, and, yet he had not given up the idea of denying the estate to Ghosaka lad by hook or by crook. He, therefore, wrote a note with ulterior motive and sent it to the lad. The note reads: “Why have you, my son, stayed there long after your marriage. I want you to come back home urgently.”

Upon receipt of the letter, simple minded Ghosaka made preparations for the return journey. The daughter of Ghamaka rich man perceived that the simpleton Ghosaka never knew that it was she who was responsible for his present luxurious life. So, she tried to detain him by her own clever tactics. She convinced him by saying: “My dear man... don't be so hasty. One should make necessary arrangements before one goes to the place of one's relatives.” She had thus delayed his early departure for good reasons.

The rich man of Kosambī, with an undaunted will, sent another note stating that he had broken down in health through acute attack of deadly dysentery and that he is in a state of hopelessness and the situation warranted his immediate return.

The daughter of Ghamaka rich man could not help revealing, by that time, the true aspects connected with their union and other things at stake.

“My dear man .... rich man of Kosambī is not your own father, though you have all along regarded him as your father. He had sent you to his labour supervisor with a note containing express instructions to kill you right away. I personally destroyed that fateful note and got it substituted by a fresh one of my own design that brought about our union. He did not call you for nothing but to expose that you are not his successor. You should wait until his death.”

Soon afterwards rumour that “Kosambī rich man had died” was afloat and the couple made preparations to go there with attendants. The intelligent wife warned her husband to enter the building with great caution and to post escorts around the house before hand. She accompanied her husband as he entered the house, raising her hands and crying as if lamenting. She found her way to the rich man who was lying in a dark corner and struck his chest with her head, as if in great sorrow sending the dying man already weak with ailment to an early death.

After the cremation of the corporeal relics (sarīrajāpana) of the rich man of Kosambī, Ghosaka induced, by generous bribing, the intimate servants of the deceased to tell outsiders that he was the son of the late old man.

Title of Rich Man of Kosambī.

Seven days after the death of the rich man of Kosambī, King Udena considered that he had to find a person to succeed him, one with desirable qualifications to earn the title “The Rich Man of Kosambī”. He ordered his royal servants to find out if the late rich man had a son or not. All the intimate servants of the late rich man unanimously reported that he had a son by the name of Ghosaka, who was worthy of succeeding his father.

King Udena conferred the title of “The Rich Man of Kosambī” on Ghosaka complete with insignia of office.

When Ghosaka became the rich man of Kosambī, his wise and intelligent wife said: “My dear lord ... although we were of lowly origins, we have become great and glorious by virtue of our meritorious deeds of the past, and let us, therefore, try and keep it up by performing meritorious deeds with redoubled zeal and enthusiasm.” Her husband readily accepted her good proposals, and the couple mutually agreed to spend one thousand pieces of money every day in humanitarian acts (nibaddha-dāna), without any breach or breakage throughout their lives.

THE GREAT CHRONICLE OF BUDDHAS
THE BUDDHA'S NINTH VASSA AT KOSAMBĪ

There were three distinguished rich men in Kosambī country before the time of the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha. They were Ghosaka, Kukkudha, and Pavarika who were boyhood friends. They looked upon five hundred hermits as their teachers (in the absence of a Buddha) and looked after them well. All the hermits used to take up residence at Kosambī during the raining season, which lasted for four months, and retreated to the forests of Himalayas in summer and winter seasons, lasting eight months.

Years rolled by, and one day, the hermits felt exhausted after crossing a vast barren land without water on their way from the Himalayas to Kosambī. They eventually came upon a huge banyan tree and naturally entertained the hope that “from the look of the banyan tree, there should be a guardian deity powerful enough to provide them with water.”

The guardian deity of the banyan tree thought it would be well to fulfil the need of the hermits, and he caused a stream of water, about six inches in volume, to flow from the fork of his tree. When the hermits saw the silvery water, they received it with their cups and quenched their thirst. After quenching their thirst, they began to think that it would be a good thing if the guardian deity could also provide them with food, since they happened to be in the thick of a forest far away from the villages. Whereupon, the guardian deity offered them celestial gruel which was suitable for the hermits.

The hermits thought, since the guardian deity had provided them with food and water, they now had a desire to see him in person. The hermits asked him: “O deva ... you are enjoying such pleasure; therefore, we wonder what kind of deeds of merit you had done in your previous existence?” The deity replied: “I had observed the Eight Precepts for half a day in my previous existence.”

This will be further explained: This guardian deity of the banyan tree was one of the servants of Anāthapiṇḍika in his previous life. It was customary amongst the occupants of the house of Anāthapiṇḍika that everyone should observe the precepts on every holy day. One early morning (of a holy day) a workman was required to go to the place of work to perform his duties. When Anāthapiṇḍika took a list of the recipients of food for that day, he discovered that the work man was the only one who had gone to the forest for work that day. So he allowed the cook to draw food for the evening, just enough for that workman. The cooking woman drew the allotted ration and kept it ready prepared for him. On his return, the cook gave him his share of food which was reserved for him.

When the workman found that the whole house was unusually quiet that day, he enquired about the unusual silence and the empty messing room from the cook. “All the occupants of the house are observing precepts, it being a holy day” was her reply. He asked her again: “Is it true .... mother?” She nodded her head, saying: “Yes, it is.” “Dear mother .... please enquire from the rich man if one could keep precepts for the remaining part of the day.”

The cook obliged him by putting his question to the rich man, who replied: “It tantamount to keeping observance of precepts for half a day but not for a full day ”

On hearing the words of the rich man, the work man washed his mouth and made formal vow to observe precepts and went to his place and kept the precept till he fell asleep. He died of exhaustion on the following morning and was reborn as a guardian deity of a huge banyan tree on the fringe of a forest.

On hearing the full account of his previous existence, the hermits asked the deity: “You have said about the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha .... which we have never heard before. Is it true that a fully Self-Enlightened Buddha has appeared?” When the deity answered in the affirmative, the hermits asked: “Where is that Buddha residing at present?” The deity said: “The Tathāgata has been residing at the Jetavana monastery in the Savatthi country.”

The hermits left, saying: “Dear deity of the banyan tree... we are going to pay homage to the Buddha,” and they arrived at Kosambī en route to Savatthi. The three rich men extended cordial reception to the hermits and invited them to receive food on the following morning. There was a feasting festival on a grand scale on that day.

As soon as they had taken meal, the hermits said as a token of courtesy: “We are going ....” Surprised by such words, the rich men asked: “Revered Sirs .... it is quite unusual that you uttered such words when you have stayed only for a day on this occasion, though you usually stayed for one, two, three or four months on the previous occasions; we pray that you enlighten us the reason why you depart so early in the day?” Whereupon, the hermits replied: “Rich men... you have, indeed, said the truth: The Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha has appeared already, and death is a matter of certainty, though we know not how and when? Therefore, we are in great haste to the Buddha.” The rich men asked for permission to go along with the them.

The hermits said a few words of encouragement in response to their request: “You might stay behind and come afterwards as you all are saddled with worldly affairs that restrict your movements. We will go ahead of you.” They left Kosambī and found their way to Savatthi without stopping too long on the way. On their arrival at Savatthi, they went immediately to the Buddha who fed them with sweet Elixir of Dhamma. The hermits attained arahattaship through Path-knowledge acquired by hearing the preaching of the Buddha.

Three Rich Men attained Sotāpanna

The three rich men left Kosambī, each with five hundred carts fully loaded with gifts of all sorts for offering, and arrived at Savatthi eventually. They stayed at a spot in the vicinity of Jetavana monastery and erected temporary charity booths before they went to pay homage to the Buddha. On their arrival at the feet of the Buddha, they sat at suitable places. The Buddha then preached discourses in harmony with their dispositions, with the result that the three of them attained sotāpanna. They made offerings of gifts on a large scale for fifteen days in succession. They cordially requested the Buddha to do them honour by His visit to Kosambī. The Buddha said in response: “Buddhas naturally prefer places of seclusion!”

They enthusiastically replied: “This is understood... Exalted Lord!” and added: “Kindly honour us by Your visit, on receipt of our formal invitation in due time,” and after making three rounds by the right side of the Buddha, they went their way home, building resting centres at every one yojana's distance between Savatthi and Kosambī. On arrival at Kosambī, they publicised the appearance of the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha, far and wide. Each rich man constructed big monasteries in their own garden lands at great costs, in anticipation of the arrival of the Buddha.

Three monasteries were named after their donors, viz., one donated by Ghosaka as ‘Ghositarama’, one by Kukkudha as ‘Kukkudharama’, one by Pavarika in his mango garden as ‘Pavarikambavana’.

When everything was ready, the three rich men despatched a cordial address of invitation to the Buddha, through a special messenger.

Brahmin Magandhi and His Wife attained Emancipation

The Buddha, on his way to Kosambī, in the company of many bhikkhus, perceived that Brahmin Magandhi and his wife were predestined to attain arahatship. He, therefore, diverted His route from the main road towards the direction of the market-town of Kammasadamma in Kuru country.

Brahmin Magandhi returned early after spending almost all night outside the village in offering lights, according to their custom. On his way to the village to receive food in the morning, the Buddha noticed Magandhi coming from the opposite direction at a distance. He grasped the opportunity of making His presence known to the old Brahmin. On seeing Him, Magandhi thought to himself: “I have all along been looking for my daughter a suitable bridegroom, who is as charming as she is, and assuming the form of a recluse.

This recluse is charming and good looking, He is a match to my daughter.” With this idea, he went back straight to his house.

(There was a link in the chain of Magandhi’s births, being a recluse in one of his existences. Therefore he had a natural inclination towards a recluse.)

Old Magandhi told his wife: “Dear one, I’ve never seen such a recluse before. The one whom I’ve seen has golden colour. He has the appearance of the Great Brahmā. He is really a match to my daughter (Magandhi). Get my daughter Magandhi dressed up hurriedly.” As they were busy with dressing up their daughter, the Buddha had left a pair of foot-prints (Pada ceti) at the spot where He had first seen the old Brahmin, and entered the town to receive alms-food.

— Dhammapada Commentary —

The old Brahmin, his wife and daughter went to the place where he had caught sight of the Buddha, but they could not see Him as He had gone into the village by that time. Old Brahmin grumbled at the way in which his wife had taken so long in dressing their daughter that the recluse had gone away. The wife asked the Brahmin: “Let Him be gone, but do tell me to which direction has He gone?” The old Brahmin retorted: “He’s gone that way,” and eventually they found the foot-prints of the Buddha. The old man said: “Here are His foot-prints, He must have gone towards that direction.”

On seeing the foot-prints, the old Brahmin’s wife thought: “This brahmin is really ignorant. He is not intelligent enough to know the intricacies of the treatise of Veda,” and to ridicule her husband, she made this caustic remark: “O Brahmin, you are such a fool as to have said that you would give away our daughter to this person whose foot-prints are quite different from those of worldlings who have stains of passion (rāga), malice (dosa) and delusion (moha). Brahmin, look at His foot-prints which characterize those of a Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha, who had broken open the enveloping dome of defilements; just look at those foot-prints with care.”

*Rattassa hi ukkuṭīkaṃ padam bhave
duṭṭhassa hoti avakaḍḍhitaṃ padam mūṭassa hoti sahasāmupīḷitaṃ vivataccha dassa imidisaṃ padaṃ*

- the foot-print of one with strong lust does not touch the ground in the middle;
- the foot-print of one with great amount of anger is more marked at the heels;
- the foot-print of one with great amount of delusion is marked by impression of its toes and heels

The foot print, we are seeing, is free from all these and it is therefore evident that it belongs to the Omniscient One who had done away with all forms of defilements.

The old Brahmin felt uneasy in his mind by his wife’s caustic remarks and complained: “O woman, you are rude and aggressive.” While they were thus engaged in arguments, the Buddha had taken the meal in the company of bhikkhus and He made His appearance at a place where the Brahmin could easily see Him.

When Brahmin Magandhi saw the Buddha coming from a distance, he scolded his wife and said: “The person whom I spoke of is He,” and so saying he approached the Buddha and made things plain to Him:

“O recluse! I have been looking for You all over the places since the earlier part of the day. There is no one in the whole world who is as pretty as my daughter, and there is no one in the world as beautiful as Yourself. I wish to give You my daughter to attend upon You as a housewife.”

The old Brahmin spoke directly and simply. Whereupon, the Buddha said, in response to his offer:

“O big Brahmin, I had no desire whatsoever for the three charming daughters of Mara of the celestial plane of Vasavatti, who stood by my sides and wooed and tempted Me by love-making talks full of sweet charms and (you might imagine) how could I have any desire for your daughter, Magandhi!” and He recited the following verse:

*Disvāna Tanhaṃ Aratim Ragañca
nāhosi chando api methuna samim kimevidam muttakarisa punnam pādāpi nam sanphusitum na icche*

Although the three charming daughters of King Mara, namely, Taṇhā, Arati, and Raga approached Me under the banyan tree, ‘ajapala’ with firm determination to tempt Me to enjoy filthy sensual pleasure by mutual co-operation with them, I had not the least desire to yield to their wishes nor there was the slightest taint of sensual passion in Me. In the same way, I have not the slightest taint of sensual desire on seeing this young Magandhi whose physical body is full of filth such as excreta, urine, etc. I have not the slightest desire to touch her even with My feet.

The Buddha uttered this stanza as though He was communicating not with the Brahmin but with a different person.

Young Magandhi harboured Resentment

Magandhi, the daughter of Brahmin Magandhi, harboured resentment towards the Buddha for insulting her by comparing her physical body with a collection of filth such as ordure, urine and what not. “He should have rejected me in a simple manner that does not affect my dignity. I vow to revenge this insult, as and when opportunity occurs, hereafter.” Thus Magandhi had sowed the seed of enmity against the Buddha.

Brahmin Magandhi and His Wife attained Arahatship

The Buddha did not give any heed to the resentment harboured by the young lady, Magandhi, and proceeded to preach the Dhamma to the old Brahmin, Magandhi, in harmony with his disposition [for full particulars, please refer to Suttanipatta Pāli Text (Burmese translation), Magandiya Sutta]. Magandhi and his wife attained anāgāmī ariyaship at the conclusion of the discourse. In due time, the couple considered that no useful purpose will be served to continue on living the household life (after attainment to the exalted state of anāgāmī) for any length of time, and they entrusted their young daughter, Magandhi, to her paternal uncle, Magandhi, before they received ordination. They fully attained arahatship free from āsavas by virtue of observance of precept for bhikkhus.

Buddha accepted the Offering of Three Monasteries

After emancipating Magandhi and his wife, the Buddha resumed His journey to the country of Kosambī and arrived there eventually.

When the three rich men heard of the arrival of the Buddha in the company of bhikkhus, they arranged for His reception on a grand scale and conducted Him to the monasteries. On arrival at the monasteries, they sat at appropriate places and after paying their respects, addressed the Buddha: “Most Exalted Buddha... the three monasteries which have been built, are intended to be offered to all the members of the Noble Order. We humbly request for favour of Your acceptance of the three monasteries for use by Your Sangha arriving from four quarters of the compass.” The Buddha was pleased to accept them, as requested by the donors. The three rich men then invited the Buddha for the performance of feasting ceremonies the next day and then they made their departure.

(As a matter of course, facts connected with slave girl Khujjattara, Queen Sāmāvātī, and Queen Magandhi need to be included here to complete the picture. But facts connected with Khujjattara and Sāmāvātī will be given when we come to the ‘Jewel of Sangha’ later. Full account of Magandhi may be referred to Dhammapada Commentary (Burmese translation). It is proposed to deal here only with certain pertinent facts that warranted inclusion in these chapters)

The Buddha stayed in the monasteries donated by the three rich men and observed the ninth vassa in the country of Kosambī.

Magandhi's Evil Acts

At the time the Buddha was observing the ninth vassa in Kosambī, the young woman Magandhi had become the Chief Queen of King Udena. This will be clarified: Magandhi was left by her parents, to the care of her paternal uncle, Cula Magandhi, before they received ordination. King Udena made her his queen after consultation with her uncle Cula Magandhi. A separate chamber with five hundred maids of honour was allotted to her by the King. Magandhi had thus been a Queen of King Udena by the time. The Buddha kept the ninth vassa at Kosambī!

Having come to understand that the Buddha had arrived at Kosambī, she caused all the wrecked, reckless, starving drunkards to be summoned, and she bribed and instigated them to call the Buddha by several names as taught by her. When the Buddha entered the city on the following day, in response to the invitation of the three rich men to a feasting ceremony, the wrecked, reckless drunkards reviled the Buddha by calling Him several ill names as taught by Magandhi.

The Venerable Ānanda implored the Buddha to leave the place: "Most Exalted Buddha... let us not continue our stay at a town where we have been abused. Let us go to another town!" Whereupon, the Buddha replied: "Dear Ānanda ... Buddhas are totally indifferent to the eight worldly vicissitudes and all those boisterous and abusive noises are bound to die off within a period of seven days and no more. The abusers will be liable to pay for their own demerit. You need not fret and bother yourself by such short-comings!"

(This is an abridged form of exposition in Āṅguttara Commentary. Dhammapada Commentary, 2:23 Nāga Vagga, preface to Atta daṇḍa vatthu gives more detailed exposition).

Extraordinary Volitional Efforts of The Three Rich Men of Kosambī

The three rich men invited the Buddha into the city and made offerings of all kinds on a large scale. The Buddha took residence at their monasteries in rotation and received offerings in the same manner. In other words, when the Buddha occupied Gositayama monastery on a certain day, He would receive alms-food from Ghosita's house on the following day. In the same manner the Buddha received alms-food from Kukkuḍha and Pavarika, in order of succession.

— Dhammapada Commentary —

After a lapse of one month, it dawned on the three rich men:-

“Buddhas have appeared for the purpose of safe guarding sentient beings and promoting their well being; we should see to it that all the citizens should also take shares in meritorious deeds.”

They accordingly afforded opportunity to all the citizens to participate in meritorious deeds, with the result that all the citizens made offerings in their respective streets, quarters or by formation of charitable societies from that time.

Eruption of A Great Dispute within The Sangha

between a bhikkhu who was versed in the Codes of Conduct (Vinaya), and another bhikkhu who was versed in Discourses (Suttas), both were living in the same monastery. One day, the one versed in suttas entered the privy and came out, leaving certain amount of water in the cup which was usually kept in the privy for common use. The bhikkhu versed in Vinaya, on entering the privy after him, saw the amount of water that was left in the cup, he came out and asked the one versed in Suttas: “Friend... did you leave some amount of water remaining in this cup?” The one versed in Suttas replied: “Friend ... yes, I have,” with all sincerity. The one versed in Vinaya complained: “Well, friend... don't you know that such an act is tantamount to commission of a guilt (āpatti)?” The one versed in Suttas replied: “No ... I don't, my friend.” Then the one versed in Vinaya explained: “Friend, to leave any amount of water in the cup is an offence (appatti).”

The bhikkhu versed in Suttas said: “If I am guilty of an offence, I am prepared to remove the offences by confessing.” Whereupon, the bhikkhu versed in Vinaya explained: “Friend, if such an act was committed through forgetfulness and without any volition there lies no fault.” On hearing this, the bhikkhu versed in Suttas formed the idea that he had not committed the offence of leaving behind some water in the cup.

(Herein, the bhikkhu versed in Vinaya had thought that “such an offence (leaving remaining amount of water in the cup) does not amount to a guilt (āpatti) by reason of absence of mind, devoid of volition.” As a matter of fact, such an offence is tantamount to a guilt, (Dukkata-āpatti) no matter whether such an act was committed through forgetfulness or without volition).

The bhikkhu versed in Vinaya told his disciples that the bhikkhu versed in Suttas did not know when he was guilty of an offence, to decry the one versed in Suttas. And when the disciples of the bhikkhu versed in Vinaya met the disciples of the one versed in Suttas, the former told the latter that their teacher had no knowledge of the guilt he had committed. When his disciples brought this news to his knowledge, the bhikkhu versed in Suttas said: “That bhikkhu versed in Vinaya himself told me that I was not guilty of that offence, and now, he had changed his words and accused me of being guilty of that offence. He has told a lie.”

The disciples of the bhikkhu versed in Suttas went and told the disciples of the bhikkhu versed in Vinaya: “Your teacher is a liar.” The quarrel thus began! The bhikkhu versed in Vinaya managed to obtain the support of his own associates and charged the bhikkhu versed in Suttas with the offense of not seeing the fault as fault (āpattiyā adassane ukkhepaniyakam) and suspended him with a formal resolution.

The bhikkhu, who was thus suspended, being well informed and of social standing, approached his friends and associates and said: “As a matter of fact, that was a case where there was no fault, not a case where there was fault. I am unfallen, I have not fallen. I am unsuspending, I am not suspended. (although they have suspended me) I am not guilty, I was suspended by a formal act which was not legally valid. I would beseech you to stand by me as my partisans on account of the rule, on account of discipline, Dhamma-Vinaya. He thus gained many friends, supporters, and associates. A messenger was also sent to bhikkhus in the villages and country to explain the situation. Thus the bhikkhus in the country who were his associates also became his partisans.

The disciples of the suspended bhikkhus versed in Suttas went to those who suspended them and complained by way of refutation: “Friends... that is a non-guilty case, it is not a case entailing any guilt (āpatti). Wherefore, the bhikkhu versed in Suttas was not guilty of any offence. He is unsuspending though he has been suspended by a formal act which was not legally valid.”

The bhikkhus involved in suspending, in turn, told the suspended bhikkhus that, it was a case of guilt (āpatti), it was not a non-apatti case, the bhikkhu versed in Suttas was, therefore, guilty of an offence; it was not that he was not guilty; therefore he deserved to be suspended by a formal act of suspension which was legally valid: “Friends.. do not pursue his course, do not attend upon him any more.” But their appeals fell on the deaf ears of the bhikkhus versed in Suttas; they continued on attending upon the suspended bhikkhu, following him wherever he went.

Buddha exhorted Partisan Bhikkhus of The Rival Groups.

An unknown bhikkhu approached the Buddha and reported with due respect all that had happened. Whereupon, the Buddha uttered: “The Order of Bhikkhus is divided, the Order of Bhikkhus is divided” twice in succession and went to the bhikkhus who had suspended the bhikkhu versed in Suttas and addressed them from a reserved seat:

(Bhikkhus had, by then, not actually been divided, but the Buddha had said it in anticipation of the imminent danger of division in due course of time. For instance, one might have said “the rice grains have ripened” (matured) when one noticed the break of rains ushering in the season for harvesting, hence the utterance!)

The Buddha addressed them:

“Bhikkhus .... you should not, through pride and vanity, think of suspending or expelling a bhikkhu on account of a simple ordinary matter. Let us suppose that a certain bhikkhu might be guilty of an offence (āpatti) though he did not think that it was an offence, on one hand. On the other hand, there might be bhikkhus who held it to be an offence (āpatti). Bhikkhus, if those bhikkhus know concerning that bhikkhu: ‘This Venerable one is well-informed and well versed in Dhamma-Vinaya and Pāṭimokkha, intelligent and wise, experienced, conscientious, scrupulous and desirous of three training practices; (1) If we expel this bhikkhu for not seeing the offence, if we do not carry out the Observance together with this bhikkhu, and carry out the Observance without this bhikkhu, by doing so, there will be dispute, strife, brawls, there will be schism in the order, there will be altercation in the order, dissension in the order, differences in the order.’ Bhikkhus, knowing this, bhikkhus should not suspend or expel such a bhikkhu for not seeing an offence to ward off schism and promote unity.

Bhikkhus .... you should not, through pride and vanity, think of suspending or expelling a bhikkhu on account of a simple ordinary matter. Let us suppose that a certain bhikkhu might be guilty of an offence (āpatti) though he did not think that it was an offence, on one hand. On the other hand, there might be bhikkhus who held it to be an offence (āpatti). Bhikkhus, if those bhikkhus know concerning that bhikkhu: ‘This Venerable one is well-informed and well versed in Dhamma-Vinaya and Pāṭimokkha, intelligent and wise, experienced, conscientious, scrupulous and desirous of three training practices; (2) if we expel this bhikkhu for not seeing the offence, and do not perform Pavāraṇa ceremony (inviting one another to pardon) together with this bhikkhu, if we perform Pavāraṇa without this bhikkhu; (3) if we do not carry out a formal act of the order (Sangha kamma) together with this bhikkhu, if we will carry out a formal act of the order without this bhikkhu; (4) if we do not sit on a seat together with this bhikkhu, if we sit on a seat without this bhikkhu; (5) if we do not sit to drink gruel together with this bhikkhu, if we sit to drink gruel without this bhikkhu; (6) if we do not sit in a refectory together with this bhikkhu, if we sit in a refectory without this bhikkhu; (7) if we do not dwell under the same roof with this bhikkhu, if we dwell under one roof without him; (8) if we do not pay respect according to seniority, greet or worship with joined palms, together with this bhikkhu, if we will pay respect according to seniority, greet or worship with joined palms without this bhikkhu; by doing so, there will be dispute, strife, brawls, there will be schism in the order, there will be altercation in the order, dissension in the order, differences in the order.’ Bhikkhus, knowing this, bhikkhus should not suspend or expel such a bhikkhu for not seeing an offence to ward off schism and promote unity.”

After preaching the above discourse for unity of Sangha to the bhikkhus who had suspended the bhikkhu, the Buddha went over to the disciples of the suspended bhikkhu (who was well-versed in Suttas) and delivered a discourse:-

“Bhikkhus .... When you have committed an offence, you should not deem it that amends should not be made for the offence, thinking: “We have not committed an offence.”

Bhikkhus .... supposing a certain bhikkhu might be guilty of an offence (āpatti), though he did not think it was an offence, on one hand; and on the other hand, there might be bhikkhus who held it to be an offence (āpatti).

Bhikkhus, if that bhikkhu, who thinks he has not committed an offence, knows concerning those bhikkhus: “These Venerable Ones are well informed and well versed in Dhamma-Vinaya and Pāṭimokkha, intelligent and wise, conscientious, scrupulous and desirous of three training practices. Either because of me or because of anyone else, these bhikkhus should not take a wrong action through selfish desire, ill-will, through ignorance, through fear.

If these bhikkhus suspend me for not seeing an offence and (1) if they do not carry out the Observance together with me, if they carry out the Observance without me; (2) if these bhikkhus do not perform Pavarana ceremony together with me, if they perform Pavarana ceremony without me; (3) if they do not carry out a formal act of the order (Sangha-kamma) together with me, if they will carry out a formal act of the order without me; (4) if they do not sit on a seat together with me, if they sit on a seat without me; (5) if they do not sit to drink gruel together with me, if they sit to drink gruel without me; (6) if they do not sit in a refectory together with me, if they sit in a refectory without me; (7) if they do not dwell under the same roof with me, if they dwell under one roof without me; (8) if they do not pay respect according to seniority, greet or worship with joined palms, together with me, if they will pay respect according to seniority, greet or worship with joined palms without me; by doing so, there will be dispute, strife, brawls, there will be schism in the order, there will be altercation in the order, dissension in the order, differences in the order. Bhikkhus, knowing this, the bhikkhu, should confess the guilt even out of faith in the Sangha to ward off schism and promote unity.”

After delivering this discourse for unity of Sangha, the Buddha rose from the seat and departed.

(N.B. The bhikkhu versed in Suttas had honestly expressed his desire “to confess and to ask for pardon” if he had committed an offence when the bhikkhu versed in Vinaya made a complaint at first. When he was told subsequently that “any offence committed through thoughtlessness and without volition does not amount to offence or sinful act” he sincerely thought he was free from guilt.)

Had the Buddha decided to blame those (versed in Vinaya) for suspending the bhikkhus versed in Suttas on such grounds, they would have accused Him of taking sides with their opponents, thus exposing themselves to the risk of committing an offence against Him, a demerit that could direct them to realms of woes.

Again, the bhikkhu versed in Suttas had knowingly left certain amount of water in the cup and as such, he was guilty of infringement of a light offence (dukkata-āpatti). His disciples had expressed their opinion that such a judgment was legally invalid, through attachment to their teacher.

Had the Buddha decided to approve the judgment of those versed in Vinaya on such grounds, the disciples of the bhikkhu, who was versed in Suttas, would naturally accuse Him of taking sides with their opponents thus exposing themselves to the risk of committing an offence against Him, a demerit that could direct them to realms of woes.

(It should be borne in mind therefore, that the Buddha had thus refrained from putting blame on any of the rival groups in the interest of peace and tranquillity and after delivering discourses for unity of the Sangha, He made His departure from that place.)

Now at that time, bhikkhus who had been suspended carried out the Observance and performed the formal Sangha-kamma in the Sima (within the boundary) of the same monastery, whereas those Sangha, who had expelled the former, carried out the Observance and performed the formal Sangha-kamma by having gone out-side the boundary of the monastery.

One of the bhikkhus of the latter group approached the Buddha with profound respect and addressed Him:

“Most Exalted Buddha, .. those bhikkhus who had been suspended carried out the Observance and performed the formal act of Sangha-kamma, in the Sima (within the boundary) of the same monastery whereas those Sangha who had expelled the former carried out the Observance and performed the formal Sangha-kamma by having gone outside the boundary of the monastery.”

Whereupon the Buddha gave the following answer to that bhikkhus:

Dear bhikkhu ... in case where those suspended bhikkhus carried out the Observance and performed other Sangha-kamma in accordance with the procedure for a motion and proclamation (ñatti kammavācā), laid down by Me, in the Sima of the monastery, their performances must be held to be quite in order, legally valid.

Dear bhikkhu .... in the same way, if you, the suspending bhikkhus, who have suspended the former, carried out the Observance and performed other Sangha-kamma in accordance with the procedure for a motion and proclamation (ñatti kammavācā), laid down by Me, in the Sima of the monastery, your performances also must be held to be quite in order, legally valid.

Dear bhikkhu .... What is the reason for this? The suspended bhikkhus belong to a different communion from yours (not associated with you) and you belong to a different communion from theirs (not associating with them).

Two Kinds of Ñāṇa Saṁvāsa.

Dear bhikkhu... There are two grounds for belonging to a different communion (Ñāṇa-saṁvāsa): (1) one's own effort; one makes oneself belong to a different communion, (2) being suspended by the Sangha for not seeing own offence (apatti), for not making amends, for not abandoning wrong view. Thus there are these two grounds for belonging to a different communion.

Two Kinds of Samānā Saṁvāsa

Dear bhikkhu... there are two grounds for belonging to the same communion (Samānā-saṁvāsa): (1) one's own effort, one makes oneself belong to the same communion, (2) the whole Sangha lifts the Suspension and restore (Osaraniva Kamma) the bhikkhu who was suspended (Ukkhepaniya Kamma).

Thus there are two grounds for Ñāṇa-saṁvāsa and two grounds for Samānā-saṁvāsa, exhorted the Buddha.

(N.B. There are two groups or two types of bhikkhus, namely, (1) lawful bhikkhus (dhammavādi) who suspended the guilty bhikkhus (2) Unlawful bhikkhus who are suspended for being guilty of one or the other offence (adhammavādi). Should a bhikkhu, residing with one group or the other, decide, after scrutinizing the views of both groups of bhikkhu, that the bhikkhus, who are suspended are unlawful bhikkhu, and the bhikkhu, who suspended them are lawful ones, he himself has made himself of different communion with the suspended bhikkhus and of the same communion with the suspending bhikkhus.)

Conduct of Bhikkhus in Dispute

Now, at that time, bhikkhus fell into dispute, quarrelling and causing strife at the refectory in the villages. They behaved unsuitably towards one another in physical action and in speech. They came to blows. People looked down upon them, criticized them. Well-conducted and modest bhikkhus reported this unhappy state of affairs to the Buddha who sent for the disputing bhikkhus. Having made enquiries and having rebuked them, the Buddha gave an appropriate talk and addressed them:

“Bhikkhus, when the Sangha is divided, and if it is not behaving according to rules, if there is discord, you should sit down separately, thinking: ‘We cannot, at least, behave unsuitably towards one another in physical action and in speech. We cannot come to blows.

Bhikkhus, when the Sangha is divided, but if it is behaving according to rule and if there is friendliness, you may sit down next to one another.”

These are the guide-lines given to the rival bhikkhus for observance, whenever there is dissension amongst the Sangha.

Discourse on The Story of Dighavu

The two rival groups of bhikkhu went on quarrelling, making strife falling into disputes, in the midst of the Sangha wounding one another with the weapon of the tongue. The Sangha was unable to quell the dispute.

Then a certain bhikkhu approached the Buddha, having paid obeisance to Him, he stood at a suitable place and reported the matter and requesting Him to approach the quarrelling bhikkhus.

Whereupon, the Buddha went to the bhikkhus and exhorted them:

“Bhikkhus... it is not at all right and proper for you to be quarrelling, fighting and opposing one another. Enough! no disputes, no quarrelling, no contentions.”

Whereupon, a bhikkhu of the suspended group, who had the welfare of the Buddha at heart, addressed: “Most Exalted Buddha, ... Let the Lord of the law wait, let the Bhagava remain unconcerned, intent on abiding in peace for the present. We will be responsible for these disputes, quarrels and strife.” This was his appeal to the Buddha.

The Buddha exhorted them twice in the same strain, and the bhikkhu of the suspended group repeated his appeal for two times in succession.

(N.B. The suspended bhikkhu was a well-wisher of the Buddha. He took pains to appeal to Him not to trouble Himself about the matter at a time when the flame of anger was at its peak.

But the Buddha perceived that the two rival groups would be back to their senses once the anger was removed, and so out of compassion for these bhikkhus, He delivered a discourse on the life story of Dighavu with that objective in view.

The Story of Dighavu

Once, there was a King of Benares by the name of King Kasi, who had great amount of wealth, a big army war chariots, elephants, horses, infantry, a vast expansion of land, a big treasury, and fully stocked granaries. The King of Kosala, by the name of Dighiti, was poor having only a small amount of wealth, a small army, limited number of war chariots, elephants, horses and infantry, a small treasury and granaries. Bhikkhus .... King Brahmadata alias Kasi King prepared for war against King Dighiti, and marched towards Kosala with a great army comprising war chariots, elephants, horses, infantry.

The Weak succumbed to The Strong

On hearing the alarming news, King Dighiti of Kosala weighed in his mind: “King Brahmadata of Kasi is rich, he owns enormous amount of wealth, has a great army, comprising war chariots, elephants, horses, infantry, a big treasury, a vast expansion of land and granaries, whereas, I am comparatively poor, having a small amount of wealth, a small army and I am sure to be defeated by the first attack launched by that King. As such, it would be wiser to evacuate than to get defeated.” Therefore, taking his queen, he fled from his city long before the enemy reached it.

Bhikkhus ... King Brahmadata took possession of King Dighiti troops, chariots, territory, treasuries and granaries, and reigned over his newly conquered land. Dighiti, the ex-King and his queen arrived at Benares in due course, and took refuge at a potter's house, on the fringe of the City, in the guise of wandering ascetics.

The Queen conceived A Child

Bhikkhus ... after some time, the Queen of King Dighiti became pregnant and developed a strong desire for certain particular thing, such as to see at sunrise a fourfold army, fully arrayed, fully equipped standing on level ground and to drink the water used in washings of swords.

The Queen made it known to her husband, King Dighiti of Kosala, that she had conceived a child and that she had a strong desire to see fully equipped army at sun-rise, and to drink water used in washing sword. Whereupon, the King of Kosala said: "Dear Queen ... how will it be possible for us to see a fully equipped army and to get water used for washing swords, when we are in a humble condition!" The Queen replied: "Your Majesty, I will die if my wishes are not fulfilled."

A Far-Sighted Philosopher and Friend.

At that time, King Dighiti's boyhood friend was the Brahmin priest of Brahmadatta, King of Kasi. Bhikkhus, ... Dighiti, King of Kosala went to see his boyhood friend, the brahmin priest and told him: "My dear friend ... your friend, my Queen is in a family way, and she has a strong desire to see a fully equipped army standing in a vast and level plain, and to drink water used in washing swords." Whereupon, the Brahmin said: "Your Majesty... in that case, I should like to see the Queen."

Bhikkhus, .... the Queen went to see the Brahmin priest. When the Brahmin noticed the Queen coming from a distance, he got up and arranging his upper garment over one shoulder and with his hands clasped announced joyously: 'Indeed, a King of Kosala is in your womb,' for three times in succession. And he assured the Queen: 'Be happy, good Queen, you will get a chance at sun rise to see the fully equipped fourfold army arrayed on a level ground and drink the washings of the swords.'

Bhikkhus, .... the Brahmin priest went to King Brahmadatta of Kasi and addressed: 'Your Majesty... the signs which I can see are such that a fully equipped army must appear on a vast plain at sun-rise and the royal swords are to be washed then.' The King ordered his courtiers to carry out the instructions given by the Brahmin priest.

The Queen of King Dighiti had her strong desires fulfilled (as arranged by the Brahmin); she had seen a fully equipped army standing on a vast plain and drunk the water used in washing the swords. Bhikkhus, she gave birth to a baby son in due time and was named Dighavu.

Bhikkhus, .... when prince Dighavu had grown to an age of discretion, it occurred to King Dighiti: 'The King Brahmadatta of Kasi had hitherto done much harm to us; he had seized our army, war chariots, elephants, horses, and territories including small villages; deprived us of our treasuries and granaries. He would do away with three of us once he found out our whereabouts; it would be safe for our son, Dighavu, to stay outside the city. He accordingly arranged for Dighavu to stay aloof from them at a place outside the boundaries of the city. Bhikkhus,... Prince Dighavu learnt various arts and science of the time during the period of his self-exiled life.

A Disloyal Court Barber

Bhikkhus, .... a barber of King Dighiti of Kosala had free access to the palace of the King of Kasi. Bhikkhus, .... when the barber saw the King and Queen of Kosala taking refuge in an old hut of the potter under the guise of ascetics on the outskirts of the city, he went to King Brahmadatta of Kasi and reported: "Your Majesty .... King Dighiti and his Queen have been taking refuge in a hut of a potter under the guise of ascetics on the outskirts of the city." Bhikkhus, ... King Brahmadatta ordered his attendants to bring the King and Queen of Kosala to him. The attendants did as they were bid.

Bhikkhus, .... King Brahmadatta of Kasi gave orders to his servants: "Courtiers ....fasten the hands of King Dighiti and his Queen at their backs tightly, shave their heads bald with razor, beat a drum that produces harsh and broken sound, take them from street to street, from cross road to cross road, beating them all along the way, and finally get them out of the city by the southern gate to be cut up into four pieces. Their remains must be discarded to the four quarters. The executioners did as they were ordered by the King.

King Kosala's Doctrine of Peace

At that time, Prince Dighavu had a longing to see his parents. He thought to himself: 'It is quite a long time that I have not seen my parents, I had better go and see them now.' He, therefore, entered the town and came face to face with his ill-fated parents, with hands fastened tight at their backs, their heads shaved bald, being (beaten up) paraded from street to street, from cross road to cross road to the unbearable sounds of a drum. He was greatly shocked and choked with a deep sense of sorrow, but he managed to go near his parents with strained emotions.

Bhikkhus, ... when King Dighiti saw his son, Dighavu coming from a distance, he uttered words of advice meant for his son:

'My dear son .... Dighavu .... do not look far and do not look close either;

My dear son, Dighavu .... revenge does not promote peace;

My dear son, Dighavu .... Only non-resentment gives peace.'

When King Dighiti uttered such words of advice, the courtiers misunderstood him and said:

'This King Dighiti of Kosala had lost his head; where is his son, Dighavu?

Whom is he addressing as 'My son, Dighavu .... do not look far, and do not look close, either. My dear son, Dighavu, revenge does not promote peace;

My dear son, Dighavu, .... only non-resentment gives peace.' "

When King Dighiti heard of their remarks, he retorted: 'My dear men... I am not voicing through loss of head, in fact, wise men will understand the meaning of what I meant.'

King Dighiti uttered the same words of advice for three times and the executioners made the same comments for three times. King Dighiti gave the same explanation to them, to show that he was mentally sound and that it was meant for wise men who would understand, meaning his son.

Bhikkhus, ... the executioners went on punishing the royal couple all along the route and finally took them out of the city via the south gate, as instructed by their King. King Dighiti and his Queen were cut into fours and their severed limbs discarded to the four quarters. The executioners went back into the city after posting guards at the place of execution

Prince Dighavu's Clever Arrangement

Bhikkhus, ... Dighavu went into the city and came out with some liquor for presentation to the guards, who soon got drunk and fell into deep slumber. Dighavu collected a pile of fire-wood and placed the remains of his royal parents on top of the pile and cremated them in a traditional way. Raising his clasped hands in a respectful manner he made three right-hand rounds about the pile of bon-fire.

King Brahmadata was greatly shaken

At that time, King Brahmadata was in the upper chamber of his palace. He caught sight of Dighavu, through the window, in the act of circumambulating the funeral pyre three times with his palms joined and raised toward it. It at once occurred to him: 'That man must be one of the nearest relatives or kinsmen of Dighiti, and the one who would certainly do something against one.' He was greatly annoyed that no one was thoughtful enough to bring such a case to his notice.

Prince Dighavu served as An Elephant Keeper

Bhikkhus, .... Prince Dighavu went into the jungle and mourned over the loss of his royal parents, weeping to his heart's content for a while and re-entered the city. He went to the elephant stable near the palace and requested the royal elephant master to employ him as a trainee. His request was readily granted.

Bhikkhus .... Prince Dighavu used to get up early and sing sweet songs and play harp harmoniously at the elephant shed every morning. On hearing the singing and playing of the harp, King Brahmadata asked his couriers as to who was the singer and player of the harp early in the morning every day. The courtiers gave the King full description of the singer and player of the harp.

The King then ordered his men to bring the singing lad who played the harp so well.

Prince Dighavu was appointed as An Inmate of The Palace.

When the couriers brought Dighavu before the King, he was asked:

‘Youthful lad .... is that you who sing sweet songs and play the harp so well at the elephant stable early in the mornings every day?’ The Prince gave his answer in the affirmative. Then the King ordered him to sing and to play his harp in his presence.

Bhikkhus, .... Prince Dighavu sang songs sweetly in harmony with the tuning of the harp, in compliance with the royal orders. The King was greatly delighted with his performance and ordered the boy to serve him as one of the attendants. The Prince undertook to serve as an attendant to the King. In due course, he was upgraded to a confidential position of trust in consideration of the five qualities that he possessed (1) getting up earlier than the King, (2) going to bed after the King, (3) always being alert and willing to serve, (4) doing all that would please the King, (5) habit of speaking well and affectionately.

Prince Dighavu honoured His Father's Words

Bhikkhus, .... one day, King Brahmadata of Kasi ordered Prince Dighavu to harness the royal chariot: ‘Dear lad .... harness the chariot, we will go into the forest of deers.’ The Prince replied: ‘Very well.. your Majesty,’ and when everything was set, he reported the matter to the King: ‘Your Majesty... the chariot is ready, and it is up to your Majesty to decide when to leave.’ The King started off for big game in the forest followed by a company of his army.

Prince Dighavu drove away the royal chariot at such a great speed that it eventually got cut off from the royal followers. When they had gone far enough, King Brahmadata ordered Prince Dighavu: ‘Youthful lad .... we have been cut off from the party, I am tired and you might unharness the chariot, so that I might take some rest.’ The Prince unharnessed the royal chariot and sat cross-legged on the ground. The King lay down to relax with his head rested on the lap of the young lad. He soon fell into a slumber through tiredness.

Bhikkhus, .... when the King was in sound sleep, Prince Dighavu's mind began to work:

‘This King Brahmadata of Kasi country had done much harm to us. He had forcibly seized our army, elephants, horses, chariots, territories, treasuries and granaries. It was he who had assassinated my parents; the opportunity to revenge on him has presented itself now.’

He drew his sword out, bhikkhus, .... but his father's words of advice crossed his mind:

‘My dear son, Dighavu .... do not look far, and do not look close, either. My dear son, Dighavu .... revenge does not promote peace. My dear son, Dighavu .... only non-resentment gives peace.’

‘It would not be right for me to go against my father's advice,’ and he replaced the sword into its sheath.

For a second time, for a third time, Prince Dighavu drew his sword out to wreak vengeance on the old enemy and for the second and third time he replaced his sword into its sheath, remembering the advice given by his royal father.

Then Brahmadata, the King of Kasi, frightened and agitated, alarmed, unsteadily got up all of a sudden from his sleep. Whereupon, Prince Dighavu asked him: 'Your Majesty .... what has caused you to get frightened, agitated and alarmed?' The King replied: 'Youthful lad .... I dreamt in my sleep that I was running away for life through fright from the son of King of Kosala who was chasing me with a sword.'

Bhikkhus, .... then Prince Dighavu held the head of King Brahmadata with his left hand and drew out the sword with his right hand and said: 'Your Majesty .... the son of the late King of Kosala is no other person than myself. You had done much harm to us, you have forcibly seized our army, elephants, horse, chariots, territories, treasuries and granaries. It was you who have assassinated my royal parents. Now, it is my turn to revenge on you!'

Whereupon, King Brahmadata touched Prince Dighavu's feet with his head and entreated him for mercy by granting him life: 'Dear son, Dighavu .... please grant me life.' He thus entreated for mercy three times in succession. Then the Prince replied: 'How will it be possible for me to grant life to a king! It is a king who should grant me life.' 'Well then, dear Dighavu, you grant me life and I will grant you life.'

Bhikkhus, .... Brahmadata, the King of Kasi and Prince Dighavu granted life to one another, and they took hold of one another's hands. They vowed to do no harm to one another. Then the King asked Dighavu: 'My dear son.. please get the royal chariot harnessed and let us return.' The Prince said: 'Very well... your Majesty.' When everything was set, he reported that everything was ready and it was up to his Majesty to leave as and when he so wished.

The King returned

Bhikkhus, ....once the King had mounted the chariot, Prince Dighavu drove the chariot with accelerated speed and they caught up with the army in no time. King Brahmadata of Kasi, accompanied by his troops, then returned to the city. On arrival at the royal palace, the King had the councillors and ministers assembled and addressed them: 'Good Sirs, ....what would you do if Dighavu, the son of King Dighati, could be found now?'

Then some said: 'We would cut his hands off.' Others said: 'We would cut off his feet,' again others said: 'We would cut off his hands and feet, .... ears .... nose .... ears and nose; we would cut off his head.'

The King pointing his finger, said: 'This is Prince Dighavu, son of the late King Dighiti of Kosala. Nothing could be done against him now. Just as he has granted me life, so also have I granted him life.'

Thus proclaimed King Brahmadata of Kasi.

Prince Dighavu's Doctrine of Peace

King Brahmadata of Kasi then asked prince Dighava:

'My dear son ....your father is believed to have left four sets of words:

My dear son ....Do not look far and do not look close, either!

Revenge does not promote peace; only non-resentment gives peace.

My dear son, Dighavu... what did your father mean?'

Prince Dighavu gave the following reply in response to the King's query:

- (1) Your Majesty ....my father had advised me 'Not to look far.' This should be understood to mean 'One should not be at enmity with other people for any length of time.'
- (2) Your Majesty ....my father had advised me 'Not to look close, either.' This should be understood to mean 'Not to shorten the term of friendship, but to strengthen and prolong ties of friendship.'
- (3 & 4) Your Majesty... my father had, advised me: 'My dear son .... enmity could not be brought to an end by any act of revenge.' You can only do away with enmity by avoidance of revenge.

Your Majesty, in case I assassinated you for killing my parents, your well-wishers would undoubtedly try to kill me. That would not end the chain of events for my well-wishers would turn against your well-wishers, and the endless chain of events would go on for ever and for ever!

Now that your Majesty had granted me life and I have done likewise, the question of enmity or revenge would no more arise and so my good old father had said: 'My son .... revenge does not pay: Harbour no resentment and be happy' with that end in view!

Thus Prince Dighavu interpreted the meaning of his father's advice on end of strife.

To this objective, the wise men of the olden days had also left the following lines for our guidance:-

- (1) Don't prolong the cause of enmity.
- (2) Don't shorten the term of friendship.
- (3) Friendliness eliminates enmity.
- (4) Resentment begets revenge!

Prince Dighavu regained His Father's Kingdom

Bhikkhus, .... when Prince Dighavu had explained the underlying meaning of his father's advice, King Brahmadata of Kasi said: 'My dear men .... it is indeed wonderful, such a marvellous thing had never occurred before. This Prince Dighavu is so wise that he could explain to us in extensor, what his father had uttered in abridged form!' Thus King of Kasi spoke highly of Prince Dighavu and formally returned the possessions of his father (late King Dighiti of Kosala), comprising army, elephants, horses, chariots, territories, treasuries and granaries, and above all, he gave his daughter, who had come of age, to Prince Dighavu."

Buddha's Exhortation

"Bhikkhus .... it will be seen that, even those kings in arms could come to friendly terms through forbearance and kindly disposition! Bhikkhus .... when those of you who have become members of the Order within the domains of My instructions that are good in the beginning, good in the middle and good at the end, cannot forgive and act in friendly way, how can you expect to uphold the dignity and maintain the nobility and purity of My Teaching!" Then the Buddha repeated, for the third time, the exhortation He had given before: "Bhikkhus, it is not at all right and proper for you to be quarrelling, fighting and opposing one another. Enough! no disputes, no quarrelling, no contentions." At this last exhortation also, the bhikkhu who belonged to the suspended group addressed the Buddha as before: "Most Exalted Buddha.... Let the Lord of the Law wait, let the Bhagava remain unconcerned, intent on abiding in peace for the present. We will be responsible for these disputes, quarrels and strife." The Buddha then considered: "These useless people (without hope of achieving the Path and Fruition) are really incorrigible. It's not easy to bring them to senses," and departed from that place.

End of the story of Dighavu.

Ten Stanzas of Exhortation

The Buddha entered Kosambī early in the morning for alms-food and after His meal returned to the monastery. He then had His lodging kept in order and carrying His robe and the alms-bowl, He stood in the midst of the bhikkhus and gave the following exhortations in ten stanzas:

Puthusaddo Samajano,

*Na bālo koci mañña.
Sanghasamin bhijja mānasmin,
Nānan bhiyo amannayum.*

Those bhikkhus, with foul mouth and rude manners, have boisterous, cheerless voices; they are of the same type of persons with impure hearts; there is no one amongst them who knows his own folly or foolishness. Above all, none of these bhikkhus has realized that dissension amongst the members of Order has arisen because of him (his conduct).

*Parinmuthā paṇḍitabhāsā, vācāgocara bhāṇino.
Yāvicchanti mukhāyāmaṃ;
yena nīta na taṃ vidā.*

Those bhikkhus, with foul mouth and rude manners, are greatly infatuated by delusion, intent only on quarrelling and under the guise of wise and intelligent persons. (they do not dwell in contemplative mood)

They open their wide mouths and utter abusive language without any sense of shame or dread of blame; (none of them keep silent as a gesture of regard and respect for the Sangha). They are ignorant of the fact that such acts of quarrels and conflicts invariably lead to a state of shamefulness. They do not perceive that ill-will (anger) leads them on to such shameful acts.

*Akkocchimaṃ avadhi maṃ,
ajñinimaṃ ahāsi me.
Ye ca taṃ upanayhanti,
veraṃ tesaṃ na sammati.*

If you harbour resentment against a person for having abused you, tormented you, over-powered you, robbed or deprived you of your property; and if you do not care to forbear against that aggressor in the interest of peace and tranquillity, the flame of enmity will not die down, but it will keep on burning up to the time of dissolution of a world-system.

"Forbearance could be The Batch of A Bhikkhu"

*Akkocchimaṃ avadhi maṃ,
ajñinimaṃ ahāsi me.
Ye ca taṃ nupanayhanti, veraṃ tesūpasammati.*

If you do not harbour any resentment against a person who has abused you, who has tormented you, who has over-powered you, who has robbed or deprived you of your property, through forbearance and equanimity, the flame of enmity is bound to dwindle to a vanishing point for lack of fresh fuel!

*Na hi verena verāni, sammantīdha kudācanaṃ.
Averena ca sammati, esa dhammo sanantano.*

In this world, the flame of animosity cannot be extinguished by harbouring resentment and taking revenge on one another. To wash ordure by means of ordure will not be of any avail! Ordure could be cleaned by means of pure water. In the same manner, the flame of animosity could only be extinguished, and peace and tranquillity restored by forbearance and loving kindness. This is the beaten track that all the Buddhas and Paccekabuddhas have hitherto followed.

*Pare ca na vijānanti, mayamettha yamāse.
Ye ca tattha vijānanti, tatho sammanti medhagā.*

Amongst the masses of bhikkhus, the unintelligent and quarrelsome bhikkhus are ignorant of the fact that they are on their march towards the Kingdom of Death, with the movement of time! Whereas, those intelligent and thoughtful bhikkhus, amongst the masses of bhikkhus, are fully alive to the fact that all conditioned things are getting closer to the Jaws of Death with the progress of time. Consequently, quarrel and conflicts are extinguished and peace and tranquillity prevailed.

*Athicchimā pāṇaharā, gavāssadhanahārino.
Raṭhaṇ vilumpamānānam, tesampi hoti saṅgati,
kasmā tumhā ka no siyā.*

When friendship could be fostered and tranquillity established by peaceful means with the Kings, who had mercilessly broken the bones and limbs of our parents through malice, assassinated them, robbed us of our cattle and worldly possessions of our parents by brute force, I personally do not think why you bhikkhus, My own beloved sons like you, cannot foster brotherly feeling among yourselves, and re-establish a state of tranquillity and stability among yourselves! It is a possible matter.

*Sace labhetha nipakam sahāyam,
Saddhim̄ caram sādhuvivahāri dhīram̄.
Abhibuyya sabbāni parissayāni,
Careyya tenatthamano satīmā.*

When a mindful person obtains a friend-in-the-Dhamma, who is accomplished in the three training practices (sikkha), who is self-composed, prudent and wise, he should take delight in associating with him, and strive to overcome the external enemies, such as elephants, leopards and tigers, and extirpate the internal foes, such as greed, hatred and delusion, leaving an ascetic life in search of Truth.

*No ce labhetha nipakam sahāyam, saddhim̄ caram sādhuviḥāri dhīram̄.
Rājāva raṭṭham vijitam pahāya
eko care matangaraññeva nago*

Should a mindful person fail to obtain a friend-in-the-Dhamma who is accomplished in the three training practices (sikkha), who is self-composed, prudent and wise, he should strive after the Ultimate Truth all alone, by way of ascetic life, after the manner of those ancient monarchs who abdicated their thrones, abandoned their countries and renounced the world, such as, Mahā Janaka and Arindama, or like a bull elephant of Matanga breed which roams the forest all alone.

Chapter 27

*Ekassa caritaṃ seyyo, nathi bāle sahāyathā.
Eko care na ca pāpāni kayirā, appossukko mātaṅgaraññeva nāgo.*

To wander all alone, leading the life of an ascetic, and striving after Ultimate Truth, deserves praise and admiration. There is no prospect whatsoever for the acquisition of faith and insight or development of sīla, samādhi and paññā by association with lowly ignorant persons. One should strive, single handed, after the Ultimate Goal, like a bull elephant wandering all over the forests without the cares of the world! No evil acts should be performed.

The Buddha delivered this Discourse in ten Stanzas, while standing in the midst of members of the Order (Sangha), after which, He proceeded all alone to the village of Balakalonaka.

THE BUDDHA'S TENTH VASSA AT PĀLILEYYAKA FOREST

Bālakalokanaka was the feudal village of the wealthy Upāli. (According to the Sinhalese manuscript, it was also called Balakalonakāra.) The Buddha went to that village without telling either His Chief Disciple or any Great Disciple, nor even the Venerable Ānanda. Like a bull elephant that leaves his herd, He went there all by Himself, taking His bowl and robe.

For there would be no living being whom the Buddha was to enlighten during the coming tenth vassa. His lone departure from Kosambī city was a device to admonish the contentious and quarrelsome monks, He set off to Pālileyaka forest and (on His way) as He wanted to gladden and bolster up Bhagu Thera who was then staying in solitude in a forest-dwelling with Bālakalonaka village as the resort for alms.

Five Hundred Monks wished to accompany The Buddha

When the Buddha thus went alone, five hundred monks said to the Venerable Ānanda: “Venerable Ānanda, the Buddha has set out by Himself. Let us follow Him!” Ānanda then replied: “Brethren, when the Exalted One packs up His beddings, takes His bowl and robe and sets out alone without any attendant monk and without asking the Sangha for leave, then it is His wish to go unaccompanied. A disciple should act in accordance with the will of his teacher. Therefore, these days you should not follow the Master.” Thus the Venerable Ānanda did not let them go, nor did he himself follow the Master, knowing the Buddha’s wish.

When Venerable Bhagu saw from afar the Buddha coming alone to Bālakalonaka village, he prepared the seat, kept the water ready for the Buddha to wash His feet, and the board to wash His feet on and the potsherd to rub them with. He welcomed the Buddha and took His bowl and robe. Sitting on the seat prepared by the Venerable, the Buddha washed His feet and asked him, who was seated in a reverent posture at a suitable place: “Are you fit and well, monk? Do you have enough food? Do you get alms without hardship?” “Venerable Sir, I am all right. I have enough food. I get alms without hardship.” The Buddha then gave a talk on the benefit of living in solitude and then He proceeded to the eastern bamboo grove.

The Buddha's Arrival at The Eastern Bamboo Grove

At that time, the three Venerables, namely, Anuruddha, Nandiya and Kimila were living in the eastern bamboo grove. When the watchman of the grove saw from a distance the Buddha approaching, he mistook Him for an ordinary monk and tried to block the way saying:

“Monk, do not enter this grove. Three noble clansmen, having a bent for their welfare, reside in this grove. Do not make discomforts to them.”

(Note: Just as a hungry man longs for food, a thirsty man longs for drinking water, a man oppressed by cold longs for heat, a man oppressed by heat longs for cold, or a sad man longs for happiness, even so the Buddha, being weary of the disunited and contentious Kosambī monks, pondered as to who the virtuous men living there could be. While so doing, there appeared in His vision these three noble clansmen. Wishing to encourage them, He considered thus: “If I do so, this practice would mean a good way to admonish the Kosambī monks forever.” Hence His visit to the eastern bamboo grove, the abode of the said three good ones.

(The grove where the Venerable Anuruddha and others were dwelling was fenced, guarded and conserved by its owners so that the fruit, flowers, gum and wooden buildings in it might be safe from depredation by all sorts of people.

(When the watchman saw from afar the Buddha coming, he thought: “Here in this grove are the three worthy people still living in harmony. Quarrels and disputes tend to arise at any place where another person comes. Such a person might move about, attacking and destroying like a wild bull with sharp horns and such destruction could bring about dissension that make it impossible for two persons to go together along the same road. This visiting big monk might create discord at one time or another and destroy the united and happy stay of the three noble people. He seems impressive, has golden colour and looks like one who is fond of good food. From the time he arrives here, by praising his lay followers, who would offer him good meals, and by doing this and that, he might undermine the mindful monastic life led by the three good men.

(“Besides, there is accommodation only for the three: there are only three lodges, three walks, three day-retreats, three couches and three boards. There is nothing extra. This big monk, a newcomer, has a bulky body; perhaps he could be a recluse of long standing. He might displace the present occupants at an improper time, thereby making them unhappy in every respect.” Thus thinking, he forbade the Buddha's entry into the grove saying: “Do not disturb their comfort!” as he totally did not want the unhappiness of the worthy personages.

(It may be questioned: Did the watchman try to stop the Master knowing that He was the Buddha or did he do so unknowingly? The answer is: he did so unknowingly. Explanation: When the Buddha went about with the splendour of a Buddha in the company of monks, everybody recognized Him without asking: “Who is this man?” But now as He went to the eastern bamboo grove wishing: “Let nobody know of My being a Buddha,” He covered His rays and other Buddha-glories by means of His supernormal powers as if He had hidden them all under a drapery and He moved along incognito as the big full moon that is covered by clouds, personally taking His bowl and robe. The watchman stopped the Buddha because of his ignorance of the state of an Enlightened One.)

While staying at his day-retreat, Venerable Anuruddha overheard the watchman's word: “Monk, do not enter this grove!” and thought to himself: “Only we three are dwelling in this grove; there is no other resident here. The watchman was speaking as though he were communicating with a monk. Who could that man be?” He then rose, standing at the door, he looked over the road and saw the Buddha.

On the part of the Buddha, as soon as He caught a glimpse of the Venerable Anuruddha, He emitted the rays of His body. Splendid with the various major and minor marks, the body gave out light that was glorious like a strip of golden cloth spread out. Then it occurred to the Venerable: “Like a man who stretches his hand to grasp by the neck of a cobra with its hood erected, the poor man does not know that it is the Buddha whom he is dealing with, the foremost personality in the world. He speaks as if he were dealing with an insignificant monk.” So he commanded his man saying: “Watchman, do not stop the Buddha! Here comes our Master, the Exalted One!”

Welcome extended in Unison by The Venerables to The Buddha

Venerable Anuruddha did not welcome the Buddha alone, for he considered: “We three are staying in harmony at present. If I alone were to welcome the Buddha, it would not make our harmonious living. I will bring my friends and do the welcoming only together with them. My friends too adore the Buddha just as I do.” Wishing to meet the Buddha with his two pals, he went to their day retreats and called them. “Come, brethren! Come, brethren! Our Master, the Exalted One, has arrived!” Then the three Venerables extended their welcome to the Buddha in unison, one taking His bowl and robe, another preparing the seat and the third keeping the water, the board and the potsherd ready so that He might wash His feet.

Sitting on the prepared seat, the Buddha did the washing of the feet.

some crystal-clear water and poured it over his golden coloured insteps. and washed His feet rubbing one with the other.

(It may be asked: Why did the Buddha wash His feet even though His body was free from dust and dirt? The answer is: He washed His feet in order to cool His body as well as to gladden the three Venerables. To make the latter reason more explicit: by thus washing His feet, the Buddha could make the Venerables immensely delighted with the thought: “With the water brought by us, the Master cleanse His feet and thus make use of it.” Hence the Buddha's washing of His feet despite the fact that His body had no stains whatever.)

After respectfully doing obeisance to the Buddha, the three Venerables took their proper seats. Then asked the Buddha: “How are you, my dear sons, Anuruddha and all? Are you all fit and well? Are you all right with your postures? Are you free from hardship in getting food?”

The Venerable Anuruddha replied: “Exalted One, we are fit and well. We are all right with our postures. It is not hard for us to get food.”

(Herein, of the three Venerables, Anuruddha was the most senior. If honour be shown to Anuruddha, the senior-most Venerable, it follows that honour was shown to the juniors as well. That was why the Buddha addressed Anuruddha by name. Alternatively, in the Pāli Text the name Anuruddha has a plural case-ending literally meaning “My dear sons, Anuruddhas”; in His address the Buddha used [what is known as] the virupekasesa (elliptical) method covering also the remaining two Venerables.)

Again, the Buddha asked: “In living together, do you have harmony and happiness, Anuruddha and all, without dispute, and like milk and water do you mix well, seeing one another with amiable eyes?” “We really have harmony and happiness, knowing no disputes,” Anuruddha answered, “And we mix well like milk and water, seeing one another with eyes of amity.” “How do you manage to do so, Anuruddha?” the Buddha asked further. This the Venerable Anuruddha explained:

“Exalted One, living in this grove, I consider myself thus: ‘Great indeed is my gain! I have attained a great fortune, for I am sharing this dwelling with these co-residents of such nature! Exalted One, towards these two pals I perform physical acts with mettā (loving-kindness), verbal acts with mettā, and mental acts with mettā, both in their presence as well as in their absence. Exalted One, thinking that ‘If I would practise setting aside my will, but according to theirs,’ do I practise giving priority to their will over my own. Exalted One, though we three are of different bodies, we are, as it were, of the one and the same mentality.”

Thereafter Venerable Nandiya and Venerable Kimila told the Buddha in the same way as the Venerable Anuruddha did.

(Herein with reference to the words said of the performance of physical, verbal and mental acts with mettā, whether in the presence or in the absence of others, the physical and the verbal acts in the others' presence took place while living together; the same two acts in the others' absence took place while living apart; the mental acts, however, happened while living together or while living apart.

(To elaborate: When a fellow monk saw a couch, a board, a wooden article or an earthenware misplaced by another monk, he did not ask insolently: “Who has used this?” Instead he picked it up and restored it [to its proper place] as though he himself had misplaced it. (Moreover), he cleaned any place that needed cleaning. Thus the physical act performed by one was that performed with mettā in the presence of others.

(When one of the co-resident monks went away, either of the remaining monks similarly restored the monastic articles left behind in disorder by the departed monk. He cleaned any place that needed cleaning. The physical act thus performed was that performed with mettā in the absence of others.

(Living together with other Venerables, one spoke with them sweet and delightful words, appealing words, words worthy of lifelong remembrance, words of the Dhamma; one gave an audible talk on the Dhamma, discussed the Dhamma, and put questions and gave answers to them. Any of these varied verbal acts and others of his, was that performed with mettā in the presence of others.

(When the others left for another place, the remaining monk [Venerable Anuruddha, for instance] extolled their virtues saying: "My dear friend Venerable Nandiya [or Venerable Kimila] is endowed with such moral virtues and practical virtues." His verbal act of this kind was that performed with mettā in the absence of others.

("May my friend Venerable Nandiya [or Venerable Kimila] be free from harm! May he be free from hatred and ill-will that are perverse and destructive! May he be happy both physically and mentally!" Such mental act of focusing his thoughts of goodwill on others in their presence as well as in their absence was that performed with mettā on both occasions.

(How did each of the three Venerables put aside his idea and act in accordance with that of the others? Suppose one's bowl should show wear, another's robe should get dirty and the third's meditation cell was littered and needed tidying, while these three things should happen simultaneously, if the owner of the bowl said first: "My bowl has been worn; I have to make a new bowl by baking," then the others would not say: "My robe is dirty and I have to wash it" or "I have to remove the litter from my meditation cell." Instead, they would enter the forest and the other two would lend a hand in baking the bowl. Only after finishing the task of baking would they wash the robe or tidy the cell. If the second monk said first: "I have to wash my robe" or the third said first: "I have to remove the litter," the others would similarly attend to it and only after getting it done would they turn to their own business. This was the way how one fulfilled the others' wishes, leaving aside one's own.)

Having thus asked about the value of unity (sāmaggī-rasa) of the three persons and having known thus of the full value of their unity, the Buddha desired again to question on the signs of their mindfulness (appamāda-lakkhaṇa) and asked: "Anuruddha and all, how is it; do you abide having a bent for Nibbāna by putting great efforts without negligence?" "Exalted One," answered Venerable Anuruddha, "we do indeed abide having a bent for Nibbāna by putting great efforts without negligence." Again the Buddha asked: "How do you abide having a bent for Nibbāna by putting great efforts without negligence?" The Venerable Anuruddha replied:

"Exalted One, one of us residents in this grove, after coming back before others from the alms-round in the village, prepares seats, keeps the water and board ready for washing the feet and places the potsherds for rubbing them with; he sets the vessel ready for putting the first portions of food; he fetches the water for drinking and the water for other purposes.

"The monk, who returns later from the alms-round in the village, partakes of the remaining food, in case he desires. If he does not, he disposes of it at a place where there is no green grass or plant; or he throws it into the water that has no small creatures; he folds up the seat; he restores the water, the board and potsherds to their proper places; he does so with regard to the vessel after washing it; he stows away the water pot for drinking and that for other purposes: he sweeps the mess-room.

"If he finds any water pot empty, whether for drinking, or for general use or for the bath-room, he fills it. If it is heavy, he calls another monk by giving him a signal with his hand and the two carry it with their joined hands. Exalted One, we do not utter a word for the purpose of carrying the water pot. Exalted One, once in every five days we pass the time fruitfully by discussing the Dhamma throughout the night.

"Exalted One, in the aforesaid manner do we abide having a bent for Nibbāna by putting great efforts without negligence."

(Herein, an adorable and remarkable thing was that these Venerables did not go together on alms-round; as they delighted phala-samāpatti, they rose, did early ablution, fulfilled their duties, retired to their respective meditation cells and engaged in phala-samāpatti for a certain resolved period.

(Of the three Venerables, the one, who had engaged phala-samāpatti for the resolved period before others, went out ahead of them for alms. On his return, he came to know that "Those two are late; I have come back early," he then covered his bowl, prepared the seat and did other things. If he had food in his bowl just enough for himself, he simply sat down and ate it. If the food was more than enough, he put the first portion into the vessel, covered it and ate his portion. Having eaten, he washed the bowl, dried it, put it into its bag and, taking his bowl and robe, he went to his day-retreat.

(When a second monk came to the mess-room, he perceived: "One has gone ahead of me; the other is later than me." If he saw enough food in his bowl, he simply sat down and ate it. If the food was less than enough, he took some (left behind by the first monk) from the vessel. If the food in his bowl was more, he first put the surplus portion into the vessel and ate his meal just to sustain himself and, like the earlier monk, went to his day-retreat.

(When the third one came to the mess-room, he understood: "The other two have come and gone before me, I am the last." And he partook of his meal in the manner of the second one, after finishing his meal, he washed the bowl, dried it and put it into its bag and stowed the seat away. He threw away the remaining water from the drinking water pot and also that from the pot for general use and kept the pots upside down. Should there be any leftover food in the vessel, he discarded it on the ground where there was no green grass or into the water free from tiny living creatures and washed the bowl and stowed it away. After sweeping the mess-room, he removed the dust and kept the broom at a place free from termites and, taking the bowl with him, he retired to his day-retreat. Such was the daily routine of the Venerables at the mess hall outside the dwelling in the forest.

(Fetching water for drinking and for general purpose was a duty done in the dwelling place. If one of the three noble Venerables saw some water pot empty, he carried the pot to the pond, washed it both inside and out, filled it with water through a filter, and (if the pot proved too heavy for him) he placed it near the pond and called another person by gesture. In seeking a helping hand, he never made a sound mentioning or without mentioning that person's name.

(Because if he were to cry for help by mentioning somebody else's name, it would be a disturbance to the meditation of the monk concerned. That was why he never cried out the name. Should he make a sound calling somebody without mentioning his name, both monks would come out from their meditation cells, vying each other to get to the caller first. In that case, since it was a job that could be done only by two, the third one would find himself unwanted and his meditation engagement would only be unnecessarily interrupted. For this reason the caller did not make a sound even without mentioning the name.

(If he were not to make a sound, how did he try to get a helper? After filling the pot through a filter, he approached the day-retreat of another monk, making no sound of his footsteps; seeing him he called him by a hand gesture, that attracted him. Thereafter the two monks joined their hands, carried the pot together and kept the water for drinking or for general use.

(With reference to the words, "once in every five days we would pass the time fruitfully by discussing the Dhamma throughout the night", the fourteenth, the fifteenth, and the eighth of the bright or the dark fortnight, these three days served as the three occasions on which the Dhamma was usually heard. Without disrupting these three days of Dhamma talks, once in every five days, did both Venerables, Nandiya and Kimila, bathe not long after noon, and went to the Venerable Anuruddha. At his place they met and made questions and answers on any of the three Piṭakas. While they were thus doing, the day just dawned.

(Thus far did the Venerable Anuruddha, who was asked by the Buddha as to the signs of mindfulness, reply that they were not negligent even on the occasions that normally cause negligence (to others). Explanation: For other monks, the time of their going alms-round, leaving the dwelling for alms, adjusting the lower garment, putting on the upper robe, making a round, preaching the Dhamma, expressing their appreciation [of alms-giving], partaking of alms-food on return from the town or the village, washing the bowl, putting the bowl into the bag, and stowing away the bowl and robe, these were the (eleven) occasions on which they prolonged their talks that had nothing to do with mindfulness and thereby they became negligent of their meditation duties. The Venerable Anuruddha, therefore, meant to say: “As for us, even on these occasions which cause others to indulge in loose talks as opposed to meditation, never have we done such a thing as prolongation of speech that is opposed to meditation and that is outside meditation (though we may be physically free from engagement as practical meditation (vihāra-samāpatti) was uncalled for on these occasions.)” he thereby explained the signs of their mindfulness at its height even at times when others were negligent.

(By these words, he further meant to indicate that there were no negligence at all on their part by not being absorbed in practical meditation on the occasions other than the aforesaid eleven.)

The Buddha's Visit to Pālileyaka

As has been said above, the Buddha, having explained the advantage of living in solitude to the Venerable Bhagu at the village of Bālakaloṇaka for half a day and the whole night, entered the village of Bālakaloṇaka for alms the following day with Bhagu Thera as his companion. After sending him back from that very place, the Buddha went alone to the eastern bamboo grove with the thought: “I shall meet the three clansmen who are living in harmony.” He talked to the Venerables Anuruddha, Nandiya and Kimila about the benefit of living in harmony, and having asked them to remain there at the bamboo grove, He proceeded alone and arrived at Pālileyaka village.

The villagers welcomed the Buddha and made offerings to Him. Having constructed a dwelling for Him in the forest, named Rakkhita, near the village, they requested Him: “May the Exalted One stay here at this Rakkhita forest-dwelling.”

In the Rakkhita forest there was a huge sāla tree named Bhadda-sāla near the Buddha's dwelling place. The Buddha stayed about that tree near His dwelling in the forest with Pālileyaka village as His alms-resort. Then it occurred to Him who was staying in solitude:

“I could not live at ease, being mixed up with the Kosambī monks who indulge in disputes under My eyes or in My absence and created quarrels in the Sangha. Now that I am alone and unaccompanied, away from those disputing and quarrelling monks, My stay is happy.”

Story of Pālileyaka Elephant

At that time, there was a certain full grown male elephant, the leader of a herd, living still with young males, females, courting males and suckling's. Living in this manner, he had to feed on the grass without the tender tips; all the branches and twigs brought down from the trees by him were eaten up by other elephants. He also had to drink muddy water. Besides, when he rose from the ford, females went past by pushing him.

Then it occurred to him thus: “Living with such members of my herd compels me to eat the grass. The tender tips of which are gone as have been eaten earlier by others. Whatever I have brought down from the trees are devoured by them. It is the turbid water that I have to drink. Female elephants jostle my body when I come up from the water. Were it well if I would live away from the herd!" So thinking, he left the herd and happened to go to the Buddha near the huge sāla tree in the Pālileyayaka Rakkhita forest.

(Herein Palileyayaka was originally the name of the village. The original name of the forest was Rakkhita. Since the Rakkhita forest was near the village of Pālileyayaka, it was also called Pālileyayaka, by "way of its nearness (samīpūpacāra).” The elephant that had come to that forest was also referred to as Pālileyayaka elephant-king.)

Service rendered by Pālileyayaka Elephant to The Buddha

When the elephant, being sick of living with the herd and entering the forest he saw the Buddha seated at the foot of the sāla tree. On seeing Him, he felt calm like a man who has his grief allayed by the water from a thousand pots. With devotion in his heart, he was attached to the Buddha and stood near Him. From that time onwards, as his daily routine, he swept the ground around the Bhaddasāla tree and the Buddha's dwelling place with a twig so that the ground might be cleared of grass and plants, he brought water to the Buddha for washing His face, he fetched water for His bathing, he offered a small twig to be used as a tooth-cleaner, he brought sweet, delicious fruit of different sizes and offered them to the Buddha, who took them for food.

(With his trunk, the elephant brought firewood. By rubbing the fire sticks with one another, he produced fire, into which he put stones to bake them. When the stones became hot, he rolled them down into a stone basin by means of a stick; then he tried to ascertain whether the water was hot enough or not; if he knew it was, he approached the Buddha and stood near him. Perceiving that "the elephant wanted me to bathe," the Buddha went to the stone basin and bathed. In the same way did the elephant also keep the drinking water. (What should be taken as remarkable from this is that the Buddha drank boiled water that had been cooled.)

When the Buddha entered the village for alms-food, Palileyayaka elephant carried His bowl and robe on his head and went along with Him. When the Buddha reached the edge of the village, He said to the elephant: "Pālileyayaka, it is not fit for you to follow Me beyond this point. Get Me My bowl and robe!" thus He let the elephant put down His requisites from the head, and, carrying them by Himself, he entered the village.

The elephant waited at the same spot until the Buddha returned and when the latter came back, he greeted Him and in the previous manner, he took His bowl and robe. On arriving home in the forest dwelling, he placed them in their proper place; and waiting on the Master, he fanned Him with a twig. When night fell, intending: "I will give protection to the Buddha," he held a big stick with his trunk and roamed in the forest till dawn to ward off any danger from lions, tigers and leopards.

N.B. From that time onwards, the huge forest came to be known as Palileyayaka Rakkhita Forest, for it was guarded by Pālileyayaka elephant.

He performed in like manner all his duties beginning with offering of the water for the Buddha to wash the face at day-break.

In this way the Buddha spent the tenth vassa-period in the Pālileyayaka forest, receiving service rendered by Pālileyayaka elephant.

Criticism on The Kosambī Monks' Behaviour

While the Buddha was thus spending the vassa in the Pālileyayaka forest, the wealthy

Ghosaka and other lay devotees and donors, residents of Kosambī, went to the Ghositārāma monastery and not seeing Him, they inquired: “Venerable sirs, where is the Master staying?” To this, the monks give a sad answer saying: “Donors, the Master has gone to the Pālīyeyaka forest.” “Why?” asked the lay devotees. “The Master tried to restore unity in us as we were disunited,” said the monks. “But (having developed hatred among ourselves) we refused to be united. (Hence the Master's departure to the Pālīyeyaka forest.)” “How is it, sirs?” asked the lay people, “Despite your ordination from the Buddha's hand, and despite His attempt to restore your unity, do you remain disunited?” The monks admitted that it was true.

Many male and female lay devotees, citizens of Kosambī, agreed saying among themselves: “These Kosambī monks, who have been ordained by the Exalted One, are not united in spite of His effort to unite them. On account of them, we have long been deprived of the chance to behold the Master. We will give no seats to them, nor will we pay respects!” From that time onwards, the quarrelsome and contentious monks of Kosambī were no longer treated with respects (much less with the four requisites).

Because of the scarcity of food and starvation, the monks became emancipated day by day and came to their senses after a few days. They confessed their faults and apologized to one another with salutations; they also begged the laity's pardon, saying: “We have become untied, donors, please treat us as before!” “Have you tendered your apology to the Master?” asked the lay people. “No, donors not yet.” “Then you had better do so. After your doing so, will we treat you, sirs, as before,” replied the lay people tactfully. Since it was a vassa-period, the monks did not dare to visit the Buddha and had to pass the three months of vassa miserably.

The Monkey inspired by Pālīyeyaka Elephant.

Enjoying the service of Pālīyeyaka elephant (as has been said before), the Buddha stayed happily in the Pālīyeyaka forest for the three vassa months.

At that time, a monkey, seeing the daily duties performed actively and energetically by Pālīyeyaka elephant, became inspired and thought to himself: “I too will do some act of merit towards the Master.” One day, while roaming about, he found a tree-branch with a honeycomb devoid of bees, broke it and brought it with the broken branch to the Buddha. He then cut a plantain leaf, on which he placed the honeycomb and offered it to the Buddha. The Buddha accepted it.

The monkey watched to see whether the Buddha would enjoy it or not, and he saw Him remaining in his seat and just holding the honeycomb without eating it. The monkey investigated, wondering why. He took the honeycomb by its edge and turned it round, only to see the bee-eggs, which he slowly and gently removed and offered it again to the Buddha. Then only did He eat it.

So elated was the monkey that he joyously danced moving from one tree branch to another. While so doing, both the branches, which he was holding with his hand and which he was treading on, broke off and he fell on a tree stump. With his body pierced by the stump but with his mind devoted to the Buddha, he died and was reborn in a golden mansion measuring thirty yojanas in the deva abode of Tāvātimsa. He was known as Makkata Deva (monkey god) having a thousand female celestials as his retinue.

Pālīyeyaka's Thought and The Buddha's Udāna.

To Pālīyeyaka elephant, who had been fulfilling his daily duties to the Buddha in the aforesaid manner, it occurred thus:

“Associated with young males, females, courting males and suckling's, I could not live in peace formerly. I had to feed on the grass without their sprouts; all the branches and twigs brought down from trees were devoured by all others. It is the unclean water that I had to drink. What is more, female elephants showed no regard for me as I was rudely jostled by them when I came up from the water. Now that I have departed from them, I can live alone in peace.”

Knowing by Himself His own peaceful life away from His companions and knowing also the thought of Pālileyaka elephant, the Buddha breathed forth this udāna (solemn utterance):

*Etam nāgassa nāgena
isādantassa hatthino
sameti cittaṃ cittena
yad'eko ramatī vane.*

Being alone in this forest named Rikkhita, I, the Buddha, the Teacher of the three classes of beings (devas, humans and Brahmās), take delight. In the same way, this elephant, named Pālileyaka, delights being alone in this very forest. Therefore, the thought of Pālileyaka elephant, who possesses the pole-like tusks, is the same as Mine, who have been named Buddha-nāga, the elephant-like Buddha, living in the forest seclusion.

Ānanda's Entreaty to The Buddha.

The life of the Buddha observing vassa in the forest of Pālileyaka, enjoying the service rendered by Pālileyaka elephant, became well-known throughout the whole Jambūdīpa. The wealthy Anāthapiṇḍika, the monastery donor Visakha and other high-born residents of Savatthi sent their message to Venerable Ānanda saying: "Venerable Sir, kindly help us have an opportunity to behold the Exalted One!"

Five hundred bhikkhus who had been staying all over the places approached Ānanda at the end of vassa and made a request to him with these words: "Friend Ānanda, it has been long since we heard last the sermon from the Master. Friend Ānanda, we beg you. We would like to have a chance again to listen to the Exalted One."

Then the Venerable Ānanda went to the Pālileyaka forest leading the five hundred monks, but he thought that it would not be nice to draw near the Buddha together with such a large crowd as the Buddha had been living a solitary life for the whole vassa. He, therefore, left the monks somewhere else and approached the Buddha by himself.

On seeing the Venerable Ānanda, Pālileyaka elephant rushed to him carrying a stick in the grip of his trunk (for he mistook him for an enemy). When the Buddha saw this, He stopped the elephant saying: "Go away, Pālileyaka, go away! Do not block his way. This monk is my attendant." The elephant then dropped the stick and made a gesture to express his desire to take the Venerable's bowl and robe. But the Venerable refused to hand them.

Then the elephant thought: "If this monk were conversant with the rules of an attendant, he would not put his requisites on the stone slab which is the seat of the Master." The Venerable Ānanda laid down his bowl and robe on the ground. (Never does a well conducted person or a man versed in duties place his belongings on the seat or the bed of the respected teacher.)

After paying obeisance to the Buddha, Venerable Ānanda sat down in a blameless place. "Dear son, Ānanda, did you come alone?" asked the Buddha. When informed that he came together with five hundred monks, the Buddha inquired further: "Where are those five hundred monks now?" "I came, having left them somewhere else, as I did not know the inclination of the Exalted One," replied Venerable Ānanda. "Bring them here, dear Ānanda," the Buddha ordered.

As had been ordered by the Buddha, the Venerable Ānanda called the five hundred monks who came and paid obeisance to the Buddha and took their appropriate seats. When the Buddha had exchanged friendly greetings with them, the monks said to the Buddha: "You, Exalted One, are gentle partly because you have become a Buddha and partly because you have come of an aristocratic family. You have done a difficult thing by living all by yourself for the whole vassa. It seems that you have no one to attend to your needs, nobody to bring you the water for washing your face and so on." "Monks," addressed the Buddha, "Pālileyaka elephant has fulfilled all the duties due to me. In fact, one who has a good companion of such nature should live with that companion. In the absence of such a companion only a solitary life is praiseworthy. He then gave the following three verses which are preserved in the Nāga-Vagga (of the Dhammapada)

*Sace labhetha nipakam sahāyam
Saddhim caram sādhuvihari dhīram abhibhuyya sabbāni parissayāni careyya tenattamano satīmā.*

No ce labhetha nipakem sahāyam saddhim caram sādhuvihāri dhīram rājā'va rattham vijitam pahāya eko care mātaṅgaraññeva nāgo.

*Ekassa caritam seyyo
n'atthi bale sahāyatā
apposukko mātaṅgaraññeva nāgo.*

(The meaning of these three verses has been given in Chapter 36.) At the end of the verses the five hundred monks became established in the arahatta-phala.

Then the Venerable Ānanda conveyed the messages of the wealthy Anāthapiṇḍika and the monastery donor Visākhā and all, saying: “Exalted One, the five crores of noble donors, lay men and women, citizens of Sāvatti, headed by Anāthapiṇḍika the merchant, are waiting in great hopes for your coming.” “In that case, dear Ānanda, bring My bowl and robe,” so saying the Buddha set out from the Pālileyaka forest.

At that time Pālileyaka elephant came and lay across the path that was to be taken by the Buddha and His assembly of bhikkhus. When the bhikkhus asked: “Exalted One, what is the elephant doing?” The Buddha replied: “Monks, this elephant is desirous of offering alms-food to you, dear sons. In fact, this elephant has specially rendered service to Me for a long time, for which I am grateful. He ought not to be disappointed. Let us turn back, monks!” With these words, the Buddha turned back, leading the monks.

Pālileyaka went into the forest and gathered various edible fruits, such as jack fruit, bananas and so on; he brought them, kept them in heaps for offering to the monks the following day. The five hundred monks could not eat all.

When the eating was over, the Buddha had His bowl and robe brought and left the forest. Pālileyaka elephant made his way through the monks and stood across right in front of the Buddha again. “Exalted One, what is the matter with the elephant?” the monks asked. “This elephant wants Me to turn back and to send you, dear sons, away,” answered the Buddha, who also said to the elephant: “This time I am going positively without turning back. With this body of yours it is not possible for you to attain jhāna, Insight, the Path and Fruition. Stay behind!” On hearing these words, the elephant, putting his trunk into his mouth and weeping, followed the assembly of monks headed by the Buddha. Indeed, if he were able to make the Buddha return, for life would he serve the Master only in the previous manner.

On reaching the outskirts of the Pālileyaka village, the Buddha addressed His last words to the elephant: “Pālileyaka, beyond this point is no habitat of yours. A human abode is dangerous. You had better remain here!” The elephant stood lamenting there with his eyes set on the Buddha as far as he could see, when he lost sight of the Buddha, he died of a broken-heart at that very spot. By virtue of his meritorious state of devotion to the Buddha, he was reborn a god with a retinue of a thousand celestials in a golden mansion, thirty yojanas wide; he bore the famous name of Pālileyaka Deva.

Kosambī Monks' Apology to The Buddha

The Buddha journeyed on and eventually arrived at Jetavana monastery in Sāvatti. Getting the news that “the Exalted One has come to Sāvatti,” the monks of Kosambī headed for Sāvatti to apologize to the Buddha. (What has been narrated is from the Dhammapada Commentary.)

The Eighteen Means of knowing The Righteous (Dhammavādi) and The Eighteen Means of knowing The Unrighteous (Adhammavādi)

(The following is from the Vinaya Mahāvagga Pāli.) At that time Venerable Sāriputta, the General of the Dhamma, hearing of the arrival of the Kosambī monks, approached the Buddha, paid obeisance to Him and sat down in a faultless place. He then said to the Buddha:

“It is said, Exalted Buddha, that the quarrelsome and contentious Kosambī monks are coming to Savatti. Exalted Buddha, how should we deal with them?” The Buddha replied: “Dear son Sāriputta, in that case you should abide by the Dhamma.” “How could we know, Exalted Buddha, what is the Dhamma and what is not?” asked the Venerable Sāriputta. This led to the Buddha's instruction of the following the eighteen characteristics of unrighteousness (adhamma) and the other eighteen characteristics of righteousness (dhamma).

Eighteen Characteristics of Unrighteousness (Adhamma-vatthu).

“Dear son Sāriputta, an unrighteous person should be known by the eighteen characteristics. Here in this dispensation, a monk indicates:”

- (1) what is no Dhamma as Dhamma,
- (2) what is Dhamma as no Dhamma,
- (3) what is no Vinaya as Vinaya,
- (4) what is Vinaya as no Vinaya,
- (5) what the Buddha teaches not as the teaching of Buddha,
- (6) what the Buddha teaches as no teaching of the Buddha,
- (7) what the Buddha practises not as the practice of the Buddha,
- (8) what the Buddha practises as no practice of the Buddha,
- (9) what the Buddha prescribes not as the rule of the Buddha,
- (10) what the Buddha prescribes as no rule of the Buddha,
- (11) no offence as offence,
- (12) offence as no offence,
- (13) minor offence as major,
- (14) major offence as minor,
- (15) expiable offence as inexpiable,
- (16) inexpiable offence as expiable,
- (17) gross offence as no gross, and
- (18) no gross offence as gross.

“Dear son Sāriputta, by these eighteen characteristics should an unrighteous person be known.”

Eighteen Characteristics of Righteousness (Dhamma-vatthu)

“My son Sāriputta, a righteous person should be known by the eighteen characteristics. Here in this dispensation, a monk indicates:”

- (1) what is no Dhamma as no Dhamma,
- (2) what is Dhamma as Dhamma,
- (3) what is no Vinaya as no Vinaya,

- (4) what is Vinaya as Vinaya,
- (5) what the Buddha teaches not as no teaching of the Buddha,
- (6) what the Buddha teaches as the teaching of the Buddha,
- (7) what the Buddha practises not as no practice of the Buddha,
- (8) what the Buddha practises as the practice of the Buddha,
- (9) what the Buddha prescribes not as no rule of the Buddha,
- (10) what the Buddha prescribes as the rule of the Buddha.,
- (11) no offence as no offence,
- (12) offence as offence,
- (13) minor offence as minor,
- (14) major offence as major,
- (15) expiable offence as expiable,
- (16) inexpiable offence as inexpiable,
- (17) gross offence as gross, and
- (18) no gross offence as no gross,

“Dear son Sāriputta, by these eighteen characteristics should a righteous person be known.” Thus taught the Buddha.

(Similarly, on the side of righteousness, the eighteen items, such as (1) indication of what is no Dhamma as no Dhamma, (2) indication of what is Dhamma as Dhamma ... (17) indication of gross offence as gross, and (18) indication of no gross offence as no gross, are called the eighteen characteristics of righteousness (dhamma-vatthu). He who possesses any of these characteristics is to be known as a righteous person (dhamma-vādī). Thus the purport of the Buddha's instruction should be understood briefly.

Distinction between Positive and Negative Items

(Of these [two sets of ] eighteen items, by way of Suttanta, the ten wholesome actions (kusalakamma-patha) are the Dhamma; the ten unwholesome actions (akusalakamma-patha) are no Dhamma. Likewise, the thirty-seven constituents of enlightenment (Bodhipakkhiya-dhamma), namely, the four foundations of mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna), the four right efforts (Sammappadhāna), etc. are Dhamma. (The wrongly enumerated aggregates of the above constituents, namely,) the three foundations of mindfulness, the three right efforts, the three bases of psychic powers (iddhipāda), the six faculties (indriya), the six mental powers (bala), the eight factors of enlightenment (bojjhaṅga), the nine constituents of the path (maggaṅga) as well as the four attachments (upādāna), the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa), the seven latent desires (anusaya) and the eight wrong views (micchādiṭṭhi), these and other aggregates are no Dhamma.

(If someone, after taking any of these false aggregates which are no Dhamma, and after discussing with others and coming to an agreement with them saying: “We shall indicate and speak of this stock of what is no Dhamma as Dhamma, if we do so, we shall belong to the higher class of teaching families and we ourselves shall become well-known in society,” declares: “This indeed is Dhamma!”, (1) he indicates what is no Dhamma as Dhamma.

(Likewise, if he, taking any of these true aggregates, declares, “This indeed is no Dhamma,” (2) he indicates what is Dhamma as no Dhamma.

(In terms of Vinaya, if a person questions another's offence, makes him realize it and takes action correctly in accordance with the latter's confession, that is a righteous action (dhamma-kamma). If a person, without questioning, without making him realize it and without bringing about his confession, takes action incorrectly, that is an unrighteous action (adhamma-kamma). If one speaks of a righteous action as unrighteous, then one indicates Dhamma as no Dhamma. “To speak of” means “to indicate.”

(By way of Suttanta, elimination of lust (raga), elimination of hate (dosa), elimination of delusion (moha), the fivefold restraint (saṃvara), namely, restraint by precepts (sīla-saṃvara), restraint by mindfulness (sati-saṃvara), restraint by wisdom (ñāṇa-saṃvara), restraint by forbearance (khantī-saṃvara), restraint by energy (vīriya-saṃvara); the fivefold rejection (pahāna), namely, rejection of evil by right view (tadaṅga-pahāna), rejection by mental concentration (samādhi-pahāna), rejection by destruction (samuccheda-pahāna), rejection by being peaceful (patippassaddhi-pahāna), and rejection by attainment of Nibbāna (nissaraṇa-pahāna), and reflection so that there can be no happening of lust, hate and delusion. These aggregates [of elimination, restraint, rejection and reflection form discipline; reversibly. the aggregates of non-elimination, non-restraint [non-rejection], and non-reflection of lust, etc. form no discipline.

(In terms of Vinaya, completeness of the five factors, namely, candidate (vatthu), ordination-house (sīma), assembly (parisā), declaration (ñatti), and ‘text for deeds’ (kamma-vācā) is discipline; incompleteness or defectiveness of these five is no discipline.

(By way of Suttanta, the four foundations of mindfulness, the four right efforts, the four bases of psychic powers, the five faculties, and the eight constituents of the path, these doctrinal aggregates are what the Buddha teaches; never does the Buddha teach that there are three foundations of mindfulness, three right efforts, three bases of psychic powers, six faculties, six psychic powers, eight factors of Enlightenment, and nine constituents of the Path.

1. Pārājika: “Any transgressor of these rules is defeated in his purpose in becoming a bhikkhu.” The four offences of this kind are: (1) indulgence in sexual intercourse, (2) taking with intention to steal what is not given, (3) intentional deprivation of a human life, and (4) making claim to attainments which he does not really possess.
  2. Saṅghādisesa: An offence of this kind entails formal meeting of the Sangha to decide the case and the action to be taken against the offender of the rule. The first of the 13 Saṅghādisesa offences is engagement in bodily contact with a woman through immoral thoughts.
  3. Aniyata: The nature of such offence is to be determined whether it is Pārājika, Saṅghādisesa or not so grave Pācittiya as in the case of a monk who sits in a place secluded, unseen and convenient for an immoral purpose. The other case is when he does so in a place seen and inconvenient for an immoral purpose but convenient for talking immorally to the woman.
  4. Nissaggiya: Offences of this kind involve forfeit and repentance, the first of them occurs when a bhikkhu keeps more than permissible number of robes: he has then to surrender the extra ones and confess his offence. See U Ko Lay, Guide to Tipitaka, pp. 11-12, Burma Piṭaka Association Rangoon. 1986.
  5. Āsayānusaya ñāṇa: The knowledge of inclinations and the latent tendencies.

relation of pertinent stories as demanded by occasion, these doings form the practice of the Buddha. No absorption in Attainment of Fruition, No absorption in Attainment of Great Compassion, etc., form no practice of His.

(In terms of Vinaya, observance of vassa-residence in a certain town or a village at the request of the devotees concerned, journey at the end of the vassa-period after informing the devotees concerned or after performing Pavarana, greeting addressed to the visiting monks with the words: “Are you keeping fit, dear sons? Are you faring well?” and so on; doings of these and other things form the practice of the Buddha. No doings of such things form no practice of His.

(In certain Vinaya rules, there are such lines as “He who unknowingly commits is not guilty; he who commits without intent to steal is not guilty; he who commits without intent to cause death is not guilty” and so on. The set of rules like these is the collocation of no offences. “He who knowingly commits is guilty; he who commits with intent to steal is guilty; he who commits with intent to cause death is guilty” and so on. The set of rules like these is the set of offences.

(Of the seven kinds of offences, namely, Pārājika offences, Saṅghādisesa offences, Thullaccaya offences, Pācittiya offences, Pātidēsaniya offences, Dukkata offences and Dubbhāsī offences, the latter five are minor and no gross while the former two (Pārājika and Saṅghādisesa offences) are major and gross.

(Of these seven kinds of offences, the last six are expiable (Sāvasesa āpatti) as the offender's monkhood still remains. (That is to say, if he commits any of the latter six kinds, his state of a monk is still valid even though he is guilty. The Pārājika offence is inexpiable. (This is to say, if he violates a Pārājika rule he totally loses that validity leaving no traces whatever of monkhood in him.)

(In this way the nine pairs of Dhamma and no Dhamma, etc should be particularly understood. This explanation is taken from the exposition of the Saṅgha bhedakakkhandhaka, Vinaya Cūḷa-Vagga Commentary.)

Like the Venerable Sāriputta, the Venerables Mahā Moggallāna, Mahā Kassapa, Mahā Kaccāyana, Mahā Koṭṭhika, Mahā Kappina, Mahā Cunda, Anuruddha, Revata, Upāli, Ānanda and Rāhula, also heard of the coming of the Kosambī monks to Sāvatti. They approached the Buddha and asked Him as the Venerable Sāriputta did. Then also did the Buddha teach them the eighteen items of righteousness and the eighteen items of unrighteousness the way He taught Venerable Sāriputta.

So did the Buddha's aunt, Therī Mahā Pajāpati Gotamī, who learnt of the coming of the Kosambī monks and she visited the Buddha. She paid Him obeisance, stood at a proper place and put the same question as Venerable Sāriputta's. The Buddha then told Therī Mahāpajāpati Gotamī thus:

“In that case, Gotamī, listen to the sayings of both groups of monks. Having listened, you should prefer the view, wish, liking, and acceptance of the righteous of the two parties. All that is to be expected from the Community of Bhikkhus by the Community of Bhikkhunīs should be desirable only from the righteous.”

On receiving the news, the wealthy Anāthapiṇḍika, donor of the Jetavana monastery and Visākhā, the donor of the Pubbārāma monastery, too went to the Buddha and reported the matter. To them as well the Buddha said:

“Anāthapiṇḍika, (Visākhā), in that case give alms to both parties! Having given alms, listen to the sermons from both! Having listened, you should prefer the view, wish, liking and acceptance of the righteous monks!”

Commentary.)

(The following, however, is from the Dhammapada Commentary) On hearing the news that “the quarrelsome Kosambī monks are coming to the city of Savatthi,” King Pasenadi Kosala approached the Buddha and said: “Exalted One, I would not like to grant permission to those Kosambī monks to enter my kingdom.” To this the Buddha replied: “Your Majesty, those Kosambī Monks are virtuous. It was only on account of dispute that they took no heed of what I said. Now they are coming to apologize to me. Let them come!”

“Exalted One, I would not like to let them come into the monastery,” said the King. As the Buddha rejected his desire as before, the King only kept quiet.

When the Kosambī monks arrived in Sāvattthi, the Buddha made special effort to keep the monks quiet and to provide them with accommodation at the outlying parts of the monastery. Not only other monks shunned company with them but all visiting monks of modesty asked the Buddha: “Who are the quarrelsome and contentious Kosambī bhikkhus, Exalted One?” The Buddha pointed out the monks, saying: “These are they!” As the virtuous visitors said: “We are told that the quarrelsome and contentious Kosambī monks are they. We are told that the Kosambī monks who defy the Buddha's words are they!” and pointed their fingers at them, the Kosambī monks felt so ashamed that they dared not raise their heads but threw themselves at the feet of the Buddha and begged His pardon. Then the Buddha said:

“Monks, you became bhikkhus under an Omniscient Buddha like Me, and although I, Myself, tried to bring about harmony, you disobey Me which was indeed a grave mistake on your part.

“A good wise Bodhisatta of ancient times once listened to the advice of his parents, who were about to be killed and following their advice, secured kingship of two great countries later on, though the parents had been put to death.”

The Buddha then related the Kosambaka Jātaka (the story of Dīghāvu) in detail. The Buddha added:

“In this way monks, although his parents were killed, the Bodhisatta Prince Dīghāvu gave heed to the advice of his parents and eventually won the daughter of King Brahamadatta and became ruler of the two great kingdoms of Kāsi and Kosala. You, dear sons, however, did not follow My word and committed so great a wrongdoing.”

The Buddha then uttered the following stanza:

Ye ca tattha vijānanti, tato sammanti'medhagā.*

Here in the midst of the crowded assembly of monks, those who are foolish and quarrelsome, do not realize that “We are drawing near the King of Death every minute” as they lack the eye of wisdom. In that very assembly, the wise monks who are brilliant, however, realize that they are approaching Death from moment to moment. On account of that realization do quarrels and disputes completely cease through right practice.

At the end of the verse, the monks who had assembled there became established in sotāpatti-phala and higher states.

By means of these sermons did the Buddha save and convert devas, humans and Brahmās (in the Pālileyyaka forest for the whole period beginning from the end of the tenth vassa up to the beginning of the eleventh).

Chapter 29

THE BUDDHA'S ELEVENTH VASSA AT BRAHMIN VILLAGE OF NĀĪA

As has been said before, after staying at Jetavana monastery in Sāvatti for as long as there were beings to be converted, the Buddha journeyed again and eventually reached the brahmin village named Ekanāḷa, in the district of Dakkhiṇāgiri, so named because it lay to the south of the hill that stood near the city of Rājagaha in Magadha country. There He observed the eleventh vassa with the brahmin village as a resort for alms.

While dwelling in the monastery named Dakkhiṇāgiri, the Buddha did, as usual, two series of activities: (1) morning activities (pure-bhatta-kicca, lit. before-meal doings) and (2) after-meal activities (pacchā-bhatta-kicca). Having finished the morning activities, He did the after-meal one, which were of four series. At the end of the fourth series, He surveyed the world of sentient beings through His Buddha Eye (Buddha-cakkhu) that consists of Asayāmusaya-ñāṇa and Indriya-paropariyatti-ñāṇa, and saw in His vision Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja who had the potentials for arahatship because of his past meritorious deeds. The Buddha also came to know thus:

“On my visit to the Brahmin's cultivation site, My conversation with him will take place. When the conversation is over, the Brahmin, having listened to My discourse, will attain arahatship.”

The Buddha therefore went to the Brahmin's farm and conversed with him and gave him a discourse called Kasibhāradvāja Sutta.

(The Kasibhāradvāja Sutta is contained in the Saṃyutta Nikāya. In this Chronicle, the Sutta Nipāta and its Commentary will be based for narration.)

Five Series of The Buddha's Activities

With reference to the Buddha's activities, the Saṃyutta Nikāya Commentary and others enumerate five series of activities, whereas the Sutta Nipāta Commentary, combining the latter four, gives only two, namely, the morning series and the after-meal series. The idea, however, is the same. Hence two series according to the Sutta Nipāta Commentary and five series according to the other Commentaries, namely, the activities in the first watch of the night (purima-yāma-kicca), the activities in the middle watch (majjhima-yāma-kicca), the activities in the last watch (pacchima-yāma-kicca). These five series of activities will be described in serial order so that readers might develop their devotion.

(1) The Buddha's Morning Activities (Pure-bhatta Buddha-kicca)

The Buddha rose early in the morning and, in order to honour His attendant monk with merit as well as to see to His own physical wellbeing, cleaned His body by washing His face first and then spent the rest of the time engaging in phala-samāpatti in quietude till the time of going on alms-round. Then He adjusted His lower garment, girded His waist, put on His robe, took His bowl and entered the village sometimes alone and at other times in the company of monks. His entry into the village took place sometimes in a natural manner and at other times attended by miracles. For instance:

When He went to alms-round, gentle breezes blew, cleaning the ground before Him. Clouds repeatedly sprayed water, putting the dust to rest along the way, and followed the Buddha like a canopy above Him. The winds too blew bringing the blossoms from all the places and scattering them to make a bed of flowers all the way down. The natural high ground lowered itself and became even. So did the natural low ground become high and level with other parts of the ground automatically. Stones, pebbles, potsherds, stumps and thorns moved away on their own accord.

When the Buddha put down His foot on the ground, the surface became even; or the lotus flowers, which were as big as carriage-wheels and which provided a delightful touch, arose under the feet for ready support.

As soon as the Buddha laid His right foot on the threshold at the entrance of a town or a village, the six-hued rays streamed out from His body as though they poured liquid of gold on edifices including square-roofed and pinnacled houses, or as though they covered them with exquisite drapery. The rays rushed from place to place making them all luminous with brilliant lights. Horses, elephants, birds and other animals made agreeable sounds while remaining in their respective places. Similarly, drums, harps and other musical instruments produced pleasant music without players. Ornaments, such as necklaces, earrings, bangles, arm-bands, etc., which were worn by people, sounded sweet automatically. From these signs they knew "Today comes the Blessed One into our town (or village) for alms-food!"

Well-dressed and well-robed people came out of their houses with scents, flowers and other offerings in their hands. They gathered on the main road in the town-centre and paid obeisance with their offerings respectfully. They asked for monks, as many as they could afford, to provide meals, saying: "Venerable Sirs, give us ten monks," "Give us twenty," "Give us a hundred," and so on. They also took the alms-bowl of the Buddha and placed the seats and treated the monks to meals.

After partaking of His food, the Buddha instructed the devotees according to their inclinations so that some might be established in the three refuges, others in the five precepts, still others in one of the fruitions of sotāpatti, sakadāgāmi and anāgāmi and the rest in monkhood and arahatship. In this way, He uplifted the multitudes spiritually by teaching them the Dhamma and finally He returned to the monastery.

On arrival at the monastery, the Exalted One sat on His Buddha-seat, readily made in the round flagrant pavilion and waited until the monks had eaten their meals. When they had finished eating, the attendant monk would inform the Buddha. Then only did He go into the scented chamber.

(All these were the Buddha's series of activities in the morning. There were still others done in detail but not described here. These may be taken as recorded in the Brahmāyu Sutta of the Majjhima Paṇṇāsa Pāli.)

(2) The Buddha's After Meal Activities (Pacchā-bhatta Buddha-kicca)

After meal, the Buddha sat on the seat prepared by the attendant monk near the scented chamber (at the meeting place of the monks) and washed His feet. Then standing on the washing-board, He exhorted the monks thus:

"Monks, work out your completion of the threefold training by mindfulness. Hard indeed is to live in the time of the appearance of a Buddha in the world. Hard indeed is to have human life. Hard indeed is to have faith. Hard indeed is to have monkhood. Hard indeed is to hear (i.e., to have an opportunity of listening to) the True Law."

At such meetings, some monks asked the Buddha about meditation. To them, He instructed on meditation (methods) according to their inclinations. They then paid obeisance to Him respectfully and retired to their respective day-resorts or night-resorts, some going to the forest, some to the foot of a tree, some to certain places up in the hills while others to the celestial abodes of Catumahārājika, Tāvātimsa, Yāma, Tusitā, Nimmānarati or Paranimmita Vasavattī.

Thereafter, the Buddha entered the fragrant chamber and lay down on His right side, if He wished for a moment without abandoning mindfulness. With His body eased, He rose and surveyed the world of sentient beings during the second period (of the day). During the third period, however, as He was to live depending upon the village-resort for alms, residents of towns or villages, who had given morning alms, nicely dressed and robed, gathered in the monastery, bearing scents and flowers and other offerings, to listen to the Buddha's sermon in the afternoon. Then the Buddha arrived in a miraculous way agreeable to the audience and sat down on His sacred Buddha-seat, which was prepared in the Dhamma Hall (the round pavilion where sermons were delivered). Then He gave a talk on the Dhamma which was appropriate to the length of the time available and dismissed the audience when He knew the time was up. The people, having saluted Him, left the place.

(3) The Buddha's Activities in The First Watch of The Night (Purima-yāma Buddha-kicca)

Having finished His daytime activities after the meal, the Buddha, if He wanted to bathe, rose from His Buddha-seat and went to the place where the attendant monk had fetched the water for His bath. Taking the bath-robe from His attendant's hand, He entered the bathroom.

While the Buddha was bathing, the attendant monk brought a seat for Him and placed it somewhere in the fragrant chamber. Having bathed, He put on the well-dyed and doubly folded robe, girding His waist, with His upper robe under the right arm and over the left shoulder, He then sat alone in the Buddha-seat, which was prepared in the fragrant chamber for a moment of recreation.

After a while, monks would arrive from their respective day-resorts and night-resorts to wait upon Him. At such meetings, some monks presented their problems, some asked about meditation subjects, while others made requests for a discourse. To them all, the Buddha gave His help by fulfilling their wishes and thereby spending the early hours of the night.

(4) The Buddha's Activities in The Middle Watch of The Night (Majjhima-yāma Buddha-kicca)

When the monks departed, after paying their salutations to the Buddha as that series of the Buddha's activities was over, devas and Brahmās, from all over the ten thousand world-systems, took the opportunity of approaching Him to ask questions which had cropped up in their thoughts. The questions asked were extensive and covered a wide range of topics but the Buddha answered them, leaving none unanswered. Thus, He let the hours around midnight pass.

(5) The Buddha's Activities in The Last Watch of The Night (Pacchima-yāma Buddha-kicca)

The last watch of the night (or the daybreak) was divided into three parts: the first part was used for walking up and down in order to ease the strain due to His sitting posture since dawn; the second part was taken up by His lying down on His right without losing His mindfulness in the fragrant chamber, and in the third part, He rose from lying, sat cross-legged, surveying the world of sentient beings through His twofold Buddha-Eye, namely, Asayānusaya-nāṇa and Indriya-paropariyatti-nāṇa, to find out clearly individuals, who had done in their past lives principal (adhikāra) meritorious deeds, such as dāna, sīla, etc., in the presence of former Buddhas. This is the exposition given in the Saṃyutta Commentary, Sīlakkhandha Commentary and other works.

The exposition of the Sutta Nipāta Commentary, reads as follows:

The morning time was divided into four periods: in the first period the Buddha walked to and fro; in the second period, He lay down on His right side in the fragrant chamber without losing mindfulness, which was noble lying. The third period was spent by engaging in the jhāna of arahatta-phala-samāpatti. In the fourth period, He was absorbed in the jhāna of mahākaruṇā-samāpatti and He surveyed the world of sentient beings by the aforesaid twofold Buddha-Eye so that He could see what beings were of less 'dust' in their eyes, what beings were of more 'dust' and so on.

Thus it was customary for the Buddha to carry out diligently the five series of His activities daily wherever He stayed. In accordance with that practice, when the Buddha was now dwelling, during the eleventh vassa, at the Dakkhināgiri Monastery, He also performed these duties. One day, when He did "the survey of the world of sentient beings through his Buddha-Eye," which was one of His activities during the last watch of the night, He saw in His vision, by His Omniscience, the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja who was endowed with adhikāra merit that would contribute to his attainment of arahatship. On further reflection, He foresaw thus: “The Brahmin will today hold the ploughing ceremony. When I get to his ploughing field, My conversation with him will take place. At the end of My conversation, on listening to My discourse, he will don the robe and become an arahat.” The Buddha then remained at Dakkhināgiri Monastery waiting for an opportune moment.

Kasibhāradvāja's Ploughing Ceremony.

That day witnessed the ploughing ceremony of Kasibhāradvāja Brahmin, a native of Ekanāla village, (the Brahmin was so named because he belonged to the clan of Bhāradvāja and his occupation was farming). The Brahmin's programme for the first day of the festive ploughing and sowing was as follows:

Three thousand bulls of draught were kept in readiness. All their horns were dressed beautifully in gold sheaths and so were their hoofs in silver sheaths. All of them were adorned with white flowers and the scented prints of the five fingers. They possessed the mark of best breed, each with splendid head and four legs. Some had dark brown colour of colyrium stones, some had crystal white colour, some coral red while others were splotchy like masāragalla precious stone.

Likewise, five hundred farm workers, completely in white garments and bedecked with fragrant flowers, their right shoulder bearing large floral wreaths, and they were shining as they were besmeared with orpiment and realgar all over their bodies. When they set forth, they did so in groups, each having ten ploughs. The front of the ploughs, the yokes and the goads were covered with gold plates. Of the five hundred ploughs, the very first had eight bullocks harnessed to it; each of the remaining ones had four bullocks. The rest of the bullocks were brought as reserves to replace those tired. To each group of ten ploughs was attached a cartload of seeds. The ploughing was done by each farm-worker in turn. So was the sowing accomplished.

The landlord, Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja himself, had his beard and moustache groomed early in the morning, he had also bathed, applied paste of great fragrance to his body, put on his garment worth five hundred pieces and placed an upper robe worth a thousand on his left shoulder, each of his fingers had two rings, thus making twenty rings all together, his two ears wore ear-plugs with the design of the lion's mouth; his head had a turban like that of the Brahmā, a gold ornament with a pattern of flowers was worn at his neck. Surrounded by a host of brahmins, he supervised the work.

Thereafter the Brahmin's wife had many pots of milk food cooked and brought by carts. She bathed with scented water, fully dressed herself and went to the farm in the company of other brahmin women.

In the Brahmin's house, too, everywhere was perfumed. Parched rice was strewn everywhere. Pots filled with water, banana-trees, flags, banners and streamers were used for decoration. And, with scents, flowers, etc., worship was done. In the field, flags of cylinder-shaped and flat were hoisted everywhere. Assistants, workers and those who assembled there numbered two thousand and five hundred. Everyone was in new clothes and milk-food had been prepared for them.

When everything was ready for the occasion at the farm, the Brahmin had his golden bowl, which was normally used for his eating, cleansed and filled with milk-food flavoured with butter, honey and molasses. He then had it offered in sacrifice to the god of the plough. The Brahmin's wife had bowls of gold, silver, white copper and red copper distributed among the five hundred farm workers, and she herself fed them by pouring the milk-food into their bowls, one after another, with a cup-like ladle. After finishing the offerings to deities, however, wearing his sandals with red straps and holding a red walking-stick of gold, the Brahmin went from place to place to oversee as required, and to say: “Pour milk-food into this man's bowl! Put butter into this man's! Ladle out molasses into his!”

This was how the ploughing ceremony of the Brahmin landlord Kasibhāradvāja was held.

The Buddha visited The Ploughing Ceremony

At that time, while staying at the fragrant chamber, the Buddha knew that the feast of milk-food was going on and decided that “The time has come for me to exhort the Brahmin!”. Hence, He adjusted His lower robe, girded His waist, put on His upper robe, took His alms-bowl, and went alone to the place where the ploughing ceremony was taking place in full swing, (Herein whenever the Buddha wished to collect alms-food, the stone alms-bowl in inda-nīla blue (that had been presented by the four Guardian Deities) appeared automatically in the middle of the Buddha’s two hands; it was not necessary for Him to go elsewhere and bring it. As the bee comes to the place of a variety of flowers, so the bowl presented itself to Him.

(Herein one may ask: “Why did not the monks follow the Buddha?” The answer is: When the Buddha was desirous of going alone, He entered the fragrant chamber at the time of collecting food in the morning and remained there after closing the door. From that hint the monks know “Today the Master wants to go alone into the town or the village. Surely the Master must have seen in His vision somebody to convert.” Knowing thus they took their respective alms-bowls and went on their rounds after circumambulating the fragrant chamber. On that day, for the conversion of Kasibhāradvāja, too, the Buddha did in the manner already mentioned. That was the reason for the monks did not go with the Buddha.)

At the time of the Buddha’s visit, the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja was still presiding the feast of milk-food for the members of his retinue. The Buddha then reached the site of the feast and stood at a suitable place.

(Herein the Buddha’s going to and standing on the feasting ground was just to grant His blessing to the Brahmin. In fact, He went there not because He wanted to partake of His share like a destitute. To elaborate: The Buddha had relatives numbering one hundred and sixty thousand which comprised eighty thousand being maternal and eighty thousand paternal. These relatives could afford to provide permanent sustenance by their wealth. Indeed the Buddha donned the robe not for food. Truly, He became an ascetic with the determination: “For countless aeons I had given the five great gifts and fulfilled the Perfections. Thereafter, having liberated Myself from saṃsāra, I will liberate beings worthy of liberating, as much as I am liberated. Having tamed Myself with the restraint of the six senses, I will tame beings worthy of taming, as much as I am tamed. Having calmed Myself with the extinction of all the heat of moral defilements, I will calm beings worthy of calming, as much as I am calm. Having attained Myself the element of peace with regard to the body and defilements, I will teach beings worthy of attaining the element of peace with regard to the body and defilements, as much as I do.” Therefore, it was because He wanted to liberate these beings as much as He had liberated Himself from saṃsāra; it was because He wanted to tame those beings as much as He had tamed Himself with the restraint of the six senses; it was because He wanted to calm those beings as much as He had calmed Himself with the extinction of all the heat of the defilements; it was because He wanted to attain the element of peace with regard to the body and moral defilements that He wandered about the world. In His present wandering, He went and stood there on the ground, where the feast of milk-food was in full swing, in order to show His favour to the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja.)

The Buddha, having stood at a place high enough for Him to be seen and to be heard by Kasibhāradvāja, emitted His body-rays in the colour called pīṭa as though it were a mixture of gold liquid and yellow orpiment. Far brighter than the light of a thousand suns and a thousand moons, the rays reached up to the distance of eighty cubits. Enveloped on all sides by the Buddha’s body light, the walls of the Brahmin’s workshop, the trees around and the lumps of turned-over earth and other objects looked like solid gold.

At that time the people who were helping themselves to the milk-food saw the peerless Buddha with the glowing Buddha-splendour. Accordingly, they washed their hands and feet and, with their joined hands raised in adoration, they stood surrounding the Buddha. When the Brahmin saw the Buddha being surrounded by the people, he became unhappy, thinking: "My work has been purposely disrupted!" Noticing the major and minor marks, the Brahmin wrongly remarked: "This monk Gotama, only if He were to work for His material progress He would have achieved something like the ruby hairpin worn on their heads by all the people in the whole Jambudīpa. He could have accomplished any sort of wellbeing! Yet, being lazy, He does nothing but eats the food that He gets at ploughing ceremonies and other functions, He goes about giving priority to the maintenance of His physical fitness." Because of his unhappiness and misapprehension, the Brahmin said to the Buddha contemptuously as follows:

"O Monk, I do the ploughing and sowing. Doing so I make a living. (Though I possess no marks like yours, my work is not adversely affected.) O Monk, you too should plough and sow like me. By so doing, live a happy life as I do. (To you who are endowed with the signs of greatness, what benefit will fail to accrue?)"

(The Brahmin had already learnt that "The glorious Prince Siddhattha has come into being at the palace of the Sakyans, in the city of Kapilavatthu! That prince has become an ascetic after renouncing the luxurious life of a Universal Monarch!" He therefore recognized that Prince Siddhattha was this monk. He said to the Buddha in the above manner because he meant to censure Him, saying: "Having given up the luxuries of a World King, should You (who have become a monk) now feel weary?" Or as the Brahmin was of sharp intelligence, he said so not because he wanted to denounce Him but because as he personally had witnessed the Buddha's attractive frame, desired to extol His wisdom and lead Him into a dialogue.)

Then as he (the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja) was somebody worthy of conversation, was a farmer, the Buddha wanted to instruct him in accordance with his inclinations. In order to give a Dhamma-talk, revealing Himself as the top ranking cultivator in the world of sentient beings, with the devas and Brahmās, the Buddha said:

"O Brahmin, like you I too plough the field and sow the seeds and live happily thereby."

Then it occurred to Kasibhāradvāja: "This monk Gotama says: 'I too plough the field and sow the seeds,' but I do not see His implements such as yoke, goad, etc. Is He telling me a lie or is He not?" Then the Brahmin looked at the Buddha and examined Him from the feet to the top hair and saw clearly that He was fully endowed with the marks of a great man. He therefore pondered: "There is no reason for a man endowed with these marks to say what is untrue." At that moment there arose in him sense of adoration for the Buddha and he abandoned such a rude mode of address as Samaṇa (Monk), and called Him by His clan name and said:

"We do not see the Venerable Gotama's yoke, plough, ploughshare, goad and bullocks. Even then You asserted, saying: 'Brahmin, like you I too plough the field and sow the seeds and live happily thereby.' "

The Brahmin then asked in verse:

- 1) *Kassako paṭijānāsi
na ca passāmi te kasim.
Kasim no pucchito brūhi yathā jānemu te kasim.*

(O Gotama,) you declare that you are a farmer. But I do not see your implements, say, yoke, plough and others that are required for farming. As you are now asked, please tell us in such a way that we might know all the implements (of yours, Gotama,) for farming.

To the complete question put forth by the Brahmin, the Buddha gave a complete reply in four verses, three containing the answers themselves and the fourth the conclusion. The text of the verses and their translations are as follows:

Answer in Verse (1)

- 2) *Saddhā bījaṃ tapo vuṭṭhi
paññā me yuga-naṅgalam.*

*Hirī tsā mano yottam
sati me phālapācanam*

- (a) ("O Brahmin of Bhāradvāja clan!) My faith is the seeds, the faith which is of four kinds: āgama<sup>1</sup>, adhigama<sup>2</sup>, okappana<sup>3</sup> and pasāda<sup>4</sup>. (For these four, read the Pāthika-vagga Commentary and others works.)
- (b) My restraint of the six senses is the rainfall that contributes to the development of the plants.
- (c) My Insight-Wisdom (vipassanā-paññā) and the fourfold Path-Wisdom (magga-paññā) are the yoke and the log of the harrow.
- (d) My shame (hirī) and fear (ottappa) of evil deeds are the twin shafts of the harrow.
- (e) My mind generating concentration (samādhi) is the ropes which are of three kinds, one for tying, another for harnessing and a third for linking.
- (f) My mindfulness (sati) accompanied by Insight-Wisdom and that accompanied by Path-Wisdom are the harrow teeth and the goad.)

(N.B. The Brahmin asked exclusively about the yoke, harrow and other implements. But the Buddha answered by adding essential facts (though they were omitted in the question). He did so because of the analogy between the two root-causes [of faith and seeds]. Such a way of teaching is an asset of every Enlightened One. The Buddha, desirous of teaching by disclosing that asset, and by supplying the other required factors of the same analogy, said that his faith formed the seeds.

(Herein what is meant by "the analogy between the two root-causes?" Did not the Brahmin ask only with reference to the implements such as yoke, harrow and the like? Then why did the Buddha talk about His faith by comparing it to the seeds and by bringing it into His answer though not mentioned in the Brahmin's question? If an answer contains something not asked about, is not it impertinent to the questions? Although the Brahmin confined his questions to farm implements, such as the yoke, harrow and the like, why did the Buddha touch upon extra things as well in His answers such as faith equalling the seeds and so on? Did not this render His answer irrelevant? Such queries might crop up.

(The answer is: Never did the Buddha speak without relevance. It was customary for the Buddhas to teach by introducing new facts by way of analogy.

(Here references should be noted as follows: The Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja asked about farming with reference to the yoke, plough and other implements. But the Buddha, who was thus asked, did not leave out anything at all from His answer saying: "Oh, this is not questioned by the Brahmin." Such regard, on the part of the Buddha, meant His care taken for the Brahmin out of compassion. Being desirous of speaking of farming from the very beginning so that the Brahmin might know the whole business together with the four points of (1) root-cause (mūla), (2) support (upakāra), (3) accumulation (sambhāra), and (4) result (phala) that were excluded from his questions. Though the Brahmin failed to ask fully because his knowledge and wisdom was not deep enough, the Buddha answered all the unasked but essential points as well in His answer because so great was His compassion.

(Further explanation: Seeds are the basic requirement for farming. No seeds, no farming. The quantity of seeds determines the amount of farm work. There is no farm work done more than what is demanded by the seeds. Hence the seeds are the

1. Āgama-saddhā (āgamana-saddhā): faith inspired by the determination to become a Buddha.
 2. Adhigama-saddhā (adhigamana-saddhā): faith inspired by the attainment of the Path and Fruition.
 3. Okappana-saddhā: faith inspired by the understanding of the attributes of the Triple Gem.
 4. Pasāda-saddhā: faith inspired by the sight and sound of what is pleasing to the heart.

principal root-cause of farming. On account of this, the Buddha desired to describe the task of farming beginning from that root-cause. Because the seed as the root-cause of secular farming, the theme of the Brahmin's question was analogous to the root-cause of spiritual farming of the Buddha, He also wished to add the very analogy. Hence His saying: “My faith is the seeds.” (As has been said above, ‘the analogy between the root-cause of secular farming, i.e. seeds and the root-cause of spiritual farming, i.e. faith.’ Thus the profound significance of this statement should be understood.)

(Again, it may be argued: “What the Brahmin asked should have been answered first. Yet, why did the Buddha answer first but not later what was not asked by the Brahmin?”

(The answer in brief: (1) Though the seed-like faith should be answered later, the Buddha answered it first because it would benefit the Brahmin much. (2) The rainfall-like sense-restraint and the seed-like faith are related to each other as cause and effect; hence the rainfall-like sense-restraint was spoken of immediately after the seed-like faith though it should have been done so later on.

(The answer expanded: (1) The Brahmin was intelligent. But as he was born in a family of wrong views, his faith was very weak. One, who is strong in intelligence but weak in faith, does not believe others (not his teachers in the least). He does not practise what should be practised and is likely to fail thereby to attain the extraordinary Path and Fruition. Kasibhāradvāja’s faith, free from mental defilement, was weak (because of his birth in a family of wrong views.) Therefore his weak faith combined with strong intelligence could not earn him the Path and Fruition. The combination is somewhat like a bullock yoked together with an elephant. It was the faith that would lead the Brahmin to the spiritual attainment. Therefore, in order to establish him in faith (which was required), the Buddha, incomparably clever in teaching, taught faith first though it should come later.

(2) Rainfall is immensely beneficial to the seeds. The relationship between cause and effect could be fully appreciated only if the Buddha spoke of rainfall immediately after His reference to the seeds. Hence His answer concerning rainfall, which should have followed later, was given earlier (i.e., next to the answer concerning the seed-like faith.) (Not only the rainfall but also the shafts of the harrow, ropes, etc., the Buddha spoke of at their respective appropriate places in the sequence. The characteristics and other particulars of faith may be learned from the texts concerned.)

(The analogy between faith and seeds is this: The natural seeds, the basic cause of the secular farming of the Brahmin, did two things: (1) shooting roots downwards and (2) developing sprouts upwards. Similarly, the seed-like faith, the basic cause of the spiritual farming by the Buddha, performed two things: (1) shooting the roots of morality (sīla) downwards and (2) developing the sprouts of Tranquillity (samatha) and Insight (vipassanā) upwards.

(Just as the natural seeds absorb the nutritious elements of the soil as well as of the water through the roots and grow to bring maturity to the crop through their stems, even so the seed-like faith absorbs the elements of Tranquillity and Insight through the roots of morality and grows to bring maturity to the crop of Noble Fruition (ariya-phala) through the stem of Noble Path (ariya-magga).

(a) (Just as the natural seeds that lie in fertile soil attain development with their roots, sprouts, stems and ears, producing sap and paddy crop full of grains, even so the seedlike faith that lies in the fertile soil of the mental process attain development with Moral Purity (sīla-visuddhi), producing the sap of the Noble Path (ariya-magga) and the crop of arahatship full of Analytical Knowledge (pañisambhīdā) and Higher Psychic Power (abhiññā). Hence the Buddha's saying “My faith is the seeds.”)

(With reference to the saying: “My restraint of the six senses is the rainfall.” Just as the Brahmin's paddy seeds and the paddy-plants that had come out from the seeds always grew abundantly without withering because they received the help of the rainfall, even so the Buddha's morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā), that had their immediate cause in the seed-like faith constantly develop without weakening,

- (b) (By this saying the Buddha pointed out the profound meaning as follows: "Brahmin, if it rains after you have sown the seeds, that is all right. If not, you have to provide water by yourself. As for me, I attach the yoke and plough of Insight Wisdom (vipassanā-paññā) and Path-Wisdom (magga-paññā) to the plough of shame (hirī) and fear (ottappa) by means of the rope of concentration (samādhi); then harnessing the draught-bullocks of energy (vīriya) I prick and drive them with the goad of mindfulness (sati); thus I plough the fertile field of my mental process and sow the seed-like faith. Never has there been a time when the seed-like faith is deprived of rain water. Rain in the form of my restraint of the six senses is always falling on the fertile field of my mental process."

(With reference to the Buddha's saying: "My Insight Wisdom and Path-Wisdom are the yoke and the harrow." The Brahmin's yoke and harrow are analogous to the Buddha's Insight-Wisdom and Path-Wisdom. The yoke is the support for the harrow shafts. It lies before the latter, to which it is connected. It is also something on which the ropes depend. It serves by making the draught-bullocks move together. Likewise, wisdom is the chief support of faultless virtues led by shame and fear. It is also the head and forerunner of faultless virtues. As it cannot exist without the shaft-like shame and fear, the latter should be bound up with the yoke of wisdom. As it is something on which the rope of concentration depends, it gives support to the latter. As wisdom checks both excessive and meagre exertions, it serves it by regulating the movement in unison of the draught-bullocks of energy.

- (c) (When harrowing is done, the log fitted with teeth breaks up the soil. It also destroys big and small roots. Similarly, when the Buddha's log of wisdom fitted with the teeth of mindfulness breaks up the four masses (ghāna), namely, the mass of continuity (santati), the mass of composition (samūha), the mass of function (icca) and the mass of sense object (ārammaṇa). It also destroys all the big and small roots of mental defilements (kilesa). Hence the Buddha's saying: "My Insight-Wisdom and Path-Wisdom are the yoke and the harrow."

(With reference to the saying: "My shame and fear are the twin shafts of the harrow." Shame and fear are born together and exist together. When shame is experienced, fear also is then experienced. Hence the translation: "My shame (hirī) and fear (ottappa) of evil are the twin shafts of the harrow."

- (d) (Just as the Brahmin's harrow shafts hold on the yoke and the log, even so the Buddha's twin shafts of shame and fear hold on the yoke and the log of Mundane Insight Wisdom (Lokiya vipassanā-paññā) and Supra-mundane Path Wisdom (Lokuttara magga-paññā) (as the existence of the two kinds of wisdom depends on that of the two: shame and fear of evil.) The yoke and the log do their respective jobs (as has been mentioned before) only when they are bound up with the shafts. Only then are they neither shaky nor loose (but remain tight and fastened). In the same way, the (aforesaid) two kinds of Wisdom perform their respective duties only when they are bound up with the twin shafts of shame and fear. Only then are they neither slackened nor weakened but remain tight and fastened and unmixed with unwholesome things that may arise from lack of shame (ahirīka) and lack of fear (anottappa). Hence the Buddha's saying: "My shame and fear of evil deeds are the twin shafts of the harrows."

(With reference to the saying: "My mind is the ropes": The key word 'mind' means 'concentration.' Hence the translation: "My mind generating my concentration is the ropes, which are of three kinds: one for tying, another for harnessing and the third for linking."

- (e) (There are three kinds of ropes, one for tying, i.e. tying the shafts and yoke;

another for harnessing, i.e. harnessing the draught bullocks to the yoke, and the remaining one for linking, i.e. linking the driver with the bullocks. Just as the Brahmin's three ropes kept the shaft, the yoke and the bullocks together and made them accomplish their respective tasks, even so the Buddha's rope of concentration helped Him focus the shafts of shame and fear, the yoke of wisdom and the bullocks of energy on a single sense object and made all these carry out their respective functions. Hence the Buddha's saying: “My mind generating my concentration is the ropes.”

(With reference to the saying: “My mindfulness accompanied by Insight Wisdom and that accompanied by Path Wisdom are the harrow-teeth of the harrow and the goad.” Just as the natural harrow-teeth guard and lead the harrow log, even so mindfulness guards Wisdom by exploring the perspective of wholesome things and bringing them into focus. In many Pāli Texts therefore the Buddha teaches mindfulness to be the protector. By never being negligent, the harrow-teeth of mindfulness precedes the harrow-log of wisdom. Indeed the factors that have been investigated by the preceding mindfulness are penetrated by the following wisdom.

- (f) (Just as the natural goad, warning the bullocks of the danger of being pricked or beaten, gives them no chance of retreating and stopping, but checks their going astray, even so the goad of mindfulness, warning the bullock-like energy of the danger of falling into woeful states, gives it no chance of idling, retreating and stopping, and checks thereby its mental wandering in undesirable sensual pleasures; fastening it to meditation practice, it also deters the bullock-like energy from following the wrong path. Hence the Buddha's saying: “My mindfulness accompanied by Insight-Wisdom and that accompanied my Path-Wisdom are the harrow-teeth and the goad.”

Answer in Verse (2)

- 3) *Kāyagutto vacīgutto
āhāre udare yato.
Saccam karomi niddānam soraccam me pamocanam.*

(O Brahmin of Bhāradvāja clan! Just as you make your field secure by fences, even so) I (the Teacher of the three classes of beings) make the field of my mental process secure by the fences of threefold wholesome physical conduct and fourfold wholesome verbal conduct. (By this is taught Pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla, Moral restraint under the Pātimokkha Rules.) With regard to the use of the four requisites, I restrain myself well to avoid the twenty-one unlawful ways of acquisition. (By this is taught Ajivapārisuddhi-sīla, Moral practice of living a life of purity.) With regard to the stomach, I restrain myself well by eating moderately. (By this is taught Paccaya-sannissita-sīla, Moral practice of depending on requisites, represented by bhojane mattaññuta, knowledge of moderation concerning food.) Through the eightfold noble speech (ariya-vohāra) the truthful words, I uproot the weeds of eightfold ignoble speech, (anariya-vohāra), the weeds of falsehood. Arahatsip, delight in the state called Nibbāna, means the outright removal of the harrow, complete giving up of the field and perpetual retirement belonging to me, the Teacher of the three classes of beings.

(The meaning here is: “Brahmin, just as you make, after sowing the seeds, a barrier of thorns, a barrier of trees, a barrier of logs or a barrier of bamboos, so that cattle, buffalos and deer could have no access and destroy the crop, even so I, after sowing the seeds of faith, build the three big walls of pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla, ājiva-pārisuddhi-sīla and paccaya-sannissita-sīla so that cattle, buffalos and deer in the form of unwholesomeness, such as passion, hatred, delusion, etc, could have no access and destroy the crop of various meritorious deeds that I (who am a great farmer) possess.

Brahmin, just as you, after doing the external (bahira) work of secular ploughing, with the hands or with the sickle, pull out and get rid of the weeds, which are damaging to the crop, even so I, after doing the internal (ajjhattika) work of spiritual ploughing, pull out and get rid of the following eightfold ignoble speech, the weeds of falsehood:

- (1) To say “I see” when seeing not,
- (2) To say “I hear” when hearing not,
- (3) To say “I attain” when attaining not,
- (4) To say “I know” when knowing not,
- (5) To say “I see not” when seeing,
- (6) To say “I hear not” when hearing,
- (7) To say “I attain not” when attaining,
- (8) To say “I know not” when knowing).

Of this eightfold ignoble speech, the weeds of falsehood, do I perform the pulling out, cutting off and eradicating with the hands or the sickle of eightfold noble speech, the truthful words, such as:

- (1) To say “I see not” when seeing not,
- (2) To say “I hear not” when hearing not,
- (3) To say “I attain not” when attaining not,
- (4) To say “I know not” when knowing not,
- (5) To say “I see” when seeing,
- (6) To say “I hear” when hearing,
- (7) To say “I attain” when attaining,
- (8) To say “I know” when knowing.

“Brahmin, your removal of the harrow, your giving up of the field and your retirement is not forever since you have to do the job of harrowing again in the evening, next day or next year. My removal of the harrow, My giving up the field and My retirement is not like yours. Indeed, Brahmin, until My attainment of arahatship, I knew no such thing as removal of the harrow, giving up of the field and retirement. I will explain further, Brahmin, since the lifetime of Buddha Dīpaṅkarā I have not removed the harrow, given up the field and retired until I attained the Wisdom of the Path to arahatship, Omniscience. For the whole period of four asaṅkhyeyyas and a hundred thousand aeons, I had to do the internal work of spiritual farming by harnessing the four big bullocks of right exertion or glowing energy to the harrow of Wisdom.

O Brahmin, after restlessly doing the spiritual farming for the aforesaid period of four asaṅkhyeyyas and a hundred thousand aeons, only when I attained arahatship that is encircled by all the attributes of a Buddha, sitting on the golden throne of Aparājita under the Mahābodhi tree, which indeed is peace, the end of all worries, did I take off the bullocks of energy from the harrow of Wisdom, give up the field of mental process and retire once and for all by engaging (as long as time permitted) in the Fruition of Arahatsip. Now I have nothing at all to do with the work of farming again.”

Answer in Verse (3)

- 4) *Viriyam me dhuradhorayham yogakkhemādhivāhanam.
Gacchati anivattantam yattha gantvā na socati.*

(“O Brahmin of Bhāradvāja clan!) My two kinds of energy (vīriya), physical (kāyika) and mental (cetasika), form a pair of draught bullocks that are harnessed to the harrow at the front; (or) My four kinds of right exertion (sammappadhāna) are the four (two pairs of) draught bullocks. They (that pair of two bullocks of physical and mental energy of Mine or those two pairs of bullocks of right exertion of Mine) are able to lead Me to Nibbāna that is free from the torment caused by the four bonds, namely, the bonds of sensual pleasure (kāma-yoga) and so on. Having gone to Nibbāna where a farmer like Me would not grieve at all, to that Nibbāna, free from grief, did I attain without returning through the power of Wisdom and Knowledge.

(Explanation: Just as the Brahmin's harrow-log drew by a pair of draught bullocks harnessed at the front crushed earth-masses and destroyed big and small tree roots, even so the Buddha's log of Wisdom, drew forcefully by the twin bullocks of physical and mental energy, crushed the fourfold earth-mass, namely, the mass of continuity (santati), the mass of composition (samūha), the mass of function (icca) and the mass of sense object (ārammaṇa), I also got rid of the big and small tree-roots of mental defilements.

(Alternatively, just as there were two pairs of bullocks (four bullocks in all,) for the Brahmin's harrow, one pair attached to the first yoke and the other attached to the next, even so there were at the Buddha's Dhamma-harrow fourfold right exertion corresponding to the Brahmin's two pairs of bullocks (four bullocks in all); just as the Brahmin's two pairs of bullocks attached to his harrow struggle energetically and accomplished two functions, namely, the function of destroying the weeds that had grown as well as the weeds that would grow, and the function of generating the paddy plants, even so the Buddha's fourfold exertion corresponding to the Brahmin's two pairs of bullocks energetically struggled and accomplished two functions, namely, the function of removing unwholesomeness that had arisen as well as unwholesomeness that would arise, and the function of generating wholesomeness.)

“O Brahmin, just as your two pairs of draught bullocks move in the direction of east, in the direction of west and so on as you drive them, even so the bullocks, i.e. My two pairs of right exertion move straight to Nibbāna as I drive them in that direction; the difference between your moving and Mine is this: when your two pairs of bullocks reach the edge (the ridge) of the field they turn back. But My two pairs of bullocks, i.e. My right exertion has been moving towards Nibbāna without turning away since the lifetime of Buddha Dīpaṅkarā.

Your two pairs of bullocks could not manage to reach the place where a farmer like you are free from sorrow As for My two pairs of bullocks, in the form of right exertion, they have managed to reach the place of Nibbāna free from sorrow of a farmer like me.”

Conclusion in Verse

- 5) *Evam esa kasi kattha, sa hoti amatapphala
Etam kasim kasitvāna sabbadukkha pamuccati.*

("O Brahmin of Bhāradvāja clan!) I (the Teacher of the three classes of beings) have done the Dhamma-ploughing in My person without interruption for four asaṅkhyeyyas and a hundred thousand aeons. That Dhamma-ploughing of Mine bears the fruit of Nibbāna with the rich taste of peace. (It bears that tasty fruit of Nibbāna not only for Me, but for anyone be he a, deva, a human, or a Brahmā) when the harnessing of the bullocks of right exertion and the Dhamma-ploughing is done in one's person without interruption one could absolutely be free from all suffering and have Nibbāna for his possession.

In this way, the Buddha, in delivering the sermon to Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja, concluded it by fixing it with the pinnacle of arahatship and leading up to the height of Nibbāna.

Having listened to the profound teaching, Kasibhāradvāja Brahmin came to a good understanding: “Despite my eating of the crop obtained from my ploughing, I feel hungry next day as usual. The Dhamma-ploughing of the Venerable Gotama, however, produces the fruit of Deathlessness called Nibbāna. Having partaken of that fruit of Deathlessness from the Dhamma-ploughing, one could liberate oneself from suffering once and for all.”

Thus the Brahmin developed devotion, understood clearly and desirous of doing what every devotee would do: he poured milk-food into the golden bowl, which was meant for his own use and worth a hundred thousand coins, then he added butter, honey, molasses, etc. to it so that it looked attractive to the palate. Finally he covered the golden bowl with a white cloth and took it by himself and offered it respectfully to the Buddha with these words:

“May the Venerable Gotama have the milk-food! The Venerable Gotama is indeed a ploughman, for he has done the Dhamma-ploughing which produces the crop of Nibbāna!”

Then the Buddha delivered these two stanza to the Brahmin:

(6) *Gāthābhigītāṃ me abhojaneyyaṃ sampassatāṃ Brāhmana n'esa Dhammo.
Gāthābhigītāṃ panudanti Buddhā dhamme sati Brāhmana vuttiressā.*

“O Brahmin of Bhāradvāja clan! The food obtained by uttering verses ought not to be enjoyed at all by me. Enjoyment of such food thus obtained is not the custom of Buddhas who observe purity of livelihood. (Therefore) they all reject the food obtained by uttering verses. O Brahmin of Bharadvaja clan! When one observes purity of livelihood, one seeks the four requisites lawfully without being attached to any family just like stretching one's hand in space. Such is the way of making a living with purity by all Buddhas.”

(Herein a question may arise: Did the Buddha utter the verses to get the milk-food, for mention is made of the food obtained by uttering verses? The answer is: No, the Buddha uttered the verses not to get the food. In fact, He had not received even a ladleful of food though He had stood near the field since that early morning; yet He uttered the three verses clearly describing how He performed the Dhamma-farming and thereby explaining fully the attributes of a Buddha. And the food thus received happened to be like something acquired by dancers by dancing and singing. Hence “the food obtained by uttering verses.” Such food is not worth eating by Buddhas. Hence “it ought not to be enjoyed at all.”

(The verse contains four lines: the first three lines point out the purity of the discourse by absolving the Buddha from any blame and accusation by the unwise, who would say: “By singing the song the monk Gotama made the unfaithful and displeased Brahmin desire to give, and thereby accepted the food. This discourse of the monk Gotama was intended to attract the material offering of the food.” The fourth line indicates the purity of the Buddha's livelihood.)

When the Buddha uttered thus the Brahmin Bhāradvāja became sad, thinking: “The Venerable Gotama has rejected my milk-food. He said it was not worth-eating. I am so unfortunate! I have been deprived of the opportunity of giving alms.” He thought further: “If the Venerable Gotama does not accept my milk-food, it were well if He would accept something else from me.” Then it occurred thus to the Buddha, who was aware of this: “After setting aside the hour for alms-round I came here with the idea that I would arouse faith in the Brahmin within so limited a time. Now the Brahmin is dejected; should he form a wrong attitude towards Me through dejection, he would not be able to attain the penetrative knowledge of supreme Nibbāna.” Being desirous of fulfilling the Brahmin's wish so that he would cultivate faith in Him, the Buddha uttered the following verse:

(7) *Aññena ca kevalinaṃ mahesiṃ
khīṇāsavaṃ kukkucca-vupasantaṃ.
Aññena pānena upatthahassu khettaṃ hi tam puññapekkhassa hoti.*

(“O Brahmin of Bhāradvāja clan! ) With food and drink, other than this, attend upon the arahat, who is free from āsavas, endowed with all the attributes of a Buddha, the habitual seeker of such virtues as higher morality, whose scruples have been quenched. (Though the Buddha tried to arouse the desire in the Brahmin to give, He said only implicitly. He did not say directly: "Give it to me, bring it to me.") Only a Buddha's dispensation, with its eight marvellous characteristics, is the excellent great field of fertile soil for you, who have a bent on acts of merit.

Then the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja thought: "I have brought this milk-food for the sake of the Buddha. Therefore I should not give it to somebody else of my own accord," and asked: "Venerable Gotama, in that case, whom should I offer this milk-food?" "O Brahmin," replied the Buddha, "neither in this world of celestial beings together with devas, māras and Brahmins nor in the world of human beings with ascetics, and brahmins, princes and commoners, do I see nobody, apart from Me or from my disciples, who can well digest that milk-food when eaten. Therefore, O Brahmin, you should dump it in a place without green grass or in the water without insects."

(Herein why could nobody among the devas and human beings digest this milk-food? It could not be digested because this coarse human food was mixed with the soft and delicate food (ambrosia) of devas. When the Brahmin was pouring the food intended for the Buddha, the devas added ambrosia to it. (It could have been digestible if it were only pure ambrosia and eaten by devas, and so would have been the unmixed milk-food eaten by men.)

(The milk-food being coarse, even though mixed with the soft ambrosia, devas could not digest it because they had delicate bodies and the food was indigestible for them. So was it for human because it contained ambrosia and human had coarse bodies.

(As for the Buddha, he could digest the milk-food mixed with ambrosia by virtue of his natural metabolism (Some Pitāka teachers attribute this ability to the Buddha's physical and mental powers.) For the arahats (disciples of the Buddhas), too, the food was digestible because of their power of concentration and their knowledge of how to eat it in moderation. This was not possible for others, not even for those with psychic powers. Or this should not be a matter for speculation. It concerns only Buddhas.)

The Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja floated the milk-food in the insect-free water. It at once made a sizzling sound and there arose much vapour from all sides, just as a ploughshare (an iron bar) that has been baked the whole day sizzles and produces much vapour all round when it is dumped into water.

Thereupon the Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja became afraid with his hair standing on end, and approached the Exalted One. Touching the feet of the Exalted One (with his head), he said:

"O Venerable Gotama! Very delightful indeed is Your Teaching! Just as an object lying prone is turned upside down, or a covered object is uncovered, or a man, who has lost his way, is shown the right way, or a torch is lighted in darkness in order that people with eyes may see different objects, so also the Venerable Gotama has clearly preached the Dhamma to me in many ways. O Venerable Gotama! I seek refuge in You, in the Dhamma and in the Sangha!

"O Venerable Gotama! Let me be initiated! Let me be ordained under You!"

The Brahmin Kasibhāradvāja became a monk under the Exalted One and not long after his ordination, the Venerable Kasibhāradvāja retired alone to a quiet place. There he practised the Dhamma, exerting his effort vigilantly and vigorously with his mind bent on Nibbāna. Finally, he attained became an arahat.

THE BUDDHA'S TWELFTH VASSA IN VERANJA CITY

Having thus spent the eleventh vassa at the brahmin village of Ekañala, giving discourses such as Kasibhāradvāja Sutta and others to those who were worthy of conversion including Kasibhāradvāja, the Buddha set out from the village at the end of the vassa, distributing the cool medicinal water of deathlessness among devas and humans, and eventually reached the city of Verañjā. He then took up residence with five hundred monks, who were of highly noble birth, in terms of virtue, near the neem (nimba) tree, which was occupied by a demon, Naleru by name, off Verañjā city.

The Brahmin Verañjā's Visit to The Buddha

Then the Brahmin Verañjā heard the good news (as follows): “Friends, the Monk Gotama, the Sakyā prince who has become an ascetic, is staying together with five hundred highly virtuous monks near the neem tree which is occupied by the demon Naleru near our city of Veranjā. The good reputation of the Venerable Gotama goes up to Bhavagga, overwhelmingly spreading all over thus:

“That Buddha is called Arahaṃ because He is worthy of special honour;

“He is called Sammāsambuddha because He understands all phenomena perfectly by Himself;

“He is called Vijjācaraṇa-sampanṇā because He is endowed with wisdom and practice;

“He is called Sugata because He speaks good words;

“He is called Lokavidū because He knows the three worlds analytically;

“He is called Anuttaro purisa-dammaśārathi because He is an incomparable tamer of those who ought to be tamed;

“He is called Satthā deva-manussānaṃ because He is Teacher of devas and men;

“He is called Buddha because He realizes the Four Truths by Himself and let others realize them;

“He is called Bhagavā because He is endowed with the sixfold glory.

“That Exalted One comprehends the world of space (okāsa-loka) with its devas, māras and Brahmās, as well as the world of beings (satta-loka) with its monks and brahmins, princes and commoners, through His peculiar wisdom, and teaches them.

“The Exalted One proclaims the Dhamma that is good in all its three phases, the beginning, the middle and the end, and that is also complete with the letter and the spirit. (Nothing new is to be added.) He taught the noble practice that is perfect and pure all round. (There is no flaw to be taken out.) The sight of such a sage, arahat, is indeed wonderful.” Thus learned the Brahmin.

Thus the Brahmin Veranja visited the Buddha and exchanged words of joy with Him. Having thus exchanged words of joy and words worthy of remembrance, the Brahmin took his seat, which was free from the sixfold fault; thereafter, he began to censure the Buddha:

“O Venerable Gotama, I have heard that the Monk Gotama neither bow nor give a welcome nor extends an invitation to seats to old, aged, mature brahmins of previous generations who are nearing the end of their lives. O Venerable Gotama, what I have heard happens to be true. Indeed you, Venerable Gotama, neither bow nor give a welcome nor extend an invitation to seats to old, aged, mature brahmins of previous generations who are nearing the end of their lives. O Venerable Gotama, doing no reverential act, such as bowing, etc., is indeed outright unfair.”

Being untainted with the two defects of exalting oneself (att'ukkāmsana) and humiliating others (paravambhana) but with His calm heart sprinkled with the clear water of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā), and desiring to dispel the Brahmin's ignorance and to point out fairness on His part, the Buddha said:

“O Brahmin, in the world of space with its devas, māras and Brahmins and in the world of beings with its monks and brahmins, princes and commoners, I see nobody who deserves My respect, My welcome, or My invitation to seats. Should I even casually pay respect, give a welcome or extend an invitation to seats to somebody, then his head will break off and fall to the ground.”

Despite such a reply by the Buddha, Verāñjā, being unwise did not grasp that the Buddha was the greatest in the world; instead he became irritated at the words rightly uttered by the Buddha, so he accused:

In order to soften the Brahmin's heart, the Buddha did not give a directly opposite answer and, in order to show that there was reason for Him to be called in a way ‘a man of tasteless nature,’ He said:

“O Brahmin, there is reason for speaking of Me, ‘The Monk Gotama is a man of tasteless nature’ (The reason is this): O Brahmin, pleasure in forms, pleasure in sounds, pleasure in odours, pleasure in tastes, and pleasure in touch - all these pleasures I have rejected. O Brahmin, for this reason, let one speak of Me, if one so desires: ‘The Monk Gotama is a man of tasteless nature.’ But We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”

(Herein what the Brahmin meant was: “bowing, welcoming, raising folded palms and paying respect in the world are styled sāmaggī-rasa. (the taste that creates harmony between one another). That sāmaggī-rasa was totally absent in the Venerable Gotama. That was why he accused the Buddha saying: “The Venerable Gotama is a man of tasteless nature,” i.e. He is entirely devoid of sāmaggī-rasa.)

(On the other hand, the Buddha meant that pleasure in forms, pleasure in sounds, pleasure in odours, pleasure in tastes, pleasure in touch, each of these five can be called sāmaggī-rasa, for each comes into being only when such factors as object, sense, etc. combine harmoniously. As all this sāmaggī-rasa had been uprooted by Him, He was free from all these five kinds of sāmaggī-rasa. With that meaning in mind, one might label Him a tasteless man if one so desires, but He declared: “We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”

(In this connection, Why did the Buddha assert: “We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”? Did not this amount to acknowledging the supposition that Buddhas should observe sāmaggī-rasa (such as bowing, etc.) as meant by the Brahmin? Such a question may arise.

(The answer is that it did not. Explanation: He, who should but did not observe sāmaggī-rasa (bowing, etc.) meant by the Brahmin, deserved the label, ‘a man without good taste,’ for he showed no sāmaggī-rasa though he was required to do so. As for the Buddha, He even had nothing whatsoever to do with sāmaggī-rasa (bowing, etc.) meant by the Brahmin (for He was the greatest in the three worlds). Therefore, in order to point out the fact clearly that He was above such an observance, the Buddha declared: “We do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”)

Being unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus for his lack of sāmaggī-rasa demanded by him, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation:

In order to show that there was different reason for Him to be called as such, the Buddha said:

“O Brahmin! There is reason for speaking of Me, ‘The Monk Gotama is useless.’ (The reason is this:) O Brahmin, use (paribhoga) of forms, use of sounds, use of odours, use of tastes and use of touch, with lust and greed, all these uses I have rejected. O Brahmin, for this reason (absence of paribhoga, use of the five sense objects with lust and greed) let one speak of Me, if one so desires: ‘The Monk Gotama is a useless person.’ But We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”

(Herein what the Brahmin meant was: Bowing and other acts of respect shown to one's elders are recognized in the world as sāmaggi-paribhoga, use for harmony; as there was no making of such use on the part of the Buddha, He was accused, saying: ‘The Monk Gotama is a useless man.’)

(According to the Buddha, He had done away with use of the five sense objects, namely, forms, sounds, odours, tastes and touch with lust and greed. As such, He was thus free from such enjoyment. He approved therefore that, with that meaning in mind, one might speak of Him as a useless man.)

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation:

(3) “The Venerable Gotama is a believer in non-action”

In order to show, as before, that there was different reason for Him to be called as such, the Buddha said:

“O Brahmin! There is reason for speaking of Me: ‘The monk Gotama is a believer in non-action!’ (The reason is this:) O Brahmin, I declare that the three physical evils, the four verbal evils, the three mental evils, and all the remaining unwholesome deeds should not be done. For this reason (of my declaration that evil deeds should not be done, which is belief in non-action), let one speak of Me, if one so desires: ‘The Monk Gotama is a believer in non-action.’ But We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”

(Herein what the Brahmin meant was: All the people in the world practise kula-cārīta, the practice of clansmen, such as bowing before one's elders and so on. As the Buddha did not practise that He was labelled ‘a believer in non-action.’)

(The Buddha, however, meant that He taught that evil deeds should not be committed, which might be taken as akriya-vāda. He approved therefore that, with that meaning in mind, one might speak of Him as ‘a believer in non-action.’)

Being also unable to blame the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation:

(4) “The Venerable Gotama is a believer in annihilationism”

In order to soften the Brahmin's heart, the Buddha desired, as in the previous explanations, to show that there was different reason for Him to be called as such and said:

“O Brahmin, there is reason for speaking of Me: ‘The Monk Gotama is a believer in annihilationism.’ (The reason is this:) O Brahmin, I give instruction to annihilate passion (rāga), to annihilate hatred (dosa), to annihilate delusion (moha), (and also) to annihilate other evil deeds. O Brahmin, for this reason (instruction as to the annihilation of passion, hatred, delusion and other evil deeds, which is annihilationism), one may speak of Me, if one so desires: ‘The Monk Gotama is a believer in annihilationism.’ But We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”

been destroyed on account of the Monk Gotama” and labelled Him ‘an annihilatationist.’)

(The Buddha, however, taught people to do away with greed, hatred and delusion and other evil acts by means of their respective kinds of Path-knowledge. He approved, therefore, that, with that meaning in mind, one might speak of Him as ‘an annihilatationist.’)

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation:

In order to show, as before, that there was different reason for Him to be called as such, the Buddha said:

“O Brahmin, there is reason for speaking of Me: ‘The Monk Gotama is a man having the nature of loathing.’ (The reason is this:) O Brahmin, I loathe the three physical evils, the four verbal evils, the three mental evils, and other evil deeds. O Brahmin, for this reason, (loathing of the evil deeds) one may speak of Me if one so desired: ‘The Monk Gotama is a man having the nature of loathing.’ But We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”

(Herein the Brahmin thought that the Buddha did not follow the practice of clansmen, kula-cārīta, such as bowing before one’s elders and so on, only because He loathed them. Therefore, the Brahmin labelled Him, ‘a man having the nature of loathing.’)

(The Buddha, however, meant that He loathed the evil deeds and approved therefore that, with that meaning in mind one might speak of Him as ‘a man having the nature of loathing.’)

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin, willingly brought another accusation:

In order to show, as before, that there was different reason for Him to be called as such, the Buddha said:

“O Brahmin, there is reason for speaking of Me: ‘The Monk Gotama is a destroyer.’ (The reason is this:) O Brahmin, I give instruction to destroy passion, to destroy hatred, to destroy delusion, (and also) to destroy other evil deeds. O Brahmin, for this reason, (instruction as to the destruction of passion, hatred, delusion and other evil deeds,) let one speak of Me, if one so desires: ‘The Monk Gotama is a destroyer.’ But We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”

(Herein as the Brahmin did not see the Buddha’s act of respect, such as bowing, etc., shown to old people, he thought the Buddha was a great destroyer of this greatest practice of paying respect to an elder, vuddhapacāyana, and labelled Him ‘a destroyer.’)

(The Buddha, however, taught people to remove and eliminate passion, hatred, delusion, (and the remaining) evil deeds. He approved therefore that, with that meaning in mind, one might speak of Him as ‘a destroyer’)

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought another accusation:

In order to show, as before, that there was different reason for Him to be called as such, the Buddha said:

“O Brahmin, there is reason for speaking of Me: ‘The Monk Gotama is a tapassi, eliminator of tormenting things.’ (The reason is this:) O Brahmin, I proclaim that the three physical evils, the four verbal evils, the three mental evils, and all (the remaining) unwholesome deeds are tormenting things tapaniya dhammas (things causing sorrow to all humans and other beings). Brahmin, I declare that one, who has eliminated these evil deeds, is a tormentor of tormenting factors. O Brahmin, I, who am a good wayfarer like former Buddhas, have eliminated these evil deeds. O Brahmin, for this reason (of eliminating the tormenting evil deeds called tapa), let one speak of Me, if one so desires: ‘The Monk Gotama is a tormentor’ But We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”

(Herein what the Brahmin meant was this: Those who perform an act of respect, such as bowing, etc., delighted old people. Those, who did not, tormented the hearts of the latter. The Buddha did not perform that. Therefore the Brahmin thought the Monk Gotama was a tormentor to the aged and labelled Him as such.

(The Buddha, however, called evil deeds tormenting factors, tapa-dhammas, because they tend to torment the world of beings. The elimination of these evil deeds had been done on His part. “He who has done away with evil deeds is a tapassī,” so goes a definition (“Tape assī ti tapassī”). He therefore approved the label given to Him: ‘an eliminator of tormentors,’ or rather ‘a tormentor of all evils’ known as tapa.)

Being also unable to put the blame on the Buddha thus, the Brahmin willingly brought the last accusation:

(8) “The Venerable Gotama is a man far from rebirth in the Deva world”

As the Buddha had got rid of all four forms of future rebirth, He desired to show, in a different manner, that He was free of rebirth (apagabbha), and said:

“O Brahmin, there is reason for speaking of Me: ‘The Monk Gotama is far from rebirth.’ (The reason is:) O Brahmin. I proclaim that one (an arahat) who has rejected the four ways of birth that would take place in future is an apagabbha person, one beyond rebirth. O Brahmin, I, who am a good wayfarer like former Buddhas, have utterly destroyed all these four ways of rebirth. O Brahmin, for this reason (of having uprooted all means of birth in future), one may speak of Me, if one so desires: ‘The Monk Gotama is an apagabbha person, a man beyond rebirth.’ But We Buddhas do not absolutely have the kind of reason meant by you.”

(Herein, what the Brahmin meant was this: paying respect to one's elder, such as bowing, etc., was a meritorious act that was conducive to rebirth in the divine abode. Believing thus he labelled the Buddha “a man far from rebirth in the deva-world!” for he saw Him doing nothing of that respectful gestures. Therefore, the Buddha had no chance to attain the celestial realm; instead He would abide in the womb of a mother in the human world in future which was disgusting.

Though the Brahmin Verañjā had thus condemned the Buddha with the eight accusations, such as ‘a man of tasteless nature,’ and so on, but from the outset of his meeting Him, the Buddha set His both eyes on him with tranquillity, out of compassion. Just as the round full moon rises in the cloudless sky, just as the sun shines high in autumn, even so the Buddha, being Omniscient, became desirous of dispelling the darkness of ignorance that lay in the Brahmin's heart. Thus, He had turned those charges made by the Brahmin into words of honour to Him.

Now, the Buddha was to show the magnificence of His compassion and the earth-like mind that was unshaken by the eight conditions of the world and the calm heart, undisturbed however much others would abuses Him, He reflected:

“This brahmin thoughtlessly believes that he is senior (to me, the Buddha) only on account of the conventional marks of his old age, such as grey hair, broken teeth, wrinkles of the skin, and the like. He knows not even a bit that he is being followed closely by the danger of rebirth, besieged by the danger of old age, overwhelmed by the danger of ill-health, threatened by the danger of death; nor does he realize that as a stump in samsāra he would die today and would become a child (a messenger of the King of Death) lying on its back tomorrow. However, he came to me with great effort. Let his visit to me be a beneficial one.”

In order to make clear that He was peerless, eldest, and foremost among beings, the Buddha elaborately delivered His discourse in the following manner:

“O Brahmin, suppose a hen has eight eggs, (or) ten, (or) twelve. Suppose the hen does her three jobs: she sits well on the eggs, provides them well with heat, and imbues them well with her odour. (Of all the chicks that lie in the eggs so treated) one comes out first with ease after breaking the shell with its claws and beak. Would you call it senior or junior?” asked the Buddha. “O Venerable Gotama, it should be called senior. Of all the chicks, the little one (that has come out first after breaking the shell) is the oldest (as its making of appearance is the earliest),” answered the Brahmin.

Then the Buddha said: “O Brahmin, in the same way, of all beings lying in the shell of ignorance (avijjā) and being wrapped up all round by the shell of ignorance, I alone in the world have realized first the unmatched, supreme Path Knowledge of Arahantship and Omniscience after breaking through the shell of ignorance. O Brahmin, I (therefore) am the oldest of all existing in the world of sentient beings.”

(Herein an explanation of the simile may be made as follows. Now with reference to the part of the upamāna, the second part of the comparison, which is the little chicks: the eggs do not rot because the mother-hen treats them in three ways, namely, by sitting on them, by providing heat to them and by imbuing them with her odour. The wet outer membranes then dry up. The egg-shells also become thinner and thinner day by day. The claws and the beak of the chicks grow bigger and harder. The little birds get stronger. Since the shells become thinner and thinner as days go by, the light outside the shells penetrates them. Then the chicks think: “For a long time we have stayed in the confinement with our legs and wings cramped. The light appears outside. We shall live outside comfortably where the light is.” Desirous of coming outside, they kick the shells with their legs. They also forcefully stretch out their necks. Therefore the eggs are broken into halves. The chicks then emerge from the shells, flapping their small wings and chirping for the moment. Of all these chicks, the one which comes out first should be the senior-most.

With reference to the upameyya, the first member of the comparison which is the Buddha (it will be explained not separately but in relation to the upamana): The three forms of the hen's treatment, namely, sitting, heating and imbuing with her odour, may be likened to the Buddha's three acts of contemplation (anupassanā) on impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha) and non-self (anatta) under the Mahābodhi tree while as a Bodhisatta. The egg's being unrotten due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the non-shrinkage of the Bodhisatta's Insight Wisdom (vipassanā-ñāṇa) due to his threefold contemplation. The drying up of the wet outer membrane of the egg due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the cessation of the Bodhisatta's craving (nikanta-taṇhā) for the three existences due to his threefold contemplation. The shell's gradual thinning day after day due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the thinning of the shell of ignorance step by step on the part of the Bodhisatta due to his threefold contemplation. The growing bigger and harder of the claws and the beaks of the chicks due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the growing sharper, firmer, clearer and more confident of the Bodhisatta's Insight-Wisdom due to his threefold contemplation. The time of the growth of the chick's claws and beak due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the time of maturity, the time of development and the time of perfection of the Bodhisatta's Insight-Wisdom which was due to his threefold contemplation. The moment of the happy emergence of the chick, flapping its small wings after kicking the shell with its legs and striking the shell with its beak and thus breaking open the shell which was due to the hen's threefold treatment may be likened to the moment of the Bodhisatta's realization of the attributes of a Buddha with ease, after attaining the Insight-Wisdom and breaking open the shell of ignorance by means of the Path of Arahantship which was won eventually and flapping the wings of Psychic Powers – all this being due to his threefold contemplation.)

Therefore, in order to continue to show that “By this practical means, I have attained the stage of incomparable supremacy,” the Buddha elaborately related how He endeavoured in meditation through the fourfold diligence at the Mahābodhi Mandala; how He gained, as a result, mundane (lokiya) jhānas; how He acquired the Psychic Power (abhiññā) of remembrance of His former existences (pubbenivāsañāṇa) as a result of meditation based on the mundane jhānas in the first watch (of the full moon of Vesakha, in the year 103 Mahā Era) and was born first by noble birth (ariya-jāti), later, with the beak-like Psychic Powers breaking open the shell of ignorance that had concealed the series of His past bodies, how He had acquired the Psychic Power of the Divine Eye (dibba-cakkhu) in the middle watch of that night and was born for a second time, by noble birth after with the beak-like Psychic Powers, breaking open the shell of the ignorance that had concealed His rebirths after death (cuti-paṭisandhī); how He had acquired the Path Knowledge of arahantship (the third enlightening Knowledge) named Asavakkhaya in the last watch of the same night and was born for a third time, by noble birth after with the beak-like Psychic Powers breaking open the shell of ignorance that had concealed the Four Noble Truths. (A more detailed account may be read in the Myanmar translation of the Pārājikakaṇḍa Pāli where the life of Verañjā is discussed.)

Verañjā Taking Refuge

In this way, when the Buddha, out of great compassion for the Brahmin Verañjā, had thus related His being great by noble birth through the discourse, clearly describing the threefold Knowledge, the Brahmin became rapturous both physically and mentally, came to know the greatness of the Buddha and reproached himself: “I have wrongly accused the Omniscient Buddha, who is thus supreme among the three worlds of individuals and endowed with all virtues, by saying that ‘He has failed to show respect to old people!’ Ignorance, friends, is disgusting indeed!” Being convinced that ‘this Gotama is the foremost, for He was born first by noble birth in the world; unique in all virtues, He is also the best,’ the Brahmin supplicated to the Buddha as follows:

“The greatest in the world indeed is the Venerable Gotama! The best in the world indeed is the Venerable Gotama! It is very delightful indeed, O Venerable Gotama! It is very delightful indeed, O Venerable Gotama! To use a worldly simile, just as what was turned upside down has been turned upside up; just as what was covered has been uncovered; just as one following the wrong path has been told the right path; just as a torch has been lighted in the dark so that those who have eyes will see a variety of things; even so the Venerable Gotama has taught me the Dhamma in many ways. I approach, O Venerable Gotama, and recognize the Venerable Gotama, the Dhamma and the Sangha, as my shield, shelter and refuge. From today onwards, O Venerable Gotama, kindly take me as a lay devotee (upāsaka) established in the threefold refuge for life!”

Having taken refuge, the Brahmin begged, saying: “May the Venerable Gotama observe the vassa together with the community of monks in Verañjā, as an act of kindness done to me!” Keeping silent the Buddha agreed to do as requested by the Brahmin. Clever in behavioural studies, the Brahmin reflected: “If the Venerable Gotama does not accept my word, He should have rejected it by deed or by word, now that He assumes no appearance of refusal, but of consent, He must have accepted it in His heart.” Having known the Buddha's acceptance, he stood up from his seat and paid obeisance to Him from the four quarters and encircled Him three times, keeping Him at his right. Though he had accused the Buddha, since His arrival, for showing no signs of reverence to elders, he was not content at all in repeatedly doing homage to Him in all three manners – physically, verbally and mentally now that he had analytically understood His virtues. Placing his folded hands on his head and facing in the direction of the Buddha as far as he could see, he withdrew, walking backward. It was only at the point where he lost sight of the Buddha that he finally made obeisance to his heart's content and departed.

At the request of the Brahmin Verañjā, the Buddha observed the twelfth vassa in the city of Verañjā with His five hundred monks.

Famine in Verañjā City

At that time Verañjā was short of food. It was hard to make a living there. There were white bones all over the city. People had to draw lots for food ration. (Therefore) it was not easy for the monks to get enough food by going round with alms-bowl in their hands. The horse-merchants of the Uttarāp̄tha Northern Region were then staying with five hundred horses in Verañjā to take shelter from showers of rain during the rainy season. At the horse-yards the merchants made a regular donation of one pattha of barley to each monk. When the monks entered the city in the morning for alms-food and did not get any, they went to the horse-yards and each received one pattha of barley which they brought to the monastery and pounded in small mortars and ate it.

(N.B. Travelling was impossible on account of heavy rains during the four months of the rainy season in Verañjā. Hence the horse-merchants' stay there to take shelter from the rains. They had lodges and stables built and enclosures made on unflooded grounds outside the city for such a stay. These sites of the horse-merchants were known as horse-yards.

(They brought the barley which they had steamed to make it last long and free from worm-holes and which they had husked so that they might use it as horse-food where grass and such fodder were not available. These merchants (of the Uttarāp̄tha) were not faithless like the people of the Dakkhināp̄tha. They had faith and cherished the Triple Gem. One morning, when they went into the city on business, they found the monks in groups of seven or eight going about for alms but getting nothing. And so, they discussed among themselves: "These good monks are observing the vassa depending on this Verañjā City. But there is famine here. Not getting a bit of food, they are immensely troubled. Since we are visitors, we are not capable of providing them with rice gruel and food daily, but our horses get food twice a day, once at night and once in daytime. It will be good to take one pattha of barley out of the morning fodder of each horse and give it to each monk. If we do so the good monks will not be hard pressed; and the horses will still have enough food." They then went to the monks and informed them of their decision, they also requested them, saying: "Venerable Sirs, please accept one pattha of barley and make it into food in a befitting way and eat it." Hence their regular offering of one pattha of barley to each monk every day.

(When the monks entered Verañjā in the morning for alms-food and went round the whole city, they did not get, in the least, a word of excuse, let alone food. When they reached the horse-yards outside the city, each of them was given one pattha of barley and brought it to the monastery. Since there were no lay attendants to make gruel or food for them and as it was not proper to do the cooking by themselves, they formed groups of eight or ten and pounded the barley in small mortars. Each consumed his share after adding water to it, for they thought: "In this way we shall have light livelihood (sallahukavutti) and be free from the wrongdoing of cooking by oneself (samāpaka-dukkata āpatti). After having eaten, they engage in ascetic practices without worry.)

For the Buddha, however, the horse-merchants donated one pattha of barley and the proportionate amount of butter, honey and molasses. Venerable Ānanda brought the offerings and ground (the barley) on a stone slab. Anything prepared by a man of merit and intelligence is naturally delightful. Having ground the barley, he mixed it with butter, etc.

and offered it to the Buddha. Then devas put ambrosia into the ground barley. That same ground barley the Buddha partook and spent the time by engaging in phala-samāpatti. Since the arrival of famine, the Buddha had not moved about for alms.

(Herein it may be asked whether the Venerable Ānanda was an attendant (upatthaka) to the Buddha during the vassa period in Verañjā. Answer: He was, but he had not held the post yet. Explanation: During the first Bodhi period (the first twenty years of His ministry) the Buddha had no permanent personal attendant. Sometimes He was served by Thera Nāgasamāla, sometimes by Thera Nāgita, sometimes by Thera Meghiya, sometimes by Thera Upavana, sometimes by Thera Sāgata, sometimes by Sunakkhatta, a Liccavi prince before his ordination. These monks waited upon the Buddha of their own accord and left Him when they so desired.

When the aforesaid monks were serving, the Venerable Ānanda remained unconcerned, and he personally performed all his duties big and small on their departure. The Buddha also accepted him, for He thought: “This worthy relative of mine, Ānanda, is the best to serve Me in all these matters of such nature though he has not secured the post of My personal attendant.” Hence Venerable Ānanda’s preparation and offering of the barley mixed with butter, honey and molasses as there were no other attendants in Verañjā during this vassa, and the Buddha’s engagement in phala-samāpatti took place after partaking of the food. In this connection, the following questions and answers should particularly be noted:

Question: Is it true that people normally tend to struggle much to do deeds of merit at a time when food is scarce? Is it true that they think they themselves should not enjoy things but give them to monks in charity? Why then none of these people offered even a ladleful of food while the Buddha was keeping vassa in Verañjā? Why did the Brahmin Verañjā was not mindful of the Buddha’s presence though he had very earnestly requested the Buddha to spend the rainy season there?

Answer: The negligence on the part of the people and the Brahmin was due to Māra’s magical control and deception of them. Explanation: Māra possessed the Brahmin as soon as he left the Buddha. He also did the same thing to the citizens of Verañjā and the people in the environs of the city, the environs covering a distance of one yojana, within which, the monks on their morning alms-round could move about, going and coming. Māra confused all these people and made them forget about the Buddha and His community of monks and went away. Nobody, therefore remembered even to show respect to the Buddha.

Question: Did the Buddha keep the vassa without anticipating Māra’s magical control?

Answer: No, not without anticipating: He kept it though He foresaw Māra’s act of magic.

Question: Despite His knowledge of the same in anticipation, why did the Buddha keep the vassa only in Verañjā, but not in Campā, Sāvatti, Rājagaha, or in any other city?

Answer: In that very year, in that very period, even if the Buddha stayed in the Northern Continent of Uttara-kuru or in the Tāvatisa Abode of devas, the possession by Mara would take place all the same, let alone in Campā, Sāvatti, Rājagaha or anywhere else. In that year Mara was overwhelmed with malice, ill-will and hatred against the Buddha. In the city of Verañjā, however, it is also foreseen by the Buddha that the horse-merchants would come to the monks’ honour and relief. Hence His vassa-observance only in Verañjā.

Question: Was Mara not able to control the horse-merchants magically?

Answers: Yes, Māra was able to do so. But it was only after his attempt to control and deceive the citizens by magic that they arrived in Verañjā.

Question: Though they arrived only after Māra’s attempt, why did not he come back and exercise his magical influence on the merchants?

Answer: He did not because he was powerless to do so. Explanation: By no means can Māra do harm to three things meant for the Buddha: (1) the meal cooked and brought as an offering; (2) the offering of food decided to be a constant duty by those who think “we shall give the Buddha throughout such and such period,” and (3) an object brought to the monastery and offered by word of mouth saying: “This is a thing for the Buddha’s use as part of the four requisites.”

(Further explanation: The following are the four things that nobody can do harm: (1) the food that is brought and about to be offered and the four requisites intended to be permanent offering and deposited for the Buddha; (2) the life of the Buddha that usually is four-fifths of the human life span of the period in which He appears (that is to say that no one could disrupt the life of our Buddha Gotama before He was eighty which was four-fifths of a hundred, the normal life span of people in His period); (3) the Buddha’s major and minor marks and His body-light; in fact, the light of the moon, the sun, devas or Brahmās disappears on coming to the place where the Buddha’s marks and light shine; and (4) the Buddha’s Omniscience. Therefore it may be taken that the barley to which harm could not be done by Māra was consumed by the Buddha and his five hundred monk disciples.)

The Buddha’s Past Kamma that caused Him to meet with Famine

The Buddha’s past kamma which caused Him to meet with such famine along with His five hundred monks in Verañjā, was this: ninety-two kappas ago, during the dispensation of the Buddha Phussa, the Bodhisatta became a man of bad character on account of his association with wicked friends. He then wrongfully uttered to Buddha Phussa’s disciples such unwholesome words as “You had better bite coarse barley food and eat it but do not eat good sāli rice!” That evil past kamma was the reason for His encounter with famine as He was keeping the vassa in Verañjā. (In the Apādāna Pāli the story is directly told.)

The Buddha’s Bestowal of Blessing

The Buddha heard the pounding in small mortars.

Buddhas ask though they know.

They know and do not ask. (There is nothing that they do not know).

They know opportune time and ask.

They know opportune time and do not ask.

They ask what is connected with benefit; they do not ask what is not connected with benefit. (They do not ask what will be beneficial and they do not ask what will not be beneficial.)

What is not connected with benefit, they do away with through the Path-Knowledge.

They ask monks for two reasons, either to give a discourse or to lay down a rule for disciples.

The Buddha then asked the Venerable Ānanda: “What does, dear son Ānanda, the sound from the small mortars mean?” The Venerable Ānanda replied, stating what has been told above. At that moment the Buddha uttered:

“Excellent, Ānanda excellent! You, Ānanda, who are of good moral character, have overcome sāli rice cooked with meat (by not yielding to scarcity of food, by not wanting and by not at all letting yourself to be led astray by evil desires). The meaty rice that you have thus overcome will also be looked down upon by future generations.”

Venerable Moggallāna’s Bold Words

The Venerable Moggallāna was one who reached the height of his perfection of knowledge as a disciple on the seventh day after he had become a monk. He was also placed by the Buddha as the foremost among those who possessed supernatural powers.

Depending on his supernatural powers he thought: "Food is scarce in Verānjā now. Monks are having much trouble. What if I were to turn over the earth and give for food the essence of the earth from the bottom layer." Then he continued to reflect: "As I am staying in the presence of the Master, it does not befit me to do so without seeking His permission. Such an action would be tantamount to rivalry." So he went to the Buddha and bowed low before Him and took his seat at an appropriate place. Then he addressed the Buddha thus:

"Exalted Buddha, Verānjā is short of food now. It is hard to stay there. There are white bones all over the city. Lots are drawn for making a living. It is not easy to get enough food by going round with alms-bowls in hands. The bottom layer of the earth is pleasant for its sweetness, like honey that is free from bees and bee-eggs. Pray, Exalted Buddha, let me turn up the soil of this great earth so that the monks may enjoy its essence from the bottom layer."

Then the Buddha asked: "Dear son Moggallāna, how would you treat the beings living on the earth?" The Venerable Moggallāna answered:

"Exalted Buddha, I will change my one hand into something like the earth. Then I will transfer the beings, from the natural earth on the the hand that is changed into the earth. With the other hand, I will turn up this natural earth."

Then the Buddha uttered words of rejection: "No, dear son Moggallāna, it not proper. Do not wish to turn up the earth. It may lead to misunderstanding among living beings."

(Herein what should be noted with regard to the word "It may lead to misunderstanding among living beings." is this: Famine occurs not only now. It will occur also in future. From where can monks get a fellow monk endowed with supernatural power like you then? Though future monks may be sotāpanna, sakadāgāmin, anāgāmin, 'dry-vision' (sukkha-vipassaka) arahats, only those who have attained jhānas (but not Psychic powers) and even arahats of Analytical Knowledge, yet as they lack supernatural powers, they will approach the house of their lay devotee for food. Then it may occur to the devotees thus:

"Monks during the dispensation of the Buddha are accomplished in the threefold training. In that Buddha's lifetime, they had the benefits of their abhiññā and when there was famine they could turn up the earth and enjoyed the earth's essence. Nowadays there are no monks who have fully taken the threefold training. If there were such monks, they would do the same (as did those of the Buddha's time). They would not let us eat anything that is raw or cooked. (They will give us only the earth's essence.)" This thought will make them misunderstand about the Noble Ones themselves that "there are no Noble Ones!" Those, who condemn the Noble Ones on account of their misunderstanding, will be reborn in woeful states. Hence the Buddha prohibited the turning up of the earth's soil.)

At that time, as the Venerable Moggallāna failed to get permission, he desired to change his request and said:

"Pray, Exalted Buddha, let all monks go to the Northern Continent!"

The Buddha again uttered forbidding words as before: "Dear son Moggallāna, it is not proper. Do not desire to make them all go to the Northern Continent!"

(Herein though it was not said directly that "It may lead to misunderstanding among living beings," it should be known that the Buddha rejected the idea of going on alms-round in the Northern Continent on the very grounds, for it had been explained before. Note should be taken as in the previous manner.

(How would have he done if the Buddha were to give him permission? Through his supernatural powers he would have turned the great ocean into a small ditch that could be crossed over by a single stride and paved a new road straight from Naleru Nem tree to the Northern Continent; he would also have created the Continent like any village, which they have frequented for food, with streets for going and coming so that monks could be in and out conveniently.)

This indeed was the bold words of Venerable Moggallāna.

Venerable Sāriputta's Request to lay down Disciplinary Rules

At that time the Venerable Sāriputta, who was alone in seclusion, wondered: "Whose dispensations among Exalted Buddhas did not last long and whose dispensations did?" With this query he emerged from his seclusion in the evening and approached the Buddha and bowed low before Him and took his seat at an appropriate place. Then he asked the Buddha:

"Exalted Buddha, while I was staying in seclusion, I wondered: 'Whose dispensations among Exalted Buddhas did not last long and whose dispensations did?'"

(Herein it may be argued: "Was not the Venerable Sāriputta able to answer his own questions?") Answer: "He was able to do so in some cases and unable to do so in others." Explanation: He could decide: "The dispensation of these Buddhas did not last long and the dispensations of these Buddhas did." But he could not decide: "They did not last long for these reasons and they lasted long for these."

(Mahā Paduma Thera, however, states: "It was not difficult for the Chief Disciple, who had reached the height of the sixteen-fold wisdom and knowledge, to decide the reasons. But deciding by himself, though he was living with the Buddha, would be like discarding the balance and weighing something by the hand. Hence his question was put to the Buddha.")

At that time, being desirous of answering the Venerable Sāriputta's question, the Buddha said: "Dear son Sāriputta, the dispensations of the Buddhas Vipassī, Sikhī and Vessabhū did not last long (through successive generations of disciples). Those of the Buddhas Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana, and Kassapa lasted long (through successive generations of disciples)"

Then Venerable Sāriputta continued to ask:

"Exalted Buddha, why the dispensations of the Buddhas Vipassī, Sikhī and Vessabhū did not last long?"

The Buddha answered:

"Dear son Sāriputta, the Buddhas Vipassī, Sikhī and Vessabhū did not bother to give discourses to Their disciples elaborately. Their teachings of nine divisions, such as Sutta, Geyya, etc., were so few. Nor did They prescribe disciplinary rules for them. Nor did They recite the (Authoritative) Pātimokkha rules. When They passed away and when Their immediate disciples passed away, the later generations of disciples, who were of diverse names, clans and births, let the dispensations become extinct rapidly.

"Dear son Sāriputta, just as flowers of different kinds placed on a wooden board without being strung are scattered, blown away and destroyed by the wind for the very reason that they are not strung; even so, when these Buddhas and Their immediate disciples passed away, Their Teachings were caused to disappear fast by later disciples of diverse names, clans and births.

"Dear son Sāriputta, the other (three) Buddhas, knowing the intentions of Their disciples with Their minds, bothered to exhort them.

"Dear son Sāriputta, there took place an incident in former times. In a certain terrible forest, Buddha Vessabhū knew the minds of His thousand monks with His mind and exhorted them:

'Cultivate these three wholesome thoughts: the thought of renunciation (nekkhamma-vitakka), etc. Do not cultivate these unwholesome thoughts: the thought of sensual pleasure (kāma-vitakka), etc. Bear in mind that they are impermanent (anicca), miserable (dukkha), unsubstantial (anatta) and unpleasant (asubha). Do not bear in mind that they are permanent (nicca), happy (sukha), substantial (attā) and pleasant (subha). Abandon the unwholesome thoughts! Abide developing the wholesome thoughts!'

“Dear son Sāriputta, the thousand monks who had thus been exhorted by Buddha Vessabhū became arahats, free from āsavas. The minds of these thousand monks, therefore, were entirely cut off from grasping of anything through craving and wrong view that ‘This am I, this is mine!’ They were totally emancipated from āsavas that had now come to complete cessation, (cessation in the sense of not arising again). With regard to the terrible forest, the terror of the forest was such that those who were not free from passion generally had gooseflesh upon entering it.

(N.B. With reference to the statement that the three Buddhas “did not bother to give discourses to Their disciples elaborately,” They did not do so not because They were idle. In fact, there is no such thing as indolence or lack of industry on the part of Buddhas. Explanation: When Buddhas teach, They do so with the same degree of effort whether They are to teach a single person or two persons, or the whole universe full of beings. They do not reduce Their energy when seeing that the audience is small; nor do They increase Their effort when seeing that the audience is big. Just as the lion, king of animals, goes out in search of food after seven days (spent in the den), chases and catches his preys with the same speed, whether they are big or tiny, because he is resolved that his speed should not be inadequate, even so when Buddhas deliver Their sermons to Their listeners whether They form a multitude or only an inconsiderable gathering, They do so with equal industry, for They have a noble purpose not to decrease Their respect for the Dhamma.

(Unlike our Buddha, who taught in detail as though He were to fill the ocean, these three Buddhas, in fact, did not elaborate Their Teachings. The reason was that, in those times, beings had little dust of defilement in their eyes of wisdom. Explanation: In the lifetimes of these three Buddhas, beings enjoyed longevity, and the amount of dust that covered their eyes of wisdom was also slight. Beings in those days were therefore instantly converted on listening just one stanza connected with the Four Truths. It was therefore not necessary to preach to them elaborately. Hence the Teachings of these Buddhas in nine divisions were so meagre.

(In the time of these three Buddhas, since Their monk-disciples were wholly free from wrongdoings, no Authoritative Disciplinary Rules (Āṇā-Pātimokkha) associated with the seven portions of offences had to be promulgated.

Only the recitation of the Exhortative Pātimokkha (Ovāda-Pātimokkha) was known to them. Even that Pātimokkha, they did not recite fortnightly. (The two kinds of Pātimokkha have been dealt with in detail in the Chapter 25.)

(These long-lived Buddhas had two generations of disciples to follow them: (1) the immediate disciples and (2) the later disciples who were monks ordained by those immediate disciples. At the time when the later disciples, under the second category emerged, since there had been no disciplinary rules from the outset and since the disciples, who were of diverse names, clans and births, did not feel obliged to protect and preserve the small amount of discourses but remained careless as though they shirked their duty, saying: “Such and such Thera will do it, such and such Thera will do it,” they did nothing for safeguarding the Teachings by holding Councils (Saṅgāyanās). Hence the rapid disappearance of their dispensations.

(With regard to the statement: “The dispensations of the long-lived Buddhas did not last long,” it originally meant to say that Their dispensations did not last long for many generations of disciples. The life of Buddha Vipassī, however, was eighty thousand years long; the life span of His immediate disciples also was eighty thousand years, so was the life span of the last generation of later disciples who were ordained by the immediate disciples. Therefore, the dispensation with the two generations of disciples lasted for one hundred and sixty thousand years after the demise of the Buddha. In terms of generations of disciples, however, there were only two, and this small number of generations was meant, in speaking of “the short dispensation”; it was spoken, one should particularly remember, not in terms of years.)

Having heard thus of the reasons for the short-lived dispensations (in terms of generations of disciples) of the three Buddhas: Vipasī, Sikhī and Vessabhū, the Noble Thera Sāriputta, being desirous of hearing the reasons for the long-lived dispensations of the other three Buddhas: Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa, continued to ask the Buddha:

“Exalted Buddha, why did the dispensations of the Buddhas Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa last long?”

The Buddha answered:

“Dear son Sāriputta, the Buddhas Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa cared to give elaborate discourses to their disciples. Their teachings of nine divisions, such as Sutta, Geyya, etc., were numerous. They prescribed disciplinary rules for them. They recited the (Authoritative) Pāṭimokkha. When they passed away and when their immediate disciples passed away, therefore, the generations of their later disciples, who were of diverse names, clans and births, caused the dispensations to last long.

“Dear son Sāriputta, just as flowers of different kinds strung by a string and placed on a wooden board cannot be dispersed, blown away and destroyed by the wind (for the very reason that they are strung) even so, when these Buddhas and Their immediate disciples passed away, Their teachings were caused to last long by later (generations of) disciples of diverse names, clans and births.

“Dear son Sāriputta, the aforesaid factors (elaborate teaching, large number of discourses, promulgation of disciplinary rules and recitation of the Pāṭimokkha) together formed the reason for the long existence of the teachings of the three Buddhas: Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa.”

(As for our Inestimable Chief of the three worlds, He should have been born when the life span was ten thousand years, which was half that of Buddha Kassapa; if not, He should have been born in the period of five thousand years life span, one thousand years or five hundred years life span. But His wisdom was not mature enough until then. It attained maturity only when the life span became one hundred, which is very short indeed. Therefore, it should be stated that although the dispensation of our Buddha lasted long, in terms of generations of disciples, it did not last long as did the dispensations of those former Buddhas in terms of years.)

Having thus learnt the reason for the long existence of the dispensations of the Buddhas Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana and Kassapa, the Venerable Sāriputta made a conclusion that “Only the laying down of rules is the main cause for the perpetuity of the dispensation of a Buddha.” Wishing to ensure the perpetuity of the dispensation of the present Buddha, he rose from his seat, adjusted his robe, covering the left shoulder, and raised his hands in adoration towards the Buddhas. He, then emphatically requested the Master with these words:

“May the Exalted Buddha lay down disciplinary rules so that this dispensation may last long? May He recites the Pāṭimokkha! Glorious Buddha, it is time to promulgate rules vital to the long standing of the Teaching, and to recite the Pāṭimokkha! Exalted Buddha of good speech, the time has come to lay down rules and to bring about the Pāṭimokkha which was noted for the lasting endurance of the dispensation!”

Being desirous of telling that “the time is not ripe yet for laying down rules,” the Buddha said: “Wait, dear Sāriputta! Wait, dear Sāriputta! Only the Buddha shall know the proper time (for promulgating rules and reciting the Pāṭimokkha)!

- (1) “Dear Sāriputta, as long as there do not take place in the Sangha some wrongdoings which are the basis of āsavas in this dispensation, the Buddha does not lay down rules for the disciples nor does He proclaim the (Authoritative) Pāṭimokkha. Dear Sāriputta, when there take place some wrongdoings in the Sangha which are the basis of āsavas in this dispensation, does He lay down the rules and proclaim the (Authoritative) Pāṭimokkha, only for the benefit of eliminating those wrongdoings.
- (2) “Dear Sāriputta, as long as the Sangha does not have a large number of monks of long standing, there do not take place yet in it some wrongdoings, which are the basis of āsavas, in this dispensation. Dear Sāriputta, when the Sangha has a large number of monks of long standing, there take place in it some wrongdoings, which are the basis of āsavas in this dispensation, then only for the benefit of eliminating those wrongdoings, which are the basis of āsavas, does the Buddha lay down rules and proclaim the (Authoritative) Pāṭimokkha.
- (3) “Dear Sāriputta, as long as the Sangha does not thrive, there do not take place yet in it some wrongdoings which are the basis of āsavas in this dispensation. Dear Sāriputta, when the Sangha thrives, and there take place in it some wrongdoings which are the basis of āsavas in this dispensation, then only for the benefit of eliminating these wrongdoings, does the Buddha lay down rules and proclaim the (Authoritative) Pāṭimokkha.
- (4) “Dear Sāriputta, as long as the Sangha does not know many gains, there do not take place yet in it some wrongdoings which are the basis of āsavas in this dispensation. Dear Sāriputta, when the Sangha knows many gains, and, there take place in it some wrongdoings, which are the basis of āsavas in this dispensation, then only for the benefit of eliminating those wrongdoings, does the Buddha lay down rules and proclaim (Authoritative) Pāṭimokkha.
- (5) “Dear Sāriputta, as long as the Sangha does not have much knowledge, there do not take place yet in it some wrongdoings which are the basis of āsavas in this dispensation. Dear Sāriputta, when the Sangha has much knowledge, and, there take place in it some wrongdoings which are the basis of āsavas in this dispensation, then only for the benefit of eliminating those wrongdoings, does the Buddha lay down rules and proclaim the (Authoritative) Pāṭimokkha.

“Dear Sāriputta, now the Sangha is free from forms (in the form of immoral persons), free from blemishes. free from impurities, clean, and stands (in the essence of such virtues as morality and the like). Dear Sāriputta, of these five hundred monks, the lowest is a sotāpanna, whose assured destination is the three higher stages of the Path, for he will never land in woeful abodes.”

(Herein by āsavas is meant moral defilement and suffering such as accusation, killing, imprisonment, etc., by others in this life, and suffering of rebirth in the woeful states hereafter. Since such wrong-doings as sexual intercourse, stealing, killing human beings, etc., form the ground for āsavas, they are called Āsavatthaniya (basis of āsavas).

(At the time when the Venerable Sāriputta made the request for laying down rules, transgression had not occurred at all. Had the rules such as the four Pārājikas and others been laid down long before the actual taking place of transgressions, such an action would not have escaped private abuse and blame and public censure. How would such an action would not have escaped?)

(If rules were to be laid down in advance, all the necessary rules would have been done so, saying: “If a monk commits sexual intercourse...” and so on. Laying down the rules before seeing the transgression, others would abuse and blame privately and censure publicly as follows:

“Why does the Monk Gotama bind us to these rules, taking for granted that the Order of monks adheres to Him and follows His words? Why did He lay down the Pārājika rules? Have not these clansmen become monks after renouncing their great luxury, vast circles of relatives and princely wealth that they had in their possession? Are they not content with what is just enough for their food and what is just enough for their clothing, and do not they abide with extreme respect in the threefold training and without regard for their bodies and lives? Among such good men, who would indulge in such earthly practices (loka-āmisā) as sexual intercourse, stealing another's property, taking another's life, earning his living by falsely telling of his virtues. Even if the four Pāṭimokkha rules were not laid down, has it not been made clear that sexual intercourse, stealing, etc., are not proper, not practicable, for even while as a novice one keeps the precepts, saying: ‘I take upon myself the rule of staying away from taking life’ and so on?” Such would have been private abuse and blame and public censure.

(Moreover, probably the Buddha's wisdom would not have been known to beings. The rules that had been laid down would have been destroyed. They would not have lasted. To use a worldly simile, an unclever medical doctor sends for a man who has no ulcer yet (but who would soon suffer from an ulcer) and said: “Come, man, on this part of your body there will appear an ulcer, bringing no benefit but threatening your life. Get it treated early!” “Very well, sir. You yourself give treatment to it?” Saying thus the man submits himself to the doctor, who then gives surgical treatment to that part of the man's body without an ulcer and caused the skin to become normal by taking out the blood, applying the medicine, dressing, cleaning, and so on. Thereafter, he asks the man saying: “I have cured your ulcer. Give me the cost of the medicine!”

(The man who has been medically treated may then privately abuse and blame and openly censure the unclever surgeon in his presence, saying: “What is this foolish doctor talking about? Which disease of mine has been cured by this foolish doctor? As a matter of fact, has not the stupid surgeon caused trouble to me? Has he not made my blood gone?” The man may not feel grateful to the doctor.

(In the same way, had the Buddha laid down the rules for His disciples before the actual wrong-doings happened, he would not have escaped private abuse, etc. His wisdom might not have been known to beings. The rules that had been laid down would have been destroyed. They would not have lasted. Hence the Buddha said, in the negative: “Dear Sāriputta, as long as there do not take place wrong-doings in the Sangha, a Buddha does not lay down rules for the disciples,” and so on.

(Herein, “the time when wrong-doings have not taken place” means the time which was not ripe yet for laying down rules. “The time when wrongdoings have taken place” means the time which is ripe for doing so. Laying down of rules in an inopportune time might bring about the aforesaid blame and censure. The same action, taken as required by the occurrence of wrong-doings, may be likened to a clever medical doctor who gives the ulcer, that has appeared curative treatment by operating on it, applying medicine, dressing, cleaning and so on and cause the recovery of the ulcer and the normalcy of the skin. The Buddha may be likened to him, who is not abused but honoured for his distinguished service in his medical profession, for He was similarly not abused and blamed privately or otherwise but honoured for His distinguished efficiency in the matter of His Omniscience. The rules laid down would not then be impaired but would stand intact for long.

(By the words in the first statement is shown opportune time and inopportune time for laying down rules. By the words in the second, third, fourth and fifth statements is shown the time when wrong-doings occurred. The elaborate meaning of these words may be taken from the Verañjā section of the Pārājika Kaṇḍa Commentary.)

Taking His Leave at The End of The Vassa

After the Buddha had thus explained in detail the question of laying down the disciplinary rules to the Venerable Sāriputta, the General of the Dhamma, He spent the whole vassa at Verāñjā and performed pavāraṇa on the Mahāpavaraṇā Day, the full moon of Assayaṇa, at the end of vassa. Then He called Venerable Ānanda and said: “Dear Ānanda, when the Buddhas have observed vassa at the request of others, it is not their custom to depart without asking them for leave (or they are to depart only after informing them). Come, Ānanda, let us go and seek permission from Brahmin Verañjā.” After finishing His meal, the Buddha with the Venerable Ānanda as his companion visited Verāñjā’s place in the afternoon, illuminating the city gates and all the roads and streets with His body rays.

When the Buddha stood at the door of the Brahmin’s house, the Brahmin’s men, seeing the Buddha, reminded their master; (only then did Verañjā regained a sense of his responsibilities and got up from his seat excitedly to prepare a seat worthy of the Noble One; he then welcomed and invited Him respectfully saying: “Please come this way, Exalted Buddha!” The Buddha walked along as had been invited by the Brahmin and sat down on the prepared seat. (It was the time when Mara had withdrawn his spell.)

“Brahmin, we have observed the vassa at your invitation. Now we inform you that we want to go elsewhere!”

Verañjā replied to the Buddha:

“Right, Venerable Gotama. You have observed the vassa at our invitation. But I have not given alms yet. (The reason for that is) not because we have nothing to give, not because we do not want to give. People of household life have too many things to do. Where can they have a chance to give? May the Venerable Gotama accept together with the company of monks my food, my act of merit, tomorrow.”

(The Brahmin did not know about the magical influence of Māra. He thought his absent-mindedness was due to the affairs and drawbacks of household life. Hence his supplication to the Buddha.)

It occurred then to the Buddha: “If I do not accept the Brahmin’s invitation, demerit will develop to him, and to all the Verañjā citizens as well for that matter, who would think: ‘The Monk Gotama seems to be angry because He receives no alms for the whole period of the three vassa months. Therefore, He rejects even a single meal despite my request. The Monk Gotama has no patience. He is not an Omniscient One!’ Let there be no development of demerit to them!” Out of compassion, the Buddha accepted the invitation by keeping silent. Thereafter, He made the Brahmin know the futility of being occupied with the domestic affairs and drawbacks. With a Dhamma-talk appropriate at that moment, the Buddha showed the two benefits; one for this life and the other for the next. He also made him dedicated to good deeds, and enthusiastic about and happy with them. Then He rose from His seat and departed.

Verañjā’s Great Alms-giving

After the departure of the Buddha, the Brahmin Verañjā summoned all his family members and other inmates of the house to a meeting, at which he said: “Dear ones, I have offered not a single day’s meal to the Buddha though I invited him to stay here for the three months of vassa. Let us now offer alms meant for the three months vassa period in a day tomorrow.” Having given instructions thus, the Brahmin had excellent food cooked, and next morning he had his place decorated and seats worthy of Noble Ones prepared. After setting up exquisite offerings of perfumes and flowers, he sent for the Buddha with the word: "It is meal time now, Venerable Gotama, the food is ready!"

Accompanied by His hundred monks, the Buddha arrived at Verañjā's house and sat together with them on the seats prepared. Verañjā personally served the Order of monks, headed by the Buddha, with delicious meals until they were satisfied and refused to take more. As the Buddha removed His hand from the alms-bowl after finishing the meal, Verañjā offered Him a set of three robes which worth three thousand. (Each robe cost a thousand.) To each monk too, he offered a set of two pieces of cloth to make robes. (The value of each robe of cloth was five hundred. Hence the amount of his donation made to the monks was five hundred thousand. Only this much comes from the Pāli Text. The Commentarial account is as follows.)

As he was not satisfied with this much of his offering (of robes worth five hundred thousand), the Brahmin Verañjā offered again a large number of rugs, bolts of cloth made in Pattunna country, each costing seven or eight thousand, so that they might be cut and made into garments of double layers, shoulder coverings, waistbands, water strainers, etc.

He also gave each monk, jugs and bottles filled with medicinal ointment heated a hundred or thousand times and worth one thousand. There was nothing left out from the four requisites he presented for their use. He gave away in charity all the necessaries to the monks.

Having done such a great alms-giving, the Brahmin sat down together with his wife and children, respectfully doing obeisance to the Buddha. Owing to Māra's magic, he had lost the opportunity of enjoying the taste of immortality in the form of a discourse throughout the vassa. In order to make up the Brahmin's loss and to fulfil his wish, Buddha let the rain of immortality fall heavily in a single day. He preached the double advantage for the present life and the next and established him in meritorious deeds. Finally, the Buddha made Verañjā zealous and delighted in good deeds, and left the place.

Together with his wife, Verañjā respectfully raised his hands in adoration towards the Buddha and His assembly of monks and followed them to see them off, requesting: "Exalted Buddha, kindly do another favour by visiting us once again!" Then the Brahmin returned with tears trickling from his eyes.

After staying in Verañjā for as long as he wished, the Buddha left the city. Being desirous of reducing the great circular journey, He led the monks, who had been so tired and fatigued because of the scarcity of food during the whole vassa, along the direct route, bypassing Sorreyya, Sankassa, and Kaññakujja cities. On arriving at the port of Payāga, the Buddha crossed the Gaṅgā and reached Vārāṇasī. At this city too He stayed for as long as He wished, and then He headed for Vesālī. Having arrived at Vesālī the Buddha sojourned at Kutīgāra (a monastery with the gable) in the forest of Mahāvana.

THE MONK SUDINNA, THE SON OF THE KALANDA MERCHANT

At that time, in the village of Kalanda, near the city of Vesālī, there was the merchant Kalanda's son, named Sudinna. Accompanied by many friends, Sudinna, the merchant's son, went to Vesālī on some business.

(The village was named Kalanda because it abounded in black squirrels. The Kalanda merchant owned a wealth of forty crores. He was therefore a man of riches recognized by the King. His son, Sudinna, went to Vesālī to transact business, to collect debts, and to make appointments among other things.

(Some scholars said that he was in Vesālī to have fun in the festival of the constellation Kattikā (Pleiades). The Buddha indeed came to Vesālī in the bright fortnight of the month of Kattikā (October-November). The festivity of Kattikā in Vesālī attracted large crowds of people. For the sake of this festive gathering, Sudinna the merchant's son went.)

On seeing the people who went out from Vesālī after breakfast, wearing clean clothes and carrying flowers, perfumes and unguent, to see the Buddha and to listen to His sermon, Sudinna asked them where they were going and was informed of their purpose. Thinking: "I too should go along with them," he joined the crowd that flocked to hear the Buddha, who in the midst of the audience composed of four classes of devotees, was delivering a discourse in a voice resembling that of a Brahmā. Inspired by the Buddha's pleasing manner and stirred by his past wholesome kamma, he thought to himself: "How well it would be if I too could listen to the discourse!" But since the audience was so large, he was unable to go near the Buddha and had to take a suitable seat at the edge of the assembly, paying attention to the Buddha's talk.

While he was thus paying attention to the Buddha's talk on the threefold training of sīla, samādhi and paññā, a thought arose in him:

"When I ponder in many ways the Buddha's discourse, I come to the conclusion that it is not easy indeed for a householder to practise such a noble practice (of the threefold training) which is so pure and perfect like a newly polished conch. How wonderful it would be if I leave household life for monkhood, having shaved my head and beard and donned the dyed robe!"

Thereafter, Sudinna went along with the moving crowd for a short distance, for in the crowd were many of his relatives and friends, who might be in his way and they would forcibly take him away by the arm, saying: "You are the only son of your parents. You must not be given permission to become a monk." Hence his short distance of departure together with the crowd. Then pretending that he had to wash his hands, he turned back and approached the Buddha with these words of request:

"Exalted Buddha, when I pondered your discourse in many ways, I came to the conclusion that it was not easy indeed for a householder to practise such a noble practice (of the threefold training), which is pure and perfect like a newly polished conch. Exalted Buddha, I wish to enter monkhood, having shaved my head and beard and donned the dyed robe. Exalted Buddha, kindly accept me as a monk!"

As the Buddha had denied monkhood to those who were not permitted by the parents since the initiation of Prince Rāhula, the Buddha asked Sudinna, "Have your parents, Sudinna, permitted you to leave household life for monkhood?" "No, Exalted Buddha, they have not yet permitted me to do so," replied Sudinna. Then said the Buddha, "Sudinna, Buddhas do not ordain a man who has not got permission from his parents." "Exalted Buddha," said Sudinna, "I shall seek permission from my parents."

Then Sudinna, having finished his business in Vesālī, approached his parents, at Kalanda village, with these words:

“Dear parents, when I pondered the Buddha's discourse in many ways, I came to the conclusion that it was not easy indeed for a householder to practise such a noble practice (of the threefold training), which is pure and perfect like a newly polished conch. I wish to leave household life for monkhood, having shaved my head and beard and donned the dyed robe! Please give me permission to do so.”

The parents then rejected Sudinna's request, saying:

“Our son Sudinna, you are our only son whom we love so dearly. You are the child whom we have brought up and nurtured in happiness. Dear Sudinna, you know no discomforts whatever. Let us be separated from you against our wish only when you die. How can we permit you to leave household life for monkhood while you are living?”

The son requested as before for the second time. The parents similarly rejected for the second time. He did so for the third time. And they too did reject for the third time.

Knowing then that “my parents will not permit me (by any means) to renounce my household life,” and lying down on the bare ground, the very spot on which he made the request, he said: “This place will see either my death or my renunciation.” He refused to eat his meal once, twice, three times, four, five, six and seven times and demonstrated his great meritorious desire (by fasting).

Then the parents said to their son:

“Dear son Sudinna, you are our only child, whom we love so dearly. You are the one whom we have brought up and nurtured in happiness. Dear Sudinna, you know no discomfort whatever. Only your death will separate us from you against our wish. How can we permit you to leave household life and take up monkhood while you are alive? Rise, dear Sudinna, eat, drink and have fun. Feel delight in doing good deeds while eating, drinking and having fun. However, we will never give you our permission (by any means) for your renunciation.”

Sudinna kept quiet while they were saying so. He remained silent even when his parents said so a second time and a third time.

Not getting even verbal response from their son though they had appealed to him three times, the parents sent for his friends and urged them saying: “Your friend Sudinna is desirous of becoming a monk. Please prevent him from doing so!” The friends went up to Sudinna and tried to prevent him three times as they had been told by his parents. To the friends as well, Sudinna gave no answer but kept his mouth shut.

Then the friends reflected and discussed among themselves: “If this Sudinna were to die for not getting permission to become a monk, no benefit would accrue from his death. If he were to become a monk his parents could see him at will and so could we. Monkhood is very burdensome. The monk goes on alms-round carrying an earthen bowl daily. He sleeps alone and eats a single morning meal. Such a noble practice is so difficult to follow. And Sudinna is a delicate urbanite. By no means can he devote himself to the noble practice that requires one to sleep alone and to eat a single morning meal. He will definitely come back home. Well, we shall ask his parents to permit him.” Thereafter they approached Sudinna's parents and said to them with some advice:

“Dear elders, Sudinna is lying down on the bare ground, saying: ‘This place will see either my death or my renunciation. If you do not give him permission to renounce the world and enter monkhood, he will die at that very place (where he is lying down). Suppose you grant him permission for his monkhood, you can have a chance to see him as a monk. After becoming a monk, if he is not happy with ascetic life, where will he go except his parents' house? He will come back to this house of yours. You had better permit Sudinna to go forth and live an ascetic life!’”

Then Sudinna's parents replied: “Dear boys, we grant him our permission for his renunciation and entering upon monkhood,” and the friends went up to Sudinna and said: “Get up, friend Sudinna, permission has been granted to you by your parents!”

So happy and elated with the news that he had been permitted to become a monk, Sudinna got up, dusting his body with his hands, and tried to regain his strength for one or two days; thereafter he approached the Buddha, bowed his head in adoration, sat down at a suitable place and requested:

“Exalted Buddha, permission has been granted to me by my parents. May the Exalted Buddha make me a monk!”

The Buddha asked a nearby monk who was practising piṇḍapāta-dhutaṅga, “Monk, as has been requested by Sudinna thus, you, dear son, grant him ordination as a novice and then ordination as a monk!” “Very well, Exalted Buddha,” replied the dhutaṅga practicing monk, and taking Sudinna, his co-residential (saddhivihārika) pupil entrusted by the Buddha, he made him a novice and then a monk.

Soon after becoming a monk, the Venerable Sudinna engaged in the following dhutaṅga practices, the means of shaking off mental defilements, āraññika-dhutaṅga, dwelling in a forest monastery, piṇḍapātika-dhutaṅga, eating food obtained by going on alms-round, pamsukūlika-dhutaṅga, putting on robes made of rags, sapadānacārika-dhutaṅga, collecting food from houses serially. Thus he dwelt with an unknown small village as his resort for food.

At that time, the country of Vajjī was short of food. It was hard to live there. There were white bones. People had to live by food tickets. It was not easy for monks to get enough food going round with alms-bowls in their hands. Then it occurred to the Venerable Sudinna:

“Now Vajjī country was short of food. It was hard to live there. There were white bones. Lots had to be drawn for food. It was not easy for monks to get enough food by going round with alms-bowls in their hands. I have a large number of relatives in the city of Vesālī who are prosperous (with wealth), who possess plenty of (hidden) treasures, who are endowed with abundance of riches, abundance of gold and silver, abundance of delightful articles and gems (for daily use) and a large quantity of goods and grains (for trading and exchange). What if I were to live, depending on my relatives. On account of me they would make offerings and do things of merit. And material gains will accrue to monks. Monks, I too will not be troubled by food.”

With this idea, Venerable Sudinna packed his bedding and headed for Vesālī, taking his bowl and robe. On his arrival at Vesālī, he stayed at a monastery with a peaked roof (kūṭagāra) in Mahāvana (Great Forest) near Vesālī.

Getting the news that “the Kalanda merchant’s son, Sudinna, is said to have been in Vesālī, his relatives sent sixty pots of food as offering to him. (Each pot contained food for ten monks.) Then (according to his previous plan) he offered the sixty pots to (six hundred) monks, and (as for himself), being an observer of piṇḍapāta-dhutaṅga of the highest kind, he adjusted his garment, took his bowl and robe and entered the village of Kalanda for food. While going round and stopping in front of the houses, one after another he happened to have approached the gate of the house belonging to his father, the (Kalanda) merchant.

(N.B. The events after his return from the country of Vajji began to take place only in his eighth year as a bhikkhu (i.e. when the Buddha was in the twentieth year of His ministry). Here the events are told continuously in order to keep the sequence of the events uninterrupted.)

At that moment, a female slave to kinsmen of Sudinna was coming out of the house to throw away barley cakes that had become stale for having been kept overnight, (so stale that it was impossible for male slaves, workers and cattle to eat). Then Sudinna said to her: “Sister, if you are to throw away those cakes, please put them into my bowl!”

While she was putting the stale cakes into the Venerable Sudinna’s bowl, she could not recognize him as the son of her master, for Sudinna had been away for eight years; but taking note of the features of his hands and feet and also his voice, she went to Sudinna’s mother and said: "You know, O madam, your son Sudinna has returned!" Sudinna's mother replied: "O woman, if you have told me the truth, I will set you free from slavery!"

Meanwhile the Venerable Sudinna was leaning against the base of the wall (in a eating house in Kalanda) and enjoying the stale food with relish.

(Some homes of donors in certain regions had eating houses built. In these houses seats were readily arranged. (Jars of) water for drinking and use was placed; vinegar was also provided. After receiving food, monks sat and ate it in these houses. If need be, they took offerings which were placed there by donors. Therefore, 'the base of the wall' here means the bottom of the wall of a refectory erected by donors. Monks never eat, sitting at an unseemly place, unlike destitutes. See the Commentary.)

When Sudinna's wealthy father came back from work and saw him enjoying the stale food with relish, he went nearer and reproved, saying:

"O dear, my beloved son Sudinna! it is a pity that you should be eating the stale barley cakes! In fact, should not you come home?"

The Venerable Sudinna then replied: "I have been to your house donor. And I got the stale barley cakes from there!" The father grasped Sudinna's arm and said: "Come, dear Sudinna. Let us go home?" An obedient son having love for his father, Sudinna went along to his father's house and took the prepared seat.

The wealthy father asked him: "Help yourself son!" "Enough, father," replied the Venerable Sudinna: "I have eaten for the day." When the father invited him, saying: "Please accept my offering of meal for tomorrow," though he was committed to the highest kind of piṇḍapāta-dhutaṅga, Sudinna accepted it by keeping silent, he then rose from his seat and departed, for he thought: "If I reject their single meal, it will be a great distress to my parents and kinsmen."

When the night was over, the Venerable Sudinna's mother had the ground plastered with wet cow-dung, and two heaps of treasures made, one of gold and the other of silver. The treasure heaps were so great that a man standing on one side could not see another standing on the other side. So great and high were the piles of treasures. Having caused them to be covered by mats, and a seat prepared in the middle and screens set up, then she asked Sudinna's ex-wife: "Dear daughter, I would like to ask you to put on the clothes that would please my son Sudinna." "Yes, mother," replied the ex-wife to Sudinna's mother.

When morning came, the Venerable Sudinna, having adjusted his robe and carrying his bowl and robe, approached his parent's house, and sat down on the prepared seat (between the two treasure heaps). The father came to Sudinna and had the heaps uncovered and said:

"Dear son Sudinna, this gold and silver is the treasure that has come down from the side of your mother's mother. This much is just for the use of feminine things. (This is the cost of powder and flowers.) There is yet the treasure from me. The treasures from your grandfather and great grandfather are also kept separately. Dear son, they are available for you to live in luxury and perform meritorious deeds when you leave monkhood. Come, dear Sudinna, enjoy your wealth and do good works."

"I cannot become a lay man, donor," replied Sudinna, "I am very happy following the noble practice (of the threefold training)."

The father said as before for the second time, and the Venerable Sudinna replied similarly. When the father said for the third time, however, Sudinna replied (differently), saying: "If you, donor, show no anger, I would like to say something." Thinking that 'my son would tell me favourably,' the father said delightedly: "Go ahead, son." Then the Venerable Sudinna uttered determinedly to his father, the wealthy merchant:

"Father, in that case, have fibre bags made and fill them with gold and silver, take them in cans and drop them in the middle of the Ganges! Because, donor, on account of the possession of this gold and silver, you will have fear, trembling, gooseflesh and need protection. No possession means no fear and other forms of trouble. That is why.”

This caused sadness to the father who wondered: “Why does my son Sudinna have the heart to say so?”

Lure Through The Wife

Being unable to lure the Venerable Sudinna to return to household life by showing him the riches, the father thought: “There is now no fetter like a woman for a man,” he sent the ex-wife of Sudinna, saying: “I pray you, dear daughter, my son Sudinna loves you. He is fond of you. He may listen to you.” Accordingly, the ex-wife grasped Sudinna's legs in her arms and said:

“You have followed the noble practice, my lord, for the sake of getting celestial damsels. How do they look like?”

(Explanation: In those days, many princes, sons of brahmins, and sons of merchants renounced their untold luxuries and became ascetics. Seeing them, those who were ignorant of the benefits of an ascetic life used to ask: “Why do these people become ascetics?” And the answers they got from those who pretended to know was: “Because they want to have celestial damsels and dancers.” The questions and answers of these unknowledgeable people became widespread. Acting on that reply, the ex-wife of the Venerable Sudinna asked as mentioned above.)

The Venerable Sudinna replied: “I do not, sister, practise the noble practice for celestial damsels.” This prompted the ex-wife to think thus: “My Lord Sudinna has now called me ‘sister’. He no longer wants me now. Not wanting me who is his partner in life, and his own wife, he takes me as his own sister, born of the same mother.” Her thought brought about grief and caused her to fall down in faintness at that very place.

Then the Venerable Sudinna said to his father: “If you are to give food, donor, do so. Do not trouble us with your display of wealth and woman. Enticement with such a display means torment to monks!” Thereafter, the parents personally offer excellent food to the Venerable Sudinna until he was satisfied and stopped them.

Request for Procreative Seed

When the meal was done, the mother of the Venerable Sudinna said to him:

“Dear son Sudinna, our family is rich. We have a great hidden wealth. There are abundant luxuries and things for daily use. There are many delightful articles and treasures. So are there countless goods and grains for trading and exchange. Come, dear Sudinna, return to lay life and enjoy the riches. And do good works.”

Sudinna rejected his mother's words by giving the same answer as that given to his father: “I cannot become a lay man, mother. I dare not do so. I am very happily engaging in the noble practice (of the threefold training).” The mother said as before for the second time and the Venerable Sudinna replied the same. On the third time, however, Sudinna's mother asked for procreative seed by saying:

Then Sudinna reflected: “I am the only heir to the wealth of my father and mother. There is nobody else. (As long as I do not give the seed) they will constantly follow me for protection of the wealth. If they do so, I will not have a chance to devote myself to asceticism free of worries. My parents will give up following me only when they get a son as an heir. Then only will I be able to perform my duties as a monk in comfort and happiness.” And he replied: “Mother, I can, however, do something to provide the seed for procreation.” (without knowing that he would be guilty for doing so).

Again, the mother asked: “Where are you staying now, dear Sudinna?” “In the Mahāvana, mother,” so replying, the Venerable Sudinna rose from his seat and departed.

Then Sudinna's mother asked her son's ex-wife: “Dear daughter, let me make a request for getting a son. Tell me when your fertile period is.” “Very well, madam,” replied Sudinna's ex-wife.

Provision of The Seed for Procreation

Before long, Sudinna's ex-wife was ready for natural conception, and she informed Sudinna's mother of the matter. “In that case, dear daughter, dress up in the clothes which used to have appeal for my son,” said the mother. “Very well, madam,” so saying she did as she had been told.

Taking Sudinna's ex-wife, his mother went to Mahāvana and told Sudinna twice as before to leave monkhood and enjoy the riches and do acts of merit. Sudinna refused to do so by saying as before that he could not become a lay man and that he dared not do so. He further added that he was happy in pursuing (the noble practice of the threefold training). On the third time, however, the mother asked for the seed of procreation. Saying: “This is something I can do,” he caught hold his ex-wife's arm and together they had entered the Mahāvana. As it was a time when the first Pārājika rule had not been laid down yet, he did not see sexual intercourse as an offence. As such, in the forest, he successfully indulged three times in the sex practice with his ex-wife. As a result his ex-wife became pregnant.

Eight Causes of Pregnancy

Possible causes of pregnancy:

- (1) by copulating,
- (2) by coming into physical contact,
- (3) by inserting man's loin cloth (into the vagina),
- (4) by swallowing the semen,
- (5) by stroking the navel,
- (6) by seeing the male's appearance,
- (7) by hearing the male's sound, and
- (8) by getting the male's odour.

Of these,

- (1) pregnancy through copulation is explicit. (Sudinna's ex-wife had pregnancy by this means.)
- (2) Some women developing strong sexual feeling when the monthly period comes, pull men's hand and hair-knot, stroke limbs: big and small and take pleasure thereby, which makes her pregnant. Thus, through the physical contact pregnancy happens.
- (3) During the lifetime of the Buddha, the monk Udāyī gazed at the private part of his ex-wife and had a discharge of semen; he asked her to wash the soiled robe. She swallowed part of the semen and put part of it together with the robe into her organ. By so doing, she became pregnant. Thus, through the insertion of men's loin cloth into the vagina, pregnancy takes place.
- (4) A Jātaka story tells of a doe, the mother of Migasinga the hermit. When she was in heat she came to the place where the old hermit, Migasinga's father, urinated, and took the urine together with the semen. By so doing she became pregnant and gave birth to the baby Migasiṅga. Thus, through the swallowing of semen pregnancy occurs.
- (5) In the Suvannasāma Jātaka, the Sakka, foreseeing that the Bodhisatta's parents would become blind. and wanting them to have a son, asked the wise hermit Dukūla whether sexual intercourse was permissible to hermits. When the reply was “Whether it is permissible or not, we became ascetic because we do not want to do it,” the Sakka told him to stroke Pārikā's navel during menstruation. Dukūla did as he was told and Pārikā became pregnant and gave birth to Bodhisatta Suvannasāma. Thus, stroking of a women's navel is another cause for pregnancy.

Similarly, while menstruation was occurring to a rich man's daughter, Diṭṭhamaṅgalika, the Bodhisatta hermit, Mātaṅga, stroke her navel which made her pregnant and her son, Maṇḍavya, was born. The mother of Prince Caṇḍa Pajjota, during the menses, felt a scorpion's walking across her navel pleasant, she became pregnant and gave birth to the prince.

- (6) Being deprived of copulation with men, some women in this world who eye men lustfully while in the period and even staying at home can become pregnant. (In Ceylon there was a court lady, to whom the same thing happened.) Thus, through the sight of the male's appearance pregnancy happens.
- (7) No male is known among the pond herons. When they hear thunder when in heat, they become pregnant. Sometimes pregnancy occurs to hens on hearing the crowing of a cock. Similarly, pregnancy happens to cows as they hear the bellowing of a bull. Thus, through the hearing of the male's sound pregnancy takes place.
- (8) Sometimes, cows conceive when they get the smell of a bull. Thus, through the male's odour, pregnancy takes place.

These eight causes for pregnancy should particularly be noted.

Tumultuous Denunciation of Devas and Brahmās

(There is no hidden place in the world for a man who commits evil. In fact, he who does evil is the first to know his evil. Next, his guardian spirit and the guardian spirits of forests know it. Then other devas and Brahmās come to know successively. Therefore, when Sudinna copulated with his ex-wife, the terrestrial spirit living all over the entire Mahāvana saw the offence and transmitted by shouting so that higher devas and Brahmās might hear:

“Friends, the Sangha of bhikkhus (in the past) was indeed free from the thieves of immorality (dussīla)! It was indeed free from the blemishes of immorality (dussīla)! But now the Kalanda merchant's son, Sudinna, has caused theft which is immorality (dussīla)! He has caused the blemishes of immorality (dussīla)!”

On hearing the voice of the terrestrial spirits, the celestial spirits, such as Catumahārajika devas, Tāvatiṃsa devas, Yāma devas, Tusitā devas, Nimmānarati devas, Paranimmitavasavattī devas, and Brahmās shouted in the same way successively. Thus, in a moment, the roars of condemnation spread and rose to the world of Brahmās.

When her pregnancy became mature, Sudinna's ex-wife gave birth to a son. Then Sudinna's friends named him, Bijaka, but not otherwise (as it was well known that the baby's grandmother made the request saying: “Bajakam pi dehi — give us then the procreative seed.”) Sudinna's ex-wife also came to be known as Bījaka-mata, (Bījaka's mother), and Sudinna Bījaka-pitā. (Bījaka's father).

Seven or eight years later, the son and the mother, Bījaka and Bījaka-mata, went forth from household life and joined the monastic Order, respectively as a monk and a nun. They attained arahatship through the help of good teachers and friends.

In this way the monastic life of the son and the mother was that of benefit. The father (the Venerable Sudinna) was, however, severely tormented by grief.

(In this connection, the Commentary says: “pitā pana vippaṭisārābhībhūto-vihāsi, -- the father (Venerable Sudinna), however, lived being overcome by great sorrow”. It should therefore be assumed that for the Venerable Sudinna it was totally impossible to attain arahatship in that life (or existence).

— Sārattha Tika —

Though it is said in the Commentary that the (former) Sudinna, the Kalanda merchant's son, while going to listen to the discourse, was bhabba kulaputta — ‘the clansman worthy of the Path and Fruition.’ Though he was a man endowed with merits leading to such higher attainments, a hindrance to the Path and Fruition would occur to him as in the case of King Ajātasattu and that hindrance actually occurred, as he was in great torment on account of his evil (sexual intercourse with his ex-wife), teachers say so.

(A question may arise here: “Was such hindrance possible to occur to one, who is endowed with the potentials for higher attainments, even in the lifetime of a Buddha?”)

(The answer is: “Yes, it was.” But the hindrance did not derive from the Buddha. In fact, Buddhas are those who endeavour to help others attain the Path and Fruition; they constantly put efforts for the spiritual uplift of others. Therefore no hindrance can come from Them to those who are possessed of merits of the past.

(In reality, a hindrance on spiritual progress is due to (1) inadequacy of performance, and (2) association with bad friends. Of these two, (1) inadequacy of performance is of two kinds: (a) the lack of teaching effort which is conducive to the Path and Fruition on the part of the teacher, and (b) the lack of practice conducive to the Path and Fruition on the part of the student who is endowed with the merits of the past.

(Of these, (a) inadequacy of performance on the part of the teacher means that on the part of a Buddha’s Disciple only, and not on the part of Buddhas. Explanation: (In the Brāhmana Vagga of the Majjhima Paññāsa, Majjhima Nikāya, there is a discourse called Dhanañjāni Sutta. It says that while the Brahmin Dhanañjāni was dying, Thera Sāriputta taught him the doctrine of the four Brahmavihāras that could lead one to the Brahmā abode. When the Brahmin died, he was reborn on that very plane of existence. Details should be taken from the Sutta.) If Venerable Sāriputta, the General of the Dhamma, had known of the latent qualifications of the Brahmin and if the Venerable had taught him accordingly, he would have become a sotāpanna. But now the teaching was different and the Brahmin’s attainment was short of the noble status. Inadequacy of performance on the part of the teacher thus can cause the danger of failure to reach the Path and Fruition.

(b) An example of inadequacy of performance on the part of the student who has qualifications may be seen thus (in the Kandarakā Sutta, Gahapati Vagga, Majjhima Paññāsa, Majjhima Nikāya. According to this Sutta, a wandering ascetic, named Kandarakā and an elephant trainer’s son, named Pessa, once went to the Buddha, who taught them on the four individuals, the first being attantapa, one who worries oneself. When the Buddha finished just an outline of the discourse, and before He could go on to deal with it in detail, Pessa, the elephant trainer’s son, departed in satisfaction. If he had listened to the discourse in detail, Pessa would have become a sotāpanna. As he left after hearing the discourse in brief, he had only two advantages: his becoming faithful to the Sangha and a new method of practising the foundations of mindfulness. Details should be taken from the translation of the Sutta.) Had he waited a little longer to hear the elaborate teaching on the four individuals, he would have reached the first stage on his way to arahatship. His impatience now caused his failure to do so. Inadequacy of performance on the part of the student with qualifications for higher attainments is a cause of his loss.

(2) Hindrance to the Path and Fruition due to association with bad friends may be understood from the following: If King Ajātasattu, an associate of Devadatta and a follower of his advice, had not killed his father, he would have become a Sotāpanna the day he listened to the Buddha’s delivery of the Samannaphala Sutta. Now that he adhered to the advice of his evil friend and wronged by murdering his father, he did not become one. Association with a wicked companion creates a hindrance to the Path and the Fruition.

(Here also it should be taken that Sudinna suffered the same loss because of his company with a bad friend. If he had not followed his parents’ counsel and kept away from the sex practice with his ex-wife, there would not have occurred a sudden stop to his good prospects of attainments — the stop that was brought about by his grief. The grief was so great and tormenting that he met with failure in achieving arahatship.)

Thera Sudinna's Remorse

At that time a fit of remorse occurred to Venerable Sudinna: "I have failed to make achievements such as jhānas, etc. My gain of monkhood has been worthless! I have ill-gotten the Teaching! The Buddha's dispensation has come to me not in a good manner! (Because) I have thus been incapable of practising in perfection, in purity for life, the noble practice of the threefold training after receiving ordination in the dispensation of the Dhamma and Vinaya taught so well!" So great was his remorse that he became emaciated day by day, and with poor and dry skin, his good appearance deteriorated and his complexion became pale like a withered leaf. His body had sinews that were like a cast net; his distress was hidden in him and his introverted thoughts developed gradually; tormented by his physical and mental unhappiness, he remained in pensive mood.

Then Sudinna's friends said to him: "Though formerly you were handsome, your sense-faculties were alert, your facial colour was clear, and your complexion was especially clean, now you are emaciated day by day, and with poor and dry skin, your good appearance deteriorates and your complexion becomes pale like a withered leaf. Your body had sinews that are like a cast net; your distress is hidden in you and your introverted thoughts developed gradually: tormented by your physical and mental unhappiness, you remain in pensive mood. Why, friend Sudinna? Are you practising the noble practice of the threefold training with unhappiness in the Buddha's dispensation?"

"Friends, I am practising the noble practice of the threefold training in the Buddha's dispensation not with unhappiness. There is one evil deed done by me though. I have committed sexual conduct with my ex-wife, for which I feel remorseful, thinking: 'I have failed to make achievements such as jhānas, etc.! My gain of monkhood has been worthless! I have ill-gotten the Teaching! The Buddha's dispensation has come to me not in a good manner!' (Because) I have thus been incapable of practising in perfection, in purity for life, the noble practice of the threefold training after receiving ordination in the dispensation of the Dhamma and the Vinaya taught so well!"

Then his friends blamed him by citing a large number of instances:

"Friend Sudinna, since you are thus incapable of practising in perfection and purity for life the noble practice of the threefold training after receiving ordination in the dispensation of the Dhamma and the Vinaya taught so well, you should be remorseful.

"Friend Sudinna, did not the Master teach us, in various ways, to separate from lust but not to combine with lust? Did not He teach us to dissociate from sensuality but not to associate with sensuality? Did not He teach us to be detached through craving and wrong view but not to be attached through craving and wrong view? Friend Sudinna, despite the Master's teaching to separate from lust, you have striven to combine with lust. Despite the Master's teaching to dissociate from sensuality, you have striven to associate with sensuality. Despite the Master's teaching to be detached through craving and wrong view, you have striven to be attached through craving and wrong view.

"Friend, did not the Master teach us, in various ways, to separate from lust, to give up conceit, to remove hunger or thirst that is moral defilement, to eliminate attachment that is lingering of craving, to cut the source of suffering, to cease craving, to have no passionate desires, to stop craving and to extinguish moral defilements?

"Friend, did not the Master teach us, in various ways, the removal of sensuality? Did not He teach us the analytical knowledge of perception concerning sensuality? Did not He teach us the elimination of craving that is hunger or thirst for sensuality? Did not He teach us the cutting off of thoughts connected with sensuality? Did not He teach us the cooling of the heat that is sensuality?"

“Friend, the evil deed you have done cannot cause the faithless to become faithful nor can it cause the faithful to become more faithful. In fact, friend, the evil deed of yours will make the faithless remain faithless and will lead to the destruction of the faith of the faithful.”

Then they reported the matter to the Buddha.

On account of this incident the Buddha held a meeting of the Sangha and asked the Venerable Sudinna: “Is it true, Sudinna, that you have committed sexual conduct with your ex-wife?” When he replied: “Yes, Venerable Sir,” the Buddha rebuked Sudinna in the following manner:

“You empty man (mogha purisa), who have failed to attain the Path and Fruition, achieving nothing! It (i.e. what you have now done) is not befitting a monk! It is no practice of a monk. It is improper. It should not be done! You, good for nothing! Why are you incapable of practising in perfection, in purity for life, the noble practice of the threefold training after receiving ordination in the dispensation the Dhamma and the Vinaya proclaimed so well?

“You empty man, did not I teach you, in various ways, to separate from lust, but not to combine with lust? Did not I teach to dissociate from sensuality but not to associate with sensuality? Did not I teach you to be detached through craving and wrong view but not to be attached through craving and wrong view. Though I teach you to separate from lust, you have striven to combine with lust! Though I teach you to dissociate from sensuality, you have striven to associate with sensuality! Though I teach you to be detached through craving and wrong view, you have striven to be attached through craving and wrong view.

“You empty man, did not I teach you, in various ways, to be free from lust, not to be intoxicated with conceit, to remove hunger or thirst that is defilement, to cut off attachment tinged with craving, to eliminate the roots of the round of suffering, to cease craving, to reject desires, to stop craving and to extinguish defilement.

“You empty man, did not I teach you, in various ways, the removal of sensual pleasures? Did not I teach you the analytical knowledge of perception concerning sensual pleasure? Did not I teach you the removal of craving for sensual pleasure? Did not I teach you the cutting off of thoughts concerning sensual pleasure? Did not I teach you the extinguishing of the heat of sensual pleasure?

“You empty man, it is rather better to put your male organ into the mouth of a highly poisonous, severely poisonous snake! But it is no good to put it into the female organ!

“You empty man, it is better to put your male organ into the mouth of a cobra! But it is no good to put it into the female organ!

“You empty man, it is better to put your male organ into a heap of embers with glowing and blazing flames that illuminate all around! But it is no good to put it into the female organ!

Because, empty man, by putting the male organ into the snake's mouth or into the heap of embers, you will just come to death or you will just suffer almost dying. By putting the male organ into the snake's mouth or into the heap of embers, you cannot go to the four woeful states of long suffering, of animals, of departed spirits and asurakāyas on destruction of your body. But by so doing with regard to the female organ, empty man, you may go to those woeful states on destruction of your body!

“You empty man, even then you have committed sexual intercourse which is not the practice of noble persons, which is the practice of villagers, which is a crude act that ends in washing, which is done only in a secluded place (because of its unseemly sight), which is done by the couple of man and woman. You empty man, you are the pioneer in the sense that you engage in unwholesomeness ahead of others!

“You empty man, what you have done now cannot cause the faithless to become faithful; nor can it cause the faithful to become more faithful. In fact, empty man, the evil deed of yours will make the faithless remain faithless and lead to the destruction of the faith of the faithful.”

Then the Buddha censured Thera Sudinna in many ways and taught the disadvantages of such unseemly things as difficult self-maintenance, difficult maintenance by others, greediness, discontent, fondness of companions, and indolence. He also taught the advantages of such seemly things as easy self-maintenance, easy maintenance by others, little want, easy content, decrease in defilement, the shaking off of defilement, assuming pleasant appearance, the destruction of defilement, and industriousness. He also gave the monks a talk appropriate to this incident and addressed them as follows:

Ten Objectives for Laying Down Disciplinary Rules

“Monks, in that case I will lay down disciplinary rules with ten objectives:

- (1) for the acknowledgement of its goodness and observance by the Sangha,
- (2) for the welfare of the Sangha,
- (3) for suppressing those who violate morality,
- (4) for the happy life of monks who cherish morality,
- (5) for barring out peculiar suffering in the present life,
- (6) for removing peculiar suffering that may arise in future,
- (7) for causing the faithless to become faithful,
- (8) for causing the faithful to become more faithful,
- (9) for the perpetuation of the threefold dispensation, the three divisions of the True Law, and
- (10) for the sanctification of disciplinary pales.

“Monks let it be proclaimed thus:

In this manner did the Buddha lay down the first Pārājika rule.

The Vālodaka Jātaka told by The Buddha on His arrival in Sāvaththi

(The previous account of Sudinna the merchant's son contains the events from the close of the Buddha's vassa at Verañjā up to his ordination when the Buddha arrived in Vesālī. The events leading to the laying down of the first Parajika rule took place in the eighth year, after Sudinna's ordination. This should be noted carefully by readers.)

Having stayed thus in Mahāvana, Vesālī, preaching to those worthy of conversion, the Buddha left that city and eventually arrived in Sāvaththi and stayed at Jetavana monastery.

An event then happened, leading to the relation of the story of Vālodaka Jātaka by the Buddha: Five hundred lay devotees in the city of Sāvaththi left their domestic undertakings, wandered in one group with their wives from place to place, listening to the discourses of the Buddha. Among them some were sotāpannas, some were sakadāgāmins and the rest anāgāmins. There was not a single worldling (puṭhujjana). Those who extended invitation to the Buddha included the five hundred lay devotees in the list of invited monks.

There lived also five hundred young attendants who, while waiting upon the five hundred devotees, ate what was leftover. After eating the leftover food as breakfast, they slept, as they had nothing more to do, and when they woke up they went to the river Aciravati and wrestled among themselves on the banks of the river, shouting roarily. Their masters, the five hundred lay devotees, however, did not shout at all but kept quiet and engaged in phala-samāpatti in solitude.

1. Pārājika: The first category of offences, considered to be grave and irremediable; it entails the removal of the offender from the bhikkhuhood.

When the Buddha heard the loud noises of the five hundred eaters of leftover food, He asked Venerable Ānanda: “What are these noises, Ānanda?” “These noises belong to the five hundred eaters of leftover food, Exalted Buddha,” replied the Venerable.

Then the Buddha said: “Ānanda, not only now do they eat leftover food and shout roarily, but in former times too did they do the same thing. Not only now do these five hundred devotees remain quiet but in former times too did they do so.’ As requested by the Venerable Ānanda, the Buddha related the past incident as follows:

“In ancient times when King Brahmadata was reigning in Bārāṇasī, the Bodhisatta was born into the family of a noble man and when he came of age, he became a counsellor to the King.

One day, hearing of a rebellion in a border area, he harnessed five hundred horses of Sindhava breed and went to the border with the fourfold army. After restoring peace there, he returned to Bārāṇasī and asked his officers to give the horses the syrup made of grapes, saying: ‘These horses are fatigued. Let them have grape drink.’ The officers did as they were told by the King.

The five hundred horses then took the flavoured tasty grape-drinks and went to their stables and stayed quietly in their respective places.

After giving the syrup to the horses, there were a lot of the remains of the grapes without flavour and taste. The officers asked the King: ‘What shall we do with the remains of the grape?’ ‘Comrades,’ said the king, ‘knead them in water and filter them with pieces of coarse cloth made of fibres from marsh date palms and give the water to the mules that carry the food for the horses.’ The officers acted as they were ordered by the King.

The mules, that were the carriers of the food loads, took the filtered secondary juice became intoxicated with pride and they frolicked braying, jumping and running in the courtyard. The King opened the palace window, and looking at the courtyard, he desired to ask the Bodhisatta, the counsellor: “Look, O wise man, after drinking the secondary grape juice, these five hundred mules are intoxicated with pride and frolicked, braying, jumping and running. But the Sindhava horses, after drinking the flavoured and delicious syrup of grapes made no sound: not showing their frolicsome behaviour, they keep quiet. What is the reason? So he put forth the question in the following verse:

(1) *Vālodakam̐ apparasam̐ nihīnam̐
pitvā mado jāyati gadrabhānam̐
Imam̐ ca pitavāna rasam̐ pañitam̐ mado na sañjāyati sindhayānam̐.*

(Wise man!) To the mules that have taken the secondary grape syrup of less taste and poor quality and filtered with a piece of cloth made of fibres from marsh date palms, the intoxication with pride occurred to the mules. Such intoxication does not happened to the Sindhava horses though they have taken the delicious grape juice. (What is the reason?)

In order to give his answer to the King, he uttered the following verse:

(2) Appam̐ pivivāna nihīnajucco so majjatī tena janida phutt̐ho Dhorayhasīlī ca kulamhi jāto na majjatī aggarasam̐ pivivā.

Your Majesty! The lowly born mule that has been effected by its insignificant birth becomes intoxicated after drinking an inconsiderable amount of secondary grape syrup. The Sindhava horses that strenuously renders service to the country, though he had taken the sweetest taste of the juice extracted from fresh grapes, is not intoxicated because of his birth in a high family.

(What the verse means to say is that because the mules are inferior by birth, they become intoxicated after drinking less tasty secondary juice. On the contrary the Sindhava steeds, on account of their superiority by birth, do not show conceit or are not intoxicated with conceit though they have taken the primary juice of top taste.)

On hearing the Bodhisatta's saying, the King had the mules driven out from the courtyard. Taking the Bodhisatta's advice the King performed meritorious deeds, beginning with alms-giving and passed away to another existence according to his kamma.

Having delivered this sermon of the Vālodaka Jātaka, the Buddha concluded the story thus: "The five hundred mules then have now become the five hundred eaters of leftover food. The five hundred Sindhava horses then have now become the five hundred noble lay devotees. The King of Bārāṇasi then is now Ānanda. The wise counsellor then is now I."

Delivery of The Rahulovada Sutta to Rāhula

While the Buddha was staying at Jetavana monastery, Sāvatti, the Buddha's son, Rāhula, was then a novice of eighteen years of age. He had then reached the eleventh year as a sāmaṇera.

One day the Buddha entered the city of Sāvatti in the morning for alms-food. The Sāmaṇera Rāhula followed the Buddha closely.

When the Buddha and Rāhula were thus walking, the latter close behind the former, the Buddha was as splendid looking as a grand bull elephant that marches out of a jungle to come upon the pleasant ground in a grove of sāla tree in full bloom. Rāhula too was as splendid looking as a young elephant that comes close behind the bull elephant. The Buddha was as splendid looking as the lion-king that marches out of his ruby cave to look for food in the evening. Rāhula too was as splendid as a young lion that comes close behind the great lion king. The Buddha was as splendid as the tiger king that marches out of his forest resembling a jade cave. Rāhula, too, was as splendid as a young tiger that comes close behind the tiger king.

The Buddha was as splendid as the garuḷa-bird king that emerges out of a forest of cotton trees while Rāhula was as splendid as a young garuḷa that comes close behind the garuḷa king. The Buddha was as splendid as the golden haṃsa king that flies up to the sky from Cittakūṭa Mount while Rāhula was as splendid as a young golden haṃsa that comes close behind the haṃsa-king. The Buddha was as splendid as a large golden boat that sails in Lake Chaddanta while Rāhula was as splendid as a smaller golden boat that comes behind the larger one. The Buddha was as splendid as the Universal Monarch that roams in space by the power of his Wheel-Treasure while Rāhula was as splendid as the eldest royal son that comes close behind the Monarch. The Buddha was as splendid as the moon, the lord of stars that roams in the cloudless sky while Rāhula was as splendid as the morning star that comes behind the moon.

The Buddha was born in the lineage of King Okkāka, a descendent from the Mahāsammata. So was the Sāmaṇera Rāhula. The Buddha belonged to the Khattiya birth that was as pure as the milk poured into a conch. So was Rāhula. The Buddha's body was adorned with the thirty two marks of a great person and was attractive to the hearts of others as a jewel gate-post well erected at the gate of a celestial city or as a Pārichattaka tree in full bloom. So was Rāhula's body.

In this manner the two extraordinary men, Noble Ones, who had realized their unique aspirations of the past, who had become ascetics from the ruling class, who had possessed royal gentleness, who had golden complexion, and who had borne the marks of a Great Man, walked along the same road, being resplendent as though they were to overcome by means of their own splendour, the splendour of two moons, two suns, and each pair of such deities as Sakka, Suyāma, Santusita, Sunimmita, Vasavattī, Mahā-Brahmā, and others.

While they were thus resplendent, Rāhula closely following the Buddha from behind, watched his father carefully from the surface of the soles up to the tip of the hair and saw his father's resplendence generated by the glory of a Buddha. Wonder-struck, he thought thus:

“As His body frame is exquisite with the thirty-two major marks and surrounded by body lustre, He is resplendent as though He were amidst gold dust drizzled all over, as a golden mountain encircled by streaks of lightening, as a golden gatepost exquisite with seven kinds of gems that are strung on mechanical threads, as a golden mountain screened by red rugs though He is attired in dark-red rag-robcs, as a golden gate-post inlaid and adorned with coral creeps, as a golden shrine honoured with vermilion powder, as a golden sacrificial post painted with liquid of lac, as the moon that rises all of a sudden from between red clouds. The Buddha's possession of splendour, that is effected by the power of His Perfections thirty in all, is amazing endlessly!”

Thereafter he looked at his own self and developed craving associated with household life on account of his own frame: “I am of beauty, too. If the Buddha were a Universal Monarch, Lord of the four continents, He would have appointed me pro-leader (parināyaka), the position reserved for the eldest son. In that case, the whole of Jambudipa would become splendid.”

While the Buddha was walking ahead it occurred to Him thus: “Now the body of my son Rāhula has grown with flesh and blood. It is a time when one's mind restlessly wanders about all attractive objects such as sights, etc. I wonder by what thoughts he is being occupied to pass away his time!” While the Buddha was thus reflecting, He found out clearly His son's thoughts that were accompanied by greedy inclinations towards household life (gehassita taṇhālobha), He found out Rāhula's thoughts as though He saw the moving fish in the clear water, and as though He saw His own image in the round mirror. This led Him to decide as follows: “While following behind Me, My son, the Sāmaṇera Rāhula, had developed craving for household life on account of his own body, thinking: ‘I am beautiful. My appearance is pure and clean. Landing not at a right path and following a wrong path, he directs his mind to the unworthy sense objects. Like a travelling man who has lost his way, he is heading for a place which is not worth visiting. If the arising defilement of greed were to stay in him and allowed to grow, this would not give him a chance to see clearly the welfare of oneself, as well as that of another, in their true perspective. This will lead him to the four woeful states of purgatory, animals, petas, and asurakāyas, and also to conception in the mother's cramped womb. Thus will he be thrown into the wheel of samsāra that knows no beginning (anamatagga). In fact, this greed produces what is fruitless. It destroys the meritorious consciousness. Owing to it, a terrible danger may occur in one's mental continuum. This is not seen by men.

One who craves, does not see the cause and its effect clearly. When a being is overwhelmed by greed, complete darkness reigns.

A big mechanized boat, fully loaded with treasures, is not to be neglected, even for a moment, if water is seeping in through the breakage of the planks. As the breakage should be blocked up quickly, so the Sāmaṇera Rāhula should not be negligently left aside. Before the defilement of greed destroys the treasures of the virtuous, such as morality and the like, that have accrued to him, I shall subdue those moral defilements of his.”

In such an event the Buddha used to look back by turning round His whole body like a bull elephant which is called nāga-vilokana, ‘an elephant's looking.’ The Buddha stood, after turning His whole body as though a golden statue turned mechanically, and He addressed Rāhula:

“Rāhula, there is matter (rūpa) of the past, matter of the future, and matter of the present (3), matter inside the body and matter outside the body (2), rough matter and soft matter (2), bad matter and good matter (2), far matter and near matter (2). All this matter of eleven kinds is not mine; it is not I; it is not my self; thus must matter be contemplated as it really is through Vipassanā Knowledge and Wisdom.”

When Rāhula asked: “Exalted Buddha, must only matter be (thus) contemplated? Speaker of Good Words, must only matter be (thus) contemplated?” The Buddha answered: “Matter must be (thus) contemplated, Rāhula; sensation (vedanā) must be (thus) contemplated; perception (saññā) must be (thus) contemplated; mental formations (saṅkhāra) must be (thus) contemplated; consciousness (viññāṇa) must be (thus) contemplated.”

(On hearing the Buddha’s instruction that “All this matter of eleven kinds is not mine; it is not I; it is not my self: thus this matter be contemplated as it really is, through Vipassanā Knowledge and Wisdom,” it occurred to Rāhula, who developed skill in application of methods (ṇayakusala-ñāṇa), thus: “The Exalted One said: ‘All matter must be thus contemplated through Vipassanā Knowledge and Wisdom’; how must the remaining four aggregates, such as sensation, etc., be contemplated? It should follow that they must also be contemplated as in the case of the aggregate of matter!” Hence his question on the basis of his skill in application of methods (ṇayakusala-ñāṇa).

(Indeed, the Venerable Rāhula possessed ṇayakusala-ñāṇa (a high degree of intelligence). When taught just one thing saying “This should not be done,” he would then ponder this too should not be done; this too should not be done” and penetratingly proceeded in hundreds of thousands of ways. Similarly, when instructed just one thing, saying, “This should be done”, he would then ponder, “This too should be done; this too should be done”, he was able to penetrate by hundreds of thousands of means.

(Besides, Venerable Rāhula cherished the threefold training. Early in the morning, in the precincts of the Buddha’s Scented Chamber, he would scatter daily a pattha<sup>2</sup> of grains of sand and utter: “May I today get from the Exalted One or from my preceptor Thera Sāriputta words of advice as much as this sand.” (He put forward his questions because he wished to practise fully as he possessed ṇayakusala intelligence and cherished the three training.)

On receiving the Buddha’s reply the Venerable Rāhula considered thus:

“After knowing the craving that has its base in my body, the Exalted One did not admonish me indirectly saying to the effect that, ‘A monk should not have such an idea!’ Neither did He send a messenger to me saying: ‘Go, monk, ask him not to have such an idea!’ In fact, He stood face to face with me and gave me a Buddha’s instruction presently as though He seized a thief together with the stolen property, catching hold of his top knot. Hard is to get a Buddha’s advice even in the long duration asaṅkhyeyya aeons! Who, on getting the instruction of a Buddha in person, would care to enter a town or a village for food if he were truly wise?”

Accordingly, Rāhula gave up his alms-food round and turned back from the spot where he heard the Buddha’s exhortation (without following the Buddha further) and sat down at the foot of a tree.

Though the Buddha saw Rāhula turning back, He did not forbid him by saying: “Rāhula, do not go back yet. This is the time for you to go on alms-round,” for he had conceived an idea: “Let Rāhula take the food of immortality the kāyagatā-sati, body-related mindfulness, meditation, for the day!”

Duties of Venerable Sāriputta

2. Pattha: a certain measure of capacity. Grains of rice measuring eight times (of a condensed milk tin) is a pattha in Pāli and pyi in the Myanma Language.

The duties of the Venerable Sāriputta, while he was staying alone, were different from those, while he was staying together with the Buddha.

Explanation: While the two Chief Disciples were staying alone they would sweep their residential ground early in the morning, wash themselves, engage in jhāna attainment, sitting quietly, and go on alms-round, each according to his wish. While they were staying with the Buddha, the two Mahā-Theras (Chief Disciples) would not do so. Citation: While they were thus staying with the Buddha, the Buddha in the company of monks, first went for alms-food. When the Buddha had left thus for alms, Venerable Sāriputta would come out from his cell, and being aware that “a residence of monks is a place which can sometimes be made pleasant by themselves or which cannot be done so at other times”, he would go round the precincts and sweep the place that had not been swept, dispose of the rubbish that had not been disposed of, keep a drinking water pot at a suitable place where there was none. Visiting a sick monk, he would ask: “Friend, what food shall I bring for you? Which food do you want to have?” He would also go to those who had not observed even a single vassa and advise them: “Friends, be happy in the Buddha's dispensation! But do not be indolent! The Buddha's Teaching contains practice as its essence!” Having done all these, he would go on alms-round following all others.

For example, when the Universal Monarch, the Lord of the Four Continents, desired to go to a certain place, he marched out first with the fourfold army, his eldest son, the Vice-Chief, followed him supervising the troops. In the same way, the Exalted One, the Universal Monarch of the True Law, who set in motion the Wheel of the Dhamma, went in the company of monks first, the Venerable Sāriputta, the Buddha's eldest son and the Vice-Chief, the General of the Dhamma, went on alms-round following all other bhikkhus after performing all his duties mentioned above.

When the Venerable Sāriputta, as the last person, went out for alms after finishing his job in Jetavana Monastery on that very day, he saw the Venerable Rāhula seated cross-legged with his body upright, cultivating mindfulness and urged him with encouraging words to develop ānāpānassati-bhāvanā (meditation on mindfulness of in-breath and out-breath):

“Rāhula, develop ānāpānassati-bhāvanā! When ānāpānassati-bhāvanā is developed, when it is repeatedly developed, it will be of great benefit.”

(Herein it may be questioned as to why the Venerable Sāriputta urged and encouraged Rāhula to develop ānāpānassati-bhāvanā.)

(Answer: Because ānāpānassati-bhāvanā was agreeable to Rāhula's disposition.)

Explanation: Not being aware of the fact that the Buddha had taught Rāhula meditation on matter, he noticed that the way Rāhula was seated motionless would go best with ānāpānassati-bhāvanā. Hence his drive and encouraging words.

(With reference to the words, “When ānāpānassati-bhāvanā is repeatedly developed, it will be of great benefit,” the way the benefit accrues is as follows:

A bhikkhu who develops ānāpānassati-bhāvanā can attain arahatship in one sitting; even if he cannot attain arahatship, he can become a samaṁsī arahat when nearing his death; if not, during his rebirth in a celestial abode, he can attain arahatship after listening to the Dhamma from a deva; if not, he can become a Paccakabuddha at a time when there is no Perfect Buddha; if not, he can become an arahat of khippabhiññā (Quick Intelligence) like Thera Bāhiya Dāruciya in the lifetime of a later Buddha. In this way ānāpānassati-bhāvanā is of great benefit.

(Discerning the great benefit thus, Venerable Sāriputta urged and encouraged Rāhula, who had taken him as preceptor and who was his co-resident pupil (saddhivihārika), to practise ānāpānassati-bhāvanā.)

In this way, the Buddha and the Venerable Sāriputta gave Rāhula meditation on matter and meditation on ānāpānassati respectively and went away. Rāhula remained at the monastery.

Although, knowing that Rāhula was left behind, the Buddha did not personally bring food (for him), nor did He send food through Venerable Ānanda nor did He inform His male and female donors, such as King Pasenadī, Anāthapiṇḍika the wealthy merchant, etc., of the matter. (Had they known of this, they would have pots of food conveyed by means of a carrying pole indeed.)

Like the Buddha, Venerable Sāriputta did nothing. For that very day the Venerable Rāhula received no food at all and had none whatever. Despite his being deprived of provisions thus, he did not mind a bit thinking: “Though the Exalted One knows that I have been left behind at the monastery, He does not bring, in person, the food He obtained, nor does He send through somebody else, nor does He tell lay people of the matter. Though my preceptor also knows that I have remained, he too does nothing for me.” How could there be low or high opinion (contempt or admiration) in him on account of that? There was neither. In the morning as well as in the daytime, he engaged in meditation on the element of matter taught by the Buddha:

“It is true that matter is impermanent for such and such a reason, it is true that matter is miserable for such and such a reason; it is true that matter is unpleasant for such and such a reason; it is true that matter is insubstantial for such and such a reason.”

He reflected thus incessantly like a man who urgently kindles a fire, and in the evening he pondered: “I have been instructed by my preceptor to develop ānāpāṇassati. I will take up his instruction. In fact, one who does not follow the advice of one's preceptor is one who is hard to exhort (dubbaca). There is no worse oppression for me than a censure by my fellow-monks saying: “Rāhula is hard to exhort; he does not even follow his preceptor's advice!” Desirous of asking about the engagement in ānāpāṇassati-bhāvanā, he came out from his cell, and approached the Buddha. Paying obeisance most respectfully, he sat down on a blameless place, and asked:

“Exalted Buddha, how is ānāpāṇassati-bhāvanā developed? How is it repeatedly developed so that it becomes to be of great benefit?”

Then the Buddha explained to Rāhula in detail:

- (1) How to develop meditation:
  - (a) on twenty portions (koṭṭhāsa) of earth element,
  - (b) on twelve portions (koṭṭhāsa) of water element,
  - (c) on four portions (koṭṭhāsa) of fire element,
  - (d) on six portions (koṭṭhāsa) of wind element which are all Mahā-bhūta (Great Elements),
  - (e) on space element which is dependent matter (upādā-rūpa);
- (2) How to develop meditation on tādibhava-lakkhaṇa, the characteristics of which are similar to those of the five elements of earth, water, fire, wind and space;
- (3) on mettā, loving-kindness;
- (4) on karuṇā, compassion;
- (5) on muditā, altruistic joy;
- (6) on upekkhā, equanimity;
- (7) on asubha, unpleasantness;
- (8) on anicca-saññā, perception of impermanence; the Buddha gave a discourse (which included the advantages), urging him to practise all these forms of meditation.
- (9) on ānāpāṇassati, which formed the original question put forth by Rāhula; the Buddha explained it in detail, showing the benefit derived therefrom. (The Buddha's elaborate saying may be read in the Majjhima Paṇṇāsa of the Majjhima Nikāya.)

Discourses delivered by The Buddha with Reference to Venerable Rāhula

Several discourses were delivered to Venerable Rāhula by the Buddha: (1) The Sāmañera-paṇha, “Questions for a novice”, (2) the Ambalaṭṭhika Rāhulovāda Sutta, “Advice to Rāhula given in Ambalaṭṭhika Park”, (3) the Rāhula-saṃyutta, “Saying connected with Rāhula” (4) the Mahā-Rāhulovāda Sutta, “Greater Discourse as Advice to Rāhula”, and (5) the Cūla Rāhulovāda Sutta, “Lesser Discourse as Advice to Rāhula”,

Gist of these Suttas: At the time when the Buddha visited the palace at Kapilavatthu for the first time and met Prince Rāhula who was then seven years old, the Prince asked for his inheritance, grasping the edge of the Buddha's robe: “Father, you whose defilements have all been put away! Please grant me your inheritance!” Accordingly the Buddha handed him over to Venerable Sāriputta to ordain him as a novice.

(1) Thereafter the Buddha decided to make some exhortations to Rāhula, for he thought: “Children tend to speak of all kinds of things, proper as well as improper.” He then summoned His son and said: “Rāhula, a sāmaṇera should not indulge in tiracchāna-kathā, ‘animal talks’ such as those about princes and rulers and the like, which are not conducive to the Path and Fruition. Dear son, if you wish to talk, talk about such and such Dhamma.” And the Buddha gave Rāhula a sermon, ‘Sāmaṇera-pañha’ by name, containing ten questions and fifty-five answers that are never left out by all Buddhas from Their Teaching. (Khuddaka-paṭha, the first book of the Khuddaka Nikāya)

(2) Again the Buddha considered: “Children are fond of telling lies. They are likely to say: ‘I see’ when they do not; or ‘I do not see’, when they do. Therefore I shall exhort Rāhula in advance.” Hence, He taught the Ambalaṭṭhika Rāhulovāda which enumerates seven examples in order: first, the four examples of water cups which can be easily seen by the eye, the two examples of an elephant in warfare, and one example of a mirror. (Ambalaṭṭhika-Rāhulovāda Sutta, Bhikkhu-Vagga, Majjhima-Paṇṇāsa, Majjhima Nikāya.)

Besides, the Buddha taught Rāhula another Sutta which forbade the arising of craving for the four requisites, which removed desire, greed and craving for the five sensual pleasures, and explained the significant advantages of association with good friends. (Sutta-Nipāta I, this particular Sutta is called Abhiṇṇa Rāhulovāda Sutta)

(3) The Rāhula Saṃyutta teaches not to develop craving and desire for the three kinds of existence wherever one is born. (Saṃyutta Nikāya, etc.)

(4) The Mahā-Rāhulovāda Sutta was delivered in order not to cultivate gehassita chandarāga, thinking: ‘I am beautiful, my look is clean and serene’ with reference to one's body. (Majjhima Paṇṇāsa, Majjhima Nikāya)

(5) After that when the Buddha was in his fourteenth year as an Enlightened One (when Rāhula was newly ordained as a bhikkhu but had not yet completed a vassa), the Cūla Rāhulovāda was taught so that Rāhula might attain arahatship right away (Upari-Paṇṇāsa, Majjhima Nikāya)

Of the above discourses,

Nothing can be said of the date of the deliverance of the Rāhula Sutta (Abhiṇṇā Rāhulovāda Sutta). In fact, it was taught by the Buddha off and on.

(1 & 2) The Sāmaṇera Pañha and the Ambalaṭṭhika Rāhulovāda Sutta were delivered when Rāhula was a young sāmaṇera of seven.

(3) The Rāhula Saṃyutta was given occasionally during the period between Rāhula's novitiate which commenced when he was seven and his ordination as a young bhikkhu who had not yet observed even a single.

(4) The teaching of the Mahā-Rāhulovāda took place when Rāhula was eighteen.

(5) The teaching of the Cūla-Rāhulovāda took place when Rāhula had just become a bhikkhu with no experience even for a vassa.

Among these Discourses, the Rāhula Sutta (Abhiṇṇā Rāhulovāda Sutta) was given in order to exhort Rāhula incessantly; (1) The Sāmaṇera Pañha was preached to make Rāhula avoid talking about improper things. (2) The Ambalaṭṭhika Rāhulovāda Sutta was to instruct him not to tell lies knowingly. (3) The Rāhula Saṃyutta was given in order to let Rāhula receive the doctrine concerning Vipassanā-Knowledge; (4) The Mahā Rāhulovāda was taught in order to eradicate gehassaita chanda-rāga (the five sensual pleasures, the craving and greed for household life). (5) The Cūlā-Rāhulovāda Sutta was sermonized in order to make Rāhula attain arahatship when the fifteen vimutti-paripācanīya characteristics reached maturity (as he was then just a freshman in the community of bhikkhus). With reference to this point, the Venerable Rāhula, desirous of extolling the Buddha's virtues, spoke in the midst of bhikkhus as follows:

*Kikī va bījaṃ rakkheyya, camarī valam uttamāṃ,

As a female pheasant protects her egg, as a yak safeguards his precious tail, so did the Exalted One, my father, the apple of the eye to the three classes of beings, has sheltered me, His own flesh and blood, the manner of which being comparable to that adopted by the pheasant or the yak, so that I might attain arahatship.

In this way, many discourses were delivered by the Buddha in connection with Venerable Rāhula.

THE BUDDHA'S THIRTEENTH VASSA ON CALIKA HILL

After staying at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattthi during the period after the twelfth vassa and converting and exhorting such beings as devas, humans and Brahmās through the Mahā-Rāhulovāda Sutta and other Discourses, the Buddha arrived eventually at the town of Cālika. Having arrived there, He took up residence at the monastery on the hill, named Cālika, observing the thirteenth vassa.

(Herein there was moving marshy soil all around the town except in the area of the town-gate. As the marshland was unsteady, the town in the middle of that land gave the impression of being shaky to those who viewed it from afar; therefore, the town was called Cālika.

(There stood a hill near the town. As the entire hill was white, it too looked shaky to those who saw it during the uposatha days of the dark fortnight. Hence its name also was Cālika.

(On the top of the hill was a big monastery built for the Buddha by His male and female donors. The Buddha spent the thirteenth vassa at the Cālika monastery on the Cālika Hill.)

The Buddha's Discourse given to His Temporary Attendant Venerable Meghiya

While the Buddha was thus observing the thirteenth vassa at the big monastery on the Cālika Hill, Meghiya was the temporary attendant fulfilling his major and minor duties to the Buddha.

Explanation: The Buddha had no permanent attendant (upaṭṭhāka) during the first twenty vassa called the First Enlightenment (Pathama Bodhi). Sometimes Venerable Nāgasamāla, sometimes Venerable Nāgita, sometimes Venerable Upavāna, sometimes the monk Sunakkhatta, a former Licchavi prince, sometimes Venerable Cunda (younger brother of the Venerable Sāriputta), sometimes Venerable Sāgata, and sometimes Venerable Meghiya waited upon the Buddha. During the Buddha's thirteenth vassa at the big monastery on the Cālika Hill it was the Venerable Meghiya who was serving the Buddha temporarily.

Then one day, Venerable Meghiya approached the Buddha, and fell at his feet in veneration. Then while standing, he said: "Exalted Buddha, I would like to enter the village of Jantu on alms-round." "Meghiya," replied the Buddha, "now you know the time for your going" i.e., "You may go as you wish."

So the Venerable Meghiya entered the village of Jantu on alms-round and after finishing his meal, he left Jantu for the bank of the river Kimikālā, where he took a leisure walk to and fro. While he was doing so, he saw a mango grove appealing with its trees standing not very far from one another in green foliage, pleasant with its dark shade and excellent landscape, and delightful as it amused the hearts of those who happened to enter it. Seeing thus, the following thought arose:

"This mango grove is appealing, pleasant and delightful. It is a proper place for those clansmen who are desirous of practising meditation. If the Exalted Buddha were to permit me, I should come back here for meditation practice."

(That mango grove was the place where he, as a monarch, had enjoyed kingly pleasures when he was reborn in his five hundred former existences successively. That was why the desire to stay there arose in him as soon as he saw the grove.)

Then Venerable Meghiya returned to the Buddha and paid homage to Him. While sitting, he reported the matter in detail, beginning from his entry into the village for alms-food to the occurrence of his idea to revisit the mango grove for meditation practice. He added his request: "Exalted Buddha, provided you give me permission, I would like to go back to the mango grove to meditate there.”

Being requested thus, the Buddha replied only to prohibit his going there: “Wait, dear Meghiya! At the moment, I am alone, so wait till someone else comes!”

(Herein as requested by Meghiya, the Buddha pondered and came to know that “This Meghiya’s intelligence has not attained maturity yet.” That was the reason for His prohibition. He said: “At the moment I am alone,” because He thought: “If I tell him thus, and if his meditation ends in failure in the mango grove, he will come back entirely without embarrassment, but with love for me.” The Buddha said so in order to soften his mind.)

For the second time Meghiya made the request. “Exalted Buddha, as you have accomplished the sixteenfold task of the Path, you have nothing else to accomplish, nor have you to develop what has been accomplished. As for me, Exalted Buddha, I have to accomplish (the sixteenfold task of the Path) seriously. Also, I have yet to develop further what has been accomplished. If the Exalted Buddha give me permission, I would like to go to the mango grove to meditate there.” For the second time too the Buddha rejected Meghiya’s request saying (as before): “Wait, dear Meghiya! At the moment I am alone: so wait till someone else comes!”

For the third time Meghiya made the request. This time the Buddha did not bar him but said: “Dear Meghiya, how can we Buddhas prevent somebody who is asking for meditation? Dear Meghiya, do as you think fit.”

Then the Venerable Meghiya rose from his seat, made obeisance to the Buddha and went to the mango grove. Having entered the grove, he sat at the foot of a tree to spent the day.

Arising of Unwholesome Thoughts in Venerable Meghiya

The stone slab at the foot of the tree where Meghiya was then sitting was the same one he had used as a seat, happily surrounded by various dancers, when he was a ruler in his five hundred successive existences in the past.

The moment he sat, it appeared as though his monkhood had slipped away. He felt (as in a dream) that he had assumed kingship, being accompanied by dancers and sitting under a white umbrella and on the throne worthy of noble personages.

Then with his attachment to royal luxuries, there gradually arose in him unwholesome thoughts of sensuality (kāma-vitakka) connected with sensual objects (vatthu-kāma).

At that moment, he saw (as in a dream) two thieves who had been caught red-handed were brought and placed before him. Thoughts of malice (vyāpāda-vitakka) gradually occurred to him as though he were to pass a sentence to execute one of the thieves. Thoughts of violence (vihiṃsā-vitakka) gradually took place in him as though he were to pass a sentence to imprison the other one.

In this way the three kinds of unwholesome thoughts, namely, the sensual thoughts, the malicious thoughts and the violent thoughts, besieged Meghiya, giving him no chance to escape, as a tree overwhelmingly entangled by creepers or as a honey-gathering man overpoweringly stung by bees.

Then Venerable Meghiya reflected: “Oh, how strange it is! Oh, how unusual it is! We are the ones who have renounced the world and joined the Order through faith (saddhā), yet we are overcome by the three wicked, unwholesome thoughts of sensuality, malice and violence!”

As the Venerable Meghiya was seized by the three unwholesome thoughts from all sides, he was not able to do what was proper to meditation: “Certainly, it was only after foreseeing this that the farsighted Exalted One had prohibited me,” he remembered, and thinking: “I must report this to the Master,” he rose from his seat and went to the Cālīka Hill where the Buddha was. Having paid his respect, he sat at a proper place and related what had happened to him:

malice, and violence had repeatedly arose in me as I was staying in that mango grove. (As these thoughts repeatedly arose in me) I reflected: ‘Oh, how strange it is! Oh, how unusual it is! We are the ones who have renounced the world and joined the Order through faith (saddhā), yet we are overcome by the three wicked, unwholesome thoughts of sensuality, ill will and violence!’

(Herein it may be asked: “Why did the Buddha permit the Venerable Meghiya to go to the mango grove?” Because the Buddha knew Meghiya would go there even without His permission, leaving Him alone anyway. If he were prevented, he would think wrongly and misunderstand, saying to himself: “The Buddha does not permit me because He desires just one thing which is my service.” The Buddha was also aware thus: “If Meghiya had this misunderstanding, it would have been lasting loss and long suffering to him.” Hence the Buddha's permission.)

When the Venerable Meghiya had finished relating what had happened to Him, he sat down, and while he was sitting down, the Buddha, being desirous of giving him an appropriate Dhamma-talk, uttered (according to the Text): “Aparipakkāya Meghiya ceto vimuttiyā pañca dhamma paripakkāya samvattanti — Meghiya, there are five factors that would lead the mind's liberation from defilements to maturity,” and so on. (The full text of the Dhamma-talk may be read in the Udāna. Here in this Chronicle, however, only a gist of it will be given.)

- (1) association with good friends,
- (2) having morality,
- (3) listening to and reflection on the ten kinds of speech:
  - (a) speech connected with less desire,
  - (b) speech connected with contentment,
  - (c) speech connected with quietude,
  - (d) speech connected with aloofness,
  - (e) speech connected with energy,
  - (f) speech connected with morality,
  - (g) speech connected with concentration,
  - (h) speech connected with wisdom,
  - (i) speech connected with the Path, Fruition and Nibbāna and
  - (j) speech connected with reflective knowledge,
- (4) having developed energy,
- (5) having wisdom as to the arising and falling nature of things.

“Only when one is associated with a good friend, which forms the first factor, can one acquire the remaining four.

“Dear Meghiya, having established himself in the said five Factors, a yogāvacara (an earnest practising) bhikkhu must go to the next stage for developing four things: (a) he must develop notions of loathsomeness of things (asubha) to eradicate lust (rāga), (b) he must develop mindfulness of breathing in and out (ānāpānassati) to eradicate distracting thoughts (vitukka), and (c) he must develop perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) to eradicate egoistic conceit (māna). True, Meghiya, to the perceptionist of impermanence, perception of non-self (anatta-aññā) manifests, the perceptionist of non-self can shed his egoistic conceit and realize Nibbāna even in the present life.”

Knowing this the Buddha breathed forth the following two verses of solemn utterances:

- 1) *Khuddā vitakkā sukhumā vittakkā
anugatā manaso uppilāvā:
Ete avidvā manaso vitakke hurā huram dhāvati bhantacitto.*

Inferior thoughts and subtle thoughts follow the mind and make it frisky. He who does not understand these thoughts is not stable mentally and runs from one sense object to another.

- 2) *Ete ca vidvā manaso vitakke ātāpiyo samvarati satimā.
Anugate manaso uppitāve asesam ete pajahāsi Buddho.*

Understanding these thoughts, the Noble Disciple (Sutabuddhu), endowed with energy that can burn up mental defilements and with mindfulness, is able to block the thoughts that follow the mind and make it frisky. The Noble Disciple, who understands the four truths, is able to abandon the thoughts of sensuality and others, completely.

To the Venerable Meghiya, who had returned to the Buddha as he was entangled by the three wicked and unwholesome thoughts and could not meditate in that mango grove, the Buddha said:

“You have done something seriously wrong, for you left me alone although I begged you saying, ‘Wait, dear Meghiya! At the moment I am alone; so wait till someone else comes!’ A bhikkhu should not yield to the desire of the mind. The mind is light and quick. One should try only to keep it under one's control.”

Then the Buddha uttered the following two verses:

*Phandānam capalam cittaṃ, dūrakkham dunnivārayam.
Ujum karoti medhāvī, usukāro'va tejanam*

(Dear Meghiya,) just as a proud brave fletcher makes the curve arrow straight to his satisfaction by scorching it, (even so) a man with penetrative knowledge can make the mind upright by scorching it by means of energy, both physical and mental. The mind which is excitable by the six sense objects, such as form (rūpa), sound (sadda), etc., which is not stable but fickle in a single sense object, which cannot be fixed on a proper sense object and is thus difficult to control, which can hardly be prevented from wandering about improper sense objects.

*Vārtjo'va thale khitto, okamokata ubbhato,

(Dear Meghiya,) just as the fish born in water, when taken out of its water abode and thrown on land, restlessly jumps about, (even so) the mind in pursuit of enjoyment in the five sense objects, (when taken out from the vast water expanse of sensual pleasure and kept on the land of Vipassanā meditation) in order to abandon the evil defilement within oneself in the manner of samuccheda-pahāna (relinquishing through extermination), restlessly hops about almost to death as it is away from the five water-like sense objects and heated by the four kinds of energy in the form of strenuous meditation.

At the end of these Dhamma-verses, the Venerable Meghiya was established in the Fruition of Sotāpatti. Many other persons also became sotāpanna or nobler ones.

THE BUDDHA'S FOURTEENTH VASSA AT SAVATTHI

After observing the thirteenth vassa at the big monastery on Cālika Hill, near Cālika Town and teaching worthy beings by means of the Dhamma-talks, such as Meghiya Sutta, etc., as has been mentioned above and after remaining there for the post-vassa period for as long as there existed beings to be enlightened, the Buddha set out from there, administering the cool water of elixir to devas, humans and Brahmās. Eventually, He arrived in Sāvattthi and stayed at the Jetavana monastery to observe the fourteenth vassa.

Story of Venerable Sāriputta

At that time, Venerable Sāriputta went with his follower-monks to a certain big monastery in the district and spent the rainy season. The people of the district visited the mahāthera and promised to give him a large number of robes for the vassa.

Having performed the Pavāraṇā ceremony at the end of the vassa, the Venerable, being desirous of visiting the Buddha even before the vassa-robes were offered, said to the monks: “Friends, when the lay devotees bring vassa-robes for the young monks and novices, accept them and send them to me. Or store them well and give the message to me.” Having said thus, the Venerable set out to visit the Buddha.

When he arrived in Sāvattthi, many monks whispered among themselves, saying: “Friends, still Venerable Sāriputta appears to have greed? That was why he came to the Exalted One only after saying to the monks, who remain there: ‘When the lay devotees bring vassa-robes for the young monks and novices, accept them and send them to me. Or store them well and give the message to me.’ ”

When the Buddha came to the assembly of monks, He asked: “Monks, what are you talking about?” When the monks replied that they were talking about such and such a matter, the Buddha said: “Monks, in my eldest son, Sāriputta, there is not the slightest amount of greed. Indeed, he left the word with his disciples because he thought to himself thus: ‘Let the meritorious deeds of the devotees not decrease! Let the righteous acquisition of robes for the young monks and novices not decrease!’ ” Thereafter He uttered the following verse:

(O My dear sons, My dear monks!) In the (mental) continuum of an arahat, whose āsavas are gone, craving that clings to things does not exist, not even the minutest part of it, in the present world as well as in the next, as it has been broken and uprooted through the fourfold Path Knowledge in the manner of samuccheda-pahāna. The arahat, whose āsavas are gone, who has been totally emancipated from a hundred and eightfold craving and who is dissociated from every kind of mental defilement, him naturally do I declare a true Brāhmaṇa!

By the end of the Dhamma-talk, a large multitude of people attained the Fruition of Sotāpatti and so on.

This is the story of Venerable Sāriputta (contained in the Brāhmaṇa Vagga of the Dhammapada Commentary).

As the Venerable Sāriputta was misunderstood by the monks who said that the Venerable seemed to have greed, so was the Venerable Moggallāna who was once misunderstood too. His incident was also somewhat similar to that of Venerable Sāriputta. What was different in the case of Moggallāna was, after asserting that there was no greed in him, the Buddha gave another verse as follows:

*Yassālayā na vijjanti aññāya akatham kathī
Amatogadham anuppattam, tam aham brūmi brāhmaṇam.*

(O My dear sons, My dear monks!) In the (mental) continuum of an arahat whose āsavas are gone, craving that clings to things does not exist, not even the slightest part of it, as it has been broken and uprooted through the fourfold knowledge in the manner of samuccheda-pahāna. Having analytically understood the Triple Gem, the Triple Training and the Patīcasamuppada Wheel in their true nature, he is free from doubt. The arahat whose āsavas are gone, who has plunged wisely into the deathless Nibbāna and attained arahatship straight away, him naturally do I declare a true Brāhmaṇa.

By the end of this Dhamma-talk a large multitude of people attained the Fruition of Sotāpatti and so on. (Dhammapada)

Establishment of Rāhula in Arahatsip through The Cūla-Rāhulovāda Sutta

The Buddha was still staying at Jetavana, Sāvattthi, observing the fourteenth vassa in that city. At that time, Rāhula had completed twenty years of age and had become a newly ordained monk, and had not completed a vassa as a bhikkhu.

One day, at daybreak, when the Buddha surveyed the world of beings, a thought arose in Him: “The fifteen factors leading to arahatsip (Vimutti-paripācāññya-dhamma) have now ripened in Rāhula. What if I were to exhort and guide him so that he would take a step further to the attainment of the Path and Fruition of Arahatsip!”

Herein the the fifteen factors leading to arahatsip are:

- (1) dissociation from faithless persons,
- (2) association with faithful persons,
- (3) reflection on discourses causing faith (three factors with reference to saddhā),
- (4) dissociation from lazy-persons,
- (5) association with energetic persons,
- (6) reflection on discourses causing energy (three factors with reference to vīriya),
- (7) dissociation from unmindful persons,
- (8) association with mindful persons,
- (9) reflection on discourses causing the foundation of mindfulness (three factors with reference to sati),
- (10) dissociation from persons of unconcentrated mind,
- (11) association with persons of concentrated mind,
- (12) reflection on discourses dealing causing jhāna and vimohhka (emancipation) (three factors with reference to samādhi),
- (13) dissociation from unwise persons,
- (14) association with wise persons, and
- (15) reflection on profound discourses (three factors with reference to paññā).

Besides, the five faculties (indriya), namely, faith (saddhā), energy (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā); the five perceptions of weariness (nibbedhabhāgiya-saññā), namely, the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), the perception of suffering (dukkha-saññā), the perception of non-soul (anatta-saññā), the perception of abandonment (pahāna-saññā), and the perception of freedom from lust (virāga-saññā); the five factors as contained in the Sutta given to Meghiya, namely, association with good friends, having morality, listening to and reflection on the ten kinds of speech, having developed energy, and having wisdom as to the arising and falling nature of things (udayabbaya-saññā); these also make the fifteen factors of Vimutti.)

Having conceived this idea the Buddha entered Sāvātthi City in the morning for alms and after finishing His meal, He departed from the alms-resort and said to Rāhula: “Bring a mat to sit on, Rāhula, and let us go to the Andha grove to spend the day there.” “Very well, Exalted Buddha,” he answered and followed the Buddha closely carrying the mat.

At that time, several thousands of devas and Brahmās (who had resolved to have certain spiritual attainments together with Palita, the Nāga King, who was to become Rāhula, in the presence of the Buddha Padumuttara a hundred thousand aeons ago) also followed the Buddha in close succession with the belief that “the Exalted One would exhort and teach Rāhula so that he would take a step further to the attainment of the Path and Fruition of Arahātship.”

(Herein these several thousands of devas and Brahmās, who had resolved spiritually a hundred thousand aeons ago, had been waiting, asked among themselves: “When will the Exalted One’s exhortation and guidance take place so that Rāhula would attain arahātship as a further step?” When the Buddha thought of exhorting and guiding Rāhula, as his faculties, such as faith, etc., had finally grown, these several thousands of celestial beings, who had been longing all the time for that opportune moment of the Buddha’s thinking, for they had shared the desire for spiritual growth, assembled only in the Andha grove knowing that conditions were thus becoming favourable to them as well.)

The Audha Grove

Herein a short account of the Andha Grove near Sāvātthi City will be reproduced from the exposition on the Vammika Sutta of the second volume of the Mūlapaṇṇāsa:

The grove was widely known as Andhavana in the times of the two Buddhas, viz., Buddha Kassapa and our Buddha. Explanation: The body relics of the Buddhas who are of short span of life do not become one mass. In accordance with their resolution, they are disintegrated. Therefore, our Buddha (who was of short life span) considered thus: “I shall not exist long. As My life span is short, only a small number of beings will be able to see Me. There are far more beings who have no chance to do so. They will carry My relics to different places to worship and attain celestial abodes.” Consequently, He resolved immediately before His Parinibbāna: “May My body relics be disintegrated!” (Hence the breaking up of the relics of our Buddha.)

The body relics of the long-lived Buddhas, however, remain as a mass like solid gold. As Buddha Kassapa (who appeared at a time when the people’s life span was twenty thousand years) was long lived, His relic remained, taking a solid form. Then the people discussed among themselves: “The relic remains as a solid form. It cannot be broken up. What shall we do with it?” After discussions, they agreed on constructing a solid cetiya (which was the only monument). They decided unanimously that its size should be one yojana in height as well as in circumference. When they discussed the bricks and cement, they made decisions to lay bricks of gold. Each costing a hundred thousand on the outer side, while bricks of gold, each costing fifty thousand, on the inner side. For cement, realgar and orpiment powder and oil for the liquid matter were used. There must be four gates, of which (1) one was the king’s undertaking, (2) another, Prince Pathavindhara’s, (3) still another, the undertaking of the officials led by the general, (4) the final one being that of the people led by the chief merchant.

Of these four groups, the first three were men of wealth; so they took their own gold and started their work at their respective gates.

But there was delay in the work assigned to the last group as its members had no sufficient wealth. Then a lay devotee who was well-versed in the three Piṭakas and who was an anāgāmin, named Yasarata, knowing the delay, prepared five hundred carts and went round the country, crying out to the citizens and urging them to participate in the act of merit.

“O people, countrymen! Buddha Kassapa has now attained Parinibbāna after existing like a great golden mountain for twenty thousand years. The great jewelled cetiya, one yojana in measurement, to house the only body relic of that Buddha, is under construction. Please contribute whatever material you can afford whether gold, silver, gems of seven kinds, realgar or orpiment.”

The people gave in charity gold, silver and other materials as much as they could. Those, who could not afford, participated in the act of merit by giving rice, oil and the like.

The anāgāmī lay devotee, Yasorata, had rice, oil, pulses, etc., sent as provisions for the workers. He bought gold with the remaining things on the barter system and had it sent. In this way, roaming all over the Jambudīpa, he received donations and had them handed over.

When the construction was done, executive elders from the work site of the cetiya gave a letter to him saying: “The construction of the cetiya has been finished. Please, master, come and pay homage to it!” Yasorata had also sent a letter with the message reading: “I have urged and made the whole Jambudīpa established in the meritorious act. Try to complete the cetiya-monument by using whatever is available.” The two letters crossed midway. But the letter from the worksite reached him earlier.

Having read the letter, Yasorata thought: “I would pay homage to the cetiya” and set alone. On the way, five hundred robbers were terrorizing in a forest grove. Some of them saw the devotee and told others: “This elderly man had collected gold and silver from the entire Jambudīpa. Pots of gold have come now rolling on and on,” and they seized him.

Anāgāmin Yasorata’s Fate

Then Yasorata asked: “Young, men, why did you seize me?” The robbers replied: “You have collected all the gold and silver from the entire Jambudīpa. You must give us a little each out of that gold and silver.”

“Do you know, young men, that Buddha Kassapa has attained Parinibbāna? A great cetiya of one yojana in size for enshrining the body relic of that Buddha is being built. For that great edifice, I have tried to get the people involved in the act of merit, but not for me. And whatever I receive, I send to the work site from the place of donation. I have nothing, not a single thing that is worthy, other than the clothes on my body.” Then some robbers said: “What the gentleman told us is true. So let us set him free.” But others asserted: “This man is honoured by the king as well as by the ministers. On seeing any of us in a street at town-centre, he would disclose the matter to them and bring misfortune to us,” thus they spoke, representing those who did not want to free him.

Yasorata, the anāgāmī lay devotee, assured them saying: “Young men, I will not create trouble for you.” (He said so out of compassion for the robbers, but not because he had attachment for his life.) Then a dispute arose among the robbers, one group willing to continue his detention and the other willing to let him go. Finally, the former group won more votes and Yasorata was slain.

At that very moment, as they had committed a grave crime to the extent of slaying a highly virtuous man, an anāgāmin, the eyes of the robbers suddenly went blind, as the flame of an oil lamp is extinguished. When the five hundred robbers moved about touching this and that with their hands and each wailing: “Where are my eyes, men, where are my eyes?” some (who had relatives) were taken by their relatives to their respective homes. Others who had no kinsfolk had to live there miserably in leaf-roofed huts under the trees in the forest.

People, who came to the forest, took pity on the blind robbers and gave rice, meal packets and other kinds of food to them (as much as they could). Those who went there for gathering vegetables were asked on their return: “Friends, where have you been?” and they answered: “We have been to the ‘Forest of the blind’ (Andhavana).”

In this way, the forest came to be known, far and wide, as Andhavana during the dispensations of the two Buddhas. What was peculiar about it was its location near a deserted district during the Buddha Kassapa's ministry. During the ministry of our Buddha, however, it stood at the back of the Jetavana monastery, near the city of Sāvātthi, like a meditation centre where clansmen, wanting the calm of the five sense objects stay.

The Buddha then entered the Andhavana and sat on the seat prepared under a certain tree by Rāhula, who, having done obeisance respectfully to the Buddha, took a proper seat. To Rāhula, who had thus taken his seat, the Buddha gave the following Dhamma-talk.

The Discourse on The Cha-pañcaka

- (1) Buddha: "My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called 'eye', permanent or impermanent?"
 Rāhula: "Impermanent, Venerable Sir."
 Buddha: "Is the impermanent sensitive matter called 'eye' unsatisfactory or satisfactory?"
 Rāhula: "Unsatisfactory, Venerable Sir."
 Buddha: "Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable sensitive matter called 'eye' be taken falsely (through craving) as 'mine' (etam mama), (through conceit) as 'I' (eso'ham asmi), and (through wrong view) as 'my self' (eso me attā)?"
 Rāhula: "No, Venerable Sir."
- (2) Buddha: "My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is this or that form called 'object', permanent or impermanent?"
 Rāhula: "Impermanent, Venerable Sir."
 Buddha: "Is this impermanent form called 'object' unsatisfactory or satisfactory?"
 Rāhula: "Unsatisfactory, Venerable Sir."
 Buddha: "Should this or that impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable form called 'object' be taken falsely (through craving) as 'mine,' (through conceit) as 'I', and (through wrong view): as 'my self'?"
 Rāhula: "No, Venerable Sir."
- (3) Buddha: "My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is eye consciousness or consciousness depending on the eye (cakkhu-viññāna) (the element of seeing), permanent or impermanent?"
 Rāhula: "Impermanent, Venerable Sir."
 Buddha: "Is the impermanent eye-consciousness unsatisfactory or satisfactory?"
 Rāhula: "Unsatisfactory, Venerable Sir."
 Buddha: "Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable consciousness depending on the eye be taken falsely (through craving) as 'mine', (through conceit) as 'I', and (through wrong view) as 'my self'?"
 Rāhula: "No, Venerable Sir."
- (4) Buddha: "My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is eye-contact or contact depending on the eye (cakkhu-samphassa), permanent or impermanent?"
 Rāhula: "Impermanent, Venerable Sir."
 Buddha: "Is the impermanent eye-contact unsatisfactory or satisfactory?"
 Rāhula: "Unsatisfactory, Venerable Sir."

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable eye-contact be taken falsely (through craving) as ‘mine’, (through conceit) as ‘I’, and (through wrong view) as ‘my self’?”

Rāhula: “No, Venerable Sir.”

- (5) Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Are the four mental aggregates of feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhāra) and particular consciousness (viññāna), depending on the contact of the eye, permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent. Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Should the four impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mental elements be taken falsely (through craving) as ‘mine’, (through conceit) as ‘I’, and (through wrong view) as ‘my self’?”

Rāhula: “No, Venerable Sir.”

This is the teaching on the five items concerning the eye (cakkhu-pañcaka).

- (1) Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called ‘ear’ permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, Venerable Sir.” ..... This is the teaching on the five items concerning the ear (sota-pañcaka).

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called ‘nose’ permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, Venerable Sir.” ..... This is the teaching on the five items concerning the nose (ghāna-pañcaka).

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called ‘tongue’ permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, Venerable Sir.” ..... This is the teaching on the five items concerning the tongue (jivhā-pañcaka).

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called ‘body’ permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, Venerable Sir.” ..... This is the teaching on the five items concerning the body (kāya-pañcaka).

Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is the sensitive matter called ‘mind’ permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent sensitive element called ‘mind’ unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable sensitive element called ‘mind’ be taken falsely (through craving) as ‘mine’, (through conceit) as ‘I’ and (through wrong view) as ‘my self’?”

Rāhula: “No, Venerable Sir.”

- (2) Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is mind and matter called ‘object of ideas’ (dharmā-rammaṇa) permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent mind and matter called ‘object of ideas’ unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mind and matter called ‘object of ideation’ be taken falsely (through craving) as ‘mine’, (through conceit) as ‘I’ and (through wrong view) as ‘my self’?”

Rāhula: “No, Venerable Sir.”

(3) Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is mind-consciousness (māno-vinnāna) permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent mind consciousness unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mind consciousness be taken falsely (through craving) as ‘mine’, (through conceit) as ‘I’, and (through wrong view) ‘my self’?”

Rāhula: “No, Venerable Sir.”

(4) Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Is mind contact or contact depending on the mind (mano-samphassa) permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Is the impermanent mind contact unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Should the impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mind-contact be taken falsely (through craving) as ‘mine’, (through conceit) as ‘I’, and (through wrong view) as ‘my self’?”

Rāhula: “No, Venerable Sir.”

(5) Buddha: “My dear son Rāhula, how do you think of what I am going to ask you now? Are the four mental aggregates, such as sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), mental formations (saṅkhāra) and consciousness (viññāna), arising from mind-contact (mano-samphassa), permanent or impermanent?”

Rāhula: “Impermanent, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Are the four impermanent mental aggregates unsatisfactory or satisfactory?”

Rāhula: “Unsatisfactory, Venerable Sir.”

Buddha: “Should the four impermanent, unsatisfactory and changeable mental aggregates be taken falsely (through craving) as ‘mine’, (through conceit) as ‘I’, and (through wrong view) as ‘my self’?”

Rāhula: “No, Venerable Sir.” This is the teaching on the five items concerning the mind (mano-pañcaka).

(Such a discourse delivered by asking three times so that the three points of impermanence, unsatisfactoriness and non-self might become clear is called “Teparivaṭṭa Dhamma Desanā”.)

objects of touching ..... He becomes weary of the sensitive element called 'mind'; he becomes weary of the objects of ideation ..... He becomes weary of cognition; he becomes weary of mind-contact; he becomes weary of the four mental aggregates, such as sensation, perception, mental formations and consciousness, arising from mind-contact. On becoming weary he is free from attachment, on being free from attachment, he is liberated from mental defilements; on being liberated from mental defilements, he knows by reflection that he is "liberated from mental defilements. He gains knowledge through successive reflections thus: 'Rebirth for me is over.' The noble practice has been finished. The task (for the Path) has been carried out. There is nothing more to be done (for the Path)." When the Buddha has delivered this Cūla Rāhulovāda Sutta, the Venerable Rāhula became established in arahatship. Among thousands of devas and Brahmās, some become sotāpanna, some sakadāgāmin, and the rest anāgāmin and some arahats (according to their pāramīs).

Māra's Threat to Rāhula

One day, when night fell, a large number of theras went into the Jetavana monastery, visited the Venerable Rāhula's place and took their seats. As Rāhula was just a junior monk, he could not prevent senior theras from taking seats at his place, he then looked for another place and, finding none, had to lie down at the entrance to the Fragrant Chamber of the Buddha. At that time, the young Rāhula had just attained arahatship but he had not completed a vassa yet as a bhikkhu.

From the celestial abode of Vasavatti, its residence, Māra saw Venerable Rāhula lying at the entrance of the Fragrant Chamber and conceived an idea:

"The Monk Gotama's small finger (meaning Rāhula) that will suffer when hurt is sleeping outside the Fragrant Chamber. The Monk Gotama himself was sleeping inside. If I hurt the small finger, it would mean that I hurt the Monk Gotama as well."

So he assumed the appearance of a huge elephant, approached Rāhula and embraced Rāhula's head with his trunk; moreover he made a heron-like sound at a high pitch.

Even while sitting in the Fragrant Chamber, the Buddha knew it was Mara and said:

"Hey Māra, even a hundred thousand māras, let alone you, are incapable of frightening my son Rāhula. In fact, my son has no fear at all. He is free from craving, very energetic and highly intelligent."

In order to stamp His word with the seal of Dhamma, the Buddha uttered the following two verses:

*Niṭṭhangato asamtasi
vītataṅho anaṅgano
Acchindi bhavasallāni
antimo'yam samussayo*

(Hey Māra, a disturbing one! My son) Rāhula is one who has realized his goal, that is arahatship called Brahmacariya pariyoṣāna. He is absolutely free from fear, he is purified of the hundred and eight kinds of real craving; he is devoid of the one thousand and five hundred mental defilements; he has uprooted the thorns and spikes of all existences such as sensual (kāma), material (rūpa) and immaterial (arūpa). The body (of my son Rāhula) in the present existence is his last body.

*Vītataṅho anādāno
niruttipada-kovido.
Akkharānam sannipātam*

*jaññā pubbāparāṃ ca.
Sa ve antimasāriro
mahāpañño mahāpuriso ti vuccuti.*

(He who is) purified of the hundred and eight kinds of real craving, has no attachment at all; does not grasp the five aggregates of the body and the mind as 'I', 'mine' and 'my self' is clever in respect of the fourfold analytical knowledge of meaning, truth, wit and analysis; sees the combinations of letters known as natural speech (sabhāva-nirutti) as they really are (If one knowing no natural speech says 'phusso' wrongly with reference to the mental concomitant of phassa: he knows it is 'phasso', the correct word of the natural speech.) He clearly knows the preceding syllable from the following and the following syllable from the preceding. (Of the three syllabic word cetanā, for instance, if the initial syllable alone is distinct, from it he correctly knows the indistinct middle and final ones; if the middle syllable alone is distinct, from it he correctly knows the indistinct initial and final in like manner; if the final syllable alone is distinct, from it he correctly knows the indistinct initial and middle in like manner. That person, having his final, is indeed to be spoken of as a man of great wisdom, an extraordinary man free from one thousand and five hundred moral defilements.

By the end of the discourse many attained sotāpatti-phala and so on.

Aware of the fact that the Buddha came to know his identity, Māra disappeared from that very place.

Delivery of The Suciloma Sutta

(The Suciloma Sutta is contained in the Sutta Nipāta and the Sagāthā Vagga of the Saṃyutta Nikāya. Here, in this Chronicle, the Sutta will be reproduced according to the Commentary.)

One day when the Buddha emerged from the mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti immediately before dawn and surveyed the world of sentient beings with His Buddha-Eye (consisting in the asāyanusaya-nāṇa and indriya-paropariyatti-nāṇa), He saw the past acts of merit belonging to the two ogre friends, namely, Suciloma and Kharaloma, that would bring about their attainment of sotāpatti fruition. Hence, He took his bowl and robe and set out, even at dawn, and sat on the lithic couch called Ṭaṃkita at the mansion of Suciloma near the village of Gayā.

At that time, the two ogre friends went out in search of food, wandering about the place somewhat near the Buddha.

Story of Kharaloma, The Ogre

Of the two ogres, one in his past life happened to have smeared his body with the oil belonging to the Sangha without seeking its permission. For that unwholesome act, he suffered in hell and was reborn in an ogre family near the bank of the lake at Gayā. As a result of his wrong doing, his limbs were big and small and were frighteningly distorted. His skin was like a tiled roof (with his tile-skin resembling scales of a fish) and terribly rough to touch.

When he frightened others, he had his skin (or scales) bloated. As he had a rough body surface, he was called Khara the ogre.

Story of Suciloma, The Ogre

The other ogre was a supporting lay devotee during the lifetime of the Buddha Kassapa. He used to go to the monastery and listened to the sermon on every sermon-day, eight days a month. One day, when the invitation for attendance to the sermon was being announced, he heard it from his farm where he was cleaning it. Without taking a bath lest it should take time, he entered the uposatha hall with his dirty body and lay on a very costly rug on the ground, showing no care for it.

Because of this and other acts, he suffered in niraya and became a member of an ogre family near the lake at Gayā. As a subsequent result of his bad deeds, he had a terribly ugly look. His body hair was sharp-pointed and pricking like needles. When he frightened other beings, he did so as though he were piercing them with needles. Because he had needle-like hair, he was given the name Suciloma.

Getting out of their abode to look for food, the two ogre friends walked for some time and returned by the same way. While visiting another place, they happened to reach a place that was somewhere close to the Buddha.

Then Kharaloma said to Suciloma what he honestly thought: “That man is a monk!” Suciloma replied: “That man is not a true monk; he is only a false one. I will investigate to know for certain whether he is a true monk or not.”

(Herein on seeing the appearance of a monk, Kharaloma honestly said: “That man is a monk!” Suciloma was of opinion that “if the man fears, he is not a true monk; he is only a false one,” and wrongly thinking that the Buddha would be frightened, he hastily said: “That man is not a true monk; he is only a false one.” Then he became desirous of making an investigation. Hence he added: “I will investigate to know for certain whether he is a true monk or not.”)

Thereafter Suciloma went up to the Buddha and bent his big ugly, bristled body towards the Buddha. The Buddha suddenly moved His body to the other side. This prompted Suciloma to ask: “Are you frightened by me, Monk?” “Dear ogre,” answered the Buddha, “I am not frightened by you. Your body contact is indeed rough and vile (though!)”

Seeing the Buddha without the slightest trace of fear, Suciloma thought: “Despite His experience of my body-touch that was so rough, this man, though a real human, is not afraid. Now I shall present to Him some problems worthy of an Omniscient Buddha’s sphere of wisdom (Buddha-visaya). He will not be able to tackle them fully. Then I shall torment Him in such and such a way.” So he said rudely: “Monk, I shall ask You some questions. If You cannot give me a thorough answer, I shall make You mad. Or, I shall burst open Your heart. Or, I shall throw You to the other bank of the river by catching hold of Your legs.”

Then the Buddha with his face gladdened by his great compassion said: “Friend ogre, the celestial world with devas, māras and Brahmas, and the terrestrial world with monks, brahmins and princes, in either of these two worlds, I see none who is able to make Me mad, or to burst open My heart, or to throw Me to the other bank of the river by catching hold of My two legs. Be that as it may, friend ogre, ask Me whatever questions you want. I shall answer your questions without leaving anything.” When the Buddha invited the ogre’s questions the way an Omniscient Buddha would, Suciloma put his question thus in verse:

*Rāgo ca doso ca kutonidānā
aratī ratī lomahāmsō kutojā
Kuto samuṭṭhāya mano vitakkā kumrakā dhanikam ivossajanti.*

(Monk!) Where do lust and hate have their source? Displeasure in the wholesome things of a quiet forest monastery, pleasure in the five sense objects, and goose flesh (cittutrāsa dhamma — sign of a terrified mind), from what do these (three kinds of emotion) arise? As village children throw up a crow for fun (after tying its feet with a rope), from what do the ninefold thought appear and overthrow the wholesome consciousness?

Then the Buddha gave his answer and preached to Suciloma ogre by the following verses:

*1) Rāgo ca doso ca itonidānā
aratī ratī lomahāmsō itojā
Ito samuṭṭhāya mano vitakkā*

kumārakā dhañkam iv'ossajanti.

(Dear ogre!) Lust and hate have their source in this body. (These three kinds of emotion, namely,) displeasure in the wholesome things of a quiet forest monastery, pleasure in the five sense objects, and goose flesh arise from this body. As village children throw up a crow for fun (after tying its feet with a rope), so the ninefold thought appear from this very body and overthrow the wholesome consciousness.

2) *Snehajā attasambhutā nigrodhass'eva khandhajā.
Puthū visattā kāmesu māluvā va vitatā vane.*

(Friend ogre!) As shoots of a banyan tree appear on its trunk, so do lust, hate and the like caused by the sap of craving appear on this very body. As creepers in the forest wrap up the tree that they cling around, so innumerable moral defilements attach themselves in a strange manner to the sense objects and pleasures.

3) *Ye nam pajānanti yato nidānam te nam vinodeni suñohi yakkha.
Te duttaram ogham imam taranti atinnapubbam apunabbhavāya.*

Listen, friend ogre! Certain persons know thoroughly that the physical frame, which is the embodiment of the five aggregates, and which forms the Truth of suffering, has its source in craving and greed, which form the Truth of the cause [of suffering]; they drive away that craving and greed, the Truth of the cause of suffering, by means of the Truth of the Eightfold Path [leading to the cessation of suffering]. These Noble Ones, who have thus driven away craving and greed, the cause of suffering, cross over this fourfold torrential flood of moral defilements, the flood which is difficult to overcome, which has not been crossed over in the past existences in samsāra, even not in a dream, for the non-arising of rebirth, i.e. the Truth of the Cessation [of Suffering].

When the two ogre friends had thus heard these Dhamma-verses, both of them attained sotāpatti-phala as the verses came to an end.

As soon as the two friends become noble sotāpanna, their original ugliness and bad looks disappeared. With bright golden complexion and bedecked in deva ornaments, they assumed an appearance, that was pleasant to beholders.

Chapter 33

THE BUDDHA'S FIFTEENTH VASSA AT KAPILAVATTHU.

After staying in Sāvatti for the fourteenth vassa, the Buddha remained in that city, after the end of the vassa, for as long as there were beings worthy of teaching. Thereafter, He set out to administer the medicinal Dhamma of Deathlessness to all beings, devas, humans and Brahmās, and He eventually arrived in the city of Kapilavatthu and observed, together with a host of monks, the fifteenth vassa at Nigrodhārāma (which was built and given to Him on His first visit by the Sakyan prince, Nigrodha, and which had come to be known as Nigrodhārāma).

Preaching to the Sakyan Prince Mahānāma as to what makes a lay devotee

While the Buddha was thus staying at Nigrodhārāma of Kapilavatthu in the country of Sakka, the Sakyan prince, Mahānāma, paid a visit to Him, did obeisance and sat down at a proper place. Then the Prince asked the Buddha:

(1) Prince: “By doing what, Exalted Buddha, does one become a lay devotee (upāsaka)?”

Buddha: “Mahānāma, (1) taking refuge (Saraṇa-gamana) in the Buddha; (2) taking refuge in the Dhamma, and (3) taking refuge in the Sangha. By doing so, Mahānāma, one becomes a lay devotee.

(2) Prince: “By doing what, Exalted Buddha, is a lay devotee endowed with morality (sīla)?”

Buddha: “Mahānāma, (1) abstaining from taking life, (2) abstaining from taking what is not given, (3) abstaining from wrong sexual acts, (4) abstaining from telling lies and (5) abstaining from taking strong drink, a cause of unmindfulness. By doing so, Mahānāma, a lay devotee is endowed with morality.”

(That is to say, taking the Triple Refuge and keeping the Five Precepts makes one a lay devotee of morality.)

(3) Prince: “By doing what, Exalted Buddha, is a lay devotee endowed with faith (saddhā)?”

Buddha: “In this dispensation, Mahānāma, a lay devotee believes that the Buddha is an arahat (Arahant) because He is worthy of extra-ordinary homage; .... that He is a Bhagavā because He has great glory in the sense of Enlightenment. By believing so, Mahānāma, a lay devotee is endowed with faith”

(Herein, talking only about the nine attributes of the Buddha is just an elliptical way (upalukkhana-nava) of preaching. A lay devotee who believes in the nine attributes of the Buddha also believes in the six attributes of the Dhamma and in the nine attributes of the Sangha. Therefore, it means to say that a lay devotee who is convinced of the attributes or the Triple Gem is endowed with faith.)

(4) Prince: “By doing what, Exalted Buddha, is a lay devotee endowed with generosity (cāga)?”

Buddha: “In this dispensation, Mahānāma, a lay devotee abides at home with his mind freed from the impurity of stinginess (macchera), he gives away with full detachment; he washes his hand to give with (his hand is wet); he takes delight in giving; he is befitting to alms-seekers as he shuns wearing a grim face; he is delighted in offering and distributing things. By doing so, Mahānāma, a lay devotee is endowed with generosity.”

(5) Prince: “By what, Exalted Buddha, is a lay devotee endowed with wisdom (paññā)?”

Buddha: “In this dispensation, Mahānāma, a lay devotee is wise; he has wisdom which is pure and noble, which destroys moral defilement, which leads to Nibbāna, the end of suffering, and which helps him understand the rise and fall (udayabbaya-nāṇa) of mind and matter. All this makes him endowed with wisdom.”

— Mahāvagga Saṃyutta Pāli —

(Details of Mahānāma, the Sakyan prince, will be given in the portion of the Jewel of the Sangha.)

Prince Suppabuddha swallowed by The Earth

While staying at Nigrodhārāma, Kapilavatthu, in the country of Sakka, the Buddha delivered a discourse beginning with “Na antalikkhe na samuddamajjhe” in connection with His uncle and father-in-law Suppabuddha, a Sakyan prince.

Elaboration: The Buddha's uncle, Prince Suppabuddha, bore a grudge against the Buddha for two reasons. He thought: “This nephew and son-in-law of mine, Prince Siddhattha, Buddha Gotama, has abandoned my daughter and renounced the world. And having ordained my son Devadatta into monkhood He treats him as an enemy.” One day, thinking: “I should not give Him a chance to have His meal,” he blocked the Buddha's way, by having a drinking bout in the middle of the road.

At that time, when the Buddha came in a company of monks to that place, the Prince's men informed him of the Buddha's visit. “Men,” said the Prince bitterly, “tell Prince Siddhattha, my nephew Buddha, to take another road. He is not older than I. (Therefore) I cannot make way for him.” Despite his men's repeated plea, the Prince said the same and kept on drinking.

Failing to get permission from his uncle, the Buddha turned back from that place. Suppabuddha then sent a spy with these words: “Go, man, take note of what my nephew has to say, and come back.”

While turning back, the Buddha smiled and Venerable Ānanda asked Him about the reason for His smile. “Dear Ānanda,” the Buddha asked in return, “Did you see My uncle Suppabuddha?” “Yes, Exalted Buddha,” replied Venerable Ānanda. The Buddha then foretold as follows:

“Dear Ānanda, My uncle Suppabuddha, who refused to make way for Me, has done a very serious mistake. Seven days from now, he will enter the earth (he will be swallowed up by the earth) at the bottom of the stairs leading down from the upper terrace.”

Having overheard these words, the spy went back to Suppabuddha who asked: “What did my nephew, who has turned back, say?” The man told him of all he had heard. The Prince then conceived an idea: “What my nephew has said cannot go wrong. Whatever He says comes true. Despite this I will accuse Him of falsehood now. He said that I would be swallowed up by the earth on the seventh day. He said not without mentioning the place, but He did say I was to be swallowed by the earth at the foot of the stairs. From now on I shall never go to the foot of the stairs. If I do not go there, I shall not be swallowed by the earth there. On being not swallowed at the end of seven days, I shall accuse my nephew Buddha, Prince Siddhattha, of false speech.”

After getting the idea, Prince Suppabuddha had his belongings taken on to the top and the stairway removed and the doors locked; at each doorway he placed a couple of wrestlers, whom he ordered: “In case I try to descend absent minded, you must check me then.” So he remained in his cosy chamber on the seventh and top terrace of his residence.

Hearing of the matter, the Buddha said: “Monks, the word of a Buddha is never ambiguous, it is only of one meaning that is truthful no matter whether my uncle Prince Suppabuddha stays only on the terrace, or takes flight and remains in the sky, or comes down and abides in a boat in the ocean, or dwells inside a mountain. On the very spot I have mentioned (i.e. at the foot of the stairs), he will be swallowed by the earth.” Being desirous of preaching by connecting the former speech with the latter, the Buddha uttered the following verse:

*Na antalikkhe na sanudamajjhe na pabbatānam vivaram pavissa.
Na vijjati so jagatippadeso yattha ñhitam nappasaheyya maccu.*

Monks, he who stands in the air cannot escape from death; nor can he who lies in the middle of the ocean; he who enters a hole or a cleft in a mountain and lives there cannot escape from death; there is no space on the ground, not even that of a hair's breadth, that is not plagued by death.

By the end of this verse, innumerable persons attained sotāpatti-phala and so on.

On the seventh day, while the road leading to the palace where the Buddha would take His meal was being blocked, Suppabuddha's state horse (kept) under the mansion got away from the ropes, with which he was tied to a post, kicking the walls around and neighing forcefully. Nobody was able to frighten or capture him. While staying up on the terrace of the mansion, Suppabuddha heard the cries of his state horse and asked what it was all about. His male servants then replied that the Prince's charger had broken loose.

As soon as he saw the Prince, the state horse stood quietly. Then Suppabuddha could not help trying to catch the horse, he then rose from his seat and went up to the door which opened by itself. The stairways that had been removed previously stood at its original place. The wrestlers who were on guard caught hold of the Prince by the neck and (instead of getting him into the mansion) threw him down. The doors on all seven floors already became open of their own accord. The stairways were reinstated by themselves. The guards on each floor threw him down successively by catching hold of him by the neck.

After that, when he got down to the foot of the stairs leading to the ground, the great earth opened, making a roaring sound, and received Suppabuddha, the Sakyan prince. Having entered the earth, the Prince reached the Avīci niraya (hell).

The Buddha's Answers to Sakka's Four Questions

While staying at Nigrodharama of Kapilavatthu and observed the fifteenth vassa, the Buddha administered the distribution of the cool water of Dhamma, the elixir of deathlessness to worthy beings. When the fifteenth vassa came to an end, He set out from Kapilavatthu in accordance with a Buddha's practice and arrived eventually at Jetavana in the good city of Sāvatti.

While He was staying there, the Buddha delivered a sermon beginning with Sabbadānam Dhammadānam jināti as He was asked by Sakka, the King of Devas. The details are as follows:

Once the devas of Tāvātimsa celestial abode met and raised four questions:

- (1) What is the best of all gifts?
- (2) What is the best of all tastes?
- (3) What is the best of all delights? and
- (4) Why should arahatship, the end of craving, be called the best?

Not a single deva was able to answer these four questions. In fact, one deva asked another, who, in turn, asked another and so on. Thus asking among themselves, they roamed about the ten thousand universes for twelve years (without getting the answers).

Knowing nothing of the meaning of these questions, though twelve years had passed, the devas residing in the ten thousand universes assembled and went up to the Four Great Kings. When asked by the Four Great Kings as to why they had thus made a great assembly, the devas said: “We came to you as we have four questions which we are unable to solve.” “What are the four questions, friends?” asked the Deva Kings. “Of innumerable gifts, of innumerable tastes and of innumerable delights, which is the best gift, which is the best taste and which is the best delight? Why is arahatship, the end of craving, the best?" answered the devas, "Finding no answers to these questions, we have come to you."

Then the Four Great Kings said: "We too do not know the meaning of these questions, friends. But our Lord Sakka is capable of knowing promptly when he reflects on the significance of the questions that may be forwarded by a thousand persons. Sakka is superior to us in intelligence, wisdom and glory. Come, we shall go to Sakka." When the Four Deva Kings took them to Sakka and when asked by him about such a great assemblage, the devas explained the matter to him.

"Devas!" addressed Sakka, "The significance of these four questions cannot be known by all (except the Buddha). In fact, these four questions are for a Buddha to solve. Where is the Buddha staying now?" Sakka added: "Come, we shall go to the Exalted Buddha and asked him." Together with all these devas, Sakka illuminated the whole of Jetavana at night and approached the Buddha, did obeisance to Him and stood at a proper place. When the Buddha enquired about their coming in such a great multitude, Sakka replied: "The devas, Exalted One, have these questions to ask. There is none other than you, Venerable Sir, who will be able to answer them, who could know the significance of questions. Please explain the meaning clearly, to us, Exalted Buddha."

"Very well, Sakka!" said the Buddha. "Having fulfilled the Perfections and performed unflinchingly the fivefold generosity, I achieved Omniscience just to eliminate the doubts of persons like you. The answers to your four questions are as follows:

- (1) Of all gifts, the gift of Dhamma is the best.
- (2) Of all tastes, the taste of Dhamma is the best.
- (3) Of all delights, the delight in Dhamma is the best.
- (4) Arahatsip, at the end of craving, is the best because it is the cessation of all suffering.

Having spoken thus in prose the Buddha uttered the following verse:

*Sabbadānaṃ Dhammadānaṃ jināti, sabbarassaṃ Dhammarasaṃ jināti.
Sabbaratiṃ Dhammarati jināti, taṇhakkhaya sabba dukkhaṃ jināti.*

(Sakka, the King of Devas,) the gift of Dhamma, which is the teaching and learning of Dhamma, excels all other gifts overwhelmingly.

The taste of Dhamma, consisting in the thirty-seven factors of Enlightenment and the nine supra-mundane attainments, excels all others overwhelmingly.

The delight in Dhamma excels all other delights overwhelmingly.

Arahatsip, at the end of craving, absolutely overcome all suffering.

Explanation of The Meaning

(1) Even if robes, as soft as layers of a banana trunk, were given to Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and arahats, who were seated up to the abode of Brahmās in a universe with no space between one another, a four-footed verse, which was delivered in that assembly in appreciation of the gift, is far superior. In fact, the value of such a gift of countless robes is not even a two hundred and fifty-sixth part of the value of the Dhamma verse which was delivered in appreciation of the gift of robes. Hence, the excellence of the speaking, teaching and learning of the Dhamma.

Even to those, who put efforts to organize and manage so that the multitude might listen to the Dhamma, the benefit accrue is immense.

To the gift of food in bowls, each and every one of them filled with sumptuous meal, to the gift of medicine in bowls, each and every one of them filled with butter, oil and such like, to the gift of hundreds of thousands of dwellings like the Mahāvihāra, to the gift of hundreds of thousands of pinnacled mansions like the Lohapāsāda, even to the various gifts including the Jetavana monastery given by Anāthapiṇḍika and others to Buddhas, Paccekka Buddhas and arahats who were seated and occupying the whole of the aforesaid universe with no space between one another; to all these gifts, the gift of the Dhamma taught in a four-footed verse, least of all in appreciation of a material gift, is far superior.

Why? Because those who perform the wholesome act of giving the aforesaid four requisites, namely, robes, food dwelling and medicine, do so only after hearing the Dhamma, not otherwise. If they had not heard the Dhamma they would not have given even a ladleful of rice gruel or a spoonful of food. For this reason the gift of Dhamma excels all other gifts.

To make the fact more explicit: Leaving out Buddhas and Paccekabuddhas, even the Venerable Sāriputta and other Noble Ones, who had intelligence that could help them count the rain drops when it rained heavily and endlessly for the whole āyu-kappa, were unable to make such noble attainments as sotāpatti-phala and higher stages on their own (without hearing the Dhamma). In fact, it was after hearing the teaching of Thera Assaji and others that they attained sotāpatti-phala; it was by listening to the Buddha's Teaching (of the Dīghanakha Sutta and others) that they attained Discipleship (Sāvaka-Pāramī-ñāṇa). "For this reason, too, Sakka, only the gift of the Dhamma (Dhamma-dāna) is more admirable than the gift of requisites (paccaya-dāna)." Hence the Buddha's saying: "The gift of the Dhamma excels all other gifts overwhelmingly."

(2) All kinds of tastes including the taste of fruit, the taste of flowers, the taste of flavour (even that of the food of the devas) are the cause of rebirth in samsāra and of falling into suffering. The taste of the nine-fold supra-mundane Dhamma together with the thirty-seven factors of Enlightenment and the four pairs of magga and phala plus Nibbāna, however, is more praiseworthy than all mundane tastes. Hence the Buddha's saying: "The taste of Dhamma (Dhamma-rasa) excels all other tastes overwhelmingly."

(3) All kinds of delights in earthly things, such as sons, daughters, riches, women, dancing, singing, music, etc., are the cause of rebirth in samsāra and of falling into suffering. Joy (pīti) that arises in one, through one's attention paid to the Dhamma while speaking, teaching or hearing it, causes elation, even tears and gooseflesh. Only such joy that can put an end to suffering in samsāra and bring about welfare to the extent of realization of sotāpatti-phala, is more praiseworthy than all kinds of delight in earthly things. Hence the Buddha's Teaching: "The delight in Dhamma (Dhamma-rati) excels all other delights overwhelmingly."

(4) All kinds of craving disappear the moment arahatta-magga is attained. Arahatta-magga is immediately followed by (its result which is) arahatta-phala. As arahatta-phala arises at the end of craving, it is called Taṇhakkhaya (destruction of craving). As arahatta-phala, called Taṇhakkhaya, overcomes all suffering, it is the Dhamma that is superior to and more praiseworthy than all other things. Hence the Buddha's saying: "Arahatta-phala, the end of craving, absolutely overcomes all suffering."

Conversion of Eighty-four Thousand Beings

When the Buddha explained the verse in detail, eighty-four thousand sentient beings realized the Four Truths and were converted.

Having listened to the Buddha's elaborate teaching, Sakka did obeisance to Him and made a request:

"Exalted Buddha, although the gift of the Dhamma is so great and praiseworthy, why are we not let to share the merit of it? From now on, please make the Sangha give our shares of merit from the gift of the Dhamma."

Having heard Sakka's request, the Buddha called a meeting of the Sangha and said:

"From now on, monks, after giving a Dhamma-speech, be it a grand one, or an ordinary one, or one given to those who visit you, or (at least) one given in appreciation of some alms-giving, share the merit, which accrue to you from the

Taming of Āḷavaka The Ogre

King Āḷavaka, of the city of Āḷavī, was in the habit of pursuing pleasurable hunting in a deer forest once a week, leaving behind all his enjoyment at the palace together with female courtiers and dancers. In order to ward off the dangers of rebels, foes and thieves, to prevent his contemporary rulers from attacking him, he took up a sporting exercise to boost his kingly might.

One day, just before he set out for hunting, he had an agreement made with his military officers: “He, from whose charge a deer escapes, must be responsible for that deer,” and when they got to the forest a deer ran away from the king’s charge.

As he was quick and strong, the King, equipped with a bow, immediately followed the deer on foot for up to three yojanas. These (deer) belonging to eṇī family can run continuously only for three yojanas. Therefore, when the King had covered that distance, he killed the deer that was lying exhausted in a pond, with an arrow. He cut up the animal into two pieces. Though he did not want its flesh, he carried it by means of a pole lest he should be ill-spoken of as “one unable to catch the deer.” On his way back he saw a shady banyan tree in new and old foliage at a place that was neither too near nor too far from the city; he approached the foot of the tree to take some rest.

Now, Āḷavaka the ogre had been granted a boon by Vessavaṇa, the deva king, that whoever came into the vicinity of the banyan tree as far as its shadow fell at noon would be his food. (Herein, it should not be taken that those who came under the tree only at midday should be eaten by him. The fact was that those who came into the vicinity of the tree covered by the shadow of the tree at noon would be eaten, whether they came by day or by night.)

When the ogre saw the King came under his banyan tree, he showed himself in person and wanted to eat the King. [The King gave the two halves of the deer as he wanted the ogre to set him free. But the ogre did not do so, saying: “Since it came into my hand, is it not mine? How could you, Great King, seek your freedom by giving me the deer?” (This part of the story is given only in some versions.)]

Then the King made a promise to the ogre saying: “Set me free! I shall send you each day a man and a pot of cooked rice.” Still the ogre refused to release him, he said: “You might forget about it, being intoxicated with your kingly luxuries. As for me, I cannot eat those who do not come up to my residence nor can I eat those who do not voluntarily give up themselves. How could I live if you were released?” When the King satisfied the ogre by saying: “The day I fail to send you (food), you may devour me.” He regained his freedom from the ogre’s hand and returned to the city of Āḷavī.

While waiting for the King at the make-shift shelter of branches that they had constructed midway, the officers saw the King coming back; they greeted the King and received him saying: “Why did you try so hard to catch the deer, Great King, fearing loss of dignity?” Relating nothing of the incident, the King returned to the city and had his breakfast. Then he summoned the administrative minister of the city and secretly told him (of the promise which he had given to the ogre).

“Have you agreed upon the time, Great King?” asked the minister. “No, I have not,” replied the King. “You have made a mistake, Great King,” said the minister. “Ogres are to have access only to things limited. As you have not put a limit, the whole district is in danger of a disease. Be that as it may, Great King, though you have been wrong, do not worry but enjoy your royal comfort, I shall do what is to be done in this matter.” The minister rose early and went to the prison and made an announcement to the criminals who had been sentenced to death, he said: “Those who wish to survive may come out.”

He took the convict that came out first and had him bathed and fed, he then sent him saying: “Take this pot of rice to the ogre!” As soon as the convict got into the shade of the banyan tree, the ogre assumed a very terrible frame and ate him as though he were biting lotus stalks and stems.

NB: Through the supernatural power of ogres, a human body, including its hair, etc., turns into a lump of butter

Those who escorted the convict and the food for the ogre saw Āḷavaka devouring the man, became frightened and told their intimate friends of the matter. From that time onwards the news that “the King catches thieves and gives them to the ogre”, spread and people abstained from stealing.

At a later time, as there were no new thieves and old ones were all gone, the prisons became empty. Then the minister reported the matter to the King, who had his gold and silver dropped on all the main roads of the city, thinking that somebody might want to pick it up. But nobody touched it even with his foot lest they should be accused of theft.

When the King of Āḷavaka failed to get new recruit of thieves in this way, he discussed it with his ministers, who advised, saying: “We shall make people send one aged person from each household in serial order. An aged person means one who by himself is about to enter the mouth of death.” But the King rejected the advice saying that people would then be terrorized with the thought ‘the King has the heart to send my father to the ogre!’ or ‘He is cruel enough to send my grandfather to the ogre!’ I do not prefer that plan.”

Then the ministers presented their alternate idea thus: “In that case Great King, make people send their children who are lying on their backs in their cradles, each day. Such children have no such affection as ‘This is my mother’ or ‘This is my father.’ Upon this the King agreed and let him do so. The minister started executing the plan.

From the city, mothers fled with their children, and pregnant women fled too. After bringing up their children in another country, they brought back their young children to the city.

In this manner the daily feeding of the ogre took place for twelve long years. One day, when the royal servants roamed about the city looking for children, they found not a single child. So they reported to the King: “Leaving aside your son, Prince Āḷavaka, in the palace, there are no children in the city.” The King replied: “As I love my son, so do all these people love their respective sons. But in this world there is none more lovable than one's own self. Go, men, save my life by giving my son to the ogre!”

At that time, the Queen, mother of Prince Āḷavaka, had her son bathed with scented water and adorned with ornaments. She was sitting with her son wrapped in soft white pieces of cloth and placed him at her bosom to let him sleep. Under the command of the King, the royal servants went there, and while the Queen and sixteen thousand female attendants were crying, they took away the chief nurse and the prince, declaring that the little prince would become food for the ogre.

The Buddha's Visit to Āḷavī

On that day the Buddha rose early in the morning and engaged in mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti in the Fragrant Chamber inside the Jetavana monastery. And when He surveyed the world by His two-fold Buddha eyes, (consisting in āsayānusaya-ñāṇa and indriya-paropariyatti-ñāṇa) He saw in His vision three significant things:

- (1) the past merit of Prince Āḷavaka that would lead him to anāgāmī-phala,
- (2) the past merit of the ogre Āḷavaka that would lead him to sotāpatti-phala, and
- (3) the past merit of eighty-four thousand beings that would lead them to the realization of the Eye of the Dhamma (dhamma-cakkhu), the penetration of the Four Truths, at the end of His discourse.

Accordingly, at daybreak He performed His morning duty. Before He could finished His afternoon undertakings, at sunset on that new moon day, He set out on foot alone and unaccompanied, taking His bowl and robe, on a journey of thirty yojanas from Savatthi, and entered the precinct of the ogre's residence.

Now where did the Buddha stay? Did He stay in the ogre's mansion that was invisible to ordinary people and near the banyan tree? Or did He sit at the foot of the banyan tree? He took His seat in the ogre's mansion. Explanation: As ogres saw their mansions, so did the Buddha see them. Therefore, He went up to the ogre's mansion and stood at its gate.

At that time, Ālavaka was attending a meeting of ogres in the Himavanta. The door keeper of Ālavaka, the ogre by the name of Gadrabha, approached the Buddha and paid his respects. And a dialogue took place between Gadrabha and Buddha:

Gadrabha: “Glorious Buddha, did you come only at sunset?”

Buddha: “Yes, Gadrabha, I came only at sunset. If it were not a burden to you, I would like to spend the night in Ālavaka's mansion.”

Gadrabha: “Glorious Buddha, it is not a burden to me. But that ogre Ālavaka is violent. He does not show respects even to his parents. Therefore please do not prefer to stay there.”

Buddha: “Gadrabha, I know of Ālavaka's violence. There would not be a bit of harm to me. I want to stay for the night there in Ālavaka's mansion, if you do not feel my stay burdensome.”

Gadrabha: “Glorious Buddha, Ālavaka is like an iron pan aglow with fire. He is absolutely ignorant of parents, monks, and brahmins and the Dhamma. Those who come to this place he is able to drive them mad, or burst open their hearts, or to throw them beyond the ocean or beyond the universe by catching hold of their legs.”

Buddha: “Gadrabha, I know all about this. If it were not burdensome to you, I would like to stay in Ālavaka's mansion for the night.”

Gadrabha: “Glorious Buddha, it is not burdensome for me. But Ālavaka might kill me if I were to give you permission without first informing him. Glorious Buddha, let me go to him therefore and tell him of the matter first.”

Buddha: “Gadrabha, tell him as you like.”

Gadrabha: “Glorious Buddha, please consider then whether you should stay here or not.”

Having said thus, Gadrabha paid his respect to the Buddha and departed to the Himavanta. The door of Ālavaka's mansion opened by itself. The Buddha entered and took His seat on the divine jewelled throne which Ālavaka usually sat, on important and auspicious days, enjoying divine luxuries. Being seated, the Buddha emanated golden yellow (pīta) rays.

Beholding the yellow rays, Ālavaka's female attendants gathered, did obeisance to the Buddha and sat around Him. The Buddha gave a miscellaneous Dhamma-talk to them, saying: “Ogresses, as you have in the past given alms and observed morality and honoured those who deserved honour, you attain divine luxuries. Now also, do as you have done before. Abide not by jealousy (issā) and stinginess (macchariya)” and so on. Having heard the sweet talk of the Dhamma, they gave a thousand cheers and remained sitting and surrounding the Buddha.

Having arrived at the Himavanta, Gadrabha the ogre told Ālavaka respectfully: “O Ālavaka, King of Ogres, who know no suffering! May I draw your attention. Please be informed. The Buddha has come and sat in your mansion.” Then Ālavaka made a gesture, meaning to say: “Be quiet! (You shut up!) I will go back immediately and do whatever is necessary.”

(Herein Ālavaka was so strong in improper thinking that he took the Buddha's stay in his mansion as a disgrace, and out of pride as an ogre, he hushed up the news, thinking: “Let nobody amidst this assembly of ogres hear of it.”)

Then the two noble devas, Sātāgira and Hemavata, agreed between themselves to go visit the Buddha at Jetavana before they went to attend the assembly of devas. Riding different vehicles, they set off by air together with their hosts of retinue.

N.B. Routes existed nowhere in the space for the ogres. They only had to find out their way, avoiding celestial mansions standing there.

Āḷavaka's mansion, however, was situated on the ground. It was well secure, surrounded by properly fixed walls, doors, turrets and archways. Above the mansion was spread a net made of white brass. The mansion was like a box. It was three yojanas in height, over which there formed an aerial route used by divine ogres.

When the two friends, the divine ogres Sātāgira and Hemavata, happened to come just above the mansion on their way to visit the Buddha, they were unable to proceed.

In fact, up to Bhavagga above, nobody can pass over the place where a Buddha is seated.

Therefore, when they thought of the cause for their such inability to go further, they saw the Buddha and descended to the ground like a thrown up stone falls earth-bound. Having did obeisance to the Buddha, they listened to a discourse and circumambulated the Buddha, and asked for His permission to leave: "Glorious Buddha, we have to attend a meeting of divine ogres." Saying some words in praise of the Three Gems, they headed for the Himavanta, the venue of their meeting.

On seeing the two friends (noble devas), Āḷavaka rose from his place and invited them saying: "Please take your seats here."

The Fury of Āḷavaka The Ogre

The two friends informed Āḷavaka: "Friend Āḷavaka, in your mansion is the Exalted One still sitting. You are so fortunate! Go, friend Āḷavaka, wait upon the Exalted Buddha!"

(To a faithless person, the pious word connected with faith is unbearable, so is the word connected with morality to an immoral one; the word connected with knowledge to an ignorant one; the word connected with generosity to a miser; and the word connected with wisdom to a fool.)

The words of the two friends encouraging faith with reference to the Buddha was unbearable to Āḷavaka who had no faith. Therefore, on hearing words of praise of the Buddha, the faithless Āḷavaka the ogre became furious. His heart crackled with rage like lumps of salt thrown into fire. He asked in anger: "What kind of man is the so-called Exalted Buddha who sat in my mansion?"

Then the two friends (noble devas) said to Āḷavaka; "Friend Āḷavaka, do not you know of our Master, the Exalted One? (He is a very prominent and noble personage.) Even while in the Tusitā abode of devas, He made five investigations (and they related the biography of the Buddha up to his delivery of the Dhammacakka Sutta. They also told the ogre fully of the thirty-two portents that took place at the time when the Bodhisatta was conceived, and so on.) Friend Āḷavaka, have you not seen those marvellous portents?" they asked. Although he had seen them, but he was carried away by anger, Āḷavaka replied, hiding the truth: "No, I have not."

The two devas then became unsatisfied and said: "Whether you have seen them or not, what is the use of your seeing or no seeing? Friend, what are you going to do to our Master, the Exalted Buddha? Compared with Him, (a) you are like a calf that has been born today near a bull with his hump swaying; (b) like a baby elephant that has been born today near a bull elephant in musth with his granular secretion flowing from the three parts, namely, the trunk, the tip of the male organ and the ears; (c) an old ugly fox, near a lion-king who is graceful with his round back and shoulders and with long bright mane; and (d) like a young crow with its broken wings near a garuḷa-bird king with his body of a hundred and fifty yojanas in size. Go and do what is to be done." Being furious, the ogre got up from his seat, and standing firmly with his left foot placed on the flat rock of red orpiment, he shouted: "Is your Master, the Buddha, powerful? Or, is it I, who is powerful? You will see now (who is more powerful)!" So shouting he stamped his right foot on the top of Mount Kelasa that was of sixty yojanas. Then just as fiery particles fall off from the glowing iron that has been excessively heated in the blacksmith's furnace and that is put on the anvil and hammered, even so Mount Kelasa broke up into layers of rock, Standing on the mountain top, the ogre declared roaringly: "I am Ālavaka indeed." The roar overwhelmed the whole Jambudīpa.

Four Great Roars

There have been four great roars which were heard by all Jambūdīpa (1) The roar: "I have won! I have won!", made by the Ogre General, Puṇṇaka, when he beat King Dhanañcaya Korabya in the game of dice as told in the Vidhūra Jātaka; (2) the roar: "I will eat up all wicked monks, wicked nuns, wicked male lay devotees and female lay devotees and unrighteous men," made by Visukamma in the guise of a big black dog under the command of Sakka, the King of Gods, when the dispensation of Buddha Kassapa deteriorated; (3) the roar: "King Kusa, the Sihssara, whose voice is bold and penetrating like that of a lion king, am I!" made by the Bodhisatta Kusa, after going out of the city with Princess Pabhāvātī on the back of his elephant, when the seven kings, desirous of winning the princess's hand in marriage, besieged his city; and (4) the present one: "I am Alavaka indeed!" made by the ogre standing on Mount Kelasa. When those shouts were made it seemed that they appeared before each and every town-gate and village-gate throughout the whole Jambūdīpa.

Because of Alavaka's power, the Himavanta, three thousand yojanas in vastness, trembled.

Thereafter, the ogres attacked the Buddha with the nine kinds of missiles (in the way mentioned in the section on the Vanquishing Vasavaī Devaputta Māra, Chapter 7). Despite his attack with such missiles, Ālavaka was unable to make the Buddha flee. Consequently, he marched towards the Buddha, leading a frightening army composed of four divisions: elephants, horses, chariots and foot-soldiers, and mixed up with various forms of ghosts armed with weapons.

The ghosts made all sorts of guises and threats and, shouting: "Seize him! Kill him!" they appeared as though they were coming overpoweringly from the sky above the Buddha. But they dared not go near to the Buddha, like flies which dare not approach a solid piece of hot glowing iron.

Although they dared not go near, they did not retreat in a short time, unlike Māra and his enormous army turned back immediately after being defeated on the verge of the Bodhisatta's Enlightenment at Mahābodhi tree. Instead, they, Ālavaka and his ghosts, spent half the night doing disturbances.

The Last Attack with The Weapon of White Divine Cloak

Having failed in his attempt to frighten the Buddha by displaying various terrible objects thus for half the night, he conceived an idea: "It were well if I would fling the weapon of white divine cloak that is invincible!"

The Four Great Weapons

There are four most powerful weapons in the world. They are:

- (1) Sakka's weapon of thunderbolt,
- (2) Vessavaṇa's weapon of iron club,
- (3) Yama's weapon of side glance, and
- (4) Ālavaka's weapon of white divine cloak.

Explanation:

- (1) If Sakka, in his fury, were to discharge his weapon of thunderbolt towards Mount Meru, it would pierce the mountain, which is 168,000 yojanas in height, making a hollow right through it, and come out from the bottom.
- (2) Vessavana's weapon of iron club, when hauled by him in anger, as in his earlier days (when he was still a puthujjana), would chop off the heads of thousands of yakkhas and, after returning, would lie in its original position.

- (3) When an angry Yāma, the King of Hell, glances side ways, thousands of kumbhaṇḍas are destroyed making a hissing sound like sesame seeds when thrown into the red-hot iron pan.
- (4) If Ālavaka the ogre, flying into a rage, were to throw up his weapon of white divine cloak into the sky, there would be a drought for twelve years. If it were thrown upon the earth, all the trees and plants and others things would dry up, and the land would be deprived of vegetation for twelve years. If it were thrown into the ocean, all the waters in it would be dried up, like drops of water would in a red-hot pot. A Meru-like mountain, when flung at by it, would fall, breaking up into fragments.

With that idea Ālavaka took off his white divine cloak, so powerful a weapon, and while standing, he was poised to cast it.

At that time, all the devas, most of whom belonging to the ten thousand universes, assembled quickly, for they had decided: “Today the Exalted One will tame the violent ogre, Ālavaka. At that taming place, shall we listen to the Buddha’s Teaching.” Apart from those willing to listen to the Teaching, the devas, who wished to watch the fight, also gathered there. In this way the entire vault of the heaven was full of celestial beings.

Then Ālavaka, rising up and up, around the Buddha and roaming about, hurled his weapon of white divine cloak towards the Buddha. Making a terrible sound in the sky, like the weapon of thunder, and emitting smoke all over and burning with flames, the cloak flew towards the Buddha but on coming near Him, it turned into a foot-towel and dropped at His feet, destroying the ogre’s pride.

On seeing this, Ālavaka became powerless, he felt he had utterly lost his pride like a bull with its horns broken or like a poisonous cobra with its fangs taken out. He then reflected: “The weapon of white cloak has failed to overcome the Monk Gotama. Why?” Then he made a guess: “The Monk Gotama abides with loving-kindness. This must be the reason. Now I will deprive him of loving-kindness through an annoying speech.” So he said:

“O Monk Gotama, without my permission why did you enter my mansion and take the seat amidst female attendants like a householder? Is it not improper for a monk to enjoy what is not given and to mix with females. Therefore, if you abide by the rules of a monk (O Gotama, get out of my mansion at once!)”

(With reference to Ālavaka’s speech, only the essential portion mentioned in the brackets was recited as the text in the Buddhist Councils; the rest is taken fully from the Commentary.)

The Buddha then accepted the ogre’s order and went outside the mansion, giving a very pleasant reply: “Very well, Friend Ālavaka.” (A hostile man cannot be calmed by hostility. That is true! Just a piece of the bear’s gall put into the nostril of a wild furious dog will make it worse, even so a rude ferocious person, when retaliated with rudeness and ferocity, will become more violent. In fact, such a man should be tamed with gentleness. This natural phenomenon, the Buddha understood thoroughly. Hence His mild word and yielding action.)

Then the ogre thought: “Very easy to obey indeed is the Monk Gotama. He went out at my command, given but once. Without a cause I have fought against him for the whole night, the Monk Gotama who is so docile to go out. Ālavaka’s heart began to be softened thus. He continued to ponder: “But I am not certain yet whether His going out was caused by His obedience or by His anger. Now I will make an enquiry.” So he asked the Buddha again: “Get in, Monk Gotama!”

The Buddha, in order to make the ogre’s mind flexible and to feel certain of his docility, said again pleasingly: “Very well, Friend Ālavaka,” and entered the mansion.

In this way, the ogre tested the Buddha by his repeated orders to know for sure whether the latter was really obedient, for the second time and the third he said: “Go in,” and then “Come out”. The Buddha followed the ogre’s orders so that he might become more and more soft-minded. (So great was the Buddha's compassion indeed!) If the Buddha were to disobey the ogre, who was violent by nature, his rough heart would become more and more boisterous and be unable to receive the Dhamma. To cite a worldly simile, just as a little son, naughty and crying, is helped to become good by giving him something that he wants and by doing something that he likes, even so the Buddha (who was the great mother to the three worlds), acted according to his command in order to make Āḷavaka the ogre (the little wild and rough son) who was crying out of anger, which is a mental defilement, docile.

Another simile: just as a wet nurse, with a gift and persuasion, suckles a naughty baby, who refuses to take milk, even so the Buddha (the great wet nurse to the three worlds) followed whatever the ogre had to say, thereby fulfilling the latter's desire by way of persuasion in order to feed the ogre (the naughty baby) on the sweet milk of the supramundane Dhamma.

Still another simile: just as a man, desirous of filling a glass jar with catumadhu (food or medicine containing four ingredients), cleanses the inside of the jar, even so the Buddha, desirous of filling the jar-like heart of the ogre with the catumadhu-like supramundane Dhamma, was to clear the ogre's heart of the dirt-like anger. He therefore obeyed the ogre three times by going out of the mansion and getting into it as He had been ordered by him. (His obedience was not due to fear.)

Thereafter the ogre entertained a wicked desire thus: "The Monk is really docile. When ordered, but once, 'Go in' and He went in; when ordered but once, 'Come out!' and He came out. In this way (ordering Him to go in and to come out) I will make Him weary during the whole night. Having made Him weary thus will I throw Him to the other side of the Ganga by holding His two legs." Accordingly, he asked the Buddha for the fourth time, "Come out, O Monk Gotama!"

Then the Buddha knew the ogre's wicked intention. He also foresaw what the ogre would do if He said something to him: Āḷavaka would think of asking some questions to the Buddha, and that would create a golden opportunity for the Buddha to preach.

Therefore He replied: "I know the vicious plan that is in your mind. So I will not get out. Do whatever you like."

Prior to Āḷavaka's encounter with the Buddha, in former times too, when hermits and wondering ascetics, endowed with higher psychic powers came by air, they visited the mansion out of curiosity to find out whether it was a golden, or a silver, or a ruby one. To these visitors, the ogre put questions. If they were unable to give him the answers, he would do harm by driving them mad or by ripping their hearts, or by throwing them by the legs to the other shore of the Ganga.

The following is how ogres do harm: They make a man mad in two ways: (1) by showing him their horrible looks and (2) by gripping and crushing his heart. Knowing that the first way would not effect madness to hermits and wandering ascetics, Āḷavaka did not employ the first method; instead he reduced his body to a delicate frame by his own supernatural power and entered the persons of these (powerful) ascetics and crumpled their hearts with his grip. Then their mental process could not remain stable and they became out of their senses. He also burst open the hearts of these ascetics who went mad thus. As they could not answer his questions, he would tell them not to come again and would fling them by the two legs to the other side of the Ganga.

So Āḷavaka recalled the questions he had asked on previous occasions and thought: "Now I will ask the Monk Gotama in this manner and, then, if He fails to give me satisfactory answers, I will make Him mad, burst open His heart and fling Him by the legs to beyond the Gaṅgā. Thus will I torment Him." So he said rudely:

"O Great Monk Gotama, I am going to ask You some questions. If You cannot answer them thoroughly I will make You mad, or cause Your heart to burst, or hold You by Your legs and throw You across the river."

(From where did Alavaka's questions come down? Answer: His parents had learnt the questions numbering eight, together with their answers from Buddha Kassapa, whom they worshipped. The parents taught him all the questions and answers when he was young.

(As time went by Ālavaka forgot the answers. He then had the questions put down in orpiment on gold plates, lest they should get lost, and he kept the plates stuck at the entrance of the mansion. In this way, Ālavaka's questions had their source in a Buddha, and they were the ones which only Buddhas could answer as they (belonged to the sphere of Buddhas, Buddhavisaya.)

On hearing the ogre's words, the Buddha wished to show the unique power of Buddhas; unique in the sense that it was not shared by any in the world, for, nobody could do any harm to the four things in Their possession; the gains accrued to Them, Their life, Their Omniscience, and Their physical rays. So the Buddha said:

“Friend ogre, all over the dual worlds, the world of divine beings, such as devas, māras and Brahmās, and the world of human beings, such as monks, brahmins, princes and commoners, I see none who could cause Me madness, (or) who could explode My heart, (or) who could fling Me over the river.”

(After barring the cruel intent of the ogre, the Buddha added in order to make him ask:)

“Friend ogre, in spite of that, you may put whatever questions you like?”

Thus the Buddha extended His invitation, the kind that Omniscient Buddhas adopt.

(Herein there are two kinds of invitation: one made by Omniscient Buddhas and Bodhisattas, and the other made by other individuals. Omniscient Buddhas and Bodhisattas invite questions with full self-confidence: “Ask whatever you like. I will answer your questions, leaving nothing unanswered.” Other individuals do so but with less confidence: “Ask, friend. On hearing your question, I will answer if I know.”)

Alavaka's Questions and The Buddha's Answers

When the Buddha made the kind of invitation usually adopted by Omniscient Buddhas thus, Alavaka put his questions in verse as follows:

Kim su'dha vittaṃ purisassa seṭṭham?
Kim su suciṇṇaṃ sukhaṃ āvahati?
Kim su have sādutaraṃ rasānaṃ?
Kathaṃ jīviṃ jīvitaṃ ahu seṭṭham?

(O Monk, Gotama by clan!) What is the most praiseworthy property of men in this world? What, when practised continuously for days can convey the threefold happiness of devas, humans and Nibbāna? Of all enjoyable tastes, what indeed is by far the best for living beings? How is one's life, the most praiseworthy among living beings, as sweetly declared by numerous men of virtue such as Buddhas and others?

In this manner the first question, “What is the most praiseworthy property of men in this world?” is asked by using the term which is of leading nature. Such a way of speaking is called ukattiha method. Therefore it is to be noted that the term ‘men’ here represents both male and female. The question means “What is the best thing of all men and women?”

By this verse the following four questions are meant:

- (1) What is the best property in the world?
- (2) What, when practised day by day, can lead to the three blissful states of human, divine and Nibbānic?
- (3) What is the sweetest of all tastes?
- (4) By what is living the best?

Then the Buddha, desirous of answering in the same way as Kassapa Buddha did, uttered the following answers in verse:

*Saddh'īdha vittam purissasa setṭham
Dhammo suciṇṇo sukham āvahati.
Saccam have sādutaram rasānam, Paññājīvim jīvitam āhu setṭham.*

(O friend ogre by the peculiar name of Ālavaka!) In this world the most praiseworthy property of every man and woman is faith (saddhā), mundane as well as supramundane.

The ten wholesome acts or the three good works of charity, morality and meditation, which practised day and night continuously, can convey the threefold bliss (sukha) of devas, humans and Nibbāna.

Of all enjoyable tastes, the truth (sacca) significant of Nibbāna, which is the reality in its ultimate sense (paramattha-sacca) or the truthful speech of oral auspiciousness (vaci-māṅgata) achieved by refraining from falsehood (virati-sacca) indeed is by far the best for all beings.

Men of virtue, such as Buddhas and others, declare that the life of a being who lives, following the right course of conduct continuously, is the most praiseworthy.

[1] Herein the meaning, at moderate length should be taken thus: Just as various mundane properties, such as gold, silver, etc., though their usefulness bring about both physical happiness (kāyika-sukha) and mental happiness (cetasika-sukha), just as they prevent one from thirst, hunger and other forms of suffering, just as they effect the cessation of poverty, just as they form the cause for gaining pearls, rubies, etc., just as they attract admiration (the state of one's being admired) from others, even so, the two kinds of faith (saddhā), mundane and supra-mundane, bring about both secular happiness and spiritual happiness; even so, faith being the leading virtue of those who take the right course of conduct, prevents one from suffering in samsāra, such as rebirth, old age, and so on; even so, it effects the cessation of poverty of virtues; even so it forms the cause for winning the Dhamma-Jewel such as the seven Constituents of Wisdom (Bojjhaṅga) which are Sati-sambojjhanga and others.

*Saddho sīlena sampanno, yaso bhogasamappito,
Yam yaṃ padesaṃ bhajati, tattha tatth'eva pūjito.*

(He who possesses faith (saddhā), and morality (sīla), who also has retinue and wealth is honoured wherever he goes. As the Buddha preaches thus (in the story of Cittaḡahapati, 21 Pakinnaka-vagga of the Dhammapada), a faithful individual is honoured (or praised) by all human and divine beings. Therefore, the two kinds of faiths, mundane and supramundane, are said by the Buddha to be one's property.

(This property of faith is the cause of the threefold unique happiness of devas, humans and Nibbāna. Moreover, it is the cause of gaining such secular treasures as gold, silver and the like. This is true: Only he who is faithful and performs alms-giving can acquire secular treasures. The property of one without faith is just fruitless. Therefore, the property of faith is said to be the most praiseworthy possession.)

(2) When the ten wholesome works (alternately, the three acts of charity (dāna), morality (sīla) and meditation (bhāvanā) are performed day after day, they bring human happiness to the performer, as they did to Sona, Ratthapala and other sons of wealthy persons; they bring divine happiness to the performer, as they did to Sakka, King of Devas, and others; they bring the bliss of Nibbāna to him as they did bring to Prince Mahāpaduma and others.

(3) Something to be licked and enjoyed is called taste. Various tastes, such as the taste of roots, the taste of stems, etc., and the other parts of a plant contribute to the development of one's body. (But) they can convey only secular happiness. The taste of the truth caused by refraining from falsehood (virati-sacca) and that of the verbal truth (vacī-sacca) contribute to one's mental development through tranquillity (samatha), and (vipassanā) meditation and other meditative practices. They lead to spiritual happiness. Arahatsip called Vimutti-rasa, the taste of Emancipation, as developed through the taste of the Nibbānic Peace, the Truth in its ultimate sense (paramattha-sacca), is sweet and delicious. Therefore, these three tastes of Paramattha-sacca, virati-sacca and vacī-sacca are the best of all tastes.

(4) An individual, who lacks both eyes, namely, the eye of intelligence in mundane development and the eye of intelligence in supra-mundane development, is called Andha-puggala (an individual whose both eyes are blind). One having only the eye of intelligence in mundane development and lacks the eye of intelligence in the Dhamma, is called Eka-cakkhu (one eyed), one who has both eyes of intelligence is designated Dvi-cakkhu-puggala (an individual whose both eyes see).

Of these three kinds of individuals, a two-eyed lay devotee lives by doing his domestic task, by taking refuge in the Triple Gem, by keeping the precepts, by fasting and by fulfilling other human social duties only through wisdom. A monk lives by accomplishing his ascetic undertakings, such as sīla-visuddhi, (purification of morality), citta-visuddhi (purification of mind) and others, through wisdom. "Only the life of one who abides by wisdom is praiseworthy", the Noble Ones, such as Buddhas, etc., declared. (They do not say that the life of one who lives just by respiration is praiseworthy.) Thus should the meaning at moderate length be noted.]

On hearing the Buddha's answer to his four questions, Ālavaka the ogre became very glad, and being desirous of asking the remaining four, he uttered the following verses:

*Katham su tarati ogham, katham su tarati aṇṇavam.
Katham su dukkham acceti, katham su parisujjhati.*

(Exalted Buddha) how, or by what does one cross over the four rough whirlpools? How, or by what does one cross over the ocean of saṃsāra? How or by what does one overcome the round of suffering? How or by what does one cleanse oneself of mental impurities?

When the ogre had questioned thus, the Buddha uttered the following verse as He wished to answer as before:

*Saddhāya tarati ogham, appamādena aṇṇavam.
Viriyena dukkham acceti, Paññāya parisujjhati.*

(Herein, he, who crosses over the four whirlpools, can also cross over the ocean of saṃsāra, can overcome the round of suffering and be aloof from moral impurities; but (1) he who lacks saddhā, as he does not believe in the worthy practice of crossing over the four whirlpools, cannot engage in meditation which is crossing. Therefore, he cannot go beyond them. (2) He who neglects by indulging in five sensual pleasures, as he holds fast to these very pleasures, cannot get beyond the ocean of saṃsāra. (3) He who is not energetic but indolent, by mixing himself with unwholesome things, lives miserably. (4) A fool, as he does not know the good path of practise leading to the purification of moral impurities, cannot be away from such mental defilements. Hence the Buddha's answer revealing saddhā as opposed to asaddhiya (faithlessness), appamāda as opposed to pamāda (negligence), vīriya as opposed to kosajja (indolence) and paññā as opposed to moha (ignorance).

Again in this answering verse of four-feet; faith or the faculty of saddhā is the fundamental cause of the four factors of the streams-winning (sotāpattiyaṅga), namely, (a) sappurisa-saṁseva, association with the virtuous, (b) saddhamma-savana, listening to the law of the virtuous, (c) yoniso-manasikara, proper contemplation, and (d) dhammānudhamma-paṭipatti, engagement in Tranquillity and Insight meditation in accordance with the ninefold supra-mundane Dhamma. Only the possession of saddhā leads to the development of the four factors of the stream-winning factors, and only the development of these four factors leads to sotāpatti, the winning of the stream. Hence by the first answer in the verse reading “Saddhaya tarati ogham — By faith one crosses over the four whirlpools of rough waters”, the sotāpatti-magga, which is the crossing over of ditth'ogha, the whirlpool of wrong beliefs, as well as the noble sotāpanna, the Stream-Winner, are meant.

(The noble sotāpanna, as he has diligence, equivalent to the repeated acts of merit, accomplishes the second Path and is to be reborn but once in the human world; he crosses over the ocean of saṁsāra, (the feat which has not been performed yet by sotāpatti-magga) and which has its source in bhav'ogha, the whirlpool of becoming. Hence by the second answer in the verse reading “appamādena annavam — by diligence one crosses over the ocean of saṁsāra”, the sakadāgāmi-magga, which is the crossing over of bhav'ogha, the whirlpool of becoming, as well as the noble individual sakadāgāmin, the Once-Returner, are meant.

(The noble sakadāgāmin accomplishes the third Path by energy and overcomes the lust-related suffering, which has its source in kāmo'ogha, the whirlpool of sensual pleasures, (the feat which has not been performed yet by sakadāgāmi-magga). Hence the third answer in the verse reading “viriyena dukkham acceti — by energy one overcomes the round of suffering”, the anāgāmi-magga, which is the crossing over of kāmo'ogha, the whirlpool of sensual pleasures, as well as the noble individual anāgāmin the Never-Returner, are meant.

(The noble anāgāmin, as he is free from the mire of sensuality, accomplishes the fourth Path through the pristine pure Insight Wisdom and abandons the extreme impurities of avijjā (ignorance), (which has not been eradicated yet by anāgāmi-magga). Hence the fourth answer in the verse reading “paññāya parisujjhati — by wisdom one cleanses oneself of mental impurities”, the arahatta-magga, the crossing over of avijj'ogha, the whirlpool of ignorance, as well as the arahat are meant.)

At the end of the verse, in answer that was taught with arahatship as its apex, was Āḷavaka, the ogre, being established in the fruition of sotāpatti.

Āḷavaka's Further Questions after His Attainment of Sotāpatti

Now that Āḷavaka, the ogre, had been impressed by the word Paññā (wisdom), that is contained in the fourth answer of the verse, “paññāya parisujjhati — By wisdom is one cleansed of one's mental impurities”, uttered by the Buddha, he (as he was typically a noble sotāpanna), became desirous of asking further questions, a mixture of mundane and supra-mundane problems, by his intelligence and uttered the following six lines:

Katham su labhate paññāmaṃ ?
Katham su vindate dhanam?
Katham su kittim pappoti?
Katham mittāni ganthati?
Asmā lokā param lokam
katham pecca na socati?

(Exalted Buddha!) How is the twofold wisdom, mundane and supramundane, gained? How is the twofold wealth, mundane and supra-mundane, attained? How is fame achieved? How are friends associated? By what, one does not grieve on passing away from this world to the next?

(By this verse Alavaka) the ogre meant to ask on the problems concerning these five:

- (1) The means to get wisdom,
- (2) The means to get wealth,
- (3) The means to get fame,
- (4) The means to get friends, and
- (5) The means to get away from sorrow in the next life.

(Being desirous of teaching Ālavaka properly that there were four things contributing to the acquisition of the twofold wisdom, mundane and supra-mundane, (being desirous of answering the first question), the Buddha delivered the following verse:

*Saddahāno arahataṃ, dhammaṃ nibbānapattiyā;
sussūsāṃ labhate paññāṃ, appamatto vicakkaṇaṃ.*

(Friend by the peculiar name of Alavaka!) He who has deep faith in the ten wholesome acts and the thirty-seven constituents of Enlightenment that contribute to the attainment of Nibbāna taught by Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and arahats; who respectfully pays attention to the wise; who is mindful and earnest; and who reflects thoroughly on the two speeches, one well-spoken (subhāsita) and the other ill-spoken (asubhāsita), acquires the twofold wisdom, mundane and supra-mundane.

(By this answer the Buddha meant to say that:

- (1) saddhā, faith,
- (2) sussūsā, attention,
- (3) appamāda, mindfulness, and
- (4) vicakkaṇā, reflection are the means to have wisdom.

(To make the meaning more explicit: Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and arahats realize Nibbāna through the ten wholesome acts at the beginning and through the thirty-seven constituents of Enlightenment later on. Therefore, these ten wholesome acts and the thirty-seven constituents of Enlightenment are to be designated as the means to Nibbāna. Only he, who has profound faith (saddhā), can possess both mundane and supra-mundane wisdom.

(The possession of wisdom, however, is not possible just by faith. Only when the faithful individual develops sussūsā by approaching the wise, serving them, by listening to their pious words, can he win these two kinds of wisdom. (That is to say, having faith that leads to Nibbāna, he must go to his preceptor (upajjhāya) and fulfil his duties towards them. When the preceptor, being pleased with his fulfilment of duties, teach him, he must listen carefully. His approach to his preceptors, his service towards him, his listening to his word — all these briefly make up the term sussūsā, respectful obedience. Only one who possesses sussūsā, can realize mundane wisdom as well as supra-mundane.

(Only when the faithful and respectful listener further develops, appamāda (mindfulness), and vicakkaṇā, (reflection) on subhāsita (well-spoken speech), and, dubbhāsita, (ill-spoken speech), can he realize the twofold wisdom. He, who lacks these four, viz., saddhā, sussūsā, appamāda and vicakkaṇā, cannot.

(With regard to the interrelation between these four and the supra-mundane wisdom, (1) by saddhā, a man takes up the practice which lead to wisdom; (2) by sussūsā, he listens respectfully to the Dhamma which lead to paññā; (3) by appamāda, he does not forget what he has learnt; (4) by vicakkaṇā, he considers deeply what he has learnt so that it may remain intact and without distortion and widens one's knowledge and wisdom. Or (2) by sussūsā, a man respectfully listens to the Dhamma which lead to wisdom; (3) by appamāda, he bears in mind what he has learnt so that it may not be forgotten, (4) by vicakkaṇā, one ponders the profound significance of what he has borne in mind. The repeated practice of these four brings to one the ultimate reality of Nibbāna by causing arahatship. In this manner, the development of the supra-mundane wisdom of the Path and that of the Fruition is to be noted.)

After answering the first question thus, did the Exalted One, being desirous of answering now the second, third and fourth questions, uttered the following verse:

Patirūpa-kārī dhuravā, utṭhātā vindate dhanam;
saccaena kittim pappoti, dadam mittāni ganthati.

(Friend ogre by the peculiar name of Alavaka!) He, who performs these two things leading to both worldly and spiritual wealth in harmony with the place and time; who, by mental energy, does not abandon his duty, and who is physically energetic as well, certainly occupies the two-fold wealth (By the first half of the verse does the Buddha answer that the two-fold wealth can be attained through three factors: following the practice in harmony with the place and time, leading to wealth, having mental energy and having physical energy.) By auspicious truthful speech does one attain good reputation that "This man is the speaker of truth", [or] by the attainment of ultimate reality of Nibbāna does he reach fame, people would say: "He is a Buddha," "He is a Paccekabuddha," or "He is a noble disciple of the Buddha." (By this third foot of the verse, the third question is answered.) He who without stinginess but wholeheartedly gives somebody what he or she wants, makes friends. (By this fourth foot, the fourth question is answered.)

(Herein, the way the worldly wealth is attained through suitable practice, mental energy and physical energy may be noted from the (well-known) Cūḷa-seṭṭhi Jātaka which tells of a man who becomes rich having two hundred thousand within four months by making a dead rat as his capital.

(With reference to the attainment of spiritual wealth, it should be understood from the story of Mahā Tissa Thera. Explanation: The aged elder Mahā Tissa of Ceylon, once, decided to live only by the three postures of sitting, standing and walking, and he actually did so, fulfilling his duties. Whenever he felt slothful and drowsy, he soaked a head-pad made of straw [normally used as a cushion to things carried on the head] with water, put it on his head and went into the water of throat-depth to remove his sloth and drowsiness (thina-middha). After twelve years, he attained arahatship)

Having answered thus the first four questions in the way in which the worldly and spiritual things for the lay man and the monk are mixed, the Buddha now wished to answer the fifth question. Accordingly He uttered the following verse:

Yass'ete caturo dhammā, saddhassa gharam esino.
Saccam dhammo dhīti cāgo, sa ve pecca n socati.

He who is faithful and seeking the benefit of one's home, in whom exist four things, namely, sacca (truthfulness), dhamma (wisdom), dhīti (physical and mental energy), cāga (generosity), indeed does not worry on his departure to the next existence.

After answering the fifth question thus, the Buddha wished to urge the ogre, Alavaka, and uttered this verse:

*Īṅha aññe 'pi pucchassu, puthū samāna brāhmaṇe.
Yadi saccā damā cāgā, khantīyā bhīyyo'dha vijjati.*

(Friend ogre by the peculiar name of Āḷavaka!) In this world, if there were any virtue better than sacca (the twofold truthfulness) for the attainment of good reputation, if there were any virtue that is better than dāma (taming) through prudence which is part of wise obedience for the attainment of worldly and spiritual wisdom, if there were any virtue that is better than cāga (giving) for the making of friends, if there is any virtue better than forbearance (khantī) in the form of physical and mental energy for the making of worldly and spiritual wealth, if there is any virtue better than these four, namely, sacca, dāma, cāga and khantī, for the elimination of grief hereafter, or if you think there were any virtues better than these, I pray you, for your satisfaction ask many others, those monks and brahmins, such as Purāṇa Kassapa, etc., who falsely claim that they are Omniscient Buddhas.

When the Buddha uttered thus, the ogre Āḷavaka said to the Buddha in verse, the first half of which explains that He had already removed his doubt (through his attainment of the Path Knowledge), the doubt as to whether he should ask Purāṇa Kassapa etc. and the second half explains the reason for his having no intention to ask:

puthū samana-brāhmaṇe.
Yo'ham ajja pajānāmi, yo attho samparāyiko.*

(Exalted Buddha!) Now that I (Your disciple, Āḷavaka by name,) have cut off all doubts by means of the sword of the sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa, why should I ask many monks and brahmins who unrighteously claim that they are Omniscient Buddhas. (Indeed I should not ask them as I have been free from that endangering defilement of doubt, vicikicchā.) As You have instructed me, I, who is Your disciple, Āḷavaka by name, come to know personally and clearly, on this day, all that instruction of Yours, regarding the attainment of wisdom, the attainment of wealth, the attainment of fame and the making of friends, and regarding the virtues that lead not to grief hereafter. (Therefore, I need not ask other persons for my satisfaction.)

Now the ogre Āḷavaka uttered again the following verse in the order to show that the knowledge he had acquired had its source in the Buddha:

*Atthāya vata me Buddho vāsāy'ālavim āgāmā.
Yo'haṃ ajja pajānāmi, yattha dinnam Mahāppahalam.*

The Exalted One, Lord of the world and Omniscient Buddha, has out of compassion come to the city of Alavi to spend the whole vassa period for the development of my, worldly and spiritual welfare. The gift faithfully given by the Omniscient Buddha is of great fruits ranging from the bliss of devas and humans to the bliss of Nibbāna. That Omniscient Buddha, who deserves the best gift, I have come to know now thoroughly.

Having told in verse that he had now acquired the means to develop his welfare, Alavaka now uttered again this verse in order to express his wish properly to do for the welfare of others:

So aham vicrissāmi,

*gāmā gāmam purā puram.
Namassamāno sambuddham, Dhammassa ca sudhammatam.*

(Exalted Buddha whose sun of glory shines bright,) That I, your disciple Āḷavaka, (from today onwards the day I met with the Master,) with my joined hands raised to my head in adoration, will wander from one celestial abode to another, from one celestial city to another, proclaiming aloud the countless attributes of the Buddha, the Chief of the three worlds, and the attribute of the Dhamma of the ten constituents, namely, the (four) maggas, the (four) phalas, Nibbāna and the entire collection of your Teachings, containing the good means of emancipation from the round of suffering (and the attributes of the Sangha, the eight classes of its members, the Noble Ones who carefully follow the various admirable practices of the threefold Training).

It was the time when the following four events simultaneously took place:

- (1) The end of Āḷavaka's verse;
- (2) The coming of the daybreak;
- (3) The reception of Āḷavaka's verse with wild acclaim; and
- (4) The sending of Prince Āḷavaka by his royal servants to the ogre's mansion.

When the king's men [from the city of Āḷavī] heard the tumultuous acclaim, they thought to themselves: "Such a roar could not have occurred about any personages other than the Exalted One. Could it be that the Exalted One has come?" On seeing the body-rays from the Buddha, they no longer remained outside the mansion but entered it without fear. There, in the ogre's mansion, did they encounter the Buddha seated and the ogre Āḷavaka standing with his joined hands in adoration.

After seeing thus, the king's men bravely handed the little Prince Āḷavaka over to the Ogre Āḷavaka, saying: "O Great Ogre, we have brought this Prince Āḷavaka to give you in sacrifice. Now you may bite him or eat him if you wish. Do as you please." As Āḷavaka had already become a noble sotāpanna at that time and (especially) as he was told to be so in front of the Buddha, he felt greatly ashamed.

Then Āḷavaka tenderly took over the little prince with his two hands and offered him to the Buddha, saying:

"Exalted Buddha, I offer this royal child to you. I give you the boy in charity. Buddhas are kind and protective to the sentient beings for their welfare. Exalted Buddha, please receive him, this Prince Āḷavaka, for his welfare and happiness."

He also uttered this verse:

*Imam kumāram satapuññalakkhaṇam.
sabba'ṅgupetaṃ paripuṇṇavyañjanam.
Udaggtcitto sumano dadāmi te paṭiggaha lokahitāya cakkhuma.*

Exalted Buddha of the fivefold eye! Being elated and happy, I, (Āḷavaka by name,) faithfully give you the prince named Āḷavaka, who possesses more than a hundred marks owing to his past meritorious deeds, who also has all big and small limbs and a developed physical appearance. Buddhas look after the sentient beings for their benefits. Kindly accept the prince for his own welfare.

The Buddha accepted the little Prince Āḷavaka with his hands. While He was thus accepting, in order to give His blessing for the benefit of long life and good health of the ogre and the prince, the Buddha uttered [three] verses, each omitting a foot (to be filled up by somebody else). That blank in each verse was filled up three times as the fourth foot by the ogre in order to establish the little prince in the Three Refuges. The incomplete verses which were uttered by the Buddha and completed by the ogre are as follows:

- (1) Buddha: *Dīghāyuko hotu ayaṃ kumāro, tuvañ ca yakkha sukhito bhavāhi.
Avyādhitā lokahitāya tiṭṭhatha,*
Yakkha: ayaṃ kumāro saraṇam upeti Buddham.
- (2) Buddha: *Dīghāyuko horn ayaṃ kumāro

- (1) Buddha: May this Prince Āḷavaka live long! Ogre Āḷavaka, may you also have physical and mental happiness! May you both remain long, being free from the ninety-six diseases, for the welfare of many!
Yakkha: (Exalted Buddha!) This Prince Āḷavaka takes refuge in the Exalted One, Lord of the world, and Omniscient Buddha.
- (2) Buddha: May this Prince Āḷavaka live long! Ogre Āḷavaka, may you also have physical and mental happiness! May you both remain long, being free from the ninety-six diseases, for the welfare of many!
Yakkha: (Exalted Buddha!) This Prince Āḷavaka takes refuge in the Dhamma consisting of the ten features, such as the four Paths, four Fruitions, Nibbāna and the entire body of Teaching.
- (3) Buddha: May this Prince Āḷavaka live long! Ogre Āḷavaka, may you also have physical and mental happiness! May you both remain long, being free from the ninety-six diseases, for the welfare of many!
Yakkha: (Exalted Buddha!) This Prince Āḷavaka takes refuge in the Sangha of the Noble Ones in the ultimate sense of the word (Paramattha Ariya).

Then the Buddha entrusted the little prince to the king's officers, ordering: "Bring up this royal child and return him to me!"

Naming of The Prince: Hatthaka Āḷavaka

The original name of the prince was Āḷavaka. As has been said, the day the ogre was tamed, the prince was passed from the hands of the royal officers to the ogre's hands, from the ogre's hands to the Buddha's hands, from the Buddha's hands back to the hands of the officers. Hence he was named Hatthaka-Āḷavaka (or Hatthakā-Āḷavaka — Āḷavaka who has been handed from person to person).

When the officers returned, carrying the little prince, they were seen by farmers and foresters and other people, who asked timidly: "How is it? Is it that the ogre does not want to devour the prince because he is too small?" "Friends, do not be afraid," replied the officers, "The Exalted One has made him free from danger," and they related the whole story to them.

Then the entire city of Āḷavī cheered, shouting: "Sādhu! Sādhu!". The people happened to have faced in the direction where the ogre Āḷavaka was in just one roaring: "The Exalted One has caused safety! The Exalted One has caused safety!" When it was time for the Buddha to go to town for alms-food, the ogre went along, carrying the Buddha's bowl and robe, half the way down to see Buddha off, he returned to his mansion.

Mass Conversion (Dhammābhisamaya)

After the Buddha went on alms-round in the city of Āḷavī and when He had finished His meal, He sat on the splendid seat which was prepared under a tree in quietude at the city gate. Then came King Āḷavaka with his hosts of ministers, troops and were joined by the citizens of Āḷavi who did obeisance to the Buddha and sat down around him and asked: “Exalted Buddha, how could you tame such a wild and cruel ogre?”

The Buddha then delivered the aforesaid Āḷavaka Sutta in twelve verses in which He started His narration with the attack made by the ogre and went on relating in detail: “In this manner did he rain nine kinds of weapons, in this manner did he exhibit horrible things, in this manner did he put questions to me, in this manner did I answer his questions.” By the end of the discourse eighty-four thousand sentient beings realized the Four Truths and found emancipation.

Regular Offerings made to The Ogre

Now King Āḷavaka and the citizens of Āḷavi built a shrine for the ogre Āḷavaka, near the (original) shrine of Vessavana Deva King. And they regularly made to the ogre, offerings worthy of divine beings (devatabali) such as flowers, perfumes, etc.

When the little prince grew up into an intelligent youth, they sent him to the Buddha with these words: “You, Prince, have secured a new lease of life because of the Exalted One. Go and serve the Master. Serve the Order of Monks as well!” The Prince approached the Buddha and the monks and rendered his service to them, practised the Dhamma and was established in the anāgāmi-phala. He also learned all the teachings of the Three Piṭakas and acquired the retinue of five hundred lay devotees of the Buddha. At a later time the Buddha held a convocation where the devout lay man and Anāgāmin Prince Hathaway Lavaca was placed foremost among those who lavishly showered upon their audience the four Sangha-vatthus.

THE BUDDHA'S SEVENTEENTH VASSA AT VEĻUVANA.

After taming and converting the ogre Ālavaka while observing the sixteenth vassa at Ālavī city, the Buddha exhorted and taught those beings who were worthy of His Teaching. When the vassa came to an end, He journeyed from the city of Ālavī and reached the city of Rājagaha eventually and He stayed at the Veļuvana monastery of the city to keep the seventeenth vassa.

Story of Sirimā The Courtesan

Here a brief account of Sirimā the courtesan which should be known in advance: Merchants of Rājagaha who belonged to a trading guild, having personally witnessed the splendour of the city of Vesālī, which was due to the courtesan Ambapālī, told King Bimbisāra on their return to Rājagaha that a courtesan should be kept in their city too. When the King granted permission to do so, they appointed a very pretty woman, Sālavatī by name, courtesan with appropriate ceremonial emblems and duly recognized by the King. A fee of a hundred coins was charged for those who wanted to enjoy her company for one night.

When the courtesan first gave birth to a son, the infant was abandoned on a road but was picked up, adopted and named Jivaka by Prince Abhaya. On coming of age, he went to Takkaṣila and studied medicine under a prominent teacher till he became accomplished in it. He was, in fact, to be famous as physician Jivaka, and his name is well-known even today.

Sālavatī's second child was a daughter. As a daughter could follow her mother's occupation as a courtesan, she was not abandoned (unlike in Jivaka's case) but nurtured well. The name Sirimā was given to her. On her mother's death, Sirimā succeeded her and was recognized as courtesan by the King. Those, who wished to seek pleasure with her for one night, had to pay a thousand coins. This is a brief account of the courtesan Siramā.

The Buddha's Discourse in Connection with Sirimā

While the Buddha was keeping the seventeenth vassa at Veļuvana in Rājagaha, Sirimā was a lady of great beauty. What was peculiar about her was this: During one rainy season, she did something wrong against the Buddha's female lay devotee (upāsikā) Uttarā, who was daughter-in-law of the wealthy merchant, Puṇṇa, and who was a noble sotāpanna. In order to beg Uttarā's pardon, she confessed to the Buddha who had finished His meal together with members of the Sangha at Uttarā's house. One that very day, after listening to the Buddha's discourse, given in appreciation of the meal, she attained sotāpatti-phala when the verse beginning with “Akkodhena jine kodham” uttered by the Buddha came to a close. (This is just an abridgment. A detailed account will be given when we come to the section on Nandamātā Uttarā Upāsikā in the chronicle of female lay devotees, in the Chapter on Sangha-Ratana.)

The day after her attainment of sotāpatti-phala, the courtesan Sirimā invited the Order of Bhikkhus with the Buddha at its head and performed alms-giving on a grand scale. From that day onwards, she undertook permanent (nibaddha) giving of alms-food to a group of the eight bhikkhus. Beginning from the first day of her invitation the eight bhikkhus went in their turn to Sirimā's place constantly for food. Saying respectfully: “Please accept butter, Venerable Sirs! Please accept milk, Venerable Sirs!” Sirimā offered by putting her supplies to the brim of the bowls of the eight monks who came as it was their turn. The food received by a monk (from Sirimā's house) was sufficient for three or four. Sirimā spent sixteen coins each day for offering food.

One day, one of the eight monks went to Sirimā's place as it was his turn, had his meal there and went to another monastery that was more than three yojanas away from Rājagaha. One evening, while the visiting monk was sitting at the place reserved for waiting upon, the Mahāthera of the monastery, his fellow monks, asked him in their speech of welcome (paṭisandhāra): “Friend, where did you have your meal and come over here?” The visiting monk replied: “Friends, I came after having the meal which is the permanent offering made to eight monks by Sirimā.” Again the monks inquired: “Friend, did Sirimā make her offering attractive and give it to you?” “Friend, I am not able to praise her food fully. She offered the food to us after preparing it in the best possible manner. The food received by one from her is sufficient for three or four to enjoy. It is particularly fortunate for one to see her beauty rather than to see her offering. That woman, Sirimā, is indeed one endowed with such and such signs of beauty and fairness of limbs, big and small?” Thus the visiting monk replied, extolling Sirimā’s qualities.

Then one of the monks, after hearing the words in praise of Sirima's qualities, fell in love with her, even without actual seeing. Thinking: “I should go and see her,” he told the visiting monk his years of standing as a bhikkhu and asked about the order of monks (who were presently due to be at Sirimā’s house). “Friend,” replied the visiting monk, “if you go now you will be one of those at Sirimā’s place tomorrow and receive the aṭṭhaka-bhatta (the food for the eight).” Hearing the reply, the monk set out at that very moment, taking his bowl and robe. (Though he could not reach Rājagaha that night, he made great effort to continue his journey.) And he arrived in Rājagaha at dawn. When he entered the lot-drawing booth and stood there, the lot came to him, and he joined the group to receive the aṭṭhaka-bhatta at Sirimā’s residence.

But Sirimā had been inflicted with a fatal disease since the previous day when the former monk left after having Sirimā’s meal. Therefore she had to take off her ornaments that she usually put on and lay down on her couch. As her female servants saw the eight monks coming according to their lot, they reported to Sirimā. But she was unable to give seats and treat them personally by taking the bowls with her own hands (as in the previous days). So she asked her maids, while lying: “Take the bowls from the monks, women. Give them seats and offer the rice-gruel first. Then offer cakes and, when meal time comes fill the bowls with food and give them to the monks.”

“Yes, madam,” said the servants, and after ushering the monks into the house, they gave them rice-gruel first. Then they offered cakes. At meal time, they made the bowls full with cooked rice and other foods. When they told her of what they had done, Sirimā said to them: “Women, carry me to the Venerable Ones; I would like to pay my respect to them.” When they carried her to the monks, she did obeisance to the monks respectfully with her body trembling as she could not remain steady.

The monk, who had become amorous with Sirimā without seeing her previously, now gazed upon her and thought: “This Sirimā looks still beautiful despite her illness. How great her glamour would have been when she was in good health and adorned with all ornaments.” Then there arose in his person wild lustful passions as though they had accumulated for many crores of years. The monk became unconscious of anything else and could not eat his meal. Taking the bowl, he went back to the monastery, covered the bowl and put it at a place. Then he spread out a robe on which he lay down with his body kept straight. No companion monk could request him to eat. He starved himself by entirely cutting off the food.

That evening Sirimā died. King Bimbisāra had the news sent to the Buddha, saying: “Exalted Buddha! Sirimā, the younger sister of the physician Jivaka is dead.” On hearing the news the Buddha had his message sent back to the King, asking him: “Do not cremate the remains of Sirimā yet. Place her body on its back at the cemetery and guarded it against crows, dogs, foxes, etc.” The King did as he was instructed by the Buddha.

In this way, three days had passed and on the fourth day, Sirimā’s body became swollen. Worms came out profusely from the nine openings of the body. The entire frame burst out and was bloated like a boiling-pot. King Bimbisāra sent the drummers all over the city of Rājagaha to announce his orders: “All citizens, except children, who are to look after their houses, must come to the cemetery to watch the remains of Sirimā. Those who fail to do so will be punished with a fine of eight coins each.” He also sent an invitation to the Buddha to come and observe Sirimā's body.

The Buddha then asked the monks: “Let us go and see Sirimā's body!” The young passionate monk followed no advice of others but starved himself, lying. The food (kept in the bowl four days ago) had now gone stale. The bowl also had become filthy. Then a friendly monk told the young bhikkhu: “Friend, the Buddha is about to go and see Sirimā's body.” Though he was oppressed by hunger severely, the crazy young monk got up as soon as he heard the name Sirimā. “What do you say, friend?” he asked. When the friend replied: “The Buddha, friend, is going to see Sirimā. Are you coming along?” Answering: “Yes, I am,” he threw away the stale food, washed the bowl, put it in the bag and went along with other monks.

Surrounded by monks, the Buddha stood on one side at the cemetery. There were also groups of nuns (bhikkhunīs), members of the royalty, male and female lay devotees, standing on other sides. When all had gathered, the Buddha asked the King: “Great King, who was this woman?” “Exalted Buddha, she was a young woman named Sirimā, sister of the physician Jīvaka,” answered the King. “Was she Sirimā, Great King?” the Buddha asked again. When the King affirmed, the Buddha said:

“Great King, in that case (if she was Jīvaka's sister) have the announcement made by beating the drum that ‘those who desire Sirimā may take her on the payment of a thousand coins.’”

The King did as instructed by the Buddha. But there was no one who would say even ‘hey!’ or ‘ho!’ When the King informed the Buddha that “Nobody would like to take her,” the Buddha said: “Great King, if there is none to take her for a thousand coins, reduce the price,” the King then had it announced that those who would like to take her by paying five hundred. Again none was found desirous of taking her by paying that amount of money. Again the price was reduced to two hundred and fifty, two hundred, one hundred, fifty, twenty-five, five, one coin, half a coin, one fourth of a coin, one sixteenth of a coin, just a gunja seed. But nobody came out to take her body. Finally it was announced that the body might be taken free, without making any payment at all. Still no one muttered even ‘hey!’ or ‘ho!’

The King reported the matter to the Buddha, saying: “Exalted Buddha, there does not exist a single person who would take it free of charge!” The Buddha then sermonized as follows:

“You monks, my dear sons! Behold this woman (Sirimā) who had been dear to many. Formerly in this city of Rājagaha one could seek pleasure with her by paying as much as a thousand coins. Now nobody would like to take her by paying nothing at all! The beauty that was so highly valued has now come to destruction. Monk, through your eye of wisdom observe this physical frame that is always intolerably painful!”

Then the Buddha uttered the following verse:

*Passa cittakatam bimbam, arukāyam samussitam
Āturam bahusankappam, yassa n'atthi dhuvam ħiti.*

(O my dear sons, monks!) There is no such a thing as nature of firmness or of steadfastness in this body frame, not even the slightest bit. The body frame which is made pleasant and exquisite with dress and ornaments, flowers and perfumes and other forms of cosmetics; which is composed of limbs big and small, beautiful and proportionate, giving a false impression of splendour, which can stand upright because of its three hundred bones; which is constantly painful and intolerable; which is wrongly thought by many blind worldlings to be pleasant, befitting and fortunate as they know no truth and have no intelligence, and which is unpleasant as the whole thing is disgustingly full of loathsomeness, trickling down from the sore-like nine openings. With your penetrating eye, have a look at such a body, studying repeatedly!

By the end of the discourse, eighty-four thousand beings realized the Four Truths and attained emancipation. The young monk who had loved Sirimā became established in sotāpatti-phala.

(The above account is extracted from the Story of Sirimā, Jarā-Vagga, Second Volume of the Dhammapada Commentary.)

(In connection with the story of Sirimā, the account contained in the Vijaya Sutta, Uraga Vagga of the first volume of the Sutta Nipāta Commentary, will be reproduced as follows, for it has so much appeal.)

While the young monk was starving himself, Sirimā died and was reborn as Chief Queen to Suyāma Deva of Yāma celestial abode. The Buddha, in the company of monks, took the young psychopathic monk and went to watch the remains of Sirimā that was not cremated yet but kept by King Bimbisāra (under the Buddha's instructions) at the cemetery where dead bodies were thrown away. Similarly, the citizens as well as the King himself were present there.

There, at the cemetery, the people talked among themselves: "Friends, in the past it was hard to get your turn to see and enjoy her even by paying a thousand coins. But now no person would like to do so even for a guñja seed."

The celestial Queen Sirimā accompanied by five hundred divine chariots came to the cemetery. To the monks and lay people who had assembled there at the cemetery, the Buddha delivered the Vijaya Sutta and to the young monk He uttered in His exhortation the verse beginning with "Passa cittakatam bimbam" as preserved in the Dhammapada.

The Vijaya Sutta and Its Translation

(1) *Caram vā yadi vā liṭṭham, nissinno vā sayam
samiñjati pasāreti, esā kāyassa iñjanā.*

Walking or standing; sitting or lying down; bending one's joints or stretching them; all these postures of walking, standing, sitting, lying down, stepping forward, stepping backward, bending and stretching are movements of the body.

By this verse is meant the following:

In this body there is no person who walks, no person who stands .... no person who stretches. In fact, one should:

- (a) know that it is the mind (consciousness) that desires to walk, stand, sit or lie down;
- (b) know that it is the mind that conditions the wind element that pervades all over the body;
- (c) know that when the wind element pervades the body new matter arises, and it is the matter that walks;
- (d) know with intelligence that what walks is no person or self, but it is the matter which does the walking;
- (e) know with intelligence that what stands is no person or self, but it is the matter which does the standing;
- (f) know with intelligence that what sits is no person or self but it is the matter which does the sitting;
- (g) know with intelligence that what has lain down is no person or self, but it is the matter which does the lying down;

- (h) know with intelligence that what bends is no person or self, but it is the matter which does the bending;
- (i) know with intelligence that what stretches it is no person or self, but it is the matter that does the stretching.

In accordance with the above lines:

- (1) When the mind desires to walk, the wind element, conditioned by the mind pervades all over the body. Because of the pervasion of the wind element, there appears the bodily gesture of striding in the desired direction. That is to say, peculiar forms of matter come into being in succession by the gesture of striding towards another desired place over there. Because of the striding gesture of these successive forms of matter, such a gesture is called “going” in worldly parlance.
- (2) Similarly, when the mind desires to stand, the wind element, conditioned by the mind, pervades all over the body. Because of the pervasion of the wind element, there appears the vertically erecting gesture of the body. That is to say, peculiar forms of matter come into being in succession by the vertically erecting. Because of the vertically erecting gesture of these successive forms of matter in linking the upper part and the lower part of the body, such a gesture is called “standing” in worldly parlance.
- (3) Similarly, when the mind desires to sit, the wind element, conditioned by the mind, pervades all over the body. Because of the pervasion of the wind element, there appears the bending gesture of the lower part and the erecting gesture of the upper part of the body. That is to say, peculiar forms of matter come into being in succession by the bending of the lower part and the erection of the upper part of the body. Because of the partly bending and partly erecting gesture of these successive forms of matter, such a gesture is called “sitting” in worldly parlance.
- (4) Similarly, when the mind desires to lie down, the wind element, conditioned by the mind, pervades all over the body. Because of the pervasion of the wind element, there appears the horizontally stretching gesture of the body. That is to say, peculiar forms of matter come into being in succession by the horizontally stretching gesture of the body. Because of the horizontally stretching of these successive forms of matter, such a gesture is called “lying down” in worldly parlance.

In the case of "bending" or "stretching" too, as the mind desires to bend or to stretch, the mind-conditioned wind element pervades the joints. Because of this pervasion of the wind element, the bending or the stretching gesture appears. That is to say peculiar forms of matter come into being in succession by the bending or the stretching gesture. Because of the bending or the stretching gesture of these successive forms of matter, such a gesture is called “bending” or “stretching” in worldly parlance.

Therefore, all these gestures of walking, sitting, sleeping, bending or stretching belong to the body. That is to say, peculiar forms of matter come into being by their respective gestures. In this body there is no individuality, no entity, no soul, that walks, stands, sits, lies down, bends or stretches. This body is devoid of any individuality, entity any soul, that does the walking, the standing, the sitting, the lying down, the bending or the stretching, what is in reality is:

vāyunānattato nānā, hoti kāyassa iñjanā.*

On account of the peculiar state of mind, the peculiar state of the wind element arises. On account of the peculiar state of the wind element, the peculiar state of the body's movement arises. This is the ultimate sense of the verse.

By this first verse the Buddha teaches the three characteristics: the characteristic of impermanence (anicca-lakkhaṇa), the characteristic of suffering (dukkha-lakkhaṇa) and the characteristic of non-soul (anatta-lakkhaṇa). The way He teaches is as follows:

When one remains long in any of the four postures of walking, standing, sitting and lying down, one becomes painful and uneasy. In order to dispel that pain and uneasiness, one changes one's posture. (The characteristic of suffering is covered by the posture. In order not to let the characteristic of suffering appear, it is hidden by means of another posture. That is why the wise say: "The posture (iriyāpatha) covers the characteristic of suffering.")

Thus by the three-feet (pada) beginning with "caram vā yadi vā tiṭṭham" the characteristic of suffering covered up by change of posture is taught. (Change of one posture to another is due to body-pain. The cause, which is body-pain, the characteristic of suffering, is known from the aforesaid effect which is change of posture.)

In the same way, as there is no posture of standing, etc. while one walks, the characteristic of impermanence covered by continuity (santati) is taught by the Buddha who says: "esā kāyassa iñjanā — all these postures of walking, standing, sitting, lying down, stepping forward, stepping backward, bending and stretching are movements of the body."

Further explanation: The uninterrupted arising of matter and mind is called santati. Because of this santati which is the uninterrupted arising of matter and mind, the cessation and disappearance of matter and mind, i.e. the characteristic of impermanence, is not seen. That is why the wise say: " 'Continuity' covers the characteristic of impermanence." By His Teaching "esa kāyassa iñjanā", the Buddha means to say "all these postures of walking, standing, sitting lying down, stepping forwards, stepping backwards, bending and stretching are movements of the body."

"In each posture, an aggregate of mind and matter, in harmony with the posture, arises uninterruptedly. With the change of each posture, changes or disappears the aggregate of mind and matter too." Therefore, it is understood that by the fourth and last foot, the Buddha teaches the characteristic of impermanence covered by santati.

As has been said above, in ultimate reality, it is because of the mind that desires to walk, to stand, to sit or to lie down, the mind-conditioned wind element arises. Because the wind element pervades all over the body, peculiar forms of matter, such as the gesture of walking, of standing, of sitting or of lying down, arise. With reference to these gestures people say: 'one walks', 'one stands', 'one sits', 'one lies down', 'one steps forward', 'one steps backwards', 'one bends' or 'one stretches'. In ultimate reality, however, this is the mere arising of peculiar forms of matter as they are given rise into being by certain combined causes in harmony. That is to say this is the mere arising of peculiar forms of matter by the gestures of walking, standing, etc. as motivated by the combination in harmony of the causes belonging to both the matter and the mind of the body. Those of attavāda (soul theory) who have no profound knowledge of this say: "The soul itself walks, stands, sits or lies down." On the contrary the Buddha declares that it is not the soul that does the walking, standing, sitting and lying down. "Esa kāyassa iñjanā" all these are but movements of the body appearing through their respective gestures, accomplished by a number of causes which harmoniously come together.

The Four Masses (Ghana)

Herein there are four masses (ghāna), namely, (1) santati-ghāna (mass of continuity) (2) samūha-ghāna (mass of coherence), (3) kicca-ghāna (mass of functions) and (4) ārammaṇa-ghāna (mass of sense objects).

Of these four:

- (1) The arising of physical and mental elements by uniting, combining and cohering with one another so that they appear as a whole without any gap is santati-ghāna.

Herein "without any gap" means the cessation of the preceding element coincides with the arising of the following or, as soon as the preceding element ceases the following arises. This is said by Tika writers to be “purima-pacchimānam nirantaratā — the absence of gap between one element and the next.” By arising thus without any gap, it seems that the arising elements are more powerful and overwhelming and the ceasing elements less manifest; so people then have a wrong impression that “what we see now is what we saw previously.” This is proved by the fact that when a burning stick is turned round and round, it is thought to be a ring of fire. (This indeed is the mass of continuity.)

- (2) The arising of mental elements, such as phassa (contact), etc., and of physical elements, such as pathavī (earth element), etc., by uniting, combining and cohering with one another so that they all give the impression of their being one in reality is samūha-ghāna.

When mental and physical elements arise, they do so not as one natural quality (sabhāvasatti). On the mental side, there are at least eight elements (such as cakkhu-viññāna (eye-consciousness), and seven sabba-citta-sādhāraṇa-cetasika, mental concomitants, dealing with all consciousness); on the physical side too, there are at least eight elements (by which eight material units are referred to). Thus, at least eight natural qualities, whether mental or physical, give the impression that they are but one, by uniting, combining and cohering with one another; such is meant by samūha-ghāna. (This indeed is the mass of coherence.)

- (3) Elements belonging to a mental or physical unit arise, performing their respective functions. When they arise, it is difficult (for those who have no knowledge of Abhidhamma) to understand “this is the function of phassa (contact), this is the function of vedanā (sensation), this is the function of saññā (perception)” and so on. Likewise, it is difficult (for them) to understand “this is the function of pathavī (earth element), this is the function of āpo (water element), this is the function of vāyo (wind element), this is the function of tejo (fire element)” and so on. Thus the functions of the elements, being difficult to grasp, make their appearance as a whole by uniting, combining and cohering with one another; such is called kicca-ghāna. (This indeed is the mass of functions.)
- (4) Elements belonging to each mental unit collectively pay attention to elements belonging to each physical unit form a single object for one's attention by uniting, combining and cohering with one another, leading one to the impression that they are just one (natural quality), in reality is ārammaṇa-ghāna. (This indeed is the mass of sense object.)

In short, several physical and mental elements arise as a result (paccay' uppaññā) of a cause (paccaya); but it is hard to discern their differences in terms of time, nature, function and attention and thus they create the false impression that they are but one unit; they are called respectively santati-ghāna, samūha-ghāna, kicca-ghāna, and ārammaṇa-ghāna. (This account of the four masses are reproduced from the Dhammasaṅgani Mūla Tika and Anu Tiki.)

In dealing with ultimate reality, the quality of an element is to be discerned. For instance, with regard to a chilli seed, the mind is to be focussed only on its taste. Only when the natural quality of an element is discerned with the eye of wisdom can the ultimate reality be penetrated. Only when the ultimate reality is penetrated, is the mass (ghāna) dissolved. Only when the mass is dissolved, is the knowledge of anatta (non-soul) is gained. If the natural quality is not discerned with the eye of wisdom, the ultimate reality cannot be penetrated. If the ultimate reality is not penetrated, the mass is not dissolved. If the mass is not dissolved, the knowledge of anatta is not gained. That is why the wise say: “The ghāna covers up the characteristic of anatta.”

By the fourth foot of the first verse the Buddha reveals the characteristic of anatta that is covered up by the masses, for he says there, “esā kāyassa iñjanā - all these postures do not belong to a soul or an entity, but they are, in fact, just the movements of the physical and mental elements accomplished in their respective functions.” Deep indeed is the teaching. It cannot be understood through the eye of ordinary wisdom.

End of the first verse

Having thus preached by way of the three characteristics, the meditation subject of suññata (void or absence) of permanence (nicca), happiness (sukha), and soul (attā), and in order to preach the two kinds of loathsomeness, that of the living (saviññānaka-asubha) and that of lifeless (aviññānaka-asubha), the Buddha uttered more verses:

- (2) *Aṭṭhināru-saṃyutto
tacamaṃsāva lepano
chaviyā kāyo paticchanno yathābhūtaṃ na dissati.*

This living body is composed of (three hundred) bones, (nine hundred) tendons that bind the bones and (seven thousand) capillaries that help experience the tastes. It is plastered by the thick inner skin in white and nine hundred lumps of flesh (extremely stinking and disgusting thereby). This living body is covered by the thinner (outer) skin of different colours as the walls of a house are painted brown, etc; therefore the reality of loathsomeness is entirely indiscernible in true perspective to the fools who are blind for lack of wisdom.

(The nature of the body is said to be as follows: Just as in a house, beams, purlins, principal rafters and common rafters and other substantial parts are fastened and kept immovable by means of rattan stems, even so (in the body) three hundred and sixty substantial bones are fastened and kept immovable by means of rattan-like nine hundred tendons. Just as walls of bamboo matting are plastered with cow-dung and fine earth, even so the bones and the tendons are plastered by nine hundred lumps of flesh. As the walls of the house are finished with cement, so the body is wrapped up by the thicker skin. The aforesaid bones, tendons, lumps of flesh and thicker skin have by nature foul and loathsome smell. But, as the walls are painted in different colours, such as brown, yellow, green, red, etc., in order to make the house look beautiful, the bones, tendons, lumps of flesh and the thicker skin are covered by the paint-like outer and thinner skin, which is flimsy like the wing of a fly, in brown, golden, red, or white colour (so flimsy that when it is taken off from the body and rolled into a ball, its size would be as small as a plum seed). Therefore those without the eye of wisdom cannot see its loathsomeness in its true state.)

In order to preach that the variety of unpleasant internal organs must be seen by penetrating them with the eye of wisdom — the organs, very impure, foul smelling, disgusting and loathsome but which are not obvious to all people because they are thus enveloped by the thicker skin that is again covered by the coloured thinner skin — the Buddha went on to utter these verses:

- (3) *Antapūro udarapūro yakanapeḷassa vatthino, hadayassa papphāsassa
vakkassa pihakassa ca.*
- (4) *Singhānikāya kheḷassa
sedassa ca medassa ca, lohitassa lasikāya
pittassa ca vasāya ca.*

- (3) This living body is not filled with sandalwood perfume, etc. In fact, this body is filled with intestines, newly eaten food, a liver, urine, a heart, a pair of lungs, a pair of kidney and the spleen.
- (4) This living body is filled with the mucus of the nose, saliva, sweat, fat, blood, synovial fluid, the bile, and marrow or marrow.

Having preached thus, by these two verses that there is none in the body an organic particle that is worth keeping with pleasure like pearls, rubies and so on and that this body is, in fact, full of impurities, the Buddha uttered the following two verses in order to reveal the internal impurities against the external and in order to combine those already enumerated with those not enumerated yet:

(5) *Athassa navahi sotehi
asucī savati sabbadā Akkhīmhā akkhigūthako, kaṇṇamhā kaṇṇagūthako.*

(6) *Sīghānikā ca nāsato
mukhena vamatekadā.
Pittam semhañ ca vamati kāyamhā sedajallikā.*

- (5) Besides, from the nine sore openings of the living body ever uncontrollably flow at all times, day and night, filthy and loathsome elements. (How?) From the eyes flow unclean secretion: from the ears flow the unclean wax.
- (6) The impure mucus sometimes flow from the nose; sometimes frothy food, when vomited, comes out through the mouth. Sometimes the bile as organ (baddha) and the bile as fluid (abaddha) and the phlegm come out frothy from the mouth. From the body come out at all times, day and night, sweat, salt, moisture, dirt and other impurities.

(Herein since the flow of excrement from the opening of the rectum and that of urine from the private parts are understood by many and since the Buddha wished to show His regard for the occasion, the individual and the audience concerned, He did not mention them explicitly and as He desired only to say that there were impurities that flow by other means as well, He summarized all in the expression “kāyamhā sedajallikā”.

(By these two verses the Buddha gave a simile: just as when rice is cooked, the impure rice water comes up with the scum and overflows the brim of the pot, even so when the food eaten is cooked by means of the digestive fire element generated by one's past kamma (kammaja tejodhātu), impurities, such as secretion of the eye, etc., come up and overflow the body.)

Head is recognized as the most sacred part of the body in the world. Because of the sacredness (or sometimes through conceit), the head is not bowed in showing respect even to those worthy of respect. In order to show that the body was impure and loathsome by the fact that even the head (as the top of the body) was devoid of essence and purity, the Buddha uttered this verse:

(7) *Athassa susiraṃ sīsam matthaluṅgassa pūritam.
Subhato naṃ maññati bālo avijjāya purakkhato.*

Besides, the hollow head of the living body is disgustingly filled with brain. The fool, who is blind (to reality) through craving, conceit and false view because he is enveloped wrongly by ignorance, wrongly takes the body thus:

“Beautiful is my body indeed. Beautiful am I indeed. My beauty is permanent!”

Here ends loathsomeness of the living body.

Having thus preached the loathsomeness of the living, now, in order, to preach the loathsomeness when life is destroyed, in other words, having preached that even the body of the Universal Monarch is full of putrid and that even life filled with all kinds of luxury, therefore, is also unpleasant. Now, in order, to preach loathsomeness when life is destroyed, the Buddha uttered this verse:

(8) *Yadā ca so mato seti
uddhumāto vinīlako.
Apaviddho susānasmim anapekkhā honti nātayo.*

When the body is dead (because of the absence of three factors, namely, life (āyu) or material and mental life (jīvita), body temperature (usmā) or the fire element generated by the past kamma (kammaja-tejo) and consciousness (viññāna), it becomes swollen like a leather bag filled with air, it turns black through loss of the original complexion and it lies in the coffin deserted at the cemetery. Then all relatives and friends have no regard for him thinking: “It is certain that the dead will not come to life again.”

(In this verse, by mato, ‘dead’, is shown ‘impermanence’; by seti, ‘lies in the coffin’, is shown ‘lack of vitality’. By both words, it is urged that ‘the two kinds of conceit, the conceit due to living (jīvita māna) and that due to strength (bala-māna), should be rejected.’

(By uddhumāto, ‘swollen’, is shown ‘the destruction of shape’; by vinīlako, ‘turns black’, is shown ‘loss of the original complexion’. By both words it is urged that ‘the conceit due to beauty and that due to good shape should be rejected.’

(By apaviddho, ‘deserted’, is shown ‘the total absence of what is to be taken back’; by susānasmim, ‘at the cemetery’, is shown ‘the loathsomeness that is so intolerable that the body is not worth keeping at home.’ By both words, it is urged that ‘the grasping with the thought, ‘This is mine’, and the impression that ‘it is pleasant’ should be rejected.’

(By the words anapekkhā honti nātayo, ‘all the relatives and friends have no regard for it’ is shown that ‘those who formerly adored the deceased no longer do so.’ By showing thus it is urged that ‘the conceit due to having a large number of companions around (parivāra-māna) should be rejected.’

(By this verse, the Buddha thus pointed out the lifeless body that has not been disintegrated yet.)

Now in order to point out the loathsomeness of the lifeless body that has been disintegrated, the Buddha uttered this verse:

(9) *Khādanti nam suvānā ca
siṅgāla ca vakā kimī;
kākā gijjhā ca khādanti
ye ca’ññe, santi pāṇino.*

That discarded body at the cemetery, domestic dogs and jackals (wild dogs), wolves and worms, eat it; crows and vultures also eat it; other flesh eating creatures, such as leopards, tigers, eagles, kites and the like, also devoured it.

End of the section on the loathsomeness of the lifeless body.

In this way the Buddha taught the nature of this body by virtue of the suññata meditation through the first verse beginning with “caram vā yadi vā tiṭṭham”; by virtue of the loathsomeness of the living body through the six verses beginning with “aṭṭhi nahāru samyutto” and by virtue of the loathsomeness of the lifeless body through the two verses beginning with “yadā ca so mato seti”. Furthermore, the Buddha revealed, thereby, the state of the fool who thought that the body was pleasant, for he was overcome by ignorance regarding the body that was really devoid of permanency (nicca), pleasantness (subha) and soul (attā). By so doing, the Buddha disclosed the fact that the round of suffering (vaṭṭa dukkha) indeed was led by ignorance (avijjā). Now, in order, to point out the state of the wise man regarding the body of such nature and the fact that the end of suffering (vivaṭṭa) was led by the three phases of thorough understanding (pariññā), the Buddha uttered these verses:

(10) Sutvāna Buddha-vacanam
bhikkhu paññāṇavā idha
so kho nam̐ parijānāti
yathābhūtañ hi passati.

In this dispensation of the Buddha which consists of eight wonders, the bhikkhu, who is a worldling (puthujjana), a learner (sekkha) or a meditator (yogāvacara), endowed with Vipassanā Wisdom, having heard properly this discourse of the Buddha named Vijaya Sutta (or Kāya-vicchandānika Sutta) sees with the eye of Vipassanā, the body in its true nature; he therefore discerns the body clearly through the three phases of understanding (pariññā), namely, knowledge (ñāta), judgment (tīraṇa) and abandonment (pahāna).

The way of discernment of the body by the three phases of pariññā is as follows:

After inspecting carefully a variety of merchandise, a merchant considers: “If I buy it at this price my profit would be this much.” Then only he buys the merchandise and sells it at a profit. In the same way, the worldling learning or meditating bhikkhu inspects his body with his eye of wisdom and comes to understand thoroughly, by ñāta-pariññā: “Things that truly constitute the body are merely bones, sinews, etc. (which are directly mentioned in the text) and hair on the head, hair on the body, etc. (which are not directly mentioned in the text).” He then reflects and judges the body with the eye of Vipassanā Wisdom and comes to understand by tīraṇa-pariññā: “The phenomena that occur in the body are only impermanent (anicca), unsatisfactory (dukkha), and non-soul (anatta).” Finally, he arrives at the Noble Path (Ariya Magga) and comes to understand by pahāna-pariññā and abandons his attachment to the body or his desire and passion for the body.

(Herein, because this body, which is visible to all, would not have been thoroughly understood through the three phases of pariññā should there be no chance to listen to the Buddha's teaching (in spite of the body's visibility), because such thorough understanding is possible only when His Teaching is heard, and in order to point out that there is also the way of understanding the characteristics of suññata, etc. through the three phases of pariññā and also to point out that those who are outside the Buddha's dispensation are unable to discern in this manner, the Buddha uttered: “Sutvāna Buddha-vacanam idha.”

(On account of the Bhikkhunī Nandā Therī and on that of the bhikkhu whose mind craved for the beauty of Sirimā, the Vijaya Sutta (or the Kāyavicchandānika Sutta) was delivered. Of the four assemblies, the assembly of monks ranks highest; it was only that very assembly of monks that was ever close to the Buddha. Anybody, be he a monk or a lay man, who meditates on anicca, dukkha and anatta, can be designated ‘bhikkhu’. In order to point out these things, the Buddha uses the term ‘bhikkhu’, not because the three phases of pariññā are confined to monks. This import should also be noted in particular.)

Now, in order to point out the way of seeing things as they really are in accordance with the word “yathā bhūtañ hi passati”, the Buddha uttered this verse:

(11) Yathā idam̐ tathā etaṃ

*yathā etaṃ tathā idaṃ.
Ajjhattañ ca bahiddhā ca
kāye chandam virājaye.*

Even as this living body of loathsomeness walks, stands, sits and lies down, [because it is not without the three factors of physical and mental life, (āyu), the kamma-generated temperature, (usmā) and consciousness (viññāṇa)] so was the lifeless body of loathsomeness at the cemetery (which before its death could walk, stand, sit and lie down) as it was then not without those three factors.

Even as the dead, lifeless body now is (unable to walk, stand, sit or lie down because of the cessation of those three factors), so will this body (of mine) be (unable to walk, stand, sit or lie down) because of the cessation of the very three factors.

Thus, the practising wise one who ponders and discerns the events of the body threatened by the danger of samsāra should be able to uproot the attachment to or the desire and passion for the internal body as well as the external by means of the fourfold Path-Knowledge, in the mode of samuccheda-phāna.

(In this verse, by identifying oneself with the lifeless body one abandons the defilement of anger (dosa-kilesa) (that would arise) with regard to the external body as he ponders “yathā idaṃ tathā etaṃ — even as this living body of mine is, so was that lifeless body of loathsomeness in the past.”

(By identifying the lifeless body with oneself, one abandons the defilement of passion (rāga-kilesa) (that would arise) in the internal body as he ponders “yathā etaṃ tathā idaṃ — even as this lifeless body, so will be my living body in future.”

(As one knows, by one's wisdom, the manner of mutual identification of the two internal and external bodies or of the two living and lifeless bodies, one abandons one's defilement of ignorance (moha-kilesa), i.e. ignorance of the nature of both bodies.

(In this way, even at the earlier moment of the arising of Vipassanā Insight one knows things as they really are and removes the three roots of unwholesomeness, lobha, dosa, and moha. At the later moment of the arising of Vipassanā Insight, through the four stages of the Path, one can abandon all desire and passion, leaving no trace of them, in the mode of samuccheda-pahāna. This import is to be noted.)

Having pointed out the level of learners (sekkha-bhūmi), the Buddha now desired to point out the level of non-learners (asekkha-bhūmi) and uttered this verse:

*(12) Chanda-rāga viratto so
bhikkhu paññāṇavā idha.
Ajjhagā amataṃ santiṃ
Nibbānaṃ padam accutaṃ.*

In this teaching consisting of eight wonders, or, with regard to this body, living or lifeless, within or without, the bhikkhu, who has totally abandoned all craving and desire, who possess the Path-wisdom of arahatship, who has reached the Fruition immediately after the Path and become an arahat, attained Nibbāna that is deathless or excellent like ambrosia, the cessation of all sankhāras or the characteristic of peace, the release from craving, the state absolutely free from the nature of falling, the goal that can be attained by the Path-wisdom.

(By this verse, the Buddha meant to say that he, who practises in the manner mentioned previously, abandoned craving and desire (or all moral defilements led by craving and desire) and secured the two elements of Nibbāna.)

Having taught thus the loathsomeness meditation (asubha kammaṭṭhāna) by means of the living (saviññāṅka) body and the lifeless (aviññāṅka) body together with its culmination in the Path, Fruition and Nibbāna, the Buddha uttered again the two final verses in order to censure, by a brief sermon, the unmindful living (pamādavihāra) that was dangerous to such greatly fruitful meditation:

(13) *Dvipādako'yaṃ asuci
duggandho-parihārati;
Nānākuṇapa-paripūro vissavanto tato tato.*

(14) *Etādisena kāyena yo maññe uṇṇametave.
Paramā vā avajāneyya
kim aññatra adassanā.*

This human body, having two feet, full of impure, disgusting things and foul smelling, has to undergo daily renovation by bathing, perfuming, etc. (Despite such daily renovation) it is filled with numerous kinds of putrid, and from the nine openings and the pores on the body flow incessantly such disgusting things as saliva, secretion of the eye, sweat, mucus of the nose, wax of the ear, in spite of repeated attempts to cover them up by applying perfumes and wearing flowers.

(By the body or because of the body which is thus impure and full of disgusting things, the fool, whether male or female, may think, through craving, that “This is my body!”, through conceit that “This am I indeed!”, through wrong view, that, “My body is lasting?” only to enhance his arrogance. (On the other hand) he may despise others for their (lowly) birth, name, clan and the like. (In so exalting oneself and despising others) what reason can be there other than not discerning the Four Truths in their true perspective. (Only due to one's ignorance of the Four Truths is one's praise of self and contempt of others.)

By the end of the Discourse, eighty-four thousand beings realised the Four Truths and were released. The divine Queen Sirimā attained anāgāmi-phala. The bhikkhu enamoured of Sirima attained sotāpatti-phala.

Translation of the Vijaya Sutta ends.

SUPPLEMENT TO THE TRANSLATION OF THE VIJAYA SUTTA

The Three Names of The Sutta

This Discourse is called by three names: (1) Vijaya Sutta, (2) Kāyavicchandaniya Sutta, (3) Nanda Sutta. Their respective reasons are:

- (1) It leads to the victory (vijaya) over desire and passion (chanda-rāga) or craving and greed (taṇhā-lobha) for the body: hence Vijaya Sutta.
- (2) It teaches the eradication of desire and passion (craving and greed) for the body; hence Kāya-vicchandaniya Sutta or Kāya-vicchindaniya Sutta.
- (3) The story of the courtesan Sirimā was the introduction to the second delivery of the Discourse. This very Discourse was previously given to Janapada Kalyāṇī Nandā Therī in Sāvattthi; hence Nanda Sutta.

Explanation: (1) The Vijaya Sutta was first preached in connection with Janapada Kalyāṇī Therī in Sāvattthi: (2) The same Sutta was preached with reference to the courtesan Sirimā in Rājagaha. The account of the second preaching has been told. That of the first preaching was as follows:

While visiting the city of Kapilavattu for the first time (after his attainment of Buddhahood), the Buddha exhorted the Sakyan prince and ordained Prince Nanda and others. Later (five years later), when He granted permission for ordination of female as bhikkhunī, the three (Sakyan) princesses, namely,

- (1) Nanda, sister of the Venerable Ānanda,
- (2) Abhirūpanandā, daughter of the Sakyan Prince Khemaka, and
- (3) Janapada-Kalyāṇī Nandā, fiancée of Prince Nandā were also ordained.

At the time of their ordination, the Buddha was still staying in Sāvatti. Of these three princesses, Abhirūpanandā was so called because of her great beauty. Janapada Kalyāṇī Nandā too saw nobody else comparable to her in beauty. Since both were highly conceited with their beautiful appearance, they never approached the Buddha nor did they want to see Him either; for they thought: “The Buddha dispraises beauty. In various ways, He points out the fault in good looks.”

“Why then did they become bhikkhunīs?” it may be asked. The answer is: “Because they had none to depend on in society; hence their becoming of bhikkhunīs.”

(Explanation: The husband of the Sakyan princess, Abhirūpanandā, died on the day they were married. Then the parents made her a bhikkhunī against her will.

(Janapada Kalyāṇī became a bhikkhunī because she lost her hope to win back her fiancée when the later, as Thera Nandā, attained arahatship: then she thought: “My Lord, Prince Nanda, my mother Mahāpajāpati Gotamī, and other relatives have joined the Order. It is indeed a misery to live without one’s kinsmen in the world of householders,” and found no solace in living in an organised community of families. Both their ordination took place not out of faith (saddhā).]

Knowing the maturity of wisdom of both, the Buddha gave an order to Mahāpajāpati Gotamī Therī that “All bhikkhunīs are required to come in turn for receiving My exhortation.” When their turn came, the Therīs sent someone else on their behalf. This prompted the Buddha to issue another order: “Coming in person to Me, in turn, is compulsory. Sending representative not permitted.”

Thereafter, one day, Therī Abhirūpanandā came to the Buddha to receive His exhortation. Then the Buddha stirred her mind by means of His created figure of a woman and by uttering the following verses of exhortation:

*Aṭṭhīnaṃ nagaraṃ kataṃ,
maṃsalohitalepanaṃ
Yattha jarā ca maccu ca, māno makkho ca ohito.*

(Dear daughter Abhirūpananda! Just as a typical barn for storing crops is built by fixing timber, by binding it with rattan stems, and by plastering it with earth, even so) the barn-like body has been built by the carpenter-like craving by (fixing) three hundred bones, (by binding it with sinews) and by plastering it with nine hundred lumps of flesh and a pattha of blood. Deposited in it are old age, death, conceit and ingratitude.

This verse belongs to the Dhammapada.

*Āturaṃ asuciṃ pūtiṃ
passa nande sarnussayaṃ.
Uggharantaṃ paggharantaṃ
bālānaṃ abhipatthitaṃ.*

(Dear daughter Abhirūpanandā) Behold carefully with the eye of wisdom, the body which is constantly painful, impure, stale, having the flow (of putrid) going upwards and downwards, (That body) the fools are highly fond of.

The second half of the verse in the Therī Gāthā reads:

Which may be translated:

Develop your jhāna consciousness in the loathsomeness of the living body, the consciousness that has one-pointedness by upacara samādhi and that is well concentrated by appana-samādhi.

*Animittaṃ ca bhāvehi mānānusayam ujjaha
Tato mānbbhisarnayā
upasantā carissasi.*

(Dear daughter Abhirūpanandā!) Develop incessantly your meditation on impermanence (anicca-bhāvanā), your meditation on unsatisfactoriness (dukkha-bhāvanā) and your meditation on non-self (anatta-bhāvanā) which are collectively designated as animitta (thing having no sign of permanence, etc). Uproot the impression of 'I' that has latently come along in saṃsāra of no beginning. By so doing in the mode of samuccheda-pahāna, you, dear daughter, will live with all the heat of moral defilement quenched.

By giving His exhortation by these verses, as mentioned in the Therī Gāthā, the Buddha established the Therī Abhirūpanandā in the arahatta-phala in due course. (This is the story of Abhirūpanandā Therī.)

Establishment of Janapada Kalyāṇī Nandā Therī in Arahatsip

One day, the citizens of Sāvattthi gave alms and observed the precepts in the morning. They also dressed themselves well and went to the Jetavana monastery, carrying unguent and flowers and other offerings to attend to the Buddha's sermon. When the sermon was over, they did obeisance to the Buddha and entered again into the city. The bhikkhunīs also returned to their living quarters after listening to the sermon.

In the city of Sāvattthi, the lay people, as well as the bhikkhunīs, spoke in praise of the Master as follows:

There is nobody who fails to have devotion on seeing the Buddha in the assembly of devas and humans, who are particularly attracted by four things: His rūpa (personality), His ghosa (voice), His lūkha (austerity) and His Dhamma (sīla, samādhi, paññā)

To wit:

- (1) Those who are mainly attracted to personality (rūpappamāṇika) become devoted to the Buddha when they see His splendid beauty with His major and minor signs and rays of light in six colours.
- (2) Those who are mainly attracted to fame and voice (ghosappamāṇika) become devoted to the Buddha when they hear His good reputation as a Bodhisatta from numerous Jātakas and His voice as a Buddha that is of eight qualities.
- (3) Those who are attracted to austere use of the four requisites and scarcity of moral defilement (lūkhappamāṇika) become devoted to the Buddha when they know of His few wants of the four requisites and His practice of dukkaracariyā.
- (4) Those who are mainly attracted to such virtues as sīla, samādhi and paññā and other attributes (dhammappamāṇika) become devoted to the Buddha when they reflect on one of His five attributes, such as sīla-guṇa (morality as an attribute), samādhi-guṇa (mental concentration as an attribute), paññā-guṇa (wisdom as an attribute), vimutti-guṇa (emancipation as an attribute) and vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana (Insight leading to emancipation as an attribute), which are all beyond compare.

In this way, words were spoken everywhere in praise of the Buddha, words that incessantly overflow the mouths.

(NB. (1) Two thirds (66%) of beings are rūpappamanika. (2) Four fifths (80%) are ghosappamāṇika. (3) Nine-tenths (90%) are lūkhappamāṇika. (4) One in a hundred thousand is dharmappamāṇika.)

(Of these four divisions of beings, those who fail to be devoted to the Buddha were very few: far more were those devoted. Explanation: (1) To the rūpappamāṇika, there was no beauty more attractive than the Buddha's. (2) To the ghosappamāṇika, there was no fame and voice more attractive than the Buddha's. (3) To the lūkhappamāṇika, there was no austerity than that of the Buddha who gave up fine clothes made in the country of Kāsi, gold vessels, the three golden palaces befitting the three seasons and replete with various sensual pleasures, but who put on rag-robies, used lithic bowl, stayed at the foot of a tree for lodging, etc. (4) To the dharmappamāṇika, there was no attribute more attractive in the whole world than the attributes of the Buddha such as morality, etc. In this way, the Buddha held in His grip the entire world of these beings, so to speak, who formed the four categories (catuppamāṇika). The words in these brackets are reproduced from the Abhidhamma, iii, The rest are from the Sutta Nipāta Commentary, Vol. 1.)

When the Therī Jaṇapada Kalyāṇī Nandā got back to her dwelling, she heard various words in praise of the Buddha's attributes, and it occurred to her: "These people are talking about the attributes of my brother (the Buddha) as though their mouths have no capacity to contain them all. If the Buddha were to speak ill of my beauty the whole day long how much could He do so? What if I shall go to the Buddha and pay homage to Him and listen to His discourse without showing my person." Thus thinking she told her fellow bhikkhunīs: "I shall come along with you to listen to the discourse." The other bhikkhunīs were glad and went to the monastery taking along Therī Nandā as they thought: "It took Therī Nandā so long to approach the Master! Surely, the Master will discourse marvellously in various exquisite ways."

The Buddha foresaw the visit of the Therī and created by His supernormal power the figure of a very pretty fifteen or sixteen year old young lady and made her fanning Him in order to humble Rūpanandā's beauty-pride, just as a man removes a thorn with a thorn or a prick with a prick.

Together with other bhikkhunīs, Therī Rūpanandā moved towards the Buddha and paid homage to Him, after which she remained amidst her companions, watching the Buddha's splendour from the foot-tip up to the hair top. Then seeing the fanning lady-figure by the side of the Buddha as had been created, Rūpanandā thought: "Oh, so fair is this young lady indeed!" And her thought led her to an extreme fondness of the created beauty and a burning desire to have that very beauty as she lost her pride in her own beauty.

Then the Buddha (while discoursing) changed the age of the created lady to twenty. A lady is highly splendored indeed only when she is sixteen. Beyond that age she is not so fair (as when she was sixteen). Therefore when the age of the created lady was changed, Rūpanandā saw with her own eyes the decrease of the lady's beauty, and her desire and passion (chanda-rāga) became less and less than before.

Thereafter, the Buddha increasingly changed the age of the created lady step by step to that of a lady not being yet in labour, to that of a lady having given birth but once, to that of a middle-aged lady, to that of an aged lady and to that of an old one of a hundred years, unsteady with a walking stick in her hand and with her body freckled all over. While Rūpanandā was watching her, the Buddha caused death to the created old lady, her remains bloated and decomposed and the disgustingly foul smelling, for the Therī to see.

On seeing the decaying process of the created figure, Therī Janapada Kalyāṇī Rūpanandā reflected on it: "This process I am watching now, all of us beings are commonly subject to" and the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā); following which the perception of unsatisfactoriness (dukkha-saññā) and the perception of non-soul (anatta-saññā) also occurred to her. The three kinds of existences manifested to her, making her helpless like a blazing house.

Then the Buddha, coming to know that Bhikkhunī Nandā was engaged in meditation, uttered the following verses that were most appropriate to her:

*Āturaṃ asuciṃ pūtiṃ,
passa Nande samussyāṃ.
Uggharantaṃ paggharantaṃ,
bālānaṃ abhipatthitaṃ.*

*Yathā idaṃ tathā etaṃ,
yathā etaṃ tathā idaṃ
dhātuto suññato passa,
mā lokaṃ punar āgami.
Bhave chandaṃ virājetvā upasanta carissasi*

(See the meaning of the first verse in “SUPPLEMENT TO THE TRANSLATION OF THE VIJAYA SUTTA”).

Dear daughter Nandā, as this internal (i.e. your own) body is subject to impermanence, etc., so is the external (i.e. another person's) body. As that external body, you have seen, discard all its various stages of old age and come to the state of being swollen, etc., so will this internal body of yours discard all its various stages of old age and come to the state of being swollen etc. (You dear daughter!) With the eye of Vipassanā Wisdom see (both the internal and external bodies) as devoid of such elements as earth or self and things associated with self. Do not desire to come again to the world of the five aggregates of attachment. Eradicate in the mode of samuccheda-pahāna your craving for the three existences of kāma, rūpa and arūpa, or if you have so eradicated you will abide with all the heat of your moral defilement quenched.

At the end of the verse Therī Janapada Kalyāṇī Nandā was established in sotāpatti-phala. Then did the Buddha give this Vijaya Sutta (as has been mentioned before) in order to preach Vipassanā meditation with the accompaniment of suññata so that the Therī might reach the higher Paths and Fruitions.

(The Buddha gave this Vijaya Sutta (1) first to Janapada Kalyāṇī when He was in His fifth or sixth year after His Enlightenment. (2) It was in His seventeenth year that He delivered it to the monk craving for Sirimā.)

When the first delivery of the Discourse was over, the Therī was greatly stirred with fear, thinking: “Oh, it was so stupid of me! To this brother of mine (the Buddha), who taught me such a wondrous doctrine, paying much attention to me and so compassionately, I had failed to come and attend earlier!” Having feared thus she repeatedly reflected on the Discourse and diligently practised suññata meditation; accordingly in two or three days' time she attained arahatship.

Story of A Male Lay Devotee

Having spent the seventeenth vassa at Veļuvana in Rājagaha and converted those devas, humans and Brahmās worthy of conversion through various discourses, including the Vijaya Sutta as has been said above, the Buddha set out on a journey when the vassa was over and eventually arrived in Sāvattthi and took up residence at Jetavana.

Then one day, while staying in the fragrant Chamber of Jetavana, He surveyed the world of beings at daybreak and saw a poor man of Āļavi City. Knowing of the past merit that would lead him to the attainment of Sotāpatti Path and Fruition, the Buddha went to Āļavi in the company of five hundred monks. The citizens of Ālavī, as they had been the Buddha's typical followers, possessing right belief, respectfully invited the monks headed by the Buddha to a feast.

When the poor man learned the arrival of the Buddha, he felt happy thinking: "I will have a chance to listen to a sermon in His presence." Then an incident took place on the day the Buddha was about to enter the city. A bullock, belonging to the poor man, ran away as the rope tied to it became broken.

The poor man then thought: "What shall I do? Shall I first search the bullock or hear the sermon?" And he decided to search for the bullock first and listen to the Buddha's sermon later, without worry. So he left home in search of the lost bullock.

The Ālavī citizens offered seats to the Sangha led by the Buddha and served them with food and made arrangements for the Buddha's discourse in appreciation of the meal. "For the poor man, I have taken this journey of thirty yojanas," reflected the Buddha, "he has now entered the forest to look for the lost bullock. I shall give a Dhamma-talk only when he comes." With that idea He remained silent.

It was late in the morning when the poor man found his bullock and put it into the herd. Then he thought: "At this hour I have no chance to give my service in any form. Yet, I will just pay my respects to the Buddha." Though he was severely oppressed by hunger, he did not think of going home but rushed to the Buddha, did obeisance to Him and stood at an appropriate place.

When the man was standing thus, the Buddha asked the head worker at the alms-giving function: "Donor, is there any surplus food after feeding the Sangha?" "Yes, Exalted Buddha," answered the head worker, "there is a full meal." The Buddha then ordered him to feed the poor man.

The head worker let the man sit at the very place where the Buddha requested and served him well with gruel, hard and soft food. Having eaten with relish, the man washed his mouth thoroughly.

(Nowhere else in the three Piṭakas is the Buddha found to have Himself asked somebody to feed a householder.)

After eating the food with relish to his satisfaction, the poor man's mind became calm with one-pointedness. Then the Buddha preached to him in serial order: dāna-kathā, (talk on generosity), sīla-kathā (talk on morality), sagga-kathā (talk on celestial abodes), kammānāḍḍinava-kathā (talk on the faults of sensual pleasures), nekkhammeanisamsa-kathā (talk on the advantages of renunciation) and finally taught the Four Truths. At the end of the teaching in appreciation of the alms-giving, the Buddha rose and departed. The people saw Him to the monastery and came back to Alavi.

While the monks were going along with their Master, they sarcastically talked among themselves:

"Friends, look at the way the Master did. Absolutely nowhere else did He ask to arrange for feeding a lay individual. But today, just on seeing a poor man, He Himself had verbally managed to get the gruel and other foods set for him." The Buddha turned back and asked what they were talking about. When He knew what it was about, the Buddha said: "Yes, you are right! Monks, I took this tedious journey of thirty yojanas just because I saw his past merit potential enough to lead him, the poor lay devotee, to the Path and Fruition of Sotāpatti. He was very hungry. Since daybreak, he had been searching for his lost bullock by roaming about the forest region. If I had taught him (without feeding him), he would not have been able to penetrate My Teaching because of his suffering from hunger. Having thus reflected, I did in this manner. There is no ailment like hunger." Then He uttered the following verse:

*Jighacchā paramā rogā, saṅkhāraparamā dukhā.
Etaṃ nītvā yathābhūtaṃ, nibbānaṃ paramaṃ sukhaṃ.*

O my dear sons, monks! Hunger surpasses all oppressing and hurting ailments. (Among all ailments, hunger is the severest.) This is true! By giving treatment but once, other ailments might be completely cured. Or they are allayed for days, for months or for years. The ailment of hunger, however, cannot be quenched by eating once. The treatment of it consists in feeding day after day. Therefore, it means that of all ailments hunger is the worst.)

The conditioning factors of the five aggregates surpass all suffering. (As long as these factors exist, suffering will not come to an end. Therefore, it means that of all suffering the conditioning factors of the five aggregates are the worst).

The unconditioned element, the ultimate Nibbāna, is the highest happiness. (Happiness that is felt (vedayita-sukha) and liked by the worldly people is enjoyable only when it exists. When it reaches the moment of destruction (when it is destroyed and gone) there is neither comfort nor enjoyment. Never has the peace of Nibbāna, a destructive nature but it remains peaceful forever; hence its being the best of all happiness.)

Knowing this as it really is, the wise man realizes the happiness of Nibbāna.

By the end of the Discourse numerous beings attained sotāpatti-phala and other Fruitions.

End of story of a male lay devotee.

THE BUDDHA'S EIGHTEENTH VASSA AT CĀLIYA

Having emancipated a large number of deserving people according to their respective dispositions, beginning with the poor man of Āḷavī who searched for his lost bullock, the Buddha observed the eighteenth vassa on a hill near Cāliya, administering the distribution of the cool water of elixir to those who ought to be emancipated.

At the close of the eighteenth vassa on the Cāliya Hill, the Buddha journeyed again from place to place and arrived in Savatthi and stayed at Jetavana.

A Dhamma-talk given to a Weaver's Daughter

Story of A Weaver's Daughter

Three years prior to the Buddha's stay at Jetavana, at the end of the eighteenth vassa, the Buddha went to Āḷavī City and the citizens invited Him and performed a great alms-giving. After finishing the meal, the Buddha gave a Dhamma-talk in appreciation of the people's alms-giving. The talk which included such exhortations as follows:

“Dear donors, you men and women! Meditate on death thus: ‘My life is not lasting; death will certainly occur to me. It is certain that I shall die. My life will end in death; life is not permanent, but death is!’

“The benefits of meditation on death are these: On seeing a snake, a man without a stick is frightened, like him, those who have not meditated on death, die making terrible sounds as caused by fear. A man with a stick, however, is not frightened but remains calm at the sight of a snake, for he can overpower the snake and catch it by means of his stick and send it away. In the same way, those, who are accomplished in meditation on death, are not frightened at their last moment (when death is drawing near) but passes away without fear but courageously. Therefore, you should meditate on death (as has been said above).”

While other people were minding their own business after hearing the Buddha's talk, a sixteen-year old daughter of a weaver gave good heed to it thus: “Oh, the word of Buddhas is indeed wonderful! I should meditate on death!” So she engaged herself in that meditation day and night. From the city of Āḷavī, the Buddha returned to Jetavana. The girl on her part continuously meditated for three full years.

After three years, the Buddha, while sojourning now at Jetavana, surveyed the world of sentient beings one morning and saw that very girl of a weaver in His vision. When He made further investigation as to what might happen to her, He came to know as follows:

“The girl has meditated on death for three long years since she heard My talk on it. Now I shall go to Āḷavī and ask her four questions. When she gives answers to them, I will cheer her on all four answers. Then I will utter the Dhamma-verse beginning with ‘Andhī-bhūto ayaṃ loko.’ At the end of the verse the girl will attain sotāpatti-phala. On account of her, a multitude of people will also benefit.”

Foreseeing thus, the Buddha, in the company of five hundred monks, left Jetavana for Āḷavī and arrived at the monastery, named Aggāḷava.

Hearing the news of the Buddha's arrival, the people of Āḷavī went, in happy mood, to the Aggāḷava monastery and invited the Sangha with the Buddha as its head.

The weaver's daughter also learned the Buddha's arrival and became joyous at the thought: “My spiritual father and teacher, the Buddha of Gotama clan, whose beautiful face may be likened to a full moon, has arrived”, and thought further as follows:

“Three years ago I saw the golden-complexioned Buddha. Now I have another opportunity to view my father Buddha's body in the brightness of gold and to listen to His sweet and nourishing talk of Dhamma.”

At that time, the girl's father was about to go to the weaving shed; so he asked his daughter before he went: “Dear, I have fixed some person's piece of fabric on the loom. It remains unfinished with only about a hand span left unwoven. I will finish it today. Wind the woof quick and bring it to me.”

The girl was now in a dilemma, thinking: “I am desirous of listening to the Exalted One's teaching. Father has also urgently asked me to do something else. What should I do now? Should I listen to the Exalted One's discourse first, or should I wind the woof and hand it to father first?” Then she decided thus: “If I fail to send the woof, father would hit me or beat me. Therefore only after winding the woof shall I hear the Dhamma.” So sitting on a small stool she wound the woof.

The citizens of Āḷavī, after serving the Buddha with a meal, were holding the bowls of dedication water to hear the Buddha's preaching in appreciation of their good deeds. The Buddha, however, kept silent, for He pondered: “For the sake of this girl, a weaver's daughter, I have travelled this journey of thirty yojanas. The girl has not got a chance to hear Me. Only when she does get a chance to listen to My talk, shall I give a sermon of appreciation.”

(N.B. While the Buddha was remaining silent none whosoever in the world of sentient beings dared to ask Him to speak some Dhamma-word.)

The girl wound the woof, put it in a basket, and, on her way to her father, she stood at the edge of the audience. The Buddha too looked at the girl, stretching His neck. From the way of the Buddha's glance at her she knew, “The Exalted One wants me to go closer to Him, for while sitting amidst such a great assembly He looks at me.”

(Herein it may be asked: “Why did the Buddha stretch His neck and look at her?”

Answer: For it occurred to the Buddha thus: “If she goes to her father without listening to My sermon even at the edge of the assembly, she will die a puṭhujjana and her destiny on her death will not be safe. But if she goes after coming to Me and listening to My sermon her destiny will be a safe one, she will attain sotāpatti-phala and will be reborn in a divine mansion in Tusitā. Besides there would be no escape for her from death on that very day. That was why the Buddha stretched out His neck and looked at the girl.)

After taking the cue from the Buddha, and approaching the Buddha by passing through His six rays of light, she paid homage and stood at a proper place. The following questions and answers between the Buddha and the girl then took place:

Buddha: “Where did you come from, young lady?”

Young lady: “I do not know, Exalted Buddha.”

Buddha: “Where are you going?”

Young lady: “I do not know, Exalted Buddha.”

Buddha: “Do you not know, young lady?”

Young lady: “I do, Exalted Buddha.”

Buddha: “Do you know, young lady?”

Young lady: “I do not, Exalted Buddha.”

In this way the Buddha asked the girl four questions. Realising what was meant by the Buddha, the girl gave her answers in profound significance.

Those people, who did not understand the significance, reproached her, saying: “Behold this girl, friends! In her conversation with the Buddha did she speak at random what she wanted to, which is just nonsense. When asked: ‘Where did you come from?’ she should have answered: ‘I came from my weaving home’, when asked: ‘Where are you going?’ she should have answered: ‘To the weaving work-shop.’”

The Buddha, after silencing the people, asked the girl:

(1) “Young lady, when I asked you, ‘Where did you come from?’ why did you say you do not know?”

Then the girl answered: “Exalted Buddha, You knew of course that I came from my weaving home. Indeed, by ‘Where did you come from?’ You mean to say from which existence did I come to this weaver's existence. I do not know which existence I came from. Hence my answer: ‘I do not know.’”

The Buddha then expressed His appreciation for the first time, saying, “Well said, well said! Young lady you have answered the question raised by Me.” He asked another question:

(2) “Young lady, when I asked you ‘Where are you going?’ why did you say you did not know?”

The girl answered: “Exalted Buddha, You knew of course that I am going to the weaving work-shop with the woof basket in my hand. Indeed, by ‘Where are you going?’ You meant to say to which existence I was going from this human existence. To which existence I am going I do not know. Hence my answer: ‘I do not know.’”

The Buddha then expressed His appreciation for the second time, saying, “You have answered the question raised by Me.” He asked still another question:

(3) “Young lady, when I asked you ‘Do you not know?’ why did you say you did?”

The girl answered: “Exalted Buddha, I know I am bound to die. Hence my answer: ‘I know.’”

The Buddha then expressed His appreciation for the third time, saying “You have answered the question raised by Me.” He asked still another question:

(4) “Even then, young lady, when I asked you ‘Do you know?’ why did you say you do not?”

The girl answered: “Exalted Buddha, I do know that I am bound to die. I, however, do not know what time will I die, whether at night, during day time, in the morning, or when. Hence my answer: ‘I do not know.’”

The Buddha then expressed His appreciation for the fourth time, saying, “You have answered the questions raised by Me.” Then the Buddha addressed the audience:

“You do not know even this much of the significance in the answers given by this girl. Reproach, that is all you can do. Verily those who lack the eye of wisdom are blind (despite their organic eyes). Only those who have the eye of wisdom are sighted.”

After that the Buddha spoke this Dhamma-verse:

Sakuṇo jālamutto'va
appo saggāya gacchati.*

My virtuous audience! This world composed of numerous worldly people, who do not see but feel things by touching them, is like the blind for lack of the eye of wisdom. In this multitude of countless worldly people only a few highly intelligent ones can reflect and discern the nature of the conditioned mind and matter in the light of the three characteristics. Just as the quails that escape from the bird-catcher's net are of inconsiderable number, even so only a small number of sharp intelligent persons attain the abode of devas and humans and the bliss of Nibbāna.

At the end of the teaching, the weaver's daughter, was established in the state of sotāpatti-phala. The teaching was also beneficial to many people.

The Girl's Destiny

The girl took the woof-basket and proceeded to her father, who was then dozing while sitting at the loom. When the daughter pushed and moved the basket casually it hit the end of the shuttle and dropped making a sound.

Her father, the weaver woke up from dozing and pulled the shuttle by force of habit. Because of its excessive speedy motion the end of the shuttle struck the girl right in the chest. The girl died on the spot and was reborn in the deva-abode of Tusitā.

When the weaver looked at his daughter, he saw her lying dead with her body stained with blood all over. The weaver was then filled with grief. Thereafter, he came to his senses and thought: "There is no one other than the Buddha who can extinguish my grief." So thinking he went to the Buddha, most painfully weeping and after relating the story, said: "Exalted Buddha, kindly try to cease my lamentation."

The Buddha caused some relief to the weaver and said: "Do not be sad, devotee. The volume of the tears that you have shed on the occasions of your daughter's death in the past saṃsāra of unknown beginning is by far greater than the volume of the waters of the four great oceans." Having said thus the Buddha delivered a discourse on the beginningless round of births and deaths (anamataggiya saṃsāra).

Now with little sorrow, the weaver begged the Buddha to ordain him, and after becoming a bhikkhu he put efforts in meditation and soon reached arahatship. (Loka Vagga, Dhammapada Commentary.)

THE BUDDHA'S NINETEENTH VASSA ALSO AT CALIYA HILL

Having travelled to the city of Āḷavī and other places distributing the cool medicinal water of deathlessness among humans and devas, the Buddha spent the nineteenth vassa also at the monastery on Cāliya Hill, doing the same among those beings who were worthy of release.

After spending the nineteenth vassa at Cāliya, the Buddha set out again at the end of the vassa and eventually arrived in Rājagaha and stayed at Veḷuvana, the Bamboo Grove.

Story of The Kukkuṭamitta Hunter

While the Buddha was staying at Veḷuvana, He gave a Dhamma-talk beginning with "Pāṇamhi ce vano nassa," with reference to the family of Kukkuṭamitta, the hunter. The details of the story are as follows:

The daughter of a wealthy man in Rājagaha, on coming of age, was made by her parents to live in comfort in a splendid chamber on the top floor of a seven-storeyed mansion. She was cared for by a maid-servant provided by her parents. One evening, while she was viewing the street through the window, she saw Kukkuṭamitta, the hunter, who earned his living by killing deer, for which he carried five hundred snares and five hundred stakes. At that time the hunter, who had killed five hundred deer, was in a frontal seat of his cart driven by himself and fully loaded with deer-meat for sale. The girl fell in love with him and after handing her maid some presents, she sent her with these words: "Go, dear maid, give these presents to the hunter and try to get the information about the time of his return."

The maid-servant went and gave the presents to the hunter and asked: "What time will you go home?" "After selling the meat today," said the hunter, "I shall go home tomorrow early morning by such a such a gate." Having got the hunter's reply, the maid-servant returned and told her mistress about it.

The mistress then packed her clothings, ornaments, gold and silver that she should take with her, and put on dirty garments early that morning, carried a water-jar on her head and left her house as though she were going to the river-side. Reaching the place mentioned in the hunter's reply, she waited for the hunter's coming. The hunter came out from the city driving his cart early that morning. The lady then followed the hunter's cart with alacrity.

On seeing the young lady, the hunter said: "O lady, I do not know whose daughter you are. Please do not follow me." "You did not ask me to come," replied the lady, "I came on my own accord. Drive on your cart quietly." The hunter repeated his words to prevent her from following him. Then the young lady said: "Lord, one should not bar the fortune that has come to oneself." Only then the naive hunter came to understand without any doubt the reason for her dogged following him, he picked the young lady up on to the cart and drove away.

The parents of the young lady searched for their daughter everywhere and could not find her. At long last they concluded that she must have been dead and held a feast in memory of their daughter (matakabahatta).

Because of her living together with the hunter, the lady gave birth to seven sons and she had them married on their coming of age.

The Spiritual Liberation of The Hunter's Family

On surveying the world of sentient beings in the early morning one day, the Buddha saw the hunter Kukkutamitta together with his seven sons and seven daughters-in-law who came into the view of His supernormal-vision. When He investigated the reason, He discerned the past merit of all these fifteen persons that would lead them to the attainment of sotāpatti-magga. Taking His bowl and robe, the Buddha went alone early that morning to the place where the snares were set up. That day not a single animal happened to be caught.

The Buddha then put His footprint near the hunter's snares and sat down in the shade of the bush in front of him.

Carrying his bow and arrows, Kukkutamitta went early to that place and checked the snares, one after another; he found not a single deer caught, and all he saw were the Buddha's footprints.

Then it occurred to him thus: "Who could have set the animals free from the snares and roamed about?" Having a grudge against the Buddha (even before he saw Him) and while moving about, he saw the Buddha sitting under the bush before him. Thinking: "This than must be the one who had released my ensnared animals. I will kill Him with an arrow," he bent the bow and pulled the string with all his might.

The Buddha permitted him to bend the bow and pull the string, but He did not permit him to release the arrow. (The Buddha performed a miracle so that the hunter could do the bending of the bow and the pulling of the string but not the shooting.) Not only was he unable to shoot the arrow, he was also helpless in unbending the bow. It appeared that his ribs were going to break, and the saliva flowed from his mouth. Looking very exhausted, he stood like a stone statue

The seven sons went to the father's house and asked their mother during a conversation with her: "Father is taking so long. What would be the reason for his delay?" When asked by their mother: "Follow your father, dear sons," they went after their father, each holding his bow and arrows. Seeing their father standing like a stone figure (and seeing the Buddha sitting in the shadow of the bush,) they thought: "This man must be the enemy of our father." Everyone of them then tried to bend his bow and pull the string. On account of the Buddha's miraculous power, however, they all stood wearied like lithic figures as their father.

Their mother then wondered: "What is the matter? My sons were also taking too much time!" With her seven daughters-in-law, she went after them and saw all eight persons: the father and his sons. When she looked around, wondering: "Whom these eight, the father and his sons, were aiming at while so standing?" she saw the Buddha, and with her both arms up she shouted aloud: "Do not destroy my Father, sons!"

Hearing the cry (of his wife), Kukkuṭamitta the hunter thought: "Oh, I am ruined! This man is said to be my father-in-law. Oh, I have done a great misdeed!" The seven sons also thought: "This man is said to be our grandfather! We have done a great mistake!" Thereafter, under the impression that "This man is my father-in-law!" the hunter cultivated loving-kindness (towards the Buddha). So did the seven sons with the notion that "This man is our grandfather!"

Then the mother of these seven sons, the daughter of a wealthy man said: "Discard your bows and do obeisance to my Father." As He knew the eight men had become soft-minded, the Buddha let them put down their bows. (He now withdrew His miraculous power that He had previously exercised in order to prevent them from laying down their bows.) The eight people then did obeisance to the Buddha, saying: "Kindly forbear our wrong, Exalted Buddha," and they took their seats at proper places.

When they were thus seated uniformly, to them, a family of sixteen members, the Buddha gave a series of talk: Dāna-kathā, Sīla-kathā, Sagga-kathā, Kāmānaṃ ādīnava-kathā, Nekkhamme-ānisaṃsa-kathā, in this order. At the end of the talk, the fifteen persons, Kukkuṭamitta the hunter and his seven sons and the seven daughters-in-law, were established in sotāpatti-phala. Having thus helped them realise Fruition, the Buddha entered Rājagaha City for aims-round and returned to the monastery in the afternoon.

The Buddha was then asked by the Thera Ānanda: "Where have you been, Exalted Buddha?" "I have been to the place of Kukkuṭamitta the hunter, my dear son Ānanda," was the answer. "Have you, Exalted Buddha, made him one who refrained from the wrongdoing of taking life? Have you admonished and emancipated him?" "Yes I have, dear Ānanda," the Buddha answered. "All of them, with Kukkuṭamitta as the fifteenth member, are now established in unwavering faith, absolutely free from doubts in the Three Gems, and become non-doers of the evil act of killing."

The monks interrupted them, saying: "Exalted Buddha, there is also the hunter's wife; was she not there?" "Yes, she was," answered the Buddha. "Monks, that house-wife has already become a sotāpanna while still living as a girl in her parent's home."

Then a discussion took place at a religious meeting (in the Dhammasala, the Dhamma-hall, where discourses are heard and discussed) as follows:

"Friends, Kukkuṭamitta's wife (a merchant's daughter) had attained sotāpatti-phala while being a young woman and living still with her parents. Thereafter she followed the hunter to his home and had seven sons. Asked by her husband to bring the bow, the arrow, the spear, the stake, or the net, she would bring them to him. The hunter on his part would carry those weapons given by his sotāpanna wife and would commit the evil deed of taking life for long, day after day. How is it friends? Do those sotāpanna individuals, the Noble Ones, too commit such a crime?"

The Buddha came to the monk's meeting and asked: "What was the subject-matter of your discussion, monks, before I came here?" The monks answered: "We were discussing this matter (of Kukkuṭamitta's wife, the daughter of a merchant)." Thereupon the Buddha said:

"Monks, the Noble Ones, sotāpannas, never commit such a crime as killing. The hunter's wife brings him such weapons as bow and arrow because she was mindful of her duty, the duty that the wife must obey her husband's word. She had no intention to make the hunter go to the forest with the weapons in his hand for the evil act of taking-life; she had not the slightest idea of that sort.

“For example, if there is no sore on the palm of the hand, one who uses that hand for holding poison cannot be harmed by the poison; similarly, to him who does not do any evil because he has no unwholesome intention, no bad result accrue to him though he may have fetched the weapon.”

Having said thus, the Buddha spoke the following verse as a continuation of His utterance:

*Pānimhi ce vaṇo nāssa, hareyya paṇinā visam̃.
Nabbaṇam̃ visam̃ anveti n'atthi pāpaṃ akubbato.*

Monks, if there is no sore or injury in the palm of a hand, poison cannot harm it. (Therefore) with that hand without any sore or injury, one should be able to carry the poison safely. Similarly, to him who has not done a wrong thing because he has no unwholesome volition, there arises not the slightest act of wrongdoing (just by bringing a bow and the like).

(As poison cannot hurt the hand free from a boil or a cut, so he who just passes over a weapon, such as a bow and an arrow, does not do evil as he has no wicked intention. That is to say, as no poison can affect the healthy hand, so no [desire for doing] evil can approach his stout heart.)

By the end of the preaching, many attained sotāpatti-phala and other Fruitions.

The Past Merit of Kukkuṭamitta's Family

At a later time, in the Dhamma-assembly, the monks were engaged in a conversation among themselves:

“(1) Friends, what was the past merit that caused the attainment of sotāpatti-magga of Kukkuṭamitta, the hunter, who had seven sons and seven daughters-in-law? (2) Why was he born in a hunter's family?”

Thereupon the Buddha came and asked: “Monks, what are you talking about?” and getting the reply as to what they were talking about, the Buddha related the story of the hunter's past merit as follows:

“Monks, in times past, when people were holding a discussion on the construction of a huge shrine over Buddha Kassapa's relics, they deliberated the question as to what should be used for fine earth and what for the liquid matter.

Then they got an idea to use orpiment for fine earth and sesame oil for the liquid matter, and they all agreed to do so. The people had the orpiment powdered and mixed it with sesame oil and used it as cement plaster to hold the bricks together. The bricks that were laid inside the shrine were coated with gold. As for the layer of bricks outside the shrine, they laid bricks of gold. Each brick was worth a hundred thousand.

Selection of President for Enshrinement Ceremony

When the people's construction of the stupa was completed enough for enshrining the relics, a discussion took place as to ‘who should be selected president,’ for a great deal of money was badly needed when enshrining the relic.

Then a country merchant, thinking: “I shall become president”, donated money amounting to one crore to the enshrinement fund. On seeing the generosity of the country merchant, the people dispraised the town merchant, saying: “This town merchant accumulates wealth like white ants. He is not eligible to become chief of this occasion for constructing such a great relic-shrine. But the country merchant has generously donated ten million and is becoming president.”

On hearing what the people had said, the town merchant gave in charity two crores hoping to become president.

“Only I must be president of the enshrinement ceremony,” thought the country merchant and gave away three crores. In this way the donations made by both parties increased till the town merchant's contribution became eight crores.

But the country merchant had only nine crores at his place, In the residence of the town merchant, however, there were forty crores. Therefore it occurred to the country merchant thus: “If I gave nine crores the merchant from the town would say that he would donate ten. Then (as I cannot compete with him) the state of my being without wealth will be known to all.” He then said: “I will donate this much of money. I shall also take upon myself servitude to the stupa together with my seven sons, seven daughters-in-law and my wife.” So saying he brought his family members and dedicated them and himself, sixteen persons in all, to the stupa.

“Acquisition of more funds is possible, [that of dedicated human labour is not],” said the people, “This country merchant has given up his seven sons and seven daughters-in-law and wife and himself to the stupa. Let him therefore become president of the enshrinement ceremony.” Thus they all unanimously selected the country merchant as president.

In this way the sixteen family-members became slaves to the stupa. But the people agreed to set them free from servitude. The sixteen-member family however took care of the stupa till the end of their lives, and on their death were reborn in a celestial abode.

The sixteen persons enjoyed the blissful life in that abode during the whole Buddhantara asaṅkhyeyya-kappa (i.e. the period between the lifetime of Buddha Kassapa and that of our Buddha). When the time of Buddha-Emergence [Buddh'uppāda came as our Buddha (Gotama)] appeared, the housewife to the merchant passed away from the celestial abode and became a merchant's daughter in Rājagaha. While only a young girl she attained sotāpatti-phala.

(“Adiṭṭha-saccassa pana paṭisandhi nāma bhāriyā,” so says the Commentary.) “The birth of a worldling, who has not discerned the Four Truths is burdensome.” (For he is likely to be reborn into a lowly family despite the fact that, that very life is his last (pacchima-bhāvika); for he has not overcome the risk of falling into a lowly state.) Therefore the deva who had been the husband of the merchant's daughter, on his return to the human world, was reborn in a family of hunters. As soon as she saw the hunter, her former love (taṅhā-pema) revived. That was why the Buddha spoke the following verse:

*Pubbe'va sannivāseṇa, paccuppaññāhitena vā.
Evam taṃ jāyate pemaṃ, uppalaṃ va yathodake.*

Because of living together in love in the past and also because of benefiting one another at present, for these two reasons, love of two types, taṅhā-pema and mettā-pema, arose. (How?) just as lotuses and any other aquatic flowers thrive, depending on the two factors of water and mud).

It was only because of her love in the past that she followed the hunter to his house. Their sons, from the celestial abode and took conception in the womb of the merchant's daughter. The daughters-in-law were reborn in various families, and on coming of age, they all went over to the home of the hunter's family owing to their affection they had had in their past lives.

As the result of their services rendered together to the relic stupa dedicated to Buddha Kassapa the sixteen members of the hunter's family attained sotāpatti-phala in this Buddha's dispensation.

End of story of Kukkuṭamitta the hunter.

Story of Ānanda The Wealthy Merchant

Having distributed the medicinal Dhamma-water of immortality among beings, including the family of the hunter Kukkuṭamitta, while staying at Veḷuvana, Rājagaha. From there the Buddha arrived at Sāvatti and stayed at Jetavana. While staying there, he gave a discourse beginning with “puttā matthi dhanam matthi”, with reference to Ānanda the wealthy merchant and citizen of Sāvatti. The story in detail is as follows:

There was in Sāvatti a wealthy merchant, Ānanda by name, whose wealth was worth forty crores, yet who was extremely stingy. The man had his relatives assembled fortnightly and gave advice to his son, Mūasirī, amidst his kinsmen at three different times, saying thus:

“Dear son, do not think that the forty crores is a great deal of wealth. What is in one’s hand should not be given to another. Try to gain new wealth. He who spends but one coin after another will certainly exhaust his wealth one day. Therefore, we advised:

*Añjanānam khayam disyam disvā upacikānañ ca ācayam
Madhūnañ ca samāhāraṃ paṇḍito gharam āvase.*

Dear son, having observed the disappearance of a collyrium stone due to repeated rubbing, the arising of an anthill due to repeated gathering [of earth] by white ants, the development of a beehive due to repeated collection [of the nectar of flowers] by bees, a wise man should live exerting to keep his old wealth undiminished and to bring about new wealth.

Later on the merchant Ānanda died without telling his son Mūlasirī about his five big jars of gold that he had buried, and being greedily attached to his wealth and dirtying himself with the taints of miserliness; he was, upon his death, conceived in the womb of a caṇḍāla (outcaste) woman in a village of a thousand householders at the gate of the city of Sāvatti.

On learning the merchant’s death, King Kosala summoned the son, Mūlasirī, and appointed him as the successor to his father.

The thousand caṇḍāla households made their living by working collectively as daily wagers, and from the time of the conception of the miser Ānanda, the former rich man, they no longer had the wages nor did they have food more than what was enough. The labourers came to the conclusion, saying: “Now we hardly earn a small morsel of rice despite our hard work. There must be somebody evil and unfortunate among us.” So they divided themselves into two groups, and the dividing process went on and on until there remained the isolated household of the miser’s parents. In that situation, the family of Ānanda said: “The ominous one is in our household” and they expelled Ānanda’s mother.

The mother had much difficulty in obtaining just enough food as long as she was carrying the child in her womb, and she gave birth to a son so miserably. The child’s hands, legs, eyes, ears, nose and mouth were all displaced. With his body so deformed, he looked very ugly, like a little earth-bound demon. Despite all this, the mother did not have the heart to throw him away. In fact, so great was a mother’s love for her child, who had stayed in her womb, that she brought him up with great hardship. On the days she took him to her work, she got nothing, and on the days she left him behind, she got her daily wage.

Later, when the son became big enough to roam about and look for food by himself, the caṇḍāla mother thrust a small bowl into the boy’s hand and said: “Dear son, on account of you we have suffered much. Now we are no longer able to look after you. In this city of Sāvatti, there are readily cooked and reserved meals for destitutes, travellers and so on. Make your living by going where the food is and begging it.” So saying she deserted him.

When the boy roamed about the city, going from one house to another, he arrived at the place where he had lived as Ānanda, the wealthy merchant. As he was endowed with Jātissarā-ñāṇa (ability to remember former births), he boldly entered his own residence. He passed through the first, second and third gates with nobody remembering him or was aware of him. At the fourth gate, however, Mūasirī’s children saw him and cried aloud out of fear.

Then Mūlasirī’s servants beat him, saying: “You, luckless, ill-fated one!” They also took him out of the gate and put him at the garbage heap. At that moment, the Buddha, on His alms-round accompanied by the Venerable Ānanda, was at the scene. The Buddha looked at Venerable Ānanda and at his request narrated the past account and the present events of Ānanda, the wealthy merchant.

The thera then summoned Mūlasarī. People also gathered around. The Buddha then addressed Mūlasarī: “Donor Mūlasarī, do you know this boy?” “I do not, Exalted Buddha.” “This boy is your father Ānanda, the merchant,” said the Buddha. When Mulasiri did not believe it, the Buddha asked Ānanda: “Wealthy Ānanda, tell your son about the five big jars of gold you had buried.” Mūlasarī then become convinced after he had uncovered the five jars of gold, as mentioned by Ānanda.

The merchant Mūlasarī then took refuge in the Buddha. Desiring to preach to Mūlasarī, the Buddha spoke this verse:

*Puttā matthi dhamam atthi
iti bālo vihaññīti
Attā hi attano n'atthi kuto puttā kuto dhanam.*

“I have children; I have wealth,” thinking thus the fool is afflicted by putta-tañhā (craving for children) and dhana-tañhā (craving for wealth). In reality, however, one is not one's shelter from woes. How can children be one's shelter? How can wealth be one's shelter?

(The meaning is: a fool, who considers himself to be the owner of his children and wealth, is troubled by craving for both. How? He is troubled by the notion: ‘My children have died.’ or ‘My children are dying.’ or ‘My children will die.’ The same happens in the case of wealth. In this way, he suffers in six manners: three manners regarding children and three regarding wealth. Since he has craving for children, he plans to feed his children by striving in many ways on land or in water, day or night, and thus he is full of woe. Since, he has craving for wealth, he plans to increase his riches by farming or trading, and was woeful thereby.

(It is impossible for a man, who is woeful, owing to putta-tañhā, and dhana-tañhā to lead himself to safety later on. When death approaches him, he is oppressed by fatal pains (maraṇantika-vedanā) like flames, his joints are broken and his bones separated. He shuts his blinking eyes to visualize his next life and then opens them to see his present life. He is thus miserable on his death-bed; formerly he looked after himself throughout his life, bathing two times and feeding three times a day, adorning himself with perfumes and flowers and other ornaments. But now, even as a true friend to himself, he is unable to release his person from misery. At such a later time, when he is so miserably dying, how can his children or his wealth go to his rescue. Indeed they simply have no ability to save him.

(As for the merchant, who had been reluctant to give somebody something but who had piled up riches only for his son Malasirī, who on his death-bed in his previous life and when he was hungry, ill-treated by others and so miserable in the present life, which of these woes could his beloved children or his accumulated wealth remove? (Indeed neither could do so.) What kind of happiness could they bring to him? (Indeed neither could.) Such is the import of the verse.)

By the end of the discourse eighty-four thousand beings realized the Four Truths and were released. This discourse was (therefore) beneficial to many. (Dhammapada Commentary, Vol I).

THE BUDDHA'S TWENTIETH VASSA AT RĀJAGAHA

In this way, while fulfilling His five great duties without any interruption, while distributing the doctrinal and medicinal cool water of Deathlessness among gods and humans, the Buddha departed from Sāvatti and after travelling in the company of monks, reached Rājagaha in the Kingdom of Magadha, and stayed at Veļuvana to keep the twentieth vassa.

Anibaddha Vassa, etc

Of the Buddha's forty-five vassas, the first twenty, beginning from his Enlightenment are called Anibaddha or Aniyata Vassas because they were spent not at one and the same place but in various towns or villages, one vassa here, two vassas there, three still at another place and so on. They are also referred to as Pathama or Purima Bodhi-Vassas because they formed the first or former half of the whole series of vassas in which gods and men were led to enlightenment by the Fourfold Magga-Nāṇa.

The remaining twenty-five vassas are called Nibaddha or Niyata Vassas because they were spent only at one place i.e. Jetavana or Pubbārāma in Sāvatti in the kingdom of Kosala. They are also known as Dutiya or Pacchima Bodhi-Vassas for they formed the second or latter half of the whole series of vassas in which gods and humans were caused to be enlightened by the Fourfold Magga-Nāṇa.

(Elaboration: For the twenty years (twenty vassas) of the first Bodhi, the Buddha's stay was not regular, for He observed vassa in different towns or villages as he pleased. But from the twenty-first vassa, however, He stayed regularly at Jetavana or Pubbārāma, relying upon Sāvatti as His resort for alms-food.)

— Buddhavaṃsa Commentary —

(A different exposition in the Aṅguttara Nikāya, however, is as follows:

(From the twenty-first vassa, the Buddha's use of the two dwellings of Jetavana and Pubbārāma was permanent because the services, rendered by Anāthapiṇḍika, the wealthy merchant and Visākhā, the woman devotee, were great. In fact, the Buddha dwelt constantly at these residences on account of His being grateful to both donors.

(The Buddha journeyed to other places during non-vassa months, but during vassa He stayed alternatively at these two monasteries. The Buddha, whose custom was to pass His times thus, spent a night at Jetavana went on alms-round the next morning in the company of monks; entered Sāvatti by the south-gate to collect food and went out by the east-gate to Pubbārāma where He spent the day. After spending the night at Pubbārāma, He went on alms-round the next morning in the company of monks, entered Sāvatti by the east-gate to collect food and went out by the south-gate to Jetavana where He spent the day. In case the Pāli version is needed it may be taken from the Commentaries.)

Appointment of Venerable Ānanda as Permanent Attendant

(Therī-gāthā Commentary, Vol. II) During the twenty years of the First Bodhi, the Buddha had no permanent attendant to serve Him. Sometimes Nāgasamāla Thera was at His service, taking His bowl and robe and following Him wherever He went. Sometimes Nāgita. Thera, sometimes Upavāna Thera, sometimes Sunakkhatta Thera, a Licchavī Prince, sometimes Cunda Thera, a brother of Sāriputta Thera, sometimes Sāgata Thera, sometimes Meghiya Thera served Him, travelling about with Him. They did so but generally not to the Buddha's satisfaction.

One day, while the Buddha was sitting in His prepared sacred Buddha-seat surrounded by monks in the Fragrant Chamber, He addressed the monks:

“Now, monks, I am old. (At that time he was fifty-five years of age.) When I tell some attendants: ‘Let us go this way’, they leave me and went the other way and some attendants put down my bowl and robe on the ground. Consider and select a permanent attendant for Me.”

The monks were shocked and stirred on hearing this from the Buddha. Then Venerable Sāriputta stood up and saluted the Buddha, saying: “I will serve you, Exalted Buddha.” But the Buddha rejected the Venerable's offer. Following Venerable Sāriputta, all other Venerables, except Ānanda, led by Venerable Moggallāna, made their offers, one after another, saying: “I will be your attendant, Venerable Sir, I will be your attendant, Venerable sir.” The Buddha rejected their offers too.

The Venerable Ānanda, however, was just sitting and keeping silent there when asked by the other monks: “Friend Ānanda, you too beg the post of the Master's attendant.” The Venerable replied: “Friends, what kind of a post is it that is secured by begging? Should the Exalted One want me, He Himself will say so.” Then the Buddha said:

“Monks, Ānanda is not a type of persons who need to be urged. He will serve Me using his own discretion.”

Then the monks asked him again: “Stand up, Ānanda, ask the Master for the post of His attendant.” Venerable Ānanda rose from his seat and said:

“Exalted Buddha,

- (1) if you do not give me good robes received by you;
- (2) if you do not give me good food collected by you;
- (3) if you do not give me the privilege to sit together with you in the Fragrant Chamber;
- (4) if you do not take me to the places you are invited;

then (i.e. if you comply with these four wishes of mine) I shall serve you, Exalted Buddha.”

(These four negative boons were begged so that nobody else could disapprovingly say: “With such benefits or gains in view, who would think it is burdensome to serve the Master?”)

“Exalted Buddha,

- (1) if you go at my request to the places invited (by your male and female devotees);
- (2) if I have the permission to let each and every visitor pay homage to you promptly;
- (3) if I have the permission to approach you, to ask you, the moment there arises any doubt in me;
- (4) if you repeat to me what you have taught in my absence;

then (i.e. if you comply with these four wishes of mine) I shall serve you, Exalted Buddha.”

(These four positive boons were begged in order to avoid others' criticism who would say that “in spite of his service rendered day and night to the Exalted One, poor Ānanda was not favoured by the Master even this much”, and in order to be able to perform good deeds and fulfil perfections, so that he would be recognized by devas and humans as the Treasurer of the Dhamma.)

In this way Venerable Ānanda asked for eight boons, four negative and four positive. The Buddha also bestowed these eight boons on Venerable Ānanda. Venerable Ānanda received thus these eight boons and became permanent attendant to the Buddha. The fruit of his perfections fulfilled for the hundred thousand kappas for that post of permanent attendant was realized on that very day.

A Brief Account of Ānanda's Service

From the day of his appointment as the Buddha's attendant, he served the Master by giving Him hot and cold water, by providing Him with three kinds of tooth brush, short, long and medium, by massaging Him, by rubbing His back when taking a bath, by sweeping the Fragrant Chamber and so on. Venerable Ānanda roamed about near the Buddha each day, deciding “at this hour the Exalted One must get this thing, this should be done to Him.” At night he encircled around the Fragrant Chamber nine times, holding a big torch to be able to answer the Buddha promptly on being asked by Him, and to remove sloth and drowsiness. This is just a brief account of the Venerable Ānanda's service rendered to the Buddha. His other services will be mentioned in the Chapter on the Sangha

Chapter 35

STORY OF MĀRA

(Out of the Buddha's many events that took place during the Pacchima Bodhi, the last twenty-five years, only a few notable one will be written from this chapter onwards.)

Once, the Buddha was staying near Pañcasāla village which He made His resort for aims, for He had discerned the past meritorious deeds of the five hundred young women of the village — the deeds that were potential for their attainment of sotāpatti-magga. On a festive day, the women went to the riverside, bathed, dressed up well and were on their way back to the village.

As Buddha was entering the village for alms-food, Māra, the Evil One, then possessed all the villagers there so as to cause the Buddha being deprived of food, not even a spoonful of rice. Compelled to leave the village with His bowl washed as before, He stood at the village gate. There Māra asked the Buddha: “O Monk, have you received any alms-food?” When the Buddha replied: “Hey Māra, you have done something so that I receive nothing, have not you?” Māra said: “In that case, Venerable Sir, enter the village again for food.” (It was not with honesty that Māra said so. In fact, he did so with an ulterior motive, he would like to possess the villagers again to make more jest at the Monk by clapping hands in front of Him. The Buddha knew Māra's intention and did not enter the village again out of compassion for him. The Buddha was aware that “should Māra do hurt Me in this manner according to his plan, his head would split into seven pieces.”)

The moment the Evil One spoke to the Buddha, the five hundred young women arrived at the village gate, showing their respect to the Buddha and they stood at an appropriate place. Māra then asked the Buddha: “Venerable Sir, if you have no food will you not suffer hunger greatly?” “Hey Māra!” addressed the Buddha, “Even if we have no food collected, I will spend the time in zest (pīti) and bliss (sukha) accompanied by jhāna as Mahā Brahmas, residents of Abhassara Abode and He uttered the following Dhamma-verse thereafter:

Susukham vata jīvāma, yesam no natthi kiñcanam
Pītibhakkhā bhavissāma, devā ābhassarā yathā.

Hey wicked Māra! There is not the slightest degree of worrying things, such as passion, hatred, etc., in us. We shall live long free from suffering and in great happiness. Like Brahmās of Ābhassara Abode, we shall certainly have (for this day) bliss as our food by engaging in the jhāna of zest.

At the end of the teaching, the five hundred young women were established in the sotāpatti-phala.

— Sukkha vagga, Dhammapada —

King Kosala's Matchless Alms-giving

Once as the Buddha travelled and entered the great Jetavana Monastery in the company of five hundred monks, King Pasenadi Kosala went to the monastery and invited the Buddha to the next day's āgantuka-dāna (gift for visitors). He prepared the dāna elaborately and made an announcement: “Let the citizens see my dāna!”

Having come and seen the King's dāna, the citizens became desirous of competing against the King and invited the Buddha for the following day's alms-giving and made every gift perfect and invited the King, saying: “Let the Great King, our recognized Lord (Sammuti Deva), come and observe our charity.”

Having observed the alms-giving of the citizens, the King thought to himself: “The people have done their dāna that is greater than mine. I will again do another alms-giving that will excel theirs.” The next day he prepared his dāna more elaborately and invited the people to witness it. The people saw the King's gifts, and in order not to be outdone by him, they organized for the following day a greater alms-giving and sent an invitation to the King. In this way the King could not defeat the citizens nor the citizens the King.

At the sixth grand offering of alms, the people increased their gifts a hundred time, nay, a thousand times, and decided that their offering should be so perfect that nobody could not say that “Such and such a thing is not included in the dāna of the citizens.”

Seeing the people's offerings, the King became desperate, thinking: “What is the use of my living if I cannot perform better than the people in giving alms?” So he lay down on his couch, finding ways and means to outdo his subjects. Queen Mallikā then went to the King and asked: “Why are you lying down, Great King? Why do your sense faculties such as eyes, look as though they were fading?” “Don't you know, my dear Queen?” asked the king in return. “No, I do not, Great King,” replied the queen. The King then related the matter to Mallikā.

Matchless Offering organized by Mallikā.

Queen Mallikā then said to the King: “Do not have discursive thoughts, Great King. Where have you learnt that a monarch ruling over land and water is defeated by his subjects. I shall try to organize your charity.”

Having encouraged the King thus, the Queen gave her advice as she was desirous of taking the management of the Matchless Alms-giving (asadisa-dāna) in the following manner:

“Have a pavilion, Great King, built with fragrant planks of sāla-kalyāṇī trees for the five hundred monks in the precincts of the golden palace. The people will stay outside the precincts.

“Have five hundred white umbrellas made; each of five hundred elephants will take hold of one umbrella with its trunk, and stand, sheltering each monk with it.

“Have eight boats made of nīphalam gold. These boats are to be filled with perfumes in the middle of pavilion.

“Between each couple of monks will sit a princess grinding scented wood for perfumes. Another princess will hold a round fan and flap it for each couple of monks. Other princesses will convey ground perfumes and put them in the boats.

“Among these princesses, some will carry branches of blue lotus flowers and stir the perfumes in the boats so that they will be pervaded with the fragrance from the perfumes.

“Certainly, the people have no princesses, no white umbrellas, no elephants. For these reasons the citizens will be defeated.

“Do, Great King, as I now have told you.”

Replying: “Very well, my dear, you have given me good advice,” the King had everything done according to the Queen's instructions.

While everything was being done accordingly, a tame elephant was yet required for a monk. Then the king asked: “A tamed elephant is wanted, dear Queen. What shall we do?” “Have you no 500 elephants?” “Yes, I have dear. But the rest are all untamed. Like the verambha wind they might turn very wild on seeing monks.” “I have got an idea, Great King, as to where should a young wild elephant be placed to make him hold an umbrella with his trunk.” “Where is the place?” “It is close to the Venerable Aṅgulimāla,” answered the Queen.

The King had all this done as advised by the Queen. The young wild elephant stood there quietly with his tail tucked between its thighs, its ears put down, and eyes closed. The people were amazed to watch the elephant, saying to themselves: “Even such a wild elephant has now become such a docile and quiet animal!”

Having treated the Sangha headed by the Buddha to alms-food, the King showed his respect to Him and said:

“In this pavilion of alms-giving, Exalted Buddha, I offer to you things suitable for monks (kappiya-bhaṇḍā) as well as things unsuitable for them (akappiya-bhaṇḍā).”

Things offered in this Matchless Dāna in a single day cost fourteen crores. Priceless were the four things offered to the Buddha, namely, (1) the white umbrella, (2) the throne for seat, (3) the stand to place the bowl on and (4) the wooden board to stand on after washing His feet. It was impossible to repeat such a grand offering to the Buddha. Therefore the alms-giving performed by King Kosala became famous in the religion as asadisa-dāna, the “Matchless Gift.”

Indeed, such an Asadisa Dāna should take place but once to every Buddha. And that asadisa-dāna which happened just once to each Buddha was organized by a wise woman.

Ministers Juṅha and Kāla

King Pasenadī Kosala had two ministers: Juṅha and Kāla. Between them, Kāla considered:

“Oh, a loss has indeed occurred to the King's palace? The treasures amounting to many crores have come to nothing in a single day. Having taken the King's gifts, these monks will return to their place and abandon themselves to slumber. Oh, the palace has come to ruin in unprecedented proportions!”

On the contrary, Juṅha thought like this:

“Oh, the King has properly and successfully given alms? True, one who is not established in kingship (he who is not a monarch) cannot give such alms. There is no alms-giver who does not share his merit with all other beings. I rejoice at the King's excellent asadisa-dāna and say: Sādhu! Sādhu! Sādhu!”

Reflecting thus the minister Juṅha appreciated and took delight. When the Buddha had finished His partaking of food, King Pasenadī Kosala made himself ready to hear the sermon by holding a cup to pour the water of dedication, the sermon to be given by the Buddha in approval of the King's dāna. The Buddha reflected as follows:

“The King has indeed done at great sacrifice as though he let a great flood roll down waves after waves. Could he succeed in gladdening the hearts of the people or could he not?”

Then He came to know the reactions in the minds of the two ministers and came to know further thus: “If I were to give a detailed sermon that goes well with the King's dāna, the ministers Kāla's head will be split into seven pieces but the other minister, Juṅha, will be established in sotāpatti-magga. Taking pity on Kāla, the Buddha delivered only a four-footed verse (catuppadika) despite such a great alms-giving performed by the King; then He rose from His seat and left for the monastery.

Venerable Aṅgulimāla's Courage

On their arrival back at the monastery, the monks asked the Venerable Aṅgulamāla: “When you saw the wild elephant holding the umbrella over you, friend, were you not afraid?” Getting the answer in the negative, the monks drew near to the Buddha and complained with contempt, “The Venerable Aṅgulimāla, Exalted Buddha, professes to be an arahat.”

“Monks,” addressed the Buddha, “Aṅgulamāla was not afraid indeed. Ascetics like my dear sons who are highly noble amidst arahats have no fear.” And the Buddha added the following verse as contained in the Brāhmana-vagga (of the Dhammapada):

*Usabham pararam vīram, mahesim vijitavinam.
Anejam nhātakaṃ buddham, tam aham brūmi brahmaṇam*

(Monks!) The arahat with his āsavas destroyed, who is courageous as he knows no trembling like a bull-king, who possesses noble energy, who has sought and acquired the aggregate of virtues, who has triumphed over the three evils, namely, Māra as deity, Māra as moral defilement, and Māra as conditioning factors, who has quenched all craving for existences, who has washed away his mental dirt with the clear water of the Path and who has realized the Four Truths, him I declare an ultimate Brāhmana as he really is.

Destinies of The Two Ministers

King Pasenādī Kosala was unhappy and thought to himself as follows: “The Exalted One has risen from His seat and left without giving me a sermon that would befit the occasion though I have performed a great dāna to the assembly of such greatness. Instead, He has merely uttered a verse. Perhaps, I have not done what is agreeable to Him, I must have done what is not agreeable. Perhaps, I have not given suitable things, I must have given unsuitable things. Perhaps the Buddha is averse to me. The alms-giving performed by me is known as Asadisa Dāna. The Buddha should have therefore delivered some discourse appropriate to this kind of gift.” Thinking thus he went to the monastery, paid obeisance to the Buddha and said:

“Exalted Buddha, have I not done right dāna, or have I not given things good for the dāna or have I given things that are not good?”

When the Buddha replied: “Why do you ask me like this, Great King?” The King said: “You delivered no sermon in accord with my asadisa-dāna.” The Buddha stated:

“You have given right things, Great King. Yes, the gift you have given is known as ‘Asadisa Dāna’. This kind of gift happened to each Buddha but once. It is not easy to repeat it.”

Then the King asked: “Why then, Exalted Buddha, did you not preach to us in accord with the greatness of the gift?” “Because the audience was not pure.” “What was the defect of the audience, Exalted Buddha?”

The Buddha then told the King of the reactions of the two ministers and explained that He did not preach elaborately out of compassion for Kāḷa. The King then asked Kāḷa whether it was true. When Kāḷa answered in the affirmative, the King banished him from the Kingdom, saying:

“As I gave, with my family, our properties without taking a coin from you, what trouble did you suffer? You, Kāḷa, get out! But the wealth I have given you remains yours. (I will not take it back.) But you must leave the country on this day!”

Then the King summoned the other minister, Junha, and asked him whether it was true that he had favourably reacted, and on receiving the positive answer, the King said to Junha:

“Well done, uncle, well done! I adore you, uncle. Take over my retinue and give dāna for seven days the way I have done.”

So saying, the King handed over his kingship to Junha for seven days, after which, he addressed the Buddha: “Look at what the fool has done, Exalted Buddha. He is the one who stood against my dāna given in such a manner!” “Yes, Great King,” said the Buddha, “the fools are those who do not approve of another's act of charity but condemn it and finally landed in a woeful abode. The wise, however, rejoice in other's dāna and finally attained happy states.” And the Buddha uttered the following verse:

*Na ve kadariyā devalokaṃ vajanti
bālā have nappasaṃsanti dānaṃ
Dhīro ca dānaṃ amumodamāno ten'eva so hoti sukhī parattha.*

(Great King!) Indeed those who are hard and stingy do not attain celestial abodes. The fools, who are ignorant of the present world and the future, indeed do not admire dāna and are not happy about it. Only the far-sighted man of wisdom is able to rejoice in dāna. For, that very reason of his rejoicing, upon his death, he enjoys divine bliss.

At the end of the Teaching, the minister Junha became a noble sotāpanna. Enjoying the King's favour, he performed charitable acts for seven days in the manner of the King

End of King Kosala's Asadisa Dāna.

Sivi & Āditta Jātakas related with Reference to King Kosala's Matchless Dāna

When the Buddha spoke the verse beginning with “Na ve kadariya devalokam vajanti”, King Pasenadi Kosala was so pleased that he offered the Buddha an outer robe made in Sivi country and worth one hundred thousand coins. Thereafter, he entered the city.

The next day, at the assembly, the monks talked about the King's generosity; “Friends, King Kosala was not satisfied even with his matchless Dāna that had just been given; so, after the Exalted One had preached the Dhamma, he offered him again the Sivi-made outer robe worth one hundred thousand. The King is so much insatiable in his thirst for alms-giving.” Then the Buddha came and asked what they were talking about and on hearing what was being discussed, He said:

“It is easy, monks, to give away one's external belongings. The good wise Bodhisattas of old gave away daily their wealth to the value of six hundred thousand, making it unnecessary for the whole populace of the Jambudīpa to work with their ploughs. Yet they were not satisfied with giving such external things (bāhira-dāna). They believed unwaveringly that ‘he who gives what he is very fond of can enjoy the special benefit which he is so fond of.’ With this belief, they gave away even their pairs of eyes to those who came into their presence and asked for.”

At the request of the monks, the Buddha related the Sivi Jātaka, an event of the past (as contained in the Visati Nipāta).

One day, after King Kosala's Matchless Alms-giving, the monks at the assembly discussed among themselves: “Friends, only with discrimination did King Kosala give the Matchless Dāna to the Order of noble monks headed by the Exalted One, as he knows by himself that they form the fertile soil for sowing the seeds of meritorious deeds.”

The Buddha joined them and knowing what they were talking about, He said:

“Monks, it is no wonder that after careful selection, King Kosala has sown the seeds of unique alms-giving in the supreme field of my dispensation. Learned and virtuous Bodhisattas of past also performed great dānas only after discriminating the recipients very carefully.”

Then at the request of the monks, the Buddha narrated the Āditta Jātaka (of the Atthaka Nipāta.)

(The Sivi Jātaka and the Āditta Jātaka in detail may be taken from the five hundred and fifty Birth Stories of the Buddha in prose.)

Story of Garahadinna and Sirigutta.

In Sāvatti, there were two friends: the Householder Sirigutta and Garahadinna. The former being a follower of the Buddha whereas the latter, a follower of heretical teachers. The heretical teachers said constantly to Garahadinna:

“Should you not ask your friend Sirigutta thus: ‘Friend, why do you follow the Monk Gotama? What will you gain from the Monk Gotama?’ Should not you persuade him in such a way as to make him come over to us and offer us something?”

On hearing the words of his teachers again and again, Garahadinna went to his friend and wherever they were standing, sitting, or doing something else, he said to Sirigutta:

“Friend, what is the use of the Monk Gotama to you? What benefit will accrue to you from your devotion to the Monk Gotama? Do you not think you should serve my teachers and give them alms?”

The Householder Sirigutta said nothing and kept silent for many days. But being sick of hearing his friend's repeated speech, he said to Garahadinna one day:

“Friend, you come to me constantly and wherever we are standing, sitting or doing something else, you ask me what benefit will accrue to me from my devotion to my Master and you also urge me to go over to your teachers and give them alms. But tell me first what things do your teachers know?”

Then Garahadinna replied to his friend Sirigutta:

“Oh! What a surprise, Sir!, Do not speak like this. As for my teachers, there is nothing is unknown. They know all about the past, the present and the future; all that is done, said and thought, i.e. physical, verbal and mental actions. They know, ‘This will happen and this will not.’ They know, ‘This should be and this should not’. They know all fully.”

Thereupon, Sirigutta asked Garahadinna in order to get his affirmation: “Friend, do you say so?” The latter boldly affirmed: “Yes, I do.” Then the former said:

“In that case, friend, you have made a grave mistake by not telling me about this for such a long time. Only today I will know the intellectual power of your teachers. Go, friend, invite your teachers in my name (for the meal) tomorrow.”

Delighted, the Householder Garahadinna went to his teachers, paid respect and said: “Masters, my friend Sirigutta has invited you to tomorrow's meal.” The heretical teachers asked: “Did Sirigutta himself do so?” “Yes, Sirs, Sirigutta himself did,” replied Garahadinna in confirmation. Jubilant, the heretical teachers said: “Very well, Garahadinna. With the Householder Sirigutta as our devoted follower, what luxury is there that will not be ours?”

Preparations at Sirigutta's Home

Sirigutta's home was very large. In the compound he had a long huge ditch dug between his two houses and had the ditch filled with excrement.

On the two outward edges, tree stumps were set up and fastened with ropes. The fore-legs of couches were placed on the fore-edge of the ditch and the hind-legs on the ropes. This was made with this idea: ‘When they come, they will take their seats; when they take their seats, they will fall headlong into the ditch.’

Then the couches were covered with coverings (the edges of which touching the ground) so that the ditch was hidden.

Several large pots were placed behind the house. The brims of the pots were bound with banana leaves and white pieces of cloth and the empty pots smeared on the outside with gruel, rice, butter, oil, honey, molasses and crumbs of cakes.

The next day the Householder Garahadinna went quietly to Sirigutta's residence early in the morning and asked: “Have you prepared your offerings for the Venerable Ones?” “Yes, I have,” replied Sirigutta. “Where are the offerings?” asked Garahadinna again. Sirigutta answered, pointing to the pots: “These pots are full of gruel. These full of rice. These full of butter, molasses, cakes. The seats have also been arranged.” Saying: “Very good, friend,” Garahadinna left. On his return, came the five hundred heretical teachers to Sirigutta's place.

Sirigutta Lesson given to The Heretical Teachers

Coming out of his house, Sirigutta paid respect with fivefold veneration to the heretical teachers. Raising his folded palms, he stood before them and communicated with them but mentally.

“It is said that you Masters know everything such as the past, etc. It has been said so by your attendant and supporter Garahadinna.

“If you really know all, please do not get into my residence There is no gruel for you who have come to my place. Nor is there rice, nor any other food.

“If you unknowingly enter my dwelling, I will have to get you dumped into the ditch of excrement and also have to get you beaten.”

Having mentally told them thus, Sirigutta signalled his workers by his facial expression that they, knowing that the teachers were about to take their seats, should remove the coverings from behind (just before the teachers sat down) so that the coverings might not be soiled with the excrement.

Then Sirigutta invited the teachers, saying; “Please come this way, Sirs.” The heretics went between the two houses and were about to take their seats when Sirigutta's men said: “Wait a moment, Sirs. Do not sit yet.” “Why?” asked the teachers. “You should sit only knowing your manners.” “What should we do?” “Sirs, you should first stand near your seats, and you all sit down at the same time.”

The teachers said: “Very well,” and considering that the instructions should be followed. They all (five hundred) stood near their seats in order. Then the men told them: “Please sit down all together, be quick!” When the teachers were about to sit, the men removed the coverings from the couches. As soon as the teachers sat down, the legs of the couches on the rope slipped, and they fell head-on into the ditch.

Sirigutta closed the house-doors and to every teacher who had clambered out of the ditch, he gave a good thrashing with his stick, saying: “Why do not you know the events of the past, the future and the present as claimed by your supporter Garahadinna?” After beating them to his satisfaction, he had the doors opened, saying: “This much is enough for them.”

The heretical teachers tried to run away from the house but the plastered ground along the way having been made slippery beforehand, they could not control themselves and fell to the ground. Every one of them who fell down was beaten again and sent away with the word: “This much suffices you.”

The heretical teachers went to the house of their supporter Garahadinna, crying: “Sirigutta, you have ruined and humiliated us! You have ruined and humiliated us!”

Prosecution of Sirigutta by Garahadinna

When the Householder Garahadinna saw his teachers ruined and humiliated and reduced to a disaster, he became furious and said:

“My friend Sirigutta has let me down! He had the heart to have my teachers beaten and made my teachers miserable who form the good field for sowing the seeds of good works and who can bestow all the desired benefits in the deva-world even on anyone who just stretches his hands to pay respect to them (not to speak of anyone who gives them offerings).”

Muttering thus, he went to the court of King Pasenadi Kosala and filed a suit for a fine of one hundred coins against Sirigutta.

Then King Kosala summoned Sirigutta to the court. Sirigutta came and paid respect to the King and said: “Great King, impose the fine on me only after investigating the matter. Do not do so without an inquiry.” When the King agreed, saying: “Householder I shall fine you only after investigation.” Sirigutta said: “Very well, Great King.” “Then you, Sirigutta, state your case,” asked the King. Sirigutta reported to the King all that had happened, beginning with the following words:

“Great King, my friend Garahadinna, a follower of the heretical teachers, repeatedly asked me everywhere what was the use of following the Monk Gotama and what benefit would accrue to me from my devotion to the Monk Gotama.”

The King, looking at Garahadinna, asked: “Did you really say so?” When the latter admitted, saying: “Yes, Great King,” the King passed the following judgment:

“Regarding your teachers, who as ‘Great Buddhas’ are so ignorant (of the creation of the dirty ditch), why did you tell Sirigutta, a follower of the Exalted One, that they knew all the events that took place in the three divisions of time — past, present and future? The fine of one hundred thousand coins for which you have sued Sirigutta must be paid by you.”

So saying, the King imposed the payment of the fine on Garahadinna. His heretical teachers who had come to the court as complainants were beaten and sent away.

Garahadinna's Revenge

The Householder Garahadinna was angry with Sirigutta and did not speak to him for a month thence. Then he thought to himself: "For me, it is not nice not to be on speaking terms with him. Indeed, I should ruin his teachers (in revenge)." So he went to Sirigutta and broke the ice: "Friend Sirigutta!" "What is the matter, friend?" replied Sirigutta. Then the former blamed him, saying:

"Friend, it is natural for friends and relatives to quarrel or dispute. Why did not you speak to me of anything, friend? Why are you behaving like this (in estrangement)?"

Sirigutta replied calmly: "Friend I did not speak to you because you did not speak to me. (There is no other reason.)" Garahadinna said to make peace: "Friend, let bygones be bygones. Let us not destroy our mutual friendship." From that time, they became reconciled and moved about together.

One day, Sirigutta said to his friend: (the way the latter had done before): "Friend, what is the use of your teachers for you? What benefit will accrue to you from your devotion to your teacher? Do not you think you should serve my teacher, the Exalted One, and give alms to the Venerable Ones?" Garahadinna had been longing always for that kind of speech, and it was like scratching an itchy part of his body with a finger nail.

So he asked his friend: "Friend Sirigutta, what does your teacher, the Monk Gotama know?" Then Sirigutta said:

"Friend, do not speak like that. There is nothing that is not known to our teacher, the Exalted One. He knows all the things of the past, etc., He comprehends clearly the analysis of the sixteen aspects of a living being's mental process."

Then Garahadinna said: "Friend, I did not know it earlier. Why have you kept silent about it for such a long time? In that case, friend, you go and invite your teacher, the Exalted One, for the meal at my place tomorrow. I would like to feed. Please tell him to accept with five hundred monks the food I am going to offer." So Sirigutta approached the Buddha and said:

"Glorious Buddha! My friend Garahadinna has asked me to invite you. He said you should accept, together with five hundred monks, his food-offering tomorrow. There is, however, one thing: one day in the past I did something unpleasant to his heretical teachers; I do not know whether he wants to take vengeance for what I have done to him or he wants to offer you food with a pure heart. Please reflect upon his invitation and accept it if he is sincere. If not please do not."

When the Buddha reflected on what ulterior motive Garahadinna had, He foresaw that the householder had a large ditch dug between his two houses, had it filled with eighty cartloads of firewood of cutch, burnt them in order to let the Buddha and his monks fall into the ditch of embers.

Again when the Buddha contemplated: "Will my visit to his place be beneficial or not," he clearly had vision as follows:

He would stretch his leg into the ditch of fire. At that moment the rough mat covering the ditch would vanish. A large lotus flower, having the size of a chariot wheel or a cart wheel, would appear out of the ditch. He would step onto the centre of the flower and sit there. Likewise His five hundred monks would step on to the lotus flowers and take their seats respectively. People would assemble. With two verses, the Buddha would give a talk of blessing. By the end of the talk, eighty-four thousand beings would realize the Four Truths and gain liberation. The two friends, Sirigutta and Garahadinna, would become sotāpanna ariyas. Inspired with faith, both of them would give away their properties in honour of the Buddha's dispensation of eight wonders.

So the Buddha decided to go for the sake of Garahadinna. Having had the vision clearly, the Buddha accepted the invitation by keeping silent. Sirigutta went to Garahadinna's place and told him of the Buddha's acceptance. Saying: "Dear friend, with gladness do honour to the Buddha, the Chief of the three worlds," Sirigutta went home.

Preparations at Garahadinna's Residence

Thinking: "Now is the time to do what should be done to Sirigutta," Garahadinna had a large ditch dug between his two houses, had eighty cart loads of cutch firewood brought there, filled the ditch with the firewood, burnt them to create embers of cutch wood and had them kept glowing the whole night. Over the ditch he had placed wooden planks covered with rough mats that were smeared with cow dung.

He also had the path made by placing fragile sticks on one side so that when monks tread and broke them, they would fall into the ditch of fire.

At the back of his residence, he placed large pots the way Sirigutta did. The seats were also arranged in the same way.

Early in the morning Sirigutta went to Garahadinna's residence and asked: "Friend, have you made your offerings ready?" "Yes, I have," answered Garahadinna. "Where are those offerings?" "Come, let us go and see," said Garahadinna and showed Sirigutta the way the latter had done before. "Excellent, friend!" said Sirigutta delightedly.

People had assembled. There usually was a large gathering of people whenever the Buddha was invited by a man of heretical views. Other heretics also came together, thinking and saying: "We are going to witness with our own eyes the downfall of the Monk Gotama." Those who possessed right beliefs also attended the assembly, hoping that "the Exalted One would deliver a great sermon today. We will have a chance to see the might and glory of the Exalted One."

Emergence of Big Lotus Flowers out of The Fire

The next day the Buddha went with five hundred monks to the gate of Garahadinna's residence. The householder came out and did obeisance with the fivefold prostration; standing and raising his joined hands, he said mentally (not by word of mouth):

"Venerable Sirs, it is said that You know the past and all, that You comprehend the analysis of the sixteen aspects of a living being's mental process. That is what your devotee Sirigutta told me. If that were true, do not enter my house. There is really no gruel, no food, nothing for you. In fact, I am going to harm you by making you all fall into the ditch of fire."

Expressing his intention mentally thus he took the alms bowl from the Buddha's hand. After saying: "Please come this way," he added: "Venerable Sir, you visitors to my place should have come here knowing etiquette." When the Buddha asked: "What should we do?" Garahadinna said: "You should, Sirs, enter the house one by one and it is only after the preceding one has sat down that the next one should follow." [This suggestion was made because if all went together other monks would see the one, who went ahead of them falling into the ditch. Seeing his fall nobody else would proceed. (Therefore) his idea was to destroy them by letting one after another fall into the fire.] Saying: "Very well, donor," the Buddha walked off alone. When Garahadinna came to the fire ditch, he stepped back and told the Buddha to go ahead. As soon as the Buddha stretched His leg over the ditch, the rough mats disappeared. Out of the fire emerged large lotus flowers each having the size of a chariot wheel or a cart wheel. The Buddha walked, stepping on to the centre of each lotus flower, and sat on the Buddha's seat placed there. The five hundred monks, too, walked on the centre of one flower to that of another and took their respective seats.

Garahadinna's Great Distress

On seeing the extraordinary, unprecedented phenomenon, Garahadinna's body emitted heat and vapour, like those from a hot pan of oil. He hurried to his friend Sirigutta and appealed, saying: "Friend Sirigutta, please be my refuge." "Why did you say so, friend?" asked Sirigutta. Garahadinna replied: "There was no gruel, no food, nothing, in my home for five hundred monks. What shall I do?" Sirigutta asked him bluntly: "What have you done, friend?" Garahadinna disclosed:

"Friend, (to speak frankly) I had a large fire ditch made between the two houses, my intention being to subdue the Buddha and his five hundred monks by sending them into the ditch. Yet, there emerged large lotus flowers out of the ditch. The Buddha and all the monks walked on the flowers and are sitting on the seats. What am I to do now?"

When he made his confession and asked for help, Sirigutta argued, saying: "But have you not personally shown me, saying: 'These many are large pots. This much is gruel, This much is rice, etc.?' " "Friend Sirigutta, what I have told you is utter false. The pots are empty, containing no gruel, no rice, nothing," Garahadinna confessed further. Then Sirigutta said (as he had unwavering faith in the Buddha's power and glory): "Be that as it may, friend. You only go home and see the gruel and other foods in your pots."

Unimaginability of The Buddha's Capacity

No sooner had Sirigutta said so, than the pots which were falsely claimed by Garahadinna to be full of gruel became full of gruel, the pots which were falsely claimed by him to be full of rice became full of rice and the same happened to the other pots. When he went home and was confronted with all the miraculous happenings, his whole body was filled with joy. His mind also became serene.

After serving respectfully the Buddha and His monks with food, Garahadinna wanted the Buddha to give a sermon in appreciation of the offerings so he took the alms-bowl from the Buddha who had finished His meal. Desirous of giving such a sermon, the Buddha said: "Because these beings have no eye of wisdom, they are ignorant of the attributes of My disciples and the attributes of My dispensation. Those who possess no eye of wisdom are known to be blind and those who possess it are known to have eye-sight." Then He spoke the following two verses:

(1) *Yatthā saṅkāra-dhānasmiṇ, ujjhitasmim Mahāpathe
Padumamī, tattha jāyetha, sucigandham manoramamī.*

(2) *Evam saṅkārahūtesu, andhabhūte puthujjane
Atirocati Paññāya sammāsbuddha-sāvako.*

- (1) Just as a lotus flower of a hundred petals, pure, fragrant and delightful to every beholder, originates and arises wonderfully in the garbage dump on the public road.
- (2) Even so among those who should be discarded like garbage, the Buddha's Disciple, a good and glorious person who has destroyed all his defilements, glows with splendour, surpassing by his wisdom all the worldlings who are like the blind as they lack wisdom.

By the end of the sermon, eighty-four thousand people realized the Four Truths and won liberation. The two friends, Garahadinna and Sirigutta attained sotāpatti-phala. Inspired by faith, both of them dedicated all their wealth to the cause of the Buddha's dispensation that was of eight wonders.

Relation of Khadirangara Jātaka

After giving an appreciative talk, the Buddha rose and returned to the monastery. At the assembly in the evening, the monks extolled the Master, saying:

“Wonderful indeed, friends, is the power of the Exalted One. A series of lotus flowers, each having the size of a chariot wheel or a cart wheel, arose out of the horrible cutch embers.”

The Buddha came to the assembly and asked: “Monks what are you talking about?” “We are talking about this sort of subject (with reference to your power),” answered the monks. Then the Buddha said:

“Monks, it is no wonder that out of the heap of embers arose lotus-flowers for me to walk on, for I have become Perfectly Self-Enlightened, Chief of the three worlds, Omniscient. The lotus flowers emerged on one occasion in the past, when as a Bodhisatta, I was intellectually immature.” Then at the request of the monks, the Buddha related in detail the Khadirāṅga Jātaka (of the Kulavaka Vagga of the Ekaka Nipāta).

(The Jātaka is to be found in the Buddha's Birth Stories. There the story is told in connection with the alms-giving of Anāthapiṇḍika. It is repeated with reference to Garahadhinna.)

End of the story of Garahadhinna.

Taming of Nandopananda, The Nāga King, by The Venerable Moggallāna

Once, after hearing the Buddha's Dhamma-talk, the merchant, Anāthapiṇḍika, invited the Buddha: “Exalted Buddha, please accept, together with five hundred monks, my alms food at my house tomorrow.” Having the Buddha's acceptance, the merchant returned home.

The Buddha accepted Anāthapiṇḍika's invitation and passed the rest of the remaining daytime and night-time. At dawn, when He surveyed the ten thousand universes, the divine Nāga King, Nandopananda, appeared within the view of His intellectual vision.

The Buddha reflected: “The Nāga King has appeared in my vision. Has he done any good works in the past?” and came to know that “the Nāga King, having no faith in the Triple Gem, holds wrong views.” Again, when He continued to reflect as to who should free the Nāga from the wrong views, He discerned the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna

At daybreak, the Buddha cleaned himself and addressed the Venerable Ānanda: “My dear Ānanda, tell the five hundred monks that I shall make a celestial journey to Tāvātimsa Deva Abode.”

Particularly, on that day, the divine nāgas were preparing for the Nāga King's feast and drunken orgy. Nandopananda was seated on a jewelled divine throne, and had the white divine umbrella held over his head. Surrounded by female dancers of three different categories of age, grown-up, young and those in between, and also by a host of nāgas, he was viewing divine food and drinks, etc., put in gold and silver vessels.

With the five hundred monks the Buddha travelled to Tāvātimsa, passing above the mansion of Nandopananda and thus making Himself visible to the latter.

Then an evil thought arose in the Nāga King: “These wicked shaven-headed monks go to Tāvātimsa and come out passing over our abode from one higher mansion to another. This time, however, we will not allow these monks to move on, who, while doing so scatter, dust over us.” With this evil intention, he rose from his jewelled seat, went to the foot of Mount Meru and after changing his original body, he coiled himself round the mountain in seven folds and concealed the celestial world of Tāvātimsa from sight by enveloping it with his hood that lay prone from above.

Then the Venerable Raṭṭhapāla asked the Buddha: “Glorious Buddha, formerly standing from here, we could see Mount Meru; we could see its surrounding seven mountains; we could see Tāvātimsa; we could see the Vejayanta palace; we could see Sakka's flag hoisted on the Vejayanta Palace. Glorious Buddha, now we could not see Mount Meru, the seven surrounding mountains, Tāvātimsa, the Vejayanta palace, Sakka's Flag, why?”

The Buddha replied: “My dear Raṭṭhapāla, this Nāga King Nandopananda is angry with you all, and so after coiling his body round Mount Meru in seven folds, he has covered it with his hood and created darkness.” Thera Raṭṭhapāla then said to the Buddha: “Glorious Buddha, let me tame the Nāga King” but the Buddha rejected his request. Thereafter, the Theras Bhaddiya, Rāhula and all others, rose one after another in the wake of Thera Raṭṭhapāla and made their offer to tame the Nāga King. But the Buddha did not give them His permission. (The reason for the Buddha's rejection will soon be known.)

At last, the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna asked for the permission to tame the Nāga King and the Buddha granted it to him, saying; “Tame him, my dear Moggallāna.” Having obtained the Buddha's permission, Venerable Moggallāna changed his body into that of a great nāga and coiled his body fourteen folds round Nandopananda and covering Nandopananda's hood with his from above, he also pressed the latter against Mount Meru.

The Nāga King emitted powerful vapour. The Venerable emitted more powerful vapour, saying: “It is not that you alone have the vapour; I too have it.” The Nāga King's vapour could not hurt the Venerable but the Venerable's could hurt him.

Then the Nāga emitted blazing flames. Saying: “It is not that you alone have the flames, I too have them,” the Venerable emitted mightier flames. The flames emitted by the Nāga could not harm the Venerable but the Venerable's could harm the Naga.

The Nāga King, Nandopananda, perceived: “This man is crushing and pressing me against Mount Meru. He is also emitting vapour and blazing flames.” Then he asked the Venerable: “Who are you, Sir?” The Venerable replied: “Nanda, I am the Venerable Moggallāna.” “In that case please wear your ascetic garb. Then the Venerable discarded his Nāga form (and assumed his original ascetic form) and entered the Nāga's body by the right ear and came out by the left. Again he entered by the left ear and came out of the right.

Similarly, he entered the Nāga by the right nostril and came out by the left and entered by the left nostril and came out by the right.

Then Nandopananda opened his mouth for the Venerable who went inside him and walked from east to west and vice versa. The Buddha warned the Venerable, saying:

“My dear son Moggallāna, be very careful. The Nāga King is of great power.”

The Venerable replied:

“I have successfully developed the four bases of psychic powers (iddhipāda) through the five kinds of mastery (vasībhāva). I can subjugate hundreds of thousands of divine nāgas of Nandopananda's type, let alone his single self, Glorious Buddha.”

The Nāga King thought: “I have let the Venerable enter my body through my mouth. Be that as it may. When he comes out now I will keep him between my fangs, and eat him, biting him to pieces.” So he said: “Come out Sir, do not torment me by pacing in my belly.” The Venerable came out and stood outside. As soon as he saw the Venerable, the Nāga King, perceiving: “So this is Moggallāna,” snored fiercely. The Venerable entered upon the fourth jhāna and defended himself against the Nāga's nasal wind, so the wind could not stir even his body-hair.

(Note. Other monks might have the power to perform miracles from the beginning but when the snoring took place, they would not be able to engage in jhāna as rapidly as those who were of instant consciousness concerning supernormal powers (khippa-nisanti) like the Venerable Moggallāna. That was why no permission was given by the Buddha to the other monks to tame the Nāga King.)

Then the Nāga King, Nandopananda, noted: “I was not able to stir even the body-hair in a pore of the monk's skin by snorting. This monk is very powerful indeed.” and tried to escape. The Venerable, having changed his natural shape into that of a garuḷa, pursued the Nāga with the speed of that bird. Being unable to escape, the Nāga turned himself into a young man and fell in salutation at the feet of the Venerable, saying: “Venerable Sir, in you I take refuge.”

The Venerable Mahā Moggallāna said: “Nanda, the Exalted One is coming. Come, let us go [to him].” Having tamed the Nāga and freed him from the poison of conceit, the Venerable took him to the Master. The Nāga paid his respect to the Buddha and solemnly declared himself a follower. “Venerable Sir, I take refuge in you.” The Buddha gave His blessings, saying: “May you be happy both physically and mentally,” and then accompanied by the monks, the Buddha went to the house of the merchant Anāthapiṇḍika.

The merchant asked the Buddha: “Why did you come when the day was in far advanced?” The Buddha said: “There had been a terrible battle of life and death fought between Moggallāna and the Nāga King Nandopananda. (That was why I came late).” The wealthy merchant asked: “Who won the battle and who lost it, Exalted Buddha?” “The victory belonged to Moggallāna and the defeat to Nanda.”

Anāthapiṇḍika was so joyous and elated that he said: “Venerable Sir, may the Exalted Buddha and the monks receive my offering of meal every day for seven days. I will honour the Venerable for seven days.” Then the merchant celebrated the victory of the Venerable by honouring the five hundred monks, headed by the Buddha, for a week.

This account of Venerable Mahā Moggallāna's taming of Nandopananda, the Nāga King, was taken from the Iddhi Niddesa of the Visuddhi Magga Vol. II and also from the exposition of the Mahā Moggallāna Thera Gāthā, Thera Gāthā Commentary, Vol II.

Taming of Baka Brahmā

(The account of the taming of Baka Brahmā by the Buddha occurs in the Baka Jātaka of the Sattaka Nipāta and the Kesava Jātaka of the Catukka Nipāta Text and its Commentary, and also in the Commentary of the Baka Brahmā Sutta of the Saṃyutta Nikāya as the Commentary of the Brahma-nimantanika Sutta of the Mūla-paññāsa covers the Jātaka accounts and the expositions of the Saṃyutta Commentary, the following is based on the Brahmā-nimantanika Sutta Text and its Commentary of the Mūla Paññāsa.)

Once, while dwelling at Jetavana in the noble city of Sāvatti, the Buddha called the monks and said:

“Monks, on one occasion, I was living at the foot of a large sal tree in the Subhaga grove near the town of Ukkatṭha. Then arose, monks, the following thought in Baka Brahmā:

‘The world of Brahmās together with this body is permanent, firm, stable, unique and subject to no change. In this Brahmā-world, there is no one who is conceived, who grows old, who dies, who falls, who is reborn (by way of conception). There is no liberation higher than the Brahmā-world together with this body.’

“Such is the very strong but wrong view of eternalism (sassata micchā-ditṭhi) that arose in Baka Brahmā.”

(Note. Baka Brahmā, who held this view, rejected the existence of the higher transcendent states of the second and third jhāna Brahmā planes, the fourth jhāna Brahmā plane (with the four (arūpa states) and the Path, Fruition and Nibbāna, for he belonged to the first jhāna plane).

“Monks, knowing his thought with (My) mind, I disappeared then from the foot of the sal tree in the Subhaga grove, near Ukkatṭha and appeared in the (first jhāna) Brahmā abode, just as a strong man stretches his bent arm and bends his stretched out arm. When Baka Brahmā saw, from afar, My approaching to him, monks, he said:

‘Sir, please come. Sir, you are welcome. Sir, you visit this Brahmā abode after a long time. Sir, the Brahmā-world, together with this body, is permanent, firm, stable, unique and subject to no change. In this Brahmā-world, there is no one who is conceived, who grows old, who dies, who falls, who is reborn (by way of conception). There is no liberation higher than the Brahmā-world together with this body.’

“Monks, when Baka Brahmā spoke thus, I said:

‘Friends, Baka Brahmā is foolish indeed! Friends, Baka Brahmā is foolish indeed! He speaks of what is not permanent as permanent, what is not firm, not stable, not unique and subject to change as firm, stable, unique and subject to no change. He says that in this Brahmā-world there is no one who is conceived, who grows old, who dies, who falls, who is reborn (by way of conception) though in this Brahmā-world there are those who are conceived, who are born, who die, who fall, who are reborn (by way of conception). He says that there is no liberation higher than the Brahmā-world together with his body though there clearly are higher forms of liberation in terms of other jhānas and Brahmā-worlds such as the second, third, fourth jhāna Brahmā-worlds and the Path, Fruition and Nibbāna.

Possession of An Attendant Brahmā by Māra

“Monks, Māra the Evil One then possessed a young Brahmā attendant (Brahmā-pārisajja) and rebuked Me thus:

‘Monk, do not criticize this Baka Brahmā. Monk, do not criticize this Baka Brahmā. He is great. He is dominant. He is indomitable. Surely, he sees all. He holds sway over all living beings. He rules the world. He creates the world. He is the Lord of the world. He determines a living being’s destiny (declaring: ‘You shall be a king, you shall be a brahmin, you shall be a merchant, you shall be a farmer, you shall be a labourer, you shall be a human, you shall be a monk, (at least) you shall be a camel or you shall be an ox’). He is accomplished in jhāna. He is the father of beings that have arisen and beings that are arising.’ ”

(Note. Of the expressions “beings that have arisen” and “beings that are arising”, the latter means “beings originating in the eggs or in the wombs”. From the time they come out from the eggs or the wombs they are known as “beings that have arisen”.

(In the case of beings originating in moisture (samsedaja), they are called “beings that are arising” at the moment of their rebirth-consciousness, and after that moment they are “beings that have arisen”.

(As for the spontaneous (upapatti) beings they are called “beings that are arising” at the moment of their first bodily posture and after that they are “beings that have arisen”.)

“Monk!, in this world, those samaṇa and brāhmanas before you, who (like you) condemned and abhorred the earth-element, the water-element, the fire-element, the wind-element (as anicca, dukkha and anatta) and who (like you) condemned and abhorred the living beings, devas, māras and Brahmās, (as anicca, dukkha and anatta) they all landed in the lower worlds (of woes) after the dissolution of their bodies at death.

“Monk, in this world, those samaṇas and brāhmanas before you, who admired and cherished the earth-element, the water-element, the fire-element, the wind-element (as permanent, firm, stable, imperishable, unbreakable and inexhaustible) and who admired and cherished the living beings, devas, māras and Brahmās (as firm, stable, imperishable, unbreakable and inexhaustible) they all landed in the sublime (Brahmā) world after the dissolution of their bodies at death.

“Therefore I say unto you, Monk, I want to urge you to follow the Brahmā’s teaching. Do not go against his teaching. Monk, if you go against his teaching, you will be like a man who beats and drives away with a six-foot long stick, the glory that has come right to you or like a man who falls over a cliff and does not land on the supporting ground by not coming into contact with it by his hands and legs. This example will do for you. I therefore want to urge you to follow the Brahmā’s teaching. Do not contradict it. Monk, you see the Brahmās who have assembled, do you not?”

“Thus, Monks, Māra the Evil One aimed his speech at Me and tried to make Me a member of Baka Brahmā’s assembly.”

(Herein it may be asked: "How did Māra see the Buddha?" While staying in his mansion, Māra enquired frequently: “In which village or market town is the Buddha staying now?” When he enquired on this particular occasion, he came to know that the Buddha was staying in the Subhaga grove near Ukkatṭha. When he tried to see where the Buddha had gone, he saw that the Buddha had gone to the Brahmā-world. So he thought: “I will go and make Him give up His desire to preach there before He cause the Brahmās to get out of my dominion.” So he followed the Buddha vigilantly and stood anonymously among the Brahmās. Knowing that the Buddha had rebuked Baka Brahmā, he emerged as a supporter of the Brahmā.

(Māra could not possess Mahā Brahmā and Brahmā-purohita Brahmās. He therefore possessed the young Brahmā attendant.)

“Monk, when the evil Māra spoke thus (through the Brahmā attendant), I refuted him as follows:

‘You evil Māra! I know you. Do not think that ‘the Monk Gotama does not know me.’ You evil One, you are Māra. You evil Māra, the Mahā Brahmā, the assembly of Brahmās, the Brahmā-attendants they all fall into your hand; they are all under your sway. You evil Māra, you are wrong in believing thus: ‘This monk too may fall into my hand. This monk too may come under my sway.’ In reality, I do not fall into your hand. I do not go under your sway.’

“Monks, when I have thus spoken to Māra, Baka Brahmā said to me:

‘Venerable Sir, I speak of what is permanent as permanent. I speak of what is firm, stable, unique and imperishable as firm, stable; unique and imperishable. I say that in the Brahmā-world there is no one who is conceived, who grows old, who dies, who falls off, who is reborn, because in the Brahmā-world there is no one who is conceived, who is old, who dies, who falls off, who is reborn. I say that there is no liberation better than the Brahmā-world with this body because there is no liberation higher than the Brahmā-world together with this body.’

‘Monk, in this world, the practice of those samaṇas and brāhmanas before you was as old as your age. They might have known what my is liberation higher (than the Brahmā-world with this body) as the liberation higher (than the Brahmā-world with this body). They might have known the liberation no higher (than the Brahmā-world with this body) as the liberation that is no higher (than the Brahmā-world with this body).

‘Monk, therefore I say to you this (I assert as follows): You will not find any other liberation higher (than the Brahmā-world with this body). If you search for it, this will mean only trouble and suffering for you.

‘Monk, if you cling to the earth element, you will live near me, you will live in my place, you will be my subordinate. If you cling to the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the living beings, devas, māras and Brahmās, you will live near me, you will live in my place, you will be my subordinate.’

(The Buddha replied:)

‘Brahmā, I too know this: If I cling to the earth element, I will live near you, I will live in your place, I will be your subordinate. So will I and so will I be if I cling to the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the living beings, devas, māras and Brahmās. I know all this!

‘Brahmā, in fact, I know that you are of such great power, of such might, of such great fame and retinue. I know your ability, too.’

Then Baka Brahmā asked the Buddha:

‘Venerable Sir, how do you know that I am of such great power, of such great might, of such great fame and retinue? How do you know my ability too?’

Then the Buddha answered:

‘Your authority lies in a thousand universes, in each universe, the sun and the moon move about and shine in all directions. (Meaning: a vast circular area in which the sun and the moon wander, illuminating all over the directions, is called a Lokadhātu, “World Element”, or Cakka-vāla, “Spherical Universe”.) All over these universes, numbering one thousand, spread your (Brahmā’s) authority.)

‘You, Baka Brahmā, know high and low beings, covetous and uncovetous beings, this and the remaining (999) universes, the rebirth and death of beings in these universes.

‘Baka Brahmā, I know that you are of such great power, of such great might, of such great retinue and fame. I know your ability too.’ (The Buddha’s words have not come to an end yet. A note may, however, be inserted here.)

(By saying so, the Buddha tried to subdue the Brahmā. What he meant to say was this: “Baka Brahmā, your authority spreads only within one thousand universes. Yet you think highly of yourself, ‘I am a great Brahmā.’ You are only a Sahasī-brahmā, i.e. a Brahmā who can see just a thousand universes. There are other Brahmās who are superior to you such as Dvisahasī-brahmās, those who can see two thousand universes, who can see three thousand, four thousand, five thousand, ten thousand universes and Satasahasī-brahmās, those who can see a hundred thousand universes and they are countless. And yet, like a man who tries to compare his piece of cloth, which is only four cubit long, with another piece of cloth that is far greater in length. (Commentarial simile), like a man who desires to immerse himself in the water which is only ankle-deep. (Sub-commentarial simile) or like a small frog which thinks that the water in a bullock’s foot-print is a deep pool (simile used by the wise), you have a high opinion of yourself, thinking, ‘I am a great Brahmā’ ”)

‘Baka Brahmā, there is still another world indeed apart from this world of the first jhāna. You neither know nor see it. But I know and see it. Baka Brahmā, there is still another world known as the Ābhassara-world. Falling from that Ābhassara-world, you have landed in this world of the first jhāna. Because you have lived (in this world of the first jhāna) you have lost your memory. Therefore you neither know nor see that (Ābhassara-world). But I know and see it. Baka Brahmā, because I know (the Ābhassara-world which is unknown to you) you are not equal to Me in intellect. Why should I be inferior to you? In fact, I am superior to you intellectually.’ (1) (the Buddha speech has not come to an end yet. Another note may, however, be inserted here.)

(Baka Brahmā had fallen from the higher worlds and landed in the lower world. Elaboration: In a past kappa, devoid of appearance of a Buddha, Baka Brahmā became an ascetic and practised kaṣiṇa meditation as a prelude to attainment of jhānas. When he passed away, without any slip of the jhāna, he was reborn in the Vehapphala Brahmā-world of the fourth jhāna, which is of a long life span, five hundred kappas. Having lived the full life-span there, he desired for rebirth in a lower world and developed the rūpa-vacara, third jhāna of a high standard. (When he passed away from that Vehapphala-world, he landed in the Subhakiṇha Brahmā-world of the third jhāna which is of the life span of 64 mahā-kappas.)

(N.B. If a man commits a number of anantariya (immediately resultant) deeds, such as matricide, etc., only the severest and heaviest one of them bring about rebirth in the Mahā-Avīci state of long suffering; others do not bring about it but contribute to its occurrence. Similarly of the four rūpa-jhānas developed, only the specially developed one with the four dominant (adhipati) factors brings about rebirth in the rūpa-vacara plane and the remaining rūpa-jhānas do not result in that rebirth as they themselves have no chance to do so; they merely facilitate the sustenance of that rebirth for its full life span. (From the Tika.)

(Having existed in that Subhakinha Brahmā Abode for the full life span of 64 mahā-kappas, Baka Brahmā developed in the previous manner the rūpa-vacara second jhāna of the higher standard and (when he fell from Subhakinha) he landed in the Ābhassara Brahmā Abode which is the second jhāna plane lasting for eight mahā-kappas. Having existed there for the full life span of eight mahā-kappas, he developed, in the previous manner, the rūpa-vacara first jhāna of the higher standard and (when he fell from Ābhassara) he landed in the Mahā-Brahmā Abode, which is the first jhāna plane, lasting for 64 mahā-kappas in terms of antara kind or just one kappa in terms of asaṅkhyeyya.

(In his present Mahā Brahmā Abode, however Baka-Brahmā remembered in the earlier part of his life, his performance of wholesome jhāna and the former abode where he had existed. When he had been there for too long, he forgot even those two things and wrongly took to himself the false Eternalism. That was why the Buddha said to Baka Brahmā: “You have lost your memory. Therefore you neither know nor see that (Ābhassara) World”, and so on.)

The Past Story of Baka Brahmā

When the Buddha spoke thus, Baka Brahmā thought: “The Monk Gotama knows the life span of my previous lives, the worlds of my previous rebirths and the good deeds of jhāna that I had practised before, I will ask him now about my good deeds in the past.” In response to his question, the Buddha told him about his good deeds.

Elaboration: This Baka Brahmā, in one of his former births, was a son of a good family. Seeing the ills of sense desires he decided: “I will put an end to birth, old age, sickness and death.” Thereafter, he renounced the world and became an ascetic, developing mundane jhānas. Having accomplished the jhānas, the foundation of psychic powers, he built a small leaf-hut near the Gaṅgā and spent his time in enjoying the bliss of jhāna.

While he was staying thus, a caravan of five hundred carts carrying merchants, crossed a desert frequently. When they crossed the desert by night the bullocks that were harnessed at the foremost cart lost their way and turned back, thus coming back to the former track that they had taken. The other carts too similarly came back to the former track and this was known to the merchants only at dawn. For the merchants, it was the day they must have passed through the desert. All their fire wood and water had run out. Therefore, thinking that “we are now to lose our lives” the people unyoked their bullocks from the carts, tied them to the wheels and went to sleep in the shade of the rear part the carts.

The jhāna-accomplished ascetic, the future Baka Brahmā, got out of the leaf-hut early in the morning. While sitting at the hut-door, he had a look at the Gaṅgā and saw a great flood overwhelming the whole Gaṅgā as though a huge green stone was rolling down. When he thought: “Are there in this world any beings that are wearied for lack of such sweet water?” he saw the caravan of those merchants suffering in the sandy desert. Wishing them survival, he resolved through psychic powers, “May a great volume of water from the Gaṅgā flow towards the merchants in the caravan.”

As soon as his consciousness of psychic powers occurred, a great volume of water flowed into the desert as though into a drain. The merchants got up because of the sound of the water. On seeing the water they were overjoyed. They bathed, they drank, and they let the cattle drink and they finally arrived at their destination.

In order to point out this past good deed of Baka Brahmā, the Buddha spoke this verse:

(1) *Yam tvam apāyesi bahū manusse pipāsīte ghammani sambarete.
Tam te purāṇam vatasīlavattam
suttappabuddho'va anussarāmi*

(O Brahmā by the name of Baka! In the past, when you were a jhāna-accomplished ascetic) you caused, by your psychic powers, those thirsty people, who were tortured by the sun in the desert, of a caravan to have water to drink and to bath. Like a man waking up, I recollect again and again, by My power of remembering former lives (pubbenivāsānussati-ñāṇa), your morality practised in the past.

At a later time, the ascetic, built a leaf-hut on the bank of the Gaṅgā and lived there depending upon a small village for food. Then robbers beat the villagers and robbed them of gold and silver and took with them cattle and people as hostages. The cries of the people and the animals created loud noises. On hearing the noises, the ascetic thought what it was all about. Knowing that some danger has befallen the villagers, he made a wish: “May these beings not perish while I am seeing them.” Then he engaged himself in jhāna, the foundation of his psychic powers. Arising from that jhāna, he created a large army of four divisions (elephants, horses, chariots, and foot-soldiers) that marched (arrow-) shooting, (trumpet-) blowing, (drum-) beating and (threat-) shouting.

Seeing the great army, the robbers thought that it was the marching of the king, they discarded all their looted properties and fled. The ascetic resolved: “May the properties go back to their respective owners,” and this happened in accord with the ascetic's resolve. The people are thus overjoyed.

In order to point out also this past good deed of Baka Brahmā, the Buddha spoke this verse:

(2) *Yam enikulasmim janaṃ gahītam
amocayī gayhaka niyamanam.
Tam te purāṇam vatasīlavattam
suttappabuddho'va anussarāmi.*

(O Brahmā by the name of Baka! In the past when you were a jhāna accomplished ascetic) on the bank of the Gaṅgā which was also named Eṇikula because there were many herds of eṇī deer, you caused the villagers, who were taken as hostages and whose properties robbed by the robbers, to escape from the robbers' hands by your creation of an army of four divisions. Like a man waking up, I recollect again and again, by My power of remembering former lives, your morality practised in the past.

Again at a later time, a family living in the upper part of the Gaṅgā and another family living in the lower part held a wedding ceremony, one party giving the bride to the other and making friends together. They joined their boats, forming them like a raft which carried many kinds of food, unguent, flowers, etc, and which floated by the currents of the Gaṅgā waters. The people on the boats had a great feast, dancing and singing. They revelled as though they were moving in a celestial flying mansion.

Then the Nāga King, ruler and resident of the Gaṅgā, saw the people and became angry, thinking: “These people have no regard for me as they are not aware that their riotous merry making would annoy me the Nāga King of the Gaṅgā. Now I shall make them float into the ocean.” So thinking he assumed an enormous body and split the water into two halves between which he emerged all of a sudden. With his vast hood raised, he made a great hissing sound and stayed there as though he were to bite the people and put them to death.

On seeing the Nāga King, the people became frightened and cried loudly and feverishly. While sitting in the leaf-hut the ascetic heard the cries, he thought: “Earlier these people were very happy, dancing and singing. Now they are making sounds of fear and grief. What is the matter?” Then he saw the Nāga King and desired for the people's safety: “May they not perish while I am seeing them.” So he engaged himself in a jhāna, the foundation of his psychic powers, and after assuming the guise of a garuda bird, he was poised to snatch away the Nāga King.

Fearing, the Nāga King withdrew his hood and immersed himself in the water. All the people were thus saved.

In order to point out as this part of good deed of Baka Brahmā, the Buddha spoke this verse:

(3) *Gaṅgāya sotasmim gahīta nāvaṃ
luddena nāgena manussakappā
Amocayittha balasā pasayha*

suttappabuddho'va anussarāmi.*

(O Brahmā by the name of Baka! In the past when you were a ascetic) you saved the people of the two villages, who were to be destroyed by the fierce Nāga King in the water currents of the Gaṅgā, by your psychic powers known as vikubbaniddhi and you thus set them free from the threat of the Nāga King. Like a man waking up, I recollect again and again by my power of remembering former lives, your morality practised in the past.

Still at a later time, Baka Brahmā was a noble ascetic known in Kesava. At that time our Bodhisatta was a youthful ascetic by the name of Kappa. Constantly staying near the ascetic Kesava and serving him as a residential pupil (antevasika); who was always obedient, thinking to do only what was pleasing to his master, who was intelligent and who practised what was beneficial. The ascetic Kesava was unable to move about, to remain still, to eat or drink without the help of his close pupil, the young ascetic Kappa. At one time, he was looked after by the King of Varanasi but he left the King and lived by depending on his own pupil, Kappa the ascetic. (The story in detail may be read in the Kesava Jātaka of the Catukka Nipata.)

In order to point out also this past good deed of Baka Brahmā, the Buddha spoke this verse:

(4) *Kappo ca te baddhacaro ahoṣi sambuddhimantaṃ vatinaṃ amaññīti.
suttappabuddho'va annusarāmi.*

(O Brahmā by the name of Baka! In one of the past existences) I, the Buddha, was a virtuous ascetic, Kappa by name, who, as your residential pupil, served you, a virtuous ascetic, Kesava by name. (At that time) you fondly spoke in praise of me, that I was good, intelligent and that I had practised morality adequately. Like a man waking up, I recollect again and again by My power remembering former lives, your morality practised in the past.

In this way the Buddha talked to Baka Brahmā, pointing out the latter's good deeds done in his various past existences. While the Buddha was thus talking, Baka Brahmā recollected his past lives. All his past deeds gradually manifested to him as though different objects become clear when a thousand oil lamps are lighted. He was so pleased, having a faithful heart, he spoke the following verse:

*Addhā pajānāsi mam'etam āyurū aññaṃ pi jānāsi tathā hi Buddho.
Tathā hi tyāyam jalitānubhāvo obhāsayaṃ tiṭṭhati Brahmālokam.*

(Exalted One, who has done away with all suffering!) Certainly, you know my past lives. You also know all neyya-dhamma, things worth-knowing (apart from my lives). You are therefore an Omniscient Buddha. This bright body-light of yours exist, illuminating the whole Brahmā Abode, outshining the light of hundreds and thousands of suns and moons.

Having related as a parenthesis to the past events of Baka Brahmā at his request, the Buddha came back to his original topic, speaking thus:

“Baka Brahmā, there are still the Subhakinha Abode, Vehappala Abode, and Abhibhū Abode. You neither know nor see them. I know and see them. I know (what you do not) you are not equal to me intellectually. How can I be inferior to you? In fact, I am superior to you intellectually.”

Then in order to prove a step further that Baka Brahmā was not His intellectual equal and that He Himself was superior to Baka Brahmā intellectually, the Buddha continued his speech as follows:

“Baka Brahmā, with extraordinary intellect I know the earth element that it is by nature anicca, dukkha and anatta. I know Nibbāna, that is inaccessible to the earth elements by its nature; and I do not cling to the earth element (with craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna) and wrong view (diṭṭhi)). I do not cling to it, as something in which attā, etc., lie, or something from which attā, etc., emerge, I do not cling to it as I, mine, or my attā. Baka Brahmā, as I know (Nibbāna that is unknown to you), you are not equal to Me intellectually. How can I be inferior to you? In fact, I am superior to you intellectually.

“Baka Brahmā, with extraordinary intellect, I know the water element, ... the fire element, ... the wind element, ... the sentient beings, ... the devas .... māras, ... Brahmās, ... Ābhassara Brahmās.... Subhakiṇhā Brahmās, ... Vehapphala Brahmās, ... Abhibhu Brahmās ..., with extraordinary intellect. I know all (individuality pertaining to the three planes of existence (tebhūmaka) that is by nature anicca, dukkha, and anatta. I know Nibbāna, that is inaccessible to all individuality by all its nature and I do not cling to all individuality with craving, conceit and wrong view. I do not cling to it, as something in which attā, etc., lie or, as something from which attā etc, emerge. I do not cling to all (individuality pertaining to the three planes of existences) as I, mine, or my attā. Baka Brahmā, as I know Nibbāna that is unknown to you, you are not equal to me intellectually. How can I be inferior to you? In fact, I am superior to you intellectually.”

(Then Baka Brahmā, wishing to charge the Buddha with falsehood, said:)

“Venerable Sir, if what is inaccessible to all by all its nature, Your claim that You know what is inaccessible would come to nothing. Do not let it come to nothing. Your statement would become empty. Do not let it become empty.

(Herein some clarification will be made so that the virtuous readers of the Chronicle may not be confused.

(The English word ‘all’ and the Pāli ‘Sabba’ are of the same meaning. The word ‘sabba’ or ‘all’ is used in the sense of ‘all mundane things’ (‘all that is of individuality’, sakkāya). The complete terminology is ‘sakkāya-sabba’ or ‘all individuality’. It is this ‘sakkāya-sabba’, ‘all individuality’, that is referred to in the Ādittapariyāya Sutta where ‘Sabbam bhikkhave ādittam’ occurs.

(The Pāli sentence means ‘All things, monks, are burnt by fire such as rāga, etc. It cannot be said that supramundane things are burnt by fire, for unwholesome things, such as rāga, dosa, moha, etc., are absolutely incapable of taking the supramundane things as their target. They are capable of doing so only in the case of mundane things, individuality (sakkāya) or the factors of clinging to existence (upādānakkhandhā). Hence the burning of mundane things by the fire of raga, etc. Therefore what is supramundane is to be excluded from ‘sabbam’, ‘all’, whereas what is mundane is to be included therein. Therefore by the word ‘sabba’ of the Ādittapariyāya Sutta is meant ‘sakkāya-sabba’ or ‘all individuality’.

(With reference to the term ‘Sabbaññutā-ñāṇa’ or ‘All embracing Knowledge’ (or Omniscience), its component ‘sabba’ means all both mundane and supramundane, for the Buddha knows the whole range of things, mundane as well as supramundane. Therefore, the word ‘sabba’ of Sabbaññutā-ñāṇa means sabba-sabba, ‘all this all that’.

(By this much the virtuous readers of this Chronicle might have understood that in the field of Dhamma literature the use of the sabba, ‘all’ is of two kinds: (1) the use of it in the sense of sakkāya-sabba, ‘all individuality’, or ‘all mundane things’, and (2) the use of it in the sense of sabba-sabba, ‘all this and all that’ with mundane or supramundane designations. Let us examine now the use of sabba by the Buddha and Baka Brahmā.

(When the Buddha asserted that he was intellectually superior to Baka Brahmā, He presented 13 points as follows:

(1) I know the earth element (and you know it too), I know Nibbāna which is inaccessible to the earth element (but you do not). (2) I know the water element (and you know it too), I know Nibbāna which is inaccessible to the water element (but you do not); (In this way the Buddha went on with regard to:) (3) the fire element; (4) the wind element; (5) the sentient beings; (6) devas; (7) māras; (8) Brahmās; (9) Ābhassara Brahmās; (10) Subhakinha Brahmās; (11) Vehapphala Brahmās; (12) Abhibhū Brahmās (Assaññasatta Brahmās); (13) I know all (sakkāya-sabba) (and you know it too); I know Nibbāna which is inaccessible to all (but you do not).

(With regard to the first 12 points, Baka saw no reason to blame the Buddha. As regards the last point, however, he saw something to accuse the Buddha of.

When the Buddha said: “I know all (sakkāya-sabba) and I know Nibbāna which is inaccessible to all (sakkāya-sabba),” He said so as a puzzle. What He meant to say by this was: “Baka Brahmā, I know all (sakkāya = mundane things) by My extra-ordinary intellect that they are, by nature, anicca, dukkha and anatta. Having known this, I also know Nibbāna by My extra-ordinary Vipassanā Insight, which cannot be attained by all. (sakkāya = mundane things).” (In that speech the statement reading “I know all by all their nature” means “I know by Vipassanā Insight all individuality pertaining to the three planes of existence, and five aggregates of mundane things in their nature of anicca, dukkha and anatta.” Here the Buddha said: “(I know) all by all their nature” with reference to sakkāya-sabba. “(I know Nibbāna) which is inaccessible to all by all nature” means “I know Nibbāna with the Path Knowledge, realizing that it is inaccessible to all individuality and the five aggregates of mundane things in their nature of being conditioned (saṅkhata). (Such conditioned material things as the earth element, the wind element, etc. have the nature of hardness, cohesiveness, etc. which are also conditioned, such conditioned mental things as contact, sensation, etc., have the nature of the tangibility, feeling, etc., which are also conditioned — all these conditioned things are absent in Nibbāna which is unconditioned. Only the nature of santi or Peace, as opposed to conditioned things is present in unconditioned Nibbāna. This was in view when it was said that Nibbāna which is inaccessible to the earth element. Nibbāna which is inaccessible to the water element, ... Nibbāna which is inaccessible to all individuality.”)

By this much, virtuous readers of the Chronicle must have understood that what the Buddha meant was as follows:

“I know thoroughly all sakkāya or the five aggregates of mundane things (and you know them too). I also know Nibbāna which cannot be reached by all individuality (but you do not), and that the word ‘all’ in that speech implies the five aggregates of mundane things and that Nibbāna is something which cannot be attained by all.

But as a fault-finding ideologue, Baka Brahmā took, but wrongly, that by ‘all’ was meant sabba-sabba, ‘each and every thing mundane or supramundane and designated,’ (for he was totally ignorant of the fact that here sakkāya-sabba was referred to in the Buddha’s speech). This led him to his criticism of the Buddha:

“Venerable Sir, if the Dhamma is inaccessible to all other thing by all nature, your saying that you know that is inaccessible would come to nothing. Do not let it come to nothing. Your statement would become empty. Do not let it become empty.”

The gist of Baka Brahmā’s criticism was as follows:

- (1) In your speech, Venerable Sir, you claim your knowledge of all, and
  - (2) your knowledge of the Dhamma that is inaccessible to all.
- (1) The word ‘all’ of the first statement covers all things. So there can be nothing which is inaccessible to all things. And yet the Buddha insists on His knowledge of what is mentioned in the second statement. His insistence, therefore, will be reduced to nonsense like ‘the flower of the sky’, ‘the horn of a rabbit’, ‘the hair of a turtle’, and ‘the blood of a crab’.
  - (2) If what is inaccessible is semantically exclusive of the word ‘all’ of the first statement, His assertion there cannot be true, for the things known to Him are not complete. It will be a lie then.

In this way did Baka Brahmā want to accuse the Buddha of false speech. (In short, the Buddha spoke of sakkāya-sabba, all that is mundane. Baka Brahmā mistook it for sabba-sabba, all that is either mundane or supramundane. Hence his accusation against the Buddha was unjust.)

Being a supreme ideologue, a hundred times, a thousand times, nay, a hundred thousand times greater than Baka Brahmā, the Buddha would still proclaim His knowledge of all and of Nibbāna that is inaccessible to all for the Brahmā to listen to, and in order to refute the Brahmā's charge of falsehood, He went on to say thus:

“Baka Brahmā, there is Nibbāna-Dhamma which is particularly higher than all conditioned things, which is to be known through the Path-knowledge, Fruition-knowledge, reflective knowledge which is invisible to the naked eye or which has no resemblance that can be shown as its representative, which is completely devoid of arising-and-passing nature, which is brighter than all other dhammas or which never knows darkness but ever remains brilliant.”(By these words the Buddha boldly affirmed the real existence of Nibbāna that is beyond all individuality on the three planes of existence.).

“That Nibbāna-Dhamma (1) cannot be reached by the earth element through the nature of earth; (2) cannot be reached by the water element through the nature of earth; (3) ... by the fire element .... (4) ... by the wind element ...; (5) ... by the sentient beings through their nature; (6)... by devas ...; (7) ... by māras ...; (8)... by Brahmās...;(9)... by Abhassara Brahmās, (10) by Subhakiṇha Brahmās; (11) ... by Vehapphala Brahmās; (12) cannot be reached by Abhibhu Brahmās through their nature; cannot be reached by all (sakkāya-dhamma) through the nature of them all (sakkāya). (By these words the Buddha made clear that He spoke of ‘all’, too).

“In this way there is the aggregate of all sakkāya-dhammas of the three planes of existence which is within the range of knowledge that belongs to persons like you. By that aggregate of sakkāya-dhammas of the three planes of existence through the nature of them all, Nibbāna-Dhamma (with the aforesaid four attributes) cannot be reached.

Thus the Buddha firmly asserted his doctrine.

Miracle Contest between the Buddha and Baka Brahmā.

Every aspect of his belief in the eternity of the Brahmā-world together with the body having been criticized and repudiated, Baka Brahmā was at a lost for words. In order to cover his defeat, he gave up arguing for his belief and decided to show his superiority by performing miracles. So he said:

“Venerable Sir, if that is the case, I will now vanish in your presence. I am going to perform the sort of miracle so that I become invisible to you. You just watch me.”

The Buddha said:

“Baka Brahmā, (you are not able to do so). If you indeed have such a power, then vanish now before me.”

Brahmās have two kinds of body: natural body and artificial or created body. The natural body which originates at the time of birth is so subtle that it cannot be seen by other Brahmās. So to make it visible, they take the form of created gross body.

Therefore when Baka Brahmā received the consent, he bent his mind on changing his created gross body into the natural, subtle body. The Buddha knew his intention and resolved that his body should remain unchanged in its gross form. So Baka Brahmā could not change his body into its natural, subtle form and there was no vanishing of his body.

Unable to change his body, the Baka Brahmā again tried to create darkness that might envelope his present body. But by means of His supernormal power, the Buddha dispelled the darkness created by the Brahmā. So Baka was unable to hide himself.

Being unable to hide by changing his body or by creating darkness, Baka Brahmā desperately entered his mansion and hid there. He hid under the wish-fulfilling tree. He squatted furtively. Then hosts of Brahmās burst into laughter and jeered, saying: “This Baka Brahmā is now hiding in the mansion. Now he is hiding under the wish-fulfilling tree squatting furtively. O, Baka Brahmā what a pity that you think you have hidden yourself.” Being thus jeered at by other Brahmās, Baka Brahmā wore a displeased face. Hence it is said in brief in the Text.

“Monks, though Baka Brahmā said: ‘I will hide myself in the presence of the Monk Gotama, I will hide myself in the presence of the Monk Gotama’, he was unable to do so.”

To the Brahmā who was unable to hide himself, the Buddha said:

“Baka Brahmā, if you cannot hide yourself, I will hide myself in your presence now. I am going to perform a miracle so that you cannot see me.”

Then Baka Brahmā replied to the Buddha:

“Venerable Sir, hide yourself in my presence now if you can.”

Then the Buddha (1) first entered upon the fourth jhāna (rūpāvacara-kiriya), the foundation of His resolve; (2) then rising from that jhāna, He resolved that the Mahā Brahmā, the assembly of Brahmās and the young attendant-Brahmās could only hear His voice but not see his body; (3) then He entered upon the fourth jhāna (rūpāvacara-kiriya), the foundation of His Psychic Power; (4) when He rose from that jhāna, a process of Psychic Powers occurred in His mind; as soon as He felt that mental process but once, the Buddha's body vanished and not a single Brahmā could see Him. To make them know that He was still with them though He had vanished, the Buddha uttered this verse:

*Bhavevāhaṃ bhayaṃ disvā, bhavañ ca bhavesinaṃ
Bhavaṃ nābhivadim kiñci, nandiñ ca na upādiyim.*

O, Brahmās who have assembled here! Because I have seen clearly with My eye of wisdom, the dangers of birth, old age, and sickness on the three planes of existence such as kāma, rūpa and arūpa, and the endless arising of beings (like Baka Brahmā), who have gone astray in their search of Nibbāna that is non-existence, I no longer cling to any existence as permanent, constant, eternal, etc., under the power of craving and wrong view. I am entirely free from craving for existence as I have rooted it out and cutting it off four times with the axe-like wisdom of the fourfold Path-Knowledge.

Attainment of Noble Stages by Ten Thousand Brahmās

In this verse, by the word ‘existence’ (bhava) is indicated ‘the Truth of Suffering’, by ‘craving for existence’ (bhava-taṅhā) is indicated ‘the Truth of the Cause of Suffering’, by ‘non-existence’ (vibhava) is indicated ‘the Truth of the Cessation of Suffering’, by ‘I have no craving for existence’ (nandiñ ca na upādiyim) is indicated ‘the Truth of the Path leading to the Cessation of Suffering’.

Thus the Buddha taught the Four Truths in detail to the Brahmās according to their dispositions and led them to Vipassanā Insight and concluded His Teaching with the Fruition of Arahatsip as its apex. At the end of the Discourse, the Brahmās, reflectively following the discourse, were steeped in the essence of Vipassanā Insight at various stages, some attaining sotāpatti-phala, some sakadāgāmi-phala, some anāgāmi-phala and the rest arahatsip. Then the Brahmās rejoiced, marvelled and extolled the Buddha. Hence it is said in the Text:

“Monks, then the Brahmā, his followers and attendants were filled with great wonder, saying: ‘Friends, wonderful indeed is the great power and the great might of the Monk Gotama! Never have we seen or heard any samaṇa or brāhmaṇa who is so powerful and so mighty as the Monk Gotama, a Sakyan Prince and an ascetic of the Sakyan royal family. Indeed, the Monk Gotama can remove the root of existence (i.e. ignorance and craving) from all beings who take delight in existence, who take pleasure in existence and who arise in existence.’ ”

Molestation by Mara

Then Māra reflected and came to know in anger thus: “While I am moving about, the Monk Gotama has taught ten thousand Brahmās and set them free from my dominion.” So furious was he that he once again possessed a young attendant Brahmā.

(Herein, how did Māra know that the ten thousand Brahmās had become ariyas? He knew this by inference (neyaggāha or anumāna). He knew that when the Buddha preached to worthy beings, He pointed out the ills of samsāra and the bliss of Nibbāna so that the listening beings would discern Nibbāna; that all His sermons were beneficial and effective like the vajira weapon hurled by Sakka; and that devas and humans who established in His Teaching became invisible in samsāra.)

Having possessed the young Brahmā, Māra spoke to the Buddha, disturbing. This is mentioned in the Text in the following manner:

“Monks, at that time the wicked Māra possessed a young attendant Brahmā and said to me thus:

‘Venerable Sir, if you know (the Four Truths) analytically thus, if You know them by Your Omniscience, do not convey this doctrine to Your disciples. Do not convey them to hermits and wandering ascetics. Do not preach to Your disciples. Do not preach to hermits and wandering ascetics. Have no greed for Your disciples. Have no greed for hermits and wandering ascetics.

‘Monk, there were samaṇas and brāhmanas who lived before You and who claimed to be arahats or who claimed to have destroyed the enemy in the form of moral defilements, or who claimed to be Sammāsambuddhas, those who claimed to know all the doctrines by themselves. They conveyed their doctrines to their disciples and hermits and wandering ascetics. They preached to their disciples and hermits and wandering ascetics. They had greed for them and on the dissolution of their bodies at death, they landed in the low woeful states. (a)

‘Monk, there were in this world samaṇas and brāhmanas who lived before You and who claimed to be arahats or who claimed to have destroyed the enemy in the form of moral defilements, or who claimed to be Sammāsambuddhas, those who claimed to know all the doctrines by themselves. They did not convey their doctrines to their disciples. They did not preach to their disciples and hermits and wandering ascetics. They had no greed for them and on the dissolution on their bodies at death, they landed in the high Brahmā-worlds. (b)

‘Therefore, Monk, I would like to tell you thus: ‘Venerable Sir, I urge you. Live in comfort, live without any bother. Sir, non-preaching is good. Do not exhort others.’ I would like to tell you thus.’

“Monks, when Māra the evil One said thus, I spoke to him as follows:

‘Evil Māra, I know you. Do not think that I do not know you. You are Māra. Hey, evil Māra, you have spoken thus not because you desire for My welfare but because you desire for My loss. You fear that those who follow My preaching will overcome the three kinds of existence that lie within your domain.

‘Hey, evil Māra, samaṇas and brāhmanas whom you speak of claimed to be Sammāsambuddhas without actually being Samāsambuddhas. But I truly claim to be Sammāsambuddha, who know all the doctrine by Myself.

‘Hey, you evil Māra, whether the Buddha preaches to His disciples or not, He has neither love nor hate; He is endowed with the attributes of tādi (indifference). Why?

‘Hey, evil Māra, the Buddha has abandoned the moral intoxicants (āsava) that lead to anxiety, rebirth, anguish and suffering, later on causing rebirth, old age and death. He has cut off their latent (anusaya) roots. He has made them like the uprooted palm-tree. He has made it impossible for them to arise again. (So, for the Buddha, there is absolutely no revival of those āsavas).

‘Hey, evil Māra, as a palm tree cut off at its neck, cannot thrive, so the Buddha has abandoned the āsavas that lead to anxiety, rebirth, anguish and suffering, later on causing rebirth, old age, and death. He has rooted them. He has made them like the uprooted palm-tree. He has made it impossible for them to arise again. So, for the Buddha, there is absolutely no possibility of the resurges of those āsavas.’ ”

Thus the Buddha preached this sermon to silence Māra and impart special knowledge to the Brahmā. Hence this sutta is named Brahmanimantika Sutta.

Cūlasubbhaddā and Her Father-in-law, Ugga

Story of Cūlasubbhaddā

While the Buddha was residing at Jetavana in the good city of Sāvatti, he gave a sermon beginning with “Dūresanto pakāsentī” in connection with the merchant Anāthapiṇḍika's daughter, Cūlasubbhaddā. The details were as follows:

Ugga, who was another merchant, a citizen of Ugga City, was the childhood friend of the merchant, Anāthapiṇḍika. While they were educated by the same teacher, they promised to each other that when they grew up and had children, one who had a daughter should give her in marriage to a son of the other who wanted her to be his daughter-in-law.

The two friends grew up and became great merchants in their respective cities. One day, the merchant, Ugga, went to the house of Anāthapiṇḍika in Sāvatti with five hundred carts to do business. Anāthapiṇḍika called his daughter, Cūlasubbhaddā, and assigned a duty to her, saying: “Dear daughter, your (would be) father, Ugga, the merchant has come. Do all that is necessary for him.”

“Very well,” said Cūlasubbhaddā and from the day of Ugga's arrival, she prepared and cooked the food personally. She put on flowers, perfumes and unguents, etc. While the merchant was being fed, she kept the bath-water ready and after he had taken his bath, she personally supervised all the needful for him with respect.

Observing her possession of the character of a good housewife, the merchant Ugga was pleased with Cūlasubbhaddā. Then one day, while conversing cordially with Anāthapiṇḍika, he reminded his friend saying: “Friend, when we were young we have made such and such a pledge to each other,” and then asked Cūlasubbhaddā for his son. But Ugga was a heretic. So Anāthapiṇḍika did not make any decision (on his own) and reported the matter to the Buddha, who seeing Ugga's former good deeds that would contribute to his attainment of sotāpatti-magga and phala, approved. He then discussed with his wife, Puññalakkhaṇa Devī, and they agreed to his friend's proposal. He fixed the date and elaborately arranged for the wedding ceremony, and when he sent Cūlasubbhaddā away in marriage, he called his daughter and gave ten pieces of advice which were the same as those given to Visākhā by her father, Dhanañcaya.

“My dear daughter, a woman who lives in the house of her parents-in-law:

- (1) should not take outside the fire that is inside her house, (that is, she should not tell people in other houses about the faults of her parents-in-law and husband);
- (2) should not bring into her house the fire from outside (that is, when the neighbours speak ill of her parents-in-law and husband, she should not report it to them);
- (3) should give only those who give back, (that is, she should lend only to those who punctually return what they have borrowed from her house);
- (4) should not give those who do not give back, (that is, she should not give another loan to those who do not punctually return what they have borrowed from her house);

- (5) should give others whether they give her or not, (that is, when poor relatives come to her house, she should give them whether they can afford to give or not);
- (6) should sit well, (that is, she should stand up first at the sight of her parents-in-law and husband. It is not proper for her to remain sitting when she should stand up);
- (7) should eat well, (that is, she should not eat before her parents-in-law and husband but she should serve them and eat only after making sure everybody has his or her food);
- (8) should sleep well, (that is, she should not sleep in her bed before her parents-in-law and husband do. She should sleep only after doing her duties towards them);
- (9) should serve the fire respectfully, (that is, she should regard her parents-in-laws and husband as a great mass of fire or a poisonous serpent nāga king and look at them respectfully. She should not look at them disrespectfully by casting a side glance or frowning upon them);
- (10) should worship the devas in the house, (that is, she should show respect to her parents-in-law and husband, regarding them as the devas occupying the foremost or most sacred place of the house).

These were the ten pieces of advice which Anāthapiṇḍika gave to his daughter as did the merchant Dhanañcaya to his daughter Visākhā. He also sent eight wise men as guarantors along with his daughter with these instructions:

“Whenever a problem crops up to my daughter Cūlasubbhaddā you must solve it lawfully.”

The day of her departure saw him giving alms lavishly to the Sangha headed by the Buddha. Then he sent his daughter to the merchant Ugga's house with great pomp and ceremony as though he exhibited the magnificent fruition of the good deeds which Cūlasubbhaddā had done in her previous lives.

Arriving at Ugga City, she was welcomed by the merchant's family and hosts of the citizens. Like Visākhā, she entered the city standing in her chariot, and making the people much impressed by her glory and splendour. She accepted the presents sent by the citizens and sent in return gifts appropriate to their distinguished status and thus by virtue of her wisdom she endeared herself to the whole city.

When her heretical father-in-law honoured the naked ascetics (acelakas) on auspicious occasions at his house, he sent for her as he wanted her to come and pay respect to his teachers. But she refused to go to the place where they were being honoured because she was so shy to see the unclothed teachers.

The merchant Ugga sent for her repeatedly but Cūlasubbhaddā remained adamant in her refusal. So the merchant became furious and ordered her to be turned out of the house. She refused to take such unreasonable treatment. Instead she called in the eight wise men her guarantors, and stated her case openly. They decided that she had no fault and informed the merchant accordingly.

The merchant told his wife that Cūlasubbhaddā did not pay respect to his teachers, saying that they had no sense of shame. The merchant's wife wondered what kind of monks were the teachers of her daughter-in-law whom she extolled so excessively. So she summoned Cūlasubbhaddā and asked her:

*Kīdisā samaṇā tuyhaṃ bāḷhaṃ kho ne pasamsasi.
Kim sīlā kim samācārā
taṃ me akkhāhi pucchitā.*

Our daughter-in-law Subhadda! How are your teachers and monks possessed of noble qualities? Extremely do you praise them. (Those teachers of yours, the Monk Gotama and his disciples), what virtues of distinction do they have? What kind of good conduct do they show? As you are asked, tell me truthfully about that.

Then Cūlasubbhaddā, desiring to talk to the wife of the wealthy merchant about the qualities of the Buddha and His disciples, uttered the following verse:

- (1) *Santindriyā santamānasā
santam tesaṃ gataṃ ʘhitam.
Okkhittacakkhū mitabhānī
tādisā samaṇā mama.*

(Madam) Those monks of mine (comprising the Exalted One and His disciples) in contrast to the fickle and self-indulging behaviour of your teachers, are mentally serene, being free from the heat of all defilements. Therefore, their walking with their steps like lotus flowers or their standing with their twin golden feet, is so calm that the faith of the beholders increases. They have their down-cast eyes that never look beyond the length of a yoke. They speak moderately of what is in accord with time and place. My Teacher, the Exalted One, and His disciples possess such impressive attributes.

- (2) *Kāyakammaṃ sucī nesaṃ
vācākammaṃ anāvilam
Mano-kammaṃ suvisuddham
tādisā samaṇā mama.*

(Madam) All the physical behaviour of my Teacher, the Exalted One, and His disciples, is clear of unwholesomeness and pure; their verbal behaviour is serene by nature without the dust and mud of unwholesomeness, all their mental behaviour is free from the stain of evil character. They possess such impressive attributes.

- (3) *Vimalā saṅkhamuttābhā suddhā antarabāhirā.
Puṇṇā, suddhehi dhammehi
tādisā samaṇā mama.*

(Madam) They (my Teacher, the Exalted One, and His disciples) are free from moral defilements like the conch-shell or a pearl necklace. They are pure both inside and out, having no dust of fault at all. They are fully endowed with the three kinds of pure training. They possess such impressive attributes.

- (4) *Lābhena unnato loko
alābhena ca onato
Labhālabhena ekaʘthā
tādisā samaṇā mama.*

(Madam) In the world, people become puffed up with pride when they acquire many things owing to their possession of effort now (payoga-sampatti) and their good deeds in the past. They become depressed when they do not acquire anything owing to their lack of effort now and their evil deeds in the past. But my Teacher, the Exalted One, and His disciples, are not affected by acquisition nor non-acquisition of things, but remain calm and tranquil. They possess such impressive attributes.

- (5) *Yasena unnato loko
ayasena ca onato.
Yasāyasena ekaʘthā*

tādisā samaṇā mama.

(Madam) In this world people they became puffed up with pride when they become famous and have many followers owing to their possession of effort now and good deeds in the past. They become depressed when they cease to become famous and have fewer followers owing to their lack of effort now and their evil deeds in the past. But, my Teacher, the Exalted One, and His monk-disciples are not affected by having fame or having no fame and by having only a few followers, but remain calm and tranquil. They possess such impressive attributes.

(6) *Pasaṃsāy unnato loko nindāyā'pi ca onato.
Samā nindāpasamsāsu tādisā samaṇ mama.*

(Madam) In this world people become puffed up with pride when they are praised owing to their effort now and good deeds in the past. They are depressed when they are dispraised owing to their lack of effort now and their evil deeds in the past. But my Teacher, the Exalted One, and His monk-disciples are not affected by praise or by dispraise, but remain calm and tranquil. They possess such impressive attributes.

(7) *Sukhena unnato loko dukkhenā'pi ca onato.
Akampā sukhadukkhesu
tādisā samaṇā mama.*

(Madam) In this world, people become puffed up with pride when they are affluent owing to their effort now and good deeds in the past. They become depressed when they are poor owing to their lack of effort now and their evil deeds in the past. But my Teacher, the Exalted One, and His monk-disciples, are not affected by affluence, but remain calm and tranquil. They possess such impressive attributes.

Thus, Cūlasubbhaddā, the wise daughter-in-law, pleased her mother-in-law, by extolling the Exalted One and His disciples. The merchant's wife asked her whether she would be able to show them her teacher, the Exalted One and His disciples, and Culasubbhadda said she could do so. Then her mother-in-law told her to make an arrangement so that they could see her teacher and all.

Having promised thus, Cūlasubbhaddā prepared great offering for the Buddha and the Sangha on the top of the mansion and facing towards the Jetavana monastery, she paid respect to the Buddha and contemplated His attributes. Then honouring the Buddha with sweet smelling flowers, and perfumes, she resolved thus:

“Glorious Buddha, I invite the Sangha headed by the Exalted One to my good deeds at my house. May the Exalted One, the Teacher of devas and humans, know my invitation quite well through these Jasmine flowers which I am now sending.”

After extending her invitation, she threw up eight handfuls of Jasmine flowers into the air. Like small butterflies, the flowers travelled by air and became a flower-canopy above the Buddha, while He was preaching amidst four classes of people in the Jetavana monastery.

At that moment the merchant Anāthapiṇḍika who had heard the Dhamma invited the Buddha to his house the next day to his good deeds. The Buddha replied that He had already accepted the invitation to the meal offering by another donor. The merchant said: “There is no one who has come and invited the Exalted Buddha before me. Whose meal-offering have you accepted?” The Buddha replied that He had been already invited by Cūlasubhaddā. The merchant said: “But, Glorious Buddha, is not my daughter Culasubhaddā living in Ugga which is one hundred and twenty yojanas away from this city of Sāvatti?”

The Buddha replied: “You are right, merchant but good people can manifest as if they were standing before Me even though they may be living in a place that is many yojanas away.”

Then the Buddha uttered the following verse:

*Dūre santo pakāsentī
himavaṅto'va pabbato.
Asantettha na dissanti rattim khittā yathā sarā.*

Merchant Anāthapiṇḍika, donor of Jetavana! Though people, pure at heart and doers of good deeds, may stay many yojanas away, they manifest themselves to My knowledge as does the Himavanta forest. Though foolish monks and lay persons, exist near Me, they never manifest themselves in the neighbourhood of My vision like the arrows shot in the darkness of four characteristics, namely, midnight, moonless, in the heart of the forest and under all cloudy sky.

By the end of the discourse, many people attained the Fruition of Sotāpatti.

The Buddha's Journey to Ugga

Knowing that the Buddha had accepted Cūlasubhaddā's invitation, Sakka told Visukamma Deva to create five hundred turreted flying vehicles in which the Buddha and His monks were to be taken to Ugga the next day. The next day, Visukamma stood at the gate of the Jetavana monastery, after creating five hundred flying vehicles.

The Buddha took the the batch of the five hundred choice arahats as His entourage, and they, one seated in each vehicle, travelled by air to Ugga City.

Looking forward with his followers to the Buddha's arrival, as instructed by his wise daughter-in-law Cūlasubhaddā, Ugga saw the Buddha coming with great glory. Overwhelmed by devotion, he welcomed and honoured the Buddha with flowers, scents, etc. After performing alms-giving, he invited the Buddha now and then and repeated his great offering for seven days.

The Liberation of Ugga and 84000 Beings

The Buddha preached the Dhamma that suited Ugga. As a result, he and his wife, together with eighty-four thousand beings, realized the Four Truths and became liberated.

In order to show His grace to Cūlasubhaddā, the Buddha told Thera Anuruddha to stay behind in Ugga and, Himself and the rest of the arahats returned to Savatti. From that day onwards the city of Ugga became a great centre of the faith and a city devoted to the Triple Gem.

The Buddha's Preaching to a Brahmin of Wrong Views

Story of A Certain Brahmin

Once, while residing at Jetavana in Sāvatti, the Buddha preached a sermon beginning with 'Taṅhāya jāyatī soko', etc. in connection with a certain brahmin. The story in detail is as follows:

One day, a brahmin, a citizen of Sāvatti, who held wrong views, was clearing a farm land near the river Aciravati. The Buddha came to know that he had performed, in the past, an act that would contribute to his attainment of the Path and Fruition. The brahmin saw the Buddha but as he was of wrong views, he did not show his respect to the Buddha, not even talked to Him but kept silent. The Buddha Himself first addressed the brahmin, saying: “O Brahmin what are you doing?” The brahmin replied: “O Gotama, I am clearing the farmland.” With only a few such words on the first day, the Buddha went away.

The next day, too, the Buddha went to the brahmin and asked him what he was doing. The brahmin replied that he was ploughing the field. After hearing this reply the Buddha went away.

Again, the next day and the following days, the Buddha asked the brahmin what he was doing and he replied that he was sowing seeds, planting seedlings, weeding or looking after the field. The Buddha heard the brahmin’s answers which were appropriate to his work and went away,

In this way, owing to the frequency of the Buddha’s visit, the brahmin began to like and adore the Buddha. Wanting to make the Buddha his friend he said: “O Gotama, you have been visiting me since the day I cleared my farmland. If the farm yields good and abundant crops, I will share them with you. I will not consume them without giving you. From today you have become my friend.”

Then one day the crop on the brahmin’s field became ripe and mature and he decided to have them reaped the next day. But, while he was making preparations for the harvesting, rain fell heavily at night and swept away all the crops. So the whole farmland was stark barren like a field with all its crops removed.

Since the very day of his first visit, the Buddha had foreseen that the crops would come to nothing. But, if he started visiting the brahmin only after the destruction of the crops, His sermon would fall on deaf ears. He had, therefore, been visiting the brahmin from the day when the latter cleared the field, in this way the Buddha hoped to gain the brahmin’s confidence and intimacy that would make him receptive to the sermon to be given on the day when the crops were ruined.

The brahmin went early to his field and seeing his farmland stark empty, he was overwhelmed with grief.

“The monk Gotama has been visiting me since I cleared my field. I have told him that I will give Him a share of the crops after harvesting, that I will not consume them all by myself without giving Him and that He has become my friend. Now my desire will remain unfulfilled.”

So thinking, he returned home, ate nothing and lay down on his bed.

Then the Buddha went to the brahmin’s house. When the brahmin heard of the Buddha’s coming, he told the people in his house to bring his friend inside and to give Him a seat. They did according to his instructions. The Buddha sat down and asked where the brahmin was. They answered that he was lying on his bed in the room. Thereupon, He told them to bring the brahmin. The brahmin came and sat at a suitable place. Then He asked the brahmin what was wrong with him.

The brahmin said: “O Gotama! you have been visiting me ever since I cleared my farmland, I have promised to share the crops with You when they come out well. But now my desire cannot be fulfilled and I am overwhelmed with anguish. I did not want even to eat my meal.”

Then the Exalted One asked: “O Brahmin! Do you know why there arises grief in you?” The brahmin said: “I do not know, Gotama. But do you know?” The Exalted One replied: “Yes, I do. Grief and fear arises from craving.” Then the Buddha preached the following verse.

*Tañhāya jāyatī soko
tañhāya jāyatī bhayaṃ.
Tañhāya vippamuttassa natthi soko kuto bhayaṃ.*

O Brahmin, grief arises from craving. From craving arises fear. There is not the least grief in a person who has become free from craving through arahatship. How can fear arise in him since he has repudiated it at the moment of attaining the anāgāmi-magga?

At the end of the sermon, the brahmin attained the Fruition of Sotāpatti-magga.

Story of Candābha Thera

While dwelling in Jetavana, in Sāvatti City, the Buddha preached the verse beginning with 'Candābha vimalam suddham', etc., in connection with Candābha.

The story in detail is:

Former Good Deeds of Candābha.

Long ago, a trader in Vārāṇasī planned to go to a border country to collect fragrant sandalwood. So he took a lot of garments and ornaments to the border country. There, he camped near the gate of a village and asked the cowherds in the wood: "Boys, is there somebody who works at the foot of the hill?" The cowherds said: "Yes." He asked again: "What is his name?" When they gave the man's name, he also asked the names of the man's wife and children. When they gave their names, he asked further the locality of man's home. The cowherds gave their answers with honesty.

Acting on the information given by the cowherds, the trader went in a small cart to the house of the forest worker. He stepped down, went into the house and called the housewife by her name. Thinking that the visitor was one of their relatives, the woman quickly came out and gave him a seat. The trader sat down, and mentioning the name of her husband, he asked: "Where is my friend?" She replied: "Sir, your friend has gone to the forest." Then he asked her about the children, mentioning their names and referring to them as "son" and "daughter". He gave her garments and ornaments as presents for her husband and children. The housewife served the trader with very good food hospitably. When her husband returned from the forest, she told him about the guest, how he had inquired about their children by name and how he had given her presents for the whole family. The worker became intimate with the trader and dutifully did all that was necessary for the guest.

In The Evening

Then in the evening the trader sat on the bed and asked the forest worker: "What objects do you find abundantly at the foot of the hill while you are wandering there." The forester said: "I do not find anything extraordinary other than the trees with red branches that are plentiful." The trader asked him whether he found such trees abundantly and the forester assured him that the trees abounded. "In that case, please show me those trees." Then, led by the forester, the trader went into the forest, cut down the red sandalwood trees and came back with five hundred cart-loads of sandalwood. He gave the forester his address in Vārāṇasī and said: "I would like you to come to my place. You are always welcome. When you come, I want you to bring only those trees. I want no present other than the trees with red branches." After speaking warmly out of friendship, the trader returned to Vārāṇasī.

In accordance with the trader's instruction, the forest worker brought only red sandalwood whenever he went to see the trader. The trader was grateful for his kindness and gave much gold and silver.

The Relic Stupa honoured with Sandalwood

On another occasion, after the Parinibbāna (passing away) of the Buddha Kassapa and the construction of a great relic stupa, the forester came to his friend, the Vārāṇasī trader, with a lot of sandalwood. The trader had the sandalwood pounded, filled the bowl with it and said to his friend: "Come, friend, let us go to the great stupa before the meal is ready. We will honour the stupa and come back." So saying he took his friend to the stupa and honoured it with an offering of sandalwood powder. His friend, the forest worker, too honoured the stupa by making the shape of a moon with red sandalwood powder on the bell shape part of the shrine.

(This forest worker was the future Thera Candābha. This above act of honouring was his only good deed in the past that contributed to his attainment of the Path and Fruition.)

Brahmin Candābha.

On his death, the forest worker was reborn in the deva-world and after passing his time during the whole interval between the two Buddhas, he was reborn in an affluent brahmin family in Rājagaha in the time of Buddha Gotama. From the navel of the young brahmin there came out white, brilliant light like that of the full moon. So his parents and relatives named him Candābha, master moonlight.

(This emission of the whole bright light like the full-moon was the result of his honour done to Buddha Kassapa stupa with a moon shape made of sandalwood powder.)

The brahmins decided to take the child round and make money by deceiving the people. They made the child sit in a vehicle and wandered about the whole Jambudipa, boasting that those who stroked the youth's body with their hands would acquire much wealth. Only those who could pay one hundred or one thousand coins were allowed to stroke the child.

In the course of their wanderings, the brahmins came to Savatthi and stayed in a place between the city and the Jetavana monastery. In the morning, five crores of noble, virtuous men gave alms and in the afternoon, they went to Jetavana with scents, flowers, robes, medicines, etc. to hear the Dhamma.

Seeing these people, the brahmin asked them where they were off to. "We are going to hear the Exalted One's sermon," answered the noble, virtuous men. Then the brahmin said: "Come friend, what's the use of going to that Exalted One. There is no power like that of our Brahmin Candabha. Certainly, those who stroke his body will have such and such benefits. Come and see Candābha."

Candābha taken to The Monastery

The good people said: "What kind of power does the Brahmin Candābha possess? Our teacher the Exalted One is the most powerful being in the world." Being unable to give a final decision on the issue by themselves, they at last agreed to go to the monastery and see the powers of the Exalted One and of the Brahmin. So they went to the monastery taking the Brahmin Candābha.

Ordination of Candābha

As soon as the Brahmin came near Him, the Buddha resolved to make moonlight from the Brahmin's navel disappear. The Brahmin became something like a small crow in a basket of charcoal. When the Brahmin was taken away from the Buddha, the light from his navel reappeared and when he was taken back to the Buddha, the light vanished as before. This occurred thrice and Candābha wondered whether the Buddha knew any mantra (spell) that could dispel the light and he asked the Buddha accordingly.

The Buddha said: "Yes, I know it." The Brahmin requested: "In that case please teach me the mantra." The Buddha replied that He could not teach it to anyone who was not a monk. Then the Brahmin told his companions: "I will become the greatest man in the whole Jambudipa after learning this mantra. You wait for me in your lodgings in this city. I will learn the mantra within two or three days after ordination." Having thus cheered up his friends he went back to the Buddha, asked for ordination and become a monk.

Candābha's Attainment of Arahatsip

Then the Buddha taught Thera Candābha contemplation of the thirty-two parts of the body (Dvattimsakara kammattana). The Thera asked the Buddha what kesa (head-hair), loma (body-hair), etc. meant. The Buddha said: "That contemplation is preliminary (pari-kamma) to learning the mantra you should recite it."

The other brahmins came occasionally and asked him if he had learnt the mantra. The Thera answered that he had not and that he was still reciting the preliminary. In this way through the contemplation of the thirty-two parts of the body, Thera Candābha developed concentration, then practised insight-meditation (Vipassanā) and within two or three days he attained arahatship. When the brahmins came and inquired him, he told them clearly and decisively: “Go away! It is now not possible for me to return to worldly life.”

On hearing his words, other monks reported to the Buddha: “Glorious Buddha! This Thera Candābha has falsely claimed to be an arahatship.” The Buddha said: “Monks! Now, my son, the monk Candābha, is an arahat with all his āsavas extinct. He speaks only the truth.” Then the Buddha uttered the following verse:

Candaṃ va vimalaṃ suddha; vippassannaṃ anāvilm Nandībhava-parrikkhīṇaṃ, lam ahaṃ brūmi Brāhmaṇaṃ.

Monks! The arahat is free from the impurity of five kinds of sensual pleasure; pure, spotless and clear like flying mansion of the moon, free from all defilements and craving for the three kinds of existence. Such an arahat, I call a true Brāhmaṇa as he really and naturally is.

By the end of the Discourse many people attained the Fruition of Sotāpatti etc.

Māra's Temptation of The Buddha

Story of Māra

The Buddha preached the sermon beginning with “Atthamhi sukhāsahāyā” in connection with Māra who came to tempt Him to be a king. The detail account is as follows:

Once, the Buddha was dwelling in a small forest hermitage on the slopes of the Himalayas, in Kosala country. At that time, the kings still enforced their rule by oppressing the people. The Buddha saw the people in the countries of tyrants being ill-treated through various kinds of unlawful taxation and punishment. Being moved with pity, the Buddha wondered whether it was possible for one to be a good ruler without killing by oneself or through another person, without bringing about damage or loss of citizen's property by oneself or through another person, and without making one grieve by oneself or through another person.

Māra knew what was passing through the Buddha's mind and he thought: “Now, the Monk Gotama is considering the possibility of being a ruler. Perhaps, now He wants to be a king. Kingship is a cause of negligence. If the Monk Gotama becomes a king, I will have the opportunity to molest him. I will now go and make the Monk Gotama tries for kingship.” So thinking, he approached the Exalted One and said: “Glorious Buddha, let the Glorious One be a king! Let the Exalted One who utters good words becomes a righteous king who does not kill by Himself nor through another person, who does not bring about damage or loss of other's property by Himself or through another person and who does not make other grieve by Himself or through another person.”

Thus Māra lured the Buddha. The Exalted One said: “Hey, you, evil Māra! What do you see in Me that makes you tell Me like this?” Māra replied: “Glorious Buddha, You have thoroughly and effectively developed the four foundations of supernormal power. If Your mind is inclined to turn the great Himalayas into gold, it will certainly become solid gold. If You act lawfully as a king, I will support You in all matters that require gold or silver.”

Then the Exalted One uttered the following verse:

*Pabbatassa suvaṇṇassa jātarūpassa kevalo.
Dvittāva nālam ekassa iti vidvā samaṃ care.*

There may be a big mountain that is made up of pure gold unmixed with copper, iron, lead, or other minerals. Let alone such a mountain of gold.

Even a gold mountain that is twice as high as the Himalayas cannot satisfy the craving of a person. The wise man who understands this nature of craving should steadfastly and diligently practise the ten good Dhamma in thought, speech and deed.

*Yo dukkham adakkhi yato nidānaṃ kāmesu so jantu katham̐ nameyya.
upadhim̐ viditvā saṅgoti loke tass'eva jantu vinayāya sikkhe.*

If a man knows clearly that all kinds of suffering have their source in the five kinds of sensual objects, why should he be inclined to see anything good in them? In this world, a man (being) who clearly sees sensuality as a substratum (upadhi) of existence that is bound with greed, hatred, ignorance, conceit and false beliefs, should devote himself to threefold training (in morality, concentration and wisdom) in order to overcome sensual desire.

After startling Māra with these verses, the Buddha said: “Hey, you, evil Māra, your teaching is one thing while My teaching is another (you teach to strive to occupy sense objects and sense pleasures while I stress the need for eradicating them.) Certainly, by no means is it possible to enter into a doctrinal discussion with you. I teach as follows.” Then the Buddha preached the following verses:

(1) *Atthami jātamhi sukhā sahāyā tutthi sukhā yā itarītarena.
Puñña sukham̐ jīvitasañkhayamhi sabbassa dukkhassa sukham̐ pahānam̐.*

(In this world), when there is any kind of understanding, (a) friends are a source of happiness, (b) contentment with whatever is available is the source of happiness, (c) when one is dying, the good deeds are a source of happiness. (d) Arahatsip, which means the total abandonment of the whole round of suffering inherent in the life cycle, is the source of happiness (Here the cause of happiness is described as happiness in phalupaca method. The same may be said of the following verses. (This verse mentions four causes of happiness.)

(2) *Sukhā matteyyatā loke atho pettayyatā sukhā.
Sukhā samaññatā loke atho Brahmaññata sukhā.*

In this world, (a) supporting of one's mother is the source of happiness. (b) So is supporting one's father. (c) Giving alms respectively to hermits monks and wandering ascetics is also a source of happiness. Moreover, (d) giving gladly and respectively to the Buddhas, Paccakabuddha and ariya disciples is a source of happiness. (This verse also shows four sources of happiness.)

(3) *Sukham̐ yāva jarā sīlam̐ sukham̐ saddhā paṭiḥhitā.
Sukho paññāya paṭilābho pāpānam̐ akaraṇam̐ sukham̐.*

The good moral life involving the observance of the Five, Eight or Ten Precepts is good and productive of happiness until old age when one's hair turn grey, teeth fall off and the skin become wrinkled.

(Ruby earring, red garments etc. are congenial to people only at a certain age. Young people's garments are not congenial to adults and vice versa. An adult wearing the garment of a young man or vice versa will cause criticism and gives one the impression of being crazy. But morality comprising the observance of the Five, or Ten Precepts is congenial to young or old, people alike in the three phases of life. A morally good person earns the approbation of other people that is pleasant and delightful to him.

Unwaveringly established faith, mundane and supramundane, is a source of happiness. So is the ability to acquire mundane and supramundane wisdom by diligence. Complete abstinence from doing evil deeds is another source of happiness. This verse also show another set of the four sources of happiness.)

By the end of the discourse, millions of devas realized the Four Truths and became liberated.

Story of Pokkharasāti Brahmin

(From Ambattha Sutta, Dīgha Nikāya, Vol II)

(For the full story of the Brahmin Pokkharasāti, the reader is referred to the Sīlakhanda Vagga of the Dīgha Nikāya. It is condensed here as much as possible.)

One day, at dawn, the Buddha surveyed the world of living beings and there appeared the Brahmin Pokkharasāti within the range of His Omniscience. After further reflection the Buddha saw the former good deeds of the Brahmin that would contribute to his attainment of the sotāpatti-magga. The Buddha also foresaw, that:

“When I go to Icchanangala region, the Brahmin teacher Pokkharasāti will send his the young Brahmin Ambattha to inquire about My major and minor marks. Ambattha will hold a debate with Me, uttering all kinds foolish words. I must admonish him and dispel the poison of his pride. He will report the matter to his teacher. When his teacher hears his word, he will come to Me and examine My marks. I will then teach the Brahmin Pokkharasāti, who will attain the Fruition of Sotāpatti at the end of My Teaching.”

With His fore-knowledge, the Buddha journeyed to Kosala Kingdom with five hundred monks and on arriving at Icchanangala brahmin village in Kosala, the Buddha dwelt in a nearby huge grove at Icchānaṅgala.

At that time as city administrator appointed by King Pasenadī Kosala, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti administered the populous city of Ukkattha which was abounded in grass, firewood, water, rice and paddy.

(When the city was about to be founded its site was marked under the light of torches and firebrands, hence the name of the city, Ukkatṭha.)

(About the Brahmin Pokkharasāti: In the time of Buddha Kassapa he was a brahmin well-versed in the three Vedas. After giving alms and hearing the Dhamma, he was reborn in the deva-world.

(When he died in the deva-world and was reborn in the human abode in the moisture in a Paduma lotus, in a big lake near the Himavanta. A hermit, having built a hermitage near the lake, was living there. While standing near the lake, he saw the big lotus bud and thought to himself: “This big lotus bud is extraordinarily bigger than others. When it blossoms, I will take it.”

(The bud did not blossom even after a week. The hermit became impatient and stepping into the lake, he plucked the bud. As soon as it was broken from the stalk, the bud opened. Then to his surprise, the hermit found in the flower a baby boy, silvery white and covered with the pollen all over his body, like a silver statue with gold dust scattered over.

(The hermit thought: “This child will become a great man. I will start raising him from now.” He took the child to the hermitage, raised him and began to teach him the three Vedas when he was seven years old. The boy became a very famous brahmin teacher who was an authority the three Vedas. Later on, the brahmin teacher demonstrated his knowledge to King Kosala. As the King, having a high opinion of his knowledge, offered him the post of administrator of Ukkattha City. He was known as Pokkharasāti because he was conceived in the lotus-flower.

(The brahmin's body had the colour of white lotus flower and was splendid like a silver post set up at the gate of a celestial city. His head had the dark blue colour of sapphire. His beard appeared like a dark line drawn on the surface of the moon. The eyes were like a blue lotus flower and the nose was quite clean and round like a silver tube. His palms, soles and lips seemed well tainted with lacquer. The brahmin's body was very beautiful. He was fit to be made a king in a place where there was no ruler. Such was the splendour of the brahmin. Because of his resemblance to a white lotus, he was called Pokkharasāti.)

— (From the Commentary) —

Like the Brahmin Verañjā mentioned earlier, Pokkharasāti heard the news about the attributes of the Buddha. He has a residential pupil, named Ambaṭṭha, a young brahmin who was also well-versed in the three Vedas and various other sacred books, and worthy of brahmin teacher himself who held him in high esteem and ranked him as his peer.

Pokkharasāti told his pupil, Ambaṭṭha, about the reported virtues of the Buddha and said: “Dear son Ambaṭṭha, go to the Monk Gotama and enquired whether the report is true or not and whether He is true to His fame or not. The thirty-two marks of a great man are explicitly mentioned in our Vedas. For a great man who possesses these marks, there are only two possibilities: if he leads a worldly life, he will become a Universal Monarch, the ruler of the four continents; or if he leads an ascetic life, he will become a Buddha. My dear son Ambaṭṭha, I have taught you the Vedas and you have learnt them from me.”

(As an intelligent brahmin, Pokkharasāti thought: “In this world, there are many people like Purāṇa Kassapa and others who go about claiming to be Buddhas, so it is not advisable for me to associate with a teacher merely from hearsay. Certainly, it is hard to dissociate oneself from some person if one has become associated with them. Besides, such an attempt may be harmful to one's welfare, so it is good to send my disciple and find out whether the Monk Gotama is a Buddha before I myself go and see Him.” So Pokkharasāti sent his disciple Ambaṭṭha.)

Then having risen and paid respect to his teacher, Ambaṭṭha said: “Very well, Master,” and went to Icchanangala grove with many other young men in his teacher's chariot that was drawn by a mule. He went as far as the chariot could travel in the grove, then got off the chariot near the gate and entered the monastery on foot. (It was then noon.)

At that time, several monks who engaged in meditation were walking to and fro on the ground in the open air. Ambaṭṭha went to the monks and said: “Friends where is the Monk Gotama now? We have come to this place to see the Monk Gotama.”

Then the Monk thought to themselves:

“This youth Ambaṭṭha is of a well known family. He is also a pupil of the famous Pokkharasāti. For the Exalted One, it should not be burdensome to converse with such a son of a good family.”

So they said to Ambaṭṭha:

“Approach quietly that lodging with the doors closed. Enter the frontage slowly and after humming, knock at the door. The Exalted One will open the door for you.”

Then Ambaṭṭha went and knocked at the door as instructed by the monks. The Buddha opened the door. Ambaṭṭha entered the building followed by the other young men. They exchanged pleasant words with the Buddha and sat at suitable places.

(Note: The Buddha did not get up and open the door by Himself. In fact, He stretched His hand, resolving that the door should be opened. Then the door opened by itself, as if it were saying: “Venerable Sir! You, who have given alms for crores of kappas, have not done the kind of kamma that would make you open the door with your hands.” This opening of the door by itself, as resolved by the Buddha, is expressed by “vivari bhagavā dvāram” in Pāli, which is simply translated as “the Buddha opened the door.”)

Ambaṭṭha's Behaviour

The young Ambaṭṭha was not even impressed by the splendour of the Buddha's body. Bent on threatening, he unfastened the strip of cloth tied on his chest and hang it loose down his neck. Holding the edge of his waist-cloth with one hand, he got onto the promenade and sometimes walked there, sometimes stood, sometimes showed his arm, sometimes showed his chest, sometimes showed his back, sometimes made a rude gesture with his hands, and sometimes made ugly facial expressions (such as grimaces), saying:

“O Gotama! Are you quite well? Do you get your food without any hardship? It is apparently not hard for you to get food. Certainly, all your physical features are robust and very impressive. Wherever you go, people adore you very much as a monk belonging to a royal family or as a Buddha and give choicest nourishing food. Friends, look at the abode of Gotama! It is like an extraordinary hall. It looks like a celestial mansion. Look at His bed and His pillow! For a man who lives in such a good place, how can it be possible to experience hardship in leading a monastic life!”

Thus Ambaṭṭha spoke only derisive words and ungentlemanly words that would be bitter and painful forever to ordinary people.

Then the Buddha thought: “This young Ambaṭṭha spends his energy irrelevantly like a man who stretches his hand to grasp the highest Brahmā abode (Bhavagga) or like a man who stretches his legs to wander in the Avīci hell or like a man who wants to swim across the great ocean or like a man who wants to climb Mount Meru. I will now talk with him.’ So thinking the Buddha said to Ambaṭṭha: “You speak to Me disrespectfully and bitterly in a way that is unacceptable to good people. Do you speak to the aged brahmin teachers and their teachers in the same way.”

“No, Gotama, I do not speak to them in this way. When a brahmin wants to speak to a walking teacher, he speaks while walking. If he wants to speak to a standing teacher, he speaks while standing. If he wants to speak to a sitting teacher, he speaks while sitting. If he wants to speak to a teacher who is lying down, he has to speak while lying down.”

Monks denounced as Low Caste for The First Time

(Herein a brahmin usually spoke to his teacher only while walking, standing and sitting. But Ambaṭṭha was so arrogant that he mentioned the lying posture.) So the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, a walking brahmin pupil may speak to a walking brahmin teacher, a standing brahmin pupil may speak to a standing brahmin teacher, a sitting brahmin teacher may speak to a sitting brahmin teacher. Such a behaviour, all brahmin teachers approve. But you speak while lying down to your teacher who is also lying down (In that case, you are indeed like an ox.) Is your teacher then an oxen and you an ox.”

Then Ambaṭṭha became very angry and said: “O Gotama! with the dark, low-caste, vile and bare-headed monks who sprang from the instep of Brahmā, I speak in the same way as I now speak to you.” Thus he disparaged the Buddha using the word low-caste for the first time.

(Herein, according to Ambaṭṭha, brahmin sprang from the mouth of the Brahmā, princes from the chest, merchants from the navel, labourers from the knee and monks from the instep. Believing thus, Ambaṭṭha ranked the monks as men of the lowest caste and though he made no reference in his speech it was intended for the Buddha.)

Then the Buddha thought: “Since this young Ambaṭṭha came here, he has spoken to Me only with conceit motivating his remarks. Like a man who grasp a very poisonous snake by the neck or who embraces a big fire or who holds the trunk of a bull-elephant in a rut, he does not know his capacity. I will now let him know it.” So the Buddha said:

“Ambaṭṭha, you came here for some purpose. (1) You should be well mindful of the purpose for which you came here (2) Oh! without having intelligence as yet, you consider yourself already intelligent. There is nothing but lack of cleverness to account for the way you behave and speak to me.” (Here the first statement means: “Your teacher has sent you here not for insulting us but for some other purpose. So now mind the business you are sent for.” After reminding Ambaṭṭha of the etiquette to be observed by visitors, the Buddha made the second statement to snub him.)

Resentful and displeased with the Buddha's reference to his lack of cleverness. Ambaṭṭha decided to censure the Buddha in the presence of his companion and said:

“Gotama! The Sakyan princes are arrogant rough, small-hearted, talkative and if they do not revere, adore, honour or bow to the brahmin is downright improper.” Thus Ambaṭṭha spoke in contempt of the Sakyan princes, using the word “low caste” for the first time.

Monks denounced as Low Caste for The Second Time

Then the Buddha asked Ambaṭṭha how the Sakyan princes had wronged him. Ambaṭṭha replied: “Gotama, I once went to Kapilavatthu City to do some business for my teacher Pokkharasāti. I visited the assembly hall of the Sakyan princes. At that time, many Sakyan kings, who have been anointed the princes, who have not been anointed yet, were tickling one another, laughing uproariously and playing boisterously while seated on a raised platform in the hall. In fact, they seemed to be laughing only at me. Nobody offered me a seat, Gotama! Not to thus revere, adore, honour or bow to the brahmin on the part of low-caste Sakyan princes is downright improper.” Thus Ambaṭṭha denounced the Buddha for the second time using the word, “low-caste”.

(The Sakyan princes sneered at Ambaṭṭha because they know his ancestry. He arrived like one intoxicated with pride, his shoulder-bone bent and one hand holding the edge of his waistcloth that hang loosely down to his feet. They tickled one another, laughed and played boisterously saying: “Look folks! There comes Ambaṭṭha, a descendant of our slave, Kaṇhāyana.” Ambaṭṭha also knew his ancestry and so he consider rightly that the princes were laughing only at him.)

Monk denounced as Low Caste for The Third time

Then the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, even a skylark can chirp as much as it like in her nest. Kapilavatthu is the city of Sakyan princes. You should not have a grudge with such a trivial matter.”

When the Buddha thus cited the simile of the skylark, Ambaṭṭha thought that the Buddha was free from conceit since he linked his relatives to the skylark and the brahmins to hamṣa, crane and peacock. So Ambaṭṭha went on to mention the four classes of people, saying: “Friend Gotama, there are four classes of people, namely, kings, brahmins, merchants and labourers. Of these four classes, the kings, merchants and labours are in fact servants of the brahmins. So, O friend Gotama, not revering, adoring, honouring or bowing to the brahmins on the part of the low-caste Sakyan princes is downright improper.”

Thus Ambaṭṭha belittled the Sakyan princes for the third time with the word, “low-caste.”

Proof of Ambaṭṭha's Low Birth

As Ambaṭṭha persisted in denouncing the Sakyan princes as low caste people, the Buddha decided to ask him about his clan. So the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha, of what clan are you.” Ambaṭṭha, shouted three times: “Gotama, I am of Kaṇha clan.”

(Herein, Ambaṭṭha knew the impurity of the Kaṇha clan superficially. But he did not know the previous life of Kaṇha. Owing to his ignorance he thought that the Buddha could not say anything and he made the above remark because of his arrogance.)

Then the Buddha explained to Ambaṭṭha the lineage of Sakyan princes and the origin of the Kanha clan.

“Ambaṭṭha, if you trace back your genealogy, you will find that the Sakyan princes are the sons of lords and that you are the son of their slave-woman.

“Ambaṭṭha, the Sakyan princes regard King Okkāka as their grandfather. What happened long ago was that King Okkāka had a young Queen whom he loved very much. Wishing to give his kingdom to her son, he sent into exile his elder sons called Okkākumha, Karakanda, Hatthinika and Sinisura. (Their elder and younger sisters, namely, Piya, Sappiya, Ānanda, Vijitā and Vijitasenā, these five princesses also accompanied the princes with the permission of the King.) The exiled princes founded a city in the teak forest, near a lake on the fringe of the Himavanta. They married their sisters in order to preserve the purity of their family.

“Ambaṭṭha, King Okkāka asked his ministers where his sons lived. They reported to him that the princes had founded a city in the teak forest, near a lake on the Himavanta and that they had married their sisters to preserve the purity of their family.

“Ambaṭṭha! King Okkāka exclaimed then: ‘My sons are so able. They are so able!’ in allusion to that exclamation the princes were known as Sakyan (Sakya, ‘able ones’). King Okkāka was the prototype of the Sakyan princes.

Origin of Kanha Clan

“Ambaṭṭha, King Okkāka had a slave woman named Disā. She gave birth to a son called Kanha. Immediately after his birth, Kanha said: ‘O Mother, cleanse me! Bathe me! Free me from this impurity! I will be one who can do good to you.

“Ambaṭṭha, just as nowadays, people call a ogre a pisaca, so also in those days people gave the name Kanha to ogres. They talked about the slave-woman's son: ‘This child spoke soon after his birth. So he is a Kanha (ogre).’ The Kanha clansmen were known as Kaphayana after that saying: ‘That Kanha was the progenitor of the Kanha clan.’

“Ambaṭṭha, so if you trace back your ancestry, you will find that the Sakyan princes are the sons of the lord while you are the son of their slave-woman.”

When the Buddha spoke thus, the young men, who had come along with Ambaṭṭha, said together: “O Gotama! Do not disparage Ambaṭṭha so severely with the word, ‘son of a slave-woman.’ O Gotama! Do not disparage Ambaṭṭha so severely with the word, ‘son of a slave-woman.’ Ambaṭṭha is well-born, a young man of good family, well-informed, skilful in speaking and wise. He is competent to challenge and refute you in connection with your use of the word ‘son of a slave-woman.’

(Herein the outcry of these young men was designed merely to absolve themselves of blame before their teacher. In their view, Ambaṭṭha was the top disciple of their teacher. If they did not put in a word for him in his dispute with the Buddha, he would make such a report as would make his teacher displeased with them. So thinking, they supported Ambaṭṭha so as to be free from censure. They secretly wanted him to be snubbed. Indeed because of his arrogance they hated him naturally.)

Then the Buddha thought: “If these young men, seated there keep talking loudly, I will not come to the end of my speech. I will silence them and talk only with Ambaṭṭha.” So the Buddha said to them:

“Young men! If you believe that because Ambaṭṭha is low born, not of good family, ill-informed, not skilful in speaking and devoid of wisdom, he is not competent to refute the Monk Gotama, then leave him alone. It rests only with you to argue with me about the matter. But if you think that Ambaṭṭha is well-born, of good family, well-informed, skilful in speaking and wise and competent to argue with Me about this matter, then you keep quiet. Let Ambaṭṭha alone argue with Me.”

Then the young men thought: “Ambaṭṭha (dare not raise his head again) when it is said that he is the son of a slave-woman. This matter of birth is inscrutable. If the Monk Gotama tell someone that he (that someone) is a slave, who will be able to challenge and contend with the Monk Gotama? Let Ambaṭṭha rid himself of the burden that is of his own making.” So wishing to wash their hand and put the responsibility on Ambaṭṭha, they said to the Buddha evasively:

“Friend Gotama! Ambaṭṭha is well-born, of good family, well-informed, skilful in speaking and wise. He is competent to rebut (your) use of the word ‘the son of a slave-woman.’ We will keep quiet. Let Ambaṭṭha refute you.”

The Buddha now asked Ambaṭṭha:

“Ambaṭṭha here is a reasonable question for you. You will have to answer it although you do not wish to do so. If you do not answer it thoroughly or speak evasively or keep silent or go away, then your head will break up into seven pieces on the spot.

“Ambaṭṭha, what do you think of the question I will now ask? What have you heard from old brahmin teachers and their predecessors (about it)? How did the Kaṇha clan originate? Who was the ancestor of the Kaṇha clans?”

When the Buddha asked him thus, Ambattha remained silent: (His silence was the outcome of this thought: “The Monk Gotama wants me to admit verbally by myself that I am the son of a slave-woman. If I do so, then I will certainly be a slave. If the Monk Gotama asks me twice or thrice and I refuse to answer him, he will say nothing and then I will go away.”)

For the second time the Buddha asked him: “Ambaṭṭha! what do you think of the question I will now ask? What have you heard from old brahmin teachers and their predecessors? How did the Kaṇha clansmen originate? Who was their ancestor?” But Ambaṭṭha was still silent.

Then the Buddha said:

“Ambaṭṭha, now it is not the time for you to remain silent. If a man refuses to answer a reasonable question which the Buddha asks him twice, then his head will break into seven pieces on the spot.”

At that moment, Sakka (the King of Devas) came and stood in the air above Ambaṭṭha in the form of an ogre with a glowing and blazing iron hammer in his hand and threatening to break Ambaṭṭha's head into seven pieces on the spot, if he refused to answer the reasonable question which the Buddha asked him thrice. Sakka in the form of an ogre was visible only to the Buddha and Ambaṭṭha.

Herein it may be asked as to why did Sakka come. (The answer is) he came in order to make Ambaṭṭha discard his false belief (or) in the above section when Sahampati Brahmā requested the Buddha to proclaim the Dhamma, Sakka, who was with the Brahmā, said: “Venerable Sir, you do the preaching, we will make disobedient and defiant people obey you. Let your authority be the Dhamma, ours will be the command.” In accordance with his pledge, Sakka came to scare Ambaṭṭha and force him to answer the Buddha's question.

(With regard to the statement “Sakka, in the form of an ogre, was visible only to the Buddha and Ambaṭṭha”, It should be explained that if he were seen by other people as well, those who saw Sakka would have poor impression of the Buddha. They would say contemptuously that the Buddha showed the ogre to Ambaṭṭha because the latter would not accept His doctrine and that the young brahmin had to speak reluctantly under duress.)

As soon as he saw the ogre, Ambaṭṭha's body sweated profusely. He felt his whole stomach was moving up and down making a terrible sound. He scrutinized his companions but he did not see any sign of creepy feat in them. He thought: "I am the only person threatened by this ogre. If I tell them about the ogre, they will say: 'Do you alone have the eyes to see the ogre? You did not see the ogre before. You see him only when you find yourself at your wit's end in your dispute with the Monk Gotama.' Now there is no one other than the Monk Gotama for my refuge." Thus frightened with his hair standing on end, Ambattha approached the Buddha, sat at a lower place and said:

"What did Friend Gotama say, let Friend Gotama say it again."

The Buddha then asked him for the last time:

"Ambattha, what do you think of my question? What have you heard from your old teachers and their predecessors? How did the Kaṇha clansmen originate? Who were their ancestors?"

Then Ambattha made the confession:

"Friend Gotama! I have heard what you said from my old brahmin teachers and their predecessor, Kaṇha clansmen have their origin in Kaṇha, the son of the slave-woman. That Kaṇha was their ancestor."

Ambattha's Ancestry

Ambattha's confession caused an uproar among the other young brahmins. They shouted: "Friend, it is said that Ambattha is low born, not of a good family, and the son of the Sakyan princes' slave-woman. The Sakyan princes are said to be the sons of the masters of Ambattha. We have misunderstood the Monk Gotama and blamed him, whereas in fact, he is a speaker of the truth (Dhammavādi)."

Then the Buddha thought: "These young men are humiliating Ambattha severely with the word 'son of a slave-woman'. I had better make Ambattha free from such a humiliation."

So he said:

"Young men! Do not humiliate Ambattha severely with the word 'son of a slave-woman!' That Kaṇha was a powerful hermit. He went to the region south of the river Ganga and after having learnt the holy mantras he approached King Okkāka and asked for his daughter, Maddaūpi's hand in marriage.

"King Okkāka said: 'Hey! This hermit, Kaṇha, is the son of my slave-woman and yet he is asking for my daughter. What kind of a man is he?' Furious and displeased, he bent his bow but he could not shoot the arrow nor could he withdraw it.

"Then the ministers approached the hermit and begged him to save the King. Kaṇha said that the King would be safe but he threatened that if the King dropped the arrow, the earth in the whole kingdom would be destroyed."

(Herein, the hermit Kaṇha went to the region south of the Ganga as a lay man and while serving a brahmin hermit, he obtained from that hermit a mantra for obstructing arrows. Then he donned the robe of a hermit, came to King Okkāka, asked for the latter's daughter and when the irate King bent his bow to kill him, he obstructed the arrow with his spell. The spell had the power only to obstruct the arrow. Kaṇha's reference to the destruction of earth was an empty threat, merely a lie. The same may be said of his other threats.)

"The ministers again begged him to save the King and the country. He said that the King and the country would be safe but again he lied that if the King dropped the arrow, there would be no rain in the whole kingdom for seven days.

"Again the ministers begged him to spare the King and the country and make the rain fall. He said that both the King and the country would be safe and it would rain but he said that if the arrow were directed at the elder son, he would be safe without a hair standing on end. Kaṇha said this only after making the King promise to give his daughter.)

"Young men, the ministers then reported to King Okkāka. The King directed the arrow at his eldest son and the prince was safe without a hair standing on end. Then threatened with the weapon of mantra, King Okkāka became frightened, his hair stood up; and (after having made Kaṇha washed his head, he released him from slavery) he gave his daughter Maddarūpī.

“Young men, do not humiliate Ambaṭṭha severely with the word, ‘son of a slave-woman’. That Kaṇha is a powerful hermit.”

The Buddha gave his account of Kaṇha, saying that Ambaṭṭha was somewhat akin to the Sakyan princes (on his side) and thereby consoling the young Ambaṭṭha. So like a man on whom water is poured, Ambaṭṭha felt much relieved as his worry [about his social status] had been washed away. He became conceited, thinking that the Buddha had affirmed his kinship to the royal family, Khattiya on his mother's side.

The Nobility of The Khattiyas

Ambaṭṭha considered himself a member of the ruling class, not knowing that he was not a real prince. So the Buddha decided to disillusion him and in order to explain the meaning of khattiya he further engaged in the following dialogue with the young man.

“Ambaṭṭha, now what do you think of the question that I will ask you? Suppose in this world a man of the aristocratic family marries a woman of brahmin family. As a result of their marriage a son is born. Will the son born of that couple receive priority among the brahmin as regard seat and water?”

When Ambaṭṭha answered: “Yes, Gotama, he may receive it.” the Buddha said again:

“May the brahmins serve that man at the feast in memory of the dead, the wedding feast, the feast at a sacrificial ceremony and at the feast given to guests?”

When Ambaṭṭha answered: “Yes, Gotama, they may serve him,” the Buddha asked again:

“May the brahmins teach or may not teach him the Vedas?”

When Ambaṭṭha answered: “Yes, Gotama, they may teach him,” the Buddha asked again:

“May the brahmin forbid or may not forbid his marriage with a brahmin woman?”

When Ambaṭṭha answered: “No Gotama, they may not forbid,” the Buddha, clinching the argument, asked:

“May royal family consecrate him a king?”

“No Gotama,” replied Ambaṭṭha reasonably, “They may not consecrate him because his mother is not a member of Khattiya family.”

(Here in this section Ambaṭṭha answered that a son of a Khattiya father and a brahmin mother is not crowned king because of the low birth of the mother, so also is the son born of a brahmin father and a Khattiya mother because of the low birth of the father. The Buddha made this clear in His further dialogue with Ambaṭṭha.)

Buddha: “Ambaṭṭha! What do you think of the question which I will now ask you? Suppose, in this world, a brahmin marries a Khattiya woman and a son is born of this marriage. May their son receive priority among the brahmin in respect of seat and water?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, he may.”

Buddha: “May the brahmins serve him at the feast in memory of the dead?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “May they teach him the Vedas or may they not?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “May they forbid his marriage with a brahmin woman?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No, Gotama, they may not.”

Buddha: “May the Khattiyas consecrate him king?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No, Gotama, they may not, because the father is not a Khattiya.”

Buddha: “So, Ambattha, if you compare a man with man or woman with a woman, you will find that only the Khattiyas are superior and that the brahmins are inferior.”

The following is a different dialogue between the Buddha and Ambaṭṭha to show the superiority of the Khattiyas and the inferiority of the brahmins.

Buddha: “Ambaṭṭha! What do think of the question which I will now ask you? Suppose in this world, a brahmin is exiled, with his head shaved and ashes sprinkled over it from the country or the city by other brahmins for a certain offence. May that exiled brahmin receive priority among the brahmins in respect of seat and water?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No, Gotama, he may not.”

Buddha: “May the brahmins serve that (exiled) brahmin at the feast in memory of the dead, at the wedding feast, at the sacrificial feast and at the rest given to guests?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No Gotama, they may not.”

Buddha: “May the brahmins teach or may not teach the Vedas to that (exiled) brahmin?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No, Friend Gotama, they may not.”

Buddha: “May the brahmins forbid the marriage of that (exiled) brahmin with a brahmin woman?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Friend Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “Ambaṭṭha, what do you think of the question that I will now ask you? In this world, the Khattiyas exile a Khattiya from the city or the county, with his head shaved and ashes sprinkled over it for some offence. May that man receive priority among the brahmin in respect of seat and water?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, he may.”

Gotama: “May the brahmins serve him at the feast in memory of the dead, at the wedding feast, at the sacrificial feast and at the feast given to guests?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “May the brahmins teach or may not teach him the Vedas?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Gotama, they may.”

Buddha: “May they forbid or not forbid the marriage of that man with a brahmin woman?”

Ambaṭṭha: “No, Gotama, they may not.”

Buddha: “Ambaṭṭha, Khattiyas may have exiled a Khattiya with his head shaved and ashes sprinkled over and exiled from the country or the city for a certain offence and by such treatment he is very much disgraced. But even when he is very disgraced, the Khattiya is superior and the brahmin is inferior.”

“Ambaṭṭha, Sannankumara Brahmā too, utters this verse.”

*Khattiyo setho janetasmiṃ ye gottapatisārino
vijjā-caraṇa sampanno
so setho deva-mānusse.*

Among people who count much on ancestry, the Khattiyas are praiseworthy and superior. Among devas and humans, one who has wisdom and practised that wisdom is praiseworthy and superior.

“Ambattha, this verse is well-spoken by Sanankumara Brahmā. It is not ill-spoken: it is relevant to welfare; it is not irrelevant to welfare. I approved of it. Ambattha, I too like Sanankumara Brahmā, uttered this verse:”

Khattiyo seṭṭho janetasmiṃ so seṭṭha devamānusse.

Vijjā and Carana elaborated

There is the phrase “Vijjā-carana-samapanno” in the verse it means “possessed of vijjā (Knowledge) and carana (Practice)”. In the view of Ambaṭṭha, vijjā refers to the three Vedas while carana to the five moral precepts. Ambaṭṭha thought that if a man who possesses vijjā and carana is praiseworthy and superior, only then the brahmins were the praiseworthy and superior people. Wishing to know these two qualities, he asked: “O Friend Gotama, what is carana and what is vijjā?”

Then the Buddha, desiring to point out the supreme, transcendent knowledge and practice, leaving aside the three Vedas and the Five Precepts that are bound up with the well known caste system, etc. of Brahmanism, said:

“Ambaṭṭha, in the matter of possessing supreme transcendent knowledge and practice, you should never utter word such as ‘you are fit for me’ or ‘you are not fit for me’, words that stem from attachment to birth, attachment to clan and attachment to pride.

“Ambaṭṭha, only in a human society with its marriage customs involving the taking or giving of a daughter, should you ever utter words that stem from attachment to birth, clan and pride, words such as ‘you are fit for me’ or ‘you at, not fit for me’.

“Ambaṭṭha, those, who cling to words stemming from attachment to birth (jāti-vāda), words stemming from attachment to clan (gotta-vāda), words stemming from attachment to pride (māna-vāda) and words stemming from attachment to marriages that involve the taking or giving of a daughter, are far from possession of the supreme, transcendent knowledge and practice.

“Ambaṭṭha, one can realize the supreme, transcendent practice only if one overcomes clinging to birth, clinging to clan, attachment to pride, attachment to marriages that involve taking or giving of a daughter.”

Then Ambaṭṭha thought: “It has been our belief that we are still in possession of Knowledge and Practice. But just as a violent storm roughly gets rid of husks of grain, the Monk Gotama illumined us about those Knowledge and Practice. The Monk Gotama insists and extols only this supreme Knowledge and Practice which we cannot grasp. We should know the knowledge and practice which this Monk Gotama talk about” and again asked the Buddha: “O Friend Gotama, what is carana and what is vijjā?”

Then as in the Samañña-phala Sutta, the Buddha gave a talk on the supreme, transcendent Knowledge and Practice, section by section, beginning with the appearance of the Buddha and ending in the attainment of arahatship. (Readers may look up the teaching in the translation of the Sutta.)

The Four Causes of Destruction

(To state briefly:) Then the Buddha pointed out to Ambaṭṭha the four causes of destruction of Knowledge and Practice (or of the Dhamma.) The four causes of are:

(1) The life of an ascetic, who, being unable to live up to the doctrine for the attainment of Knowledge and Practice, enters the forest and takes to eating fallen fruits, (2) the life of an ascetic, who, being unable to practise even that much, enters the forest and takes to eating roots and fruits, (3) the life of an ascetic, who, being unable to practise even that much, builds a fire-shed near a town or village and worship fire, (4) the life of an ascetic, who, practise even that much builds a pavilion with entrance from four directions at the junctions of the cross roads, for making-money by providing drinking-water to all the people who come from four quarters, etc. The Buddha described these four types of ascetics making the so-called self-styled Samaṇas and Brāhmanas as merely attendants of the monk who possessed the Knowledge and Practice of the Buddha-dhamma. Ambaṭṭha and his teacher were lacking in such Knowledge and Practice. So they did belong to the four types of degenerate monks and hermits, not to speak of the types of true monks who possessed the two qualifications. The Buddha elicited these facts from Ambaṭṭha through his questions and then criticized him for the first time.

“Ambaṭṭha you and your teacher lack supreme Knowledge and Practice. Nay, you even do not have the lesser qualities of those whose mode of life is the cause of the destruction of such Knowledge and Practice.

“Ambaṭṭha, your teacher, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti, does not have the lesser qualities (leading to such destruction) and yet he says impertinently: ‘What kind of people are these low-born, bare-headed and useless monks who sprang from the instep of the Brahmā? How can it be possible for the brahmins well-versed in the three Vedas to discuss with them? Ambaṭṭha, you note this defect of your brahmin teacher Pokkharasāti.’”

Then the Buddha added:

“Ambattha, your brahmin teacher, Pokkharasāti, enjoys the privileges granted by King Pasenadi Kosala. Yet the King does not give the brahmin teacher any opportunity to face him. Also, when he consults the Brahmin Pokkharasāti, he does so from behind a curtain. Ambaṭṭha, why does not the King allow the brahmin to face him, the brahmin who is recipient of provisions lawfully given by him? (You think over the reason for this matter.) Ambaṭṭha, you note this defect of your brahmin teacher Pokkharasāti.”

This was the second criticism made by the Buddha.

(Herein the Brahmin knew the mantra for deception in one's presence (summukhā avatṭam). If, while the King was adorned with a very costly ornament, he stood near the King and recited the mantra, uttering the name of the ornament, the King had to give the ornament without being able to say: “I will not give it”. Then on a festival day, he would say: “Bring the mahāraha ornament” then the attendants informed him of his having given it to the Brahmin Pokkharasāti. The King asked why he had given it and the ministers said that the Brahmin knew the mantra for immediate deception, that he had tricked the King and taken away the Mahāraha ornament.

(Other ministers too, who envied the Brahmin for his close relationship with the King said: “Great King, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti has a kind of leprosy called leucoderma. This kind of leprosy is infectious through physical contact. So do not embrace and fondle the Brahmin as you do now when you see the Brahmin.” From that time, the King did not allow the Brahmin to face him.

Still in spite of this loss of privilege, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti was a scholar learned in law and statecraft. There was nothing which went wrong if it was done after consultation with him. Therefore, the King sat behind a curtain and consulted the Brahmin who remained outside behind the curtain.

(This was known to no one except the King and the Brahmin. The Buddha revealed the secret (not to humiliate the Brahmin but) because He knew that such revelation would certainly convince others of His Omniscience.)

Then the Buddha questioned Ambaṭṭha and made him admit that it was impossible for a commoner or his slave to become a king or a minister just by sitting at a place where the King of Kosala conferred with the ministers and princess and by repeating what they said at such meetings. The Buddha pointed out that likewise it was impossible for Ambaṭṭha or his teacher to become a hermit or a probationary hermit just by reciting and teaching the Vedas that were recited and taught by ancient hermits like Aṭṭhaka, Vāmaka and others.

The Buddha again questioned Ambaṭṭha and made him admit that unlike Ambaṭṭha and his teacher, Aṭṭhaka, Vāmaka and others of ancient times did not don good garments, eat good food, move in the company of women, ride good chariots, keep their good mansions well-guarded and indulge in sensual pleasures. Then in conclusion, the Buddha said:

“Ambaṭṭha, thus you and your teacher are not hermits or probationary hermits. One who has doubt about my Buddhahood should remove that doubt by asking Me, I shall dispel his doubt by answering the questions.”

(The Buddha said so because there was no likelihood of Ambattha's attainment of the Path and Fruition in his present life. The day would only pass away. The young Brahmin has come to examine the major marks possessed by the Buddha. He had now forgotten the object of his visit and so the Buddha decided to remind him of it indirectly.)

No one was capable of examining the major marks of a Buddha who was sitting or lying. Examination was possible when He was standing or walking. Also. It was customary of the Buddha to rise and walk when someone came to investigate the marks. For these reasons, the Buddha came out of the monastery and went for a walk. Ambaṭṭha followed the Buddha closely.

Two Major Marks Shown

Walking behind the walking Buddha, Ambaṭṭha looked for the thirty-two major marks of an extraordinary man in the body of the Buddha. He saw clearly thirty of them. He did not, however, see the remaining two great marks namely, (1) the male genital covered with a sheath and (2) the thin, long and flat tongue. Therefore, he had doubts and was sceptical and indecisive.

Knowing this very well, the Buddha created, by His supernormal power, the man's genital covered with sheath, in such way as to make it visible to the young man Ambaṭṭha. Then He stuck out His tongue and passed it in both ears, right and left (thereby revealing its length), passed it into both nostrils, right and left (thereby revealing its tenderness), and covered the whole forehead with the tongue (thereby revealing its flatness.)

Then Ambaṭṭha concluded that the Buddha really possessed those marks and took leave of Him, saying: “Well, Gotama, we will go now. We have many things to attend to.” When the Buddha said: “Ambaṭṭha you may go if you wish.” Ambaṭṭha got onto his mule drawn chariot and left.

Stuck out His Tongue and passes It in Both Ears, Right and Left

At that time the brahmin teacher, Pokkharasāṭṭi, had come out of Ukkattha City and together with many brahmins, he was waiting for Ambattha in his garden. Ambaṭṭha went to the garden in his chariot as far as he could go and then stopping, he walked on foot. Then after paying respect to his teacher, he sat down at a certain place. Then there followed a dialogue between the teacher and Ambaṭṭha:

Pokkharasāṭṭi: “Ambaṭṭha have you seen the Monk Gotama?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes Sir, we have seen the Monk Gotama’.”

Pokkharasāṭṭi: “Ambattha, is the report about the reputation of the Monk Gotama true or false? Does the reputation of Gotama has any basis or does it have no basis?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Sir, the report about the Gotama's reputation is true. The reputation of Gotama has some basis, in fact. Gotama really possesses the thirty-two major marks of an extraordinary man and the marks are thoroughly genuine.”

Pokkharasāṭṭi: “Ambaṭṭha, did you ever talk with the Monk Gotama about something?”

Ambaṭṭha: “Yes, Sir, I talked with the Monk Gotama about something.”

Pokkharasāṭṭi: “Ambaṭṭha, how did you talk with the Monk Gotama about something?”

Thus questioned, Ambaṭṭha reported to his teacher all the conversation that he had with the Buddha. Then the teacher Pokkharasāṭṭi said:

“Oh! Our young sages and intellectuals are so amazing! Oh! your experts in the

my benefit.”

The Buddha accepted the invitation by saying nothing.

Knowing of the Buddha's acceptance, when the meal was ready, the Brahmin Pokkharasāti informed Him that the meal was ready, that it was time for the Buddha to partake of it. So at his invitation, the Buddha went to the Brahmin's house with His monks in the morning and sat in the seats prepared for them.

Then the Brahmin Pokkharasāti and his young pupils undertook the responsibility and personally served the Buddha and the monks respectively with good, delicious food. When the Brahmin knew that the Buddha had finished His meal and put aside the bowl, he took a seat and sat down at a proper place.

The Buddha gave the Brahmin Pokkharasāti a series of Dhamma talks leading to the Path and Fruition, talks on (1) generosity, (2) morality, (3) the attainment of the the deva-world and (4) the noble way leading to the Path, Fruition and Nibbāna. While following these talks, the mind of the Brahmin became stable, tender, free from hindrances, joyous and clear, then the Buddha preached the Four Truths that He Himself had discovered (sāmuikkamsika) and the Brahmin attained the Fruition of Sotāpatti.

Pokkharasāti's Special Request

Then the Brahmin Pokkharasāti, who had become a sotāpanna-ariya, said to the Master:

“O Venerable Gotama, Your Teaching is so delightful just as an object that has been upside down is turned upside up, just as a covered object is uncovered, just as a man who has lost his way is shown the right way, just as fire-torches are lighted in the darkness in order that those who have eye-sight may see various objects, so also You, Venerable Gotama, have clearly preached to me the Dhamma in many ways.

“O Venerable Gotama, with my son, daughter, wife, followers and councillors, I seek refuge in the Venerable Gotama, in the Dhamma and in the Sangha. From today, let the Venerable Gotama regard me as a lay man devoted to the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha for the rest of his life.

“Just as the Venerable Gotama visit the house of other lay devotees in Ukkaṭṭha, so also kindly visit my house. Young men and young women in my house will pay respect to You. They will welcome You. They will offer seats or water to You. At the very least they will be much inspired with faith. The response of these young men and women to Your visit will be conducive to their welfare and prosperity for a long time.”

Thus having committed himself to the Buddha, etc. on the supramundane level, the Brahmin invited the Buddha to his house. The Brahmin Pokkharasāti's commitment to the Buddha, etc. differed from that of other lay devotees in that (1) it embraced his sons, daughters, wife, followers, and councillors and (2) by the last paragraph, he stated the reasons for his commitment.

Therefore, in conclusion the Buddha extolled him, saying: “Brahmin, you have spoken well” and accepted the invitation.

Chapter 36

THE BUDDHA'S HEIGHT MEASURED BY A BRAHMIN

On one occasion, a certain brahmin citizen of Rājagaha heard that it was impossible to measure the height of Buddha Gotama. So when the Buddha went into Rājagaha City and made His rounds for alms, he took a sixty-cubit long bamboo pole and stood outside the city-gate. When the Buddha drew near the city-gate, he went up to Him with the pole. The pole reached just the Buddha's knee.

The next day, the brahmin joined two sixty-cubit long poles and came again near the Buddha. The joined poles did not stand higher than the waist of the Buddha who asked him what he was doing. The brahmin replied that he was measuring His height. Then the Buddha said:

“Brahmin, even though you may join all the bamboos in the universe, you will not be able to measure My height. Certainly, I have not developed the perfections for four asaṅkhyeyyas and a hundred thousand aeons to enable somebody to measure My height. (I have developed them to the extent that nobody can measure My height.) Brahmin, the Buddha is a personage who is peerless and immeasurable.”

So saying, the Buddha spoke the following verse as contained in the Dhammapada:

*Te tādise pūjayato
nibbute akuto bhaye na sakkā punnaṃ saṅkhātum imettāṃ api kenaci.*

The merit acquired by one who pays homage with saddhā to those Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas and other Noble Ones, who have calmed the heat of defilements, who have no source whatever from which grief and fear derive, who are endowed with virtues excellent and visible, are incalculable to any one in the three worlds of devas, humans and Brahmās saying: “This merit is beneficial this much, this merit is profitable this much.”

At the end of the verse, eighty-four thousand beings became soṭāpanna-ariyas, having the opportunity of blissfully enjoying the elixir of Nibbāna.

Story of King Pukkusāti

(From the Dhatu-vibbanga Sutta, Majjhima Nikāya)

When King Bimbisāra was ruling the city of Rājagaha in the country of Magadha of the Middle Land (Majjhima-desā), the ruler of the city of Takkaṣiḷa, on the border of the Middle Land, was King Pukkusāti.

Once, the merchants of Takkaṣiḷa went to Rājagaha with goods for sale. They took presents and went to see King Bimbisāra. They offered the presents and stood paying respect to the King, who asked them where they lived and they replied they lived in Takkaṣiḷa.

After making further enquiries about the political situation, material welfare and about the city itself, he asked the name of the King. When the merchants replied that their King was Pukkusāti, he asked if their King fulfilled the ten kingly duties. They answered: “Great King, our monarch fulfilled the ten duties. He promotes the welfare of the people through four supporting things (saṅgaha-dhamma) such as sassa-medha, purisa-medha, sammapasa and vacapeyya. He acts like the parent of the people and makes them happy as the parent would do to the child sleeping in his lap.”

(1) Sassa-medha: prudence with regard to crops. In collecting land revenue, only to a tenth of the crops harvested is collected.

- (2) Purisa-medha: prudence with regard to men and warriors in service. Prizes are awarded and provisions are distributed half-yearly.
- (3) Sammāpasa: winning the hearts of the poor. Loans in cash, a thousand or two, are offered to them without interest for three years.
- (4) Vācāpeyya: Affectionate talks. Endearing terms, such as ‘young man’, ‘uncle’, etc., are used in addressing people according to their age.

King Bimbisāra still asked another question: “How old is your king?” The merchants answered the age of their king and it so happened that the two monarchs were of the same age.

Then the King said to the merchants: “Friends, your King is righteous. He is equal to me in age. Would you be able to make your King, my friend?” When the answer was in the affirmative, King Bimbisāra exempted the merchants from customs duties, provided them with lodgings and ended the conversation by asking them to see him before their departure from the city.

In accordance with the King’s instructions, the merchants went to see King Bimbisāra on the eve of their departure, the King said: “Friends, have a pleasant journey on your way home. Ask your King, in my name, about his health and tell him, on my behalf, that I desire friendship with him.”

“Very well,” replied the merchants and they returned to Takkasilā. On arrival there, they stowed away their goods properly, and went to see their King after their breakfast. The King asked: “Where have you been, men? I have not seen you for all these days.” The merchants reported the whole matter to their King. Then the King rejoiced, saying: “Excellent, men! Because of you, I have a friend and ally in the Middle Country.”

Later on, the merchants of Rājagaha went to Takkasilā on business. They called on King Pukkusāti with presents. When the King learned that they had come from Rājagaha, the city of his royal friend, he said: “You are the visitors from Rājagaha, the city of my friend and ally, King Bimbisāra.” The merchants replied in the affirmative.

Afterwards the King asked after his friend’s health and made an announcement through the beat of drum: “From today onwards, all the merchants, who have come to my kingdom from the country of my friend King Bimbisāra, on foot or in carts, shall be provided with houses for lodgings and provisions from the royal granary. They shall be exempted from taxes. There shall be no molestation whatever to them.” King Bimbisāra did similarly in his Kingdom.

Exchange of Messages between The Two Kings

Then King Bimbisāra sent a message to King Pukkusāti saying:

“Friend, precious stones, such as rubies, pearls, etc. are usually produced in border countries. If you ever find various precious stones that make attractive objects and sensational news, please inform me of them.”

King Pukkusāti, on his part, sent a return message reading:

“Friend, the Middle Land is a great region. If attractive and sensational precious stones of different kinds appear there, kindly let me be informed.”

As the days, months and years passed, the two Kings remained staunch friends without seeing each other.

King Pukkusāti's Gift

While the two Kings were thus committed to sharing the news of their potential treasure, a very special thing worthy to be given as a gift occurred to King Pukkusāti first. The King obtained eight pieces of invaluable, five-coloured muslin. “These are of fine quality,” thought the King, “I shall send them as my gifts to my friend King Bimbisāra.” So he had eight cases made of sandalwood pith, each being the size of a gum lac ball, turned on a lathe: in each case he put a muslin piece and by applying gum-lac, he had the cases made into balls. Each ball was then wrapped with a white cloth and put in a box which was wrapped again with another cloth and sealed. "Give it to my friend King Bimbisāra," the King asked his ministers and sent the boxes to his royal friend. He also sent a message: "I would like my friend to open the box and see the gifts in the company of his ministers and other officials at the centre of the city."

The ministers went to Rājagaha and presented the gift. On hearing the message, King Bimbisāra ordered his ministers and officials, through his drummers, to assemble. At the city-centre, the King sat on the jewelled throne under a white royal umbrella. Then he removed the seal and the cloth-covers and opened the box. When he untied the package in the box and saw the gum balls, it occurred to him thus: "Oh, my friend King Pukkusāti sent these gum dices as his gifts, for he must have mistaken me for a gambler, a dice-addict." Thinking thus, he took a ball, roll it in his hand, guessed its weight and knew definitely that it contained a bundle of muslin.

When the King struck the ball against the foot of the throne, the gum fell off (in layers). He opened the fragrant case gently with his fingernails and on seeing the treasure of muslin, he ordered the other seven cases to be opened. They clearly saw with their eyes that all contained priceless pieces of muslin. When these were spread and measured, they were found to be of beautiful colours and fine touch, each measuring sixteen cubits in length and eight cubits in breadth. On seeing the precious treasure of muslin pieces, people clapped their hands and threw up their turbans. They rejoiced, saying: "Our King and his friend, King Pukkusāti, have never seen each other, yet that King has sent such priceless gifts. It is proper to make such a King a friend."

King Bimbisāra had each muslin piece appraised and found all of them to be of inestimably high value. He had four of them offered to the Buddha and kept the other four in his palace.

King Bimbisāra's Gift

Then king Bimbisāra wondered thus: "A return gift should excel the gift received. My friend, King Pukkusāti, has sent me the priceless gift. What kind of gift should I send in return to him?"

Herein it may be asked: "Is there no treasure that is better than the eight pieces of muslin in Rājagaha?" (The answer is:) It was not that there was none indeed. King Bimbisāra was a great king. Therefore, it could not be that there was nothing better than the eight pieces of muslin. Nevertheless, from the time of his attainment of sotāpanna any worldly treasure had been no more delightful to the King's heart. Only the Three Jewels, in the form of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha, were delightful. Therefore, in selecting the most valuable thing as a return gift, the King considered in the following manner:

"In this world, the treasure (ratana) is of two kinds: the living (saviññānaka) and the non-living (aviññānaka). Of these two, the non-living, such as gold, silver or any other precious thing, is only to adorn the living. Therefore, the living treasure is more praiseworthy.

"Again, the living treasure is of two kinds the human and the animal, The animal, such as elephant, horse or any other creature, is only to work for the human. Therefore the human treasure is more praiseworthy.

"Again, the human treasure is of two kinds: the male and the female. The female, even if she be the wife of a Universal Monarch, is to serve the male. Therefore the male treasure is more praiseworthy.

"Again, the male treasure is of two kinds: the householder (agārika) who strives for his family and the ascetic (anāgārika) who does not strive for his family. The householder, even if he be a Universal Monarch, the top of the former kind, is to pay homage with the fivefold veneration to the newly ordained novice of today. Therefore the ascetic treasure is more praiseworthy.

"Again, the ascetic treasure is of two kinds: the learner (sekkha), a worldling or a man of lower attainments, and the non-learner (asekkha), an arahat. Even if there be a hundred thousand learners, they are not equal to one non-learner, the arahat, in sanctity. Therefore, the non-learner treasure is more praiseworthy.

“Again, the non-learner treasure is of two kinds: the Buddha and the Disciple. Even if there be a hundred thousand Disciples, they are not equal to one Buddha in sanctity. Therefore, the Buddha treasure is more praiseworthy.

“Again, the Buddha treasure is of two kinds: the minor or solitary Buddha (Pacceka Buddha) and the Omniscient One (Sabbāññū Buddha) or the Perfectly Self-Enlightened One (Sammā sambuddha). Even if there be a hundred thousand of the former type, they are not equal to one Buddha of the latter kind. Therefore, the Omniscient Buddha is more praiseworthy.

“Indeed, in this world of sentient beings, together the world of devas and Brahmās, there is no treasure like the Omniscient Buddha. Therefore, I will send that unique treasure to my friend King Pukkusāti.”

So thinking, King Bimbisāra asked the ministers from Takkasilā whether they had ever seen the Three Jewels viz., the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha in their country. The ministers replied that they had not even heard of them, much less seen them. The King was much pleased because he now had the opportunity to send a present that was not found in Takkasilā. Then the King thought:

“I can request the Exalted One to go to Takkasilā, the city of my friend King Pukkusāti, for the spiritual uplift of the people. But it is not customary for the Exalted One to pass the night in border countries. So it is impossible for the Exalted One to go there.

“Suppose I can request and send the Venerables Sāriputta, Mahā Moggallāna and other great disciples and arahats. But the fact is, even as soon as I hear of the sojourn of these great theras in border regions, I should send my people, have them brought here by any means possible and serve their physical needs. So it is not possible for the great theras to go there.

“Therefore I will send a message that will serve the same purpose as the visit of the Exalted One and the great theras to Takkasilā would.”

The King then had a gold sheet made, four cubits in length and half a cubit in breadth, neither too thick nor too thin. On the day he was going to write on the sheet, he washed his head early in the morning, bathed, committed himself to the Eight Precepts and after his breakfast, he did not adorn himself with flowers nor use any perfume. Then taking the vermilion in a golden cup, he closed all the doors of the lower storey and went upstairs and in order to get more light, he opened the lion (figure)-supported window in the east, and sat in the airy chamber, the King wrote on the golden sheet:

“There has arisen in this world the Master, who is the Worthy One (Araham), the Perfectly Self-Enlightened One (Sammāsambudha) the Possessor of Knowledge and Conduct (Vijjā-carāṇa-sampaññā), the Noble Wayfarer (Sugata), the Knower of the World (Lokavidū), the Peerless of Charioteer and Trainer of men (Anuttaro-purisa-damma-sārathi), the Teacher of men and devas (Satthā-devamanussānam), the Enlightened One (Buddha), the Exalted One (Bhagavā).”

Thus the King first wrote some high attributes of the Buddha. Then he described how the Bodhisatta practised the Ten Perfections (pāramīs); how, after his demise in the Tusitā deva-world, he took conception in the womb of his mother; how, at that time, there appeared thirty-two great signs that seemed to open the whole world freely; how the miracles attended his conception; how he practised asceticism and strived for Enlightenment; how, sitting on the Aparājita Throne, he attained Omniscience, and how he acquired extra-ordinary supernormal powers that made the whole world open to him. Finally, King Bimbisāra wrote that in the living world of devas and Brahmās there was no ratana other than the Buddha-ratana which possessed such great attributes. The King again described some other attributes of the Buddha in the following verse:

*Yaṃ kiñci vittaṃ idha vā huraṃ vā saggesu vā yaṃ ratanaṃ paṇitaṃ na no samaṃ atthi Tathāgatena;
idaṃ'pi Buddhē ratanaṃ paṇitaṃ
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

Then willing to extol the Dhamma-ratana, the King wrote its six attributes, namely, “The doctrine of the Buddha is well proclaimed (svākkhāta), leading to results discernible in this very life (sandiṭṭhika), beneficial instantly (akālika), invites beings to ‘come and see’ (ehi-passika), worthy to be embraced (opaneyyika), and worthy to be experienced by the wise individually (paccattam-vedittabbo vinnuhi). The King also mentioned special attributes such as the thirty-seven constituents of Enlightenment (Bodhipakkhiya Dhamma), such as the four foundations of mindfulness (satipathana), the four right efforts (sammappadhana), the four paths to supernormal power (iddhi-pada), the five faculties (indriya), the five strengths (bala), the seven factors of Enlightenment (bojjhaṅga) and the eightfold Path (magganga).

Then the King described the attributes of the Dhamma partly as follows:

*Yaṃ buddhaseṭṭho parivannayī sucim samādhim anantarikaññaṃ āhu; Samādhinā tena samo na vijjati;
idaṃ'pi dhamme ratanaṃ paṇitaṃ
etena saccena suvatthi hotu*

Then the King willing to extol the Saṅgha-ratana wrote its nine attributes, of which the first four being that “The Disciples of the Buddha possess good conduct (suppaṭipaññātā), upright conduct (ujjupaṭipaññātā), conduct leading to Nibbāna (ñāya-paṭipaññātā), conduct leading to their being worthy of veneration (sāmicī-paṭippaññātā); by possessing which (as the cause): they are worthy of offering brought from afar (āhuneyya), worthy of offering meant for guests (pahuneyya), worthy of proper offering (dakkhineyya), worthy of veneration (añjali-karaṇīya), and being the best field for beings to sow the seeds of good deeds (anuttara-puññakkhetta lokassa). The King continued his writing:

“Clansmen, who are of good birth and good conduct, hear the words of the Exalted One and renounce the world to become monks. Some do so, giving up the pleasures of a king, some the pleasures of a crown-prince, some the post of a supreme commander, and so on. Having become monks, they lead the noble way of life.” After this foreword, with regard to the noble way of life, the King wrote something about lower morality (cūla-sīla), medium morality (majjhima-sīla), higher morality (mahā-sīla), etc., as contained in the Brahmajāla Sutta. He also wrote, in part, on the restraint of the six senses, cultivation of mindfulness with intelligence (satisampajañña), contentment with the four requisites of life, the nine kinds of dwellings suitable for meditation, the overcoming of five hindrances (nivarana), making preparations with certain devices (kaṣiṇa) for mind-training, development of jhāna and supernormal powers, thirty-eight kinds of meditation, etc., all leading up to the attainment of arahatship.

After describing in detail the sixteen kinds of mindfulness on breathing (anapanassatī) for meditation, the King glorified the Buddha's Disciples in the Saṅgha:

*Ye puggalā aṭṭhasataṃ pasatṭhā
cattari etāni yugāni honti;
te dakkhiṇeyya sugatassa sāvakā
etesu dinnāni mahāpphalāni;
idampi Saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇitaṃ
etena saccena suvatthi hotu.*

The King then added: “The Teaching of the Exalted One with its threefold training (sikkhā) is beautiful in the beginning, beautiful in the middle and beautiful in the end. It is the teaching that will also certainly lead to liberation from samsāra; Friend Pukkasati, I would like to urge you to renounce the world and become a monk if you can.”

King Bimbisāra then rolled the gold sheet, wrapped it in a piece of very fine cloth and put it in a sandalwood case; the sandalwood case was then placed in a gold case, the gold case in a silver case, the silver case in a ruby case, the ruby case in a coral case, the coral case in a carbuncle case, the carbuncle case in a spotted ruby (masāragalla) case, the spotted-ruby case in a crystal case, the crystal case in an ivory case, the ivory case in a ten-jewelled case, the ten-jewelled case in a bamboo-strip case and the bamboo-strip case again in a sandalwood box, then again the sandalwood box was placed in a gold box, silver box, ruby box, coral box, carbuncle box, spotted-ruby box, crystal box, ivory box, the ten jewelled box and a bamboo-strip box successively, one box in the other as before.

Then the bamboo-strip box was put in a sandalwood casket, the sandalwood casket in a gold casket, then as before in a silver casket, ruby casket, coral casket, carbuncle casket, spotted ruby casket, crystal casket, ivory casket, ten-jewelled casket and lacquer casket successively. Then after having the lacquer casket wrapped up in a piece of fine cloth, and the royal seal stamped, the King ordered his ministers: “Decorate the streets in my domain, each street being eight usabhas in width, the two portions being two usabhas in width on either side to be just patched up but the middle portion measuring four usabhas<sup>1</sup> in width is to be decorated with royal accessories.”

Then the King had a seat placed on a fully ornamented royal elephant, had a white umbrella over it, had the roads of the capital sprinkled with water and thoroughly swept. Flags, banners, and streamers were to be hoisted. On either side of each road was to be decorated with plantain trees, water-filled pots, various performers and fragrant flowers. Messengers were sent to provincial and city governors with instructions saying:

“You should honour the royal present when it passed through places under your rule.”

Splendidly adorned with full regalia, and accompanied by his ministers, the King himself set off, carrying the sacred present to the border with great pomp and ceremony amid the boisterous playing of all kinds of music. He privately told his envoy who was in charge of the sacred present:

“Men, I want my royal friend to receive it not in the presence of his queens but on the upper terrace of the mansion.”

The King worshipped the sacred present most respectfully, regarding its journey as the visit of the Buddha Himself to the border country. Then he returned to Rājagaha City.

The provincial and city governors also improved the road in the same way and passed on the sacred present from one place to another.

Reception by King Pukkasāti

King Pukkasāti, too, had the road from the border refurbished, had the capital beautifully decorated and received the sacred present magnificently.

The sacred present reached Takkasilā surprisingly on an uposatha day. The minister, who brought the present, transmitted to the King about the message that King Bimbisāra had verbally given him.

Having heard the message, King Pukkasāti made the necessary arrangements for the comfort of the visitors and took the present by himself and went up to the upper terrace of the mansion. He posted guards at the door to prevent anyone from entering the mansion, opened the window, placed the holy present on a high place and took a lower seat for himself. Then he removed the royal seal and the outer covering of cloth and on opening the

1 ratanam = 2 vadatthi, 1 vadatthi = 12 ahgulaṃ
1 aṅgulaṃ = 1 inch. Hence 1 usabha = 280 ft (Childers) containers one by one beginning with the lacquer casket he saw the innermost sandalwood casket and rightly concluded: "The way in which the present is packed is different from the way in which earthly treasures are packed. Surely it must be a ratana that has appeared in the Middle Land and that deserves our attention."

Then the King opened the fragrant casket, removed the royal seal and holding the very fine cloth by both edges, he unwrapped it gently and saw the golden scroll. He was struck with wonder at the fine script of the writer — the beautiful, well-shaped letters and lines that made up his hand-writing. The King read every letter of the message.

As he read the attributes of the Buddha, beginning with "There has arisen the Exalted One in this world," he became very much ecstatic with the hair from ninety-nine thousand pores standing straight on end. He was unconscious even of his standing or sitting posture. He was deeply gratified when he thought of the opportunity that he had, thanks to his friend King Bimbisāra for the opportunity to hear the message about the Buddha-ratana that was so hard to hear despite the passage of millions of kappas.

Being unable to read further, King Pukkusāti sat in a contemplative mood till his ecstasy faded away. Then he read the attributes of the Dhamma beginning with svākkhāta. Again he became ecstatic as before. Having remained in a contemplative mood till his ecstasy faded away, he then read the attributes of the Sangha beginning with suppatipaññā and there arose a great ecstasy in him as before.

King Pukkusāti's Attainment of Jhāna and Monkhood

Then the King read the last section in the gold scroll which described the mindfulness of breathing in meditation. He engaged in meditation according to the instructions in the scroll and gained the rūpāvacāra jhāna fully. He spent his time enjoying the bliss of jhāna without anyone other than a young attendant who was allowed to see him. In this way, half a month (fifteen days) had elapsed.

The people of the city assembled in the courtyard of the palace and clamoured for the appearance of the King, saying:

"The King has completely stopped reviewing the troops or seeing the dancers since the day he received the royal present. He has also ceased to give royal decisions. We want the King to show anyone he likes the royal present sent by his friend, King Bimbisāra. It is a tendency of some kings to try to annex a country by alluring the ruler with royal presents. What is our King doing now?"

When the King heard their outcry, he wondered whether he should work for the welfare of the country or follow the Teaching of the Buddha. Then he thought: "No mathematician can count the number of lifetimes that I have spent as a ruler of a country. Therefore, I will only practise the Teaching of the Exalted One." So thinking, he took the sword that was near the bed, cut off his hair, opened the window and threw down the hair-knot with the ruby-headdress into the midst of the assembly, saying: "Men! Take my hair-knot and let it act as a king."

The people received the hair-knot together with its ornamental ruby headdress and cried, lamenting: "O Great King! Are the kings who receive presents from their royal friends all like you?" The beard of King Pukkusāti was two finger-breadth long like that of the Bodhisatta on the eve of his renunciation.

Then the King sent his young attendant to the market to buy and bring two dyed robes and an earthen bowl. Then saying: "I dedicate my monkhood to the Exalted Ones who are worthy of honour in this world," he donned one robe as the lower garment, put on the other as the upper garment and, with the alms-bowl hanging over his left shoulder and a staff in one hand, he paced twice or thrice outside the mansion to see whether he looked well and proper as a monk. He was pleased to find that he did. He then opened the main door and stepped down from the mansion.

The dancers and others who were waiting at the three successive doors saw the monk Pukkasāti coming down but they did not recognize the King. They thought that a Paccekabuddha had come to preach to their King. It was only when they got on to the top of the mansion and thoroughly examined the seat of the King that they knew of the King's departure and they cried all at once, like people in a sinking boat in the middle of the sea.

As soon as the monk Pukkusāti stepped on the ground, all the citizens and soldiers surrounded him and wept bitterly. The ministers said to Pukkasāti:

“Great King! The kings in the Middle Land are very crafty. You should go only after sending emissaries and making inquiries to know definitely whether or not the Buddha-ratana has really appeared in the world. For the time being, you should return to the palace.”

But monk Pukkusāti went off, saying: “Friends, I have implicit faith in my friend, King Bimbisāra. My friend, King Bimbisāra, has never spoken to me ambiguously. You stay behind.” The ministers and the people, however followed the King persistently.

Pukkusāti the clansman then made a mark on the ground with his staff and asked the people: “Whose country is this?” They replied: “Great King, it is your country.” Then the monk said: “He who destroys this mark should be punished by the authority of the king.” In the Mahājanaka Jātaka, the Queen Sīvalidevī dared not erase the line drawn on the ground by the Bodhisatta, King Mahā Janaka. So rolling on the ground, she artfully made the line disappear and followed the King. The people too followed through the outlet made by the Queen. But in the case of the line drawn by King Pukkusāti, the people dared not destroy it and they were left rolling and weeping with their head turned towards the line.

Pukkusāti The Clansman

Pukkusāti the clansman went off alone without taking even a servant or a slave to offer him a tooth-stick or water for washing face on the journey. He travelled by himself, mindful of the fact that “My Teacher, the Exalted Ones, renounced the world (as a Bodhisatta) and went off alone to become a monk.” Bent on following the example of the Buddha as far as possible and remembering that the Buddha never used a vehicle, he did not wear even a single-layered slipper or use even an umbrella made of leaves. The people climbed the trees, city-walls, small turrets or scaffolds on the walls or inside of fortifications, etc and watched their King setting out alone.

Pukkusāti the clansman thought: “I will have to go a long journey. I cannot fare to the end of my journey all by myself.” So he followed a caravan. As he had to travel by foot on a very rough terrain under the burning sun, the soles of his very tender feet cracked with sores and eruptions, causing great pain and suffering. When the caravan set up a tent made up of branches and leaves and took rest, Pukkusāti stepped off the main road and sat at the foot of a tree. There was no one to massage him or attend to his physical needs. He entered upon the fourth jhāna by engaging in breathing meditation, dispelled his weariness and passed the time in jhānic bliss.

The next morning, he cleaned his body and again followed the caravan. When it was time for his morning meal, the merchants took his alms-bowl and offered him food. Sometimes the food was not well-cooked: sometimes too soft, sometimes too rough with sand and pebbles, sometimes too salty, and sometimes it had too little salt. The monk did not bother whether the food was soft or hard, rough or tender, salty or having little salt, but only thought of the place it entered, and ate it as if it were celestial food.

In this way, he came to Sāvatti, having covered a distance of one hundred and ninety-two yojanas. Although the caravan passed the Jetavana monastery in the city, it never occurred to him to ask where the Buddha resided. This was due to (1) his reverence for the Buddha and (2) the message of King Bimbisāra.

- (1) Throughout his journey, Pukkusāti concentrated his mind on the Buddha without thinking of anything else. Having arrived near Jetavana with deep reverence for the Buddha, he did not even wonder whether the Buddha lived there and so. The question to ask about Master never occurred to him.
- (2) The message of King Bimbisāra said that “The Exalted. One appears in this world” and so it led Pukkusāti to believe that the Buddha lived in Rājagaha. So, although he passed by the Jetavana monastery, he did not ask about the residence of the Master and continuing his journey, he came to Rājagaha, forty-five yojanas from Savatthi.

On reaching Rājagaha, just after sunset, Pukkusāti found many monasteries and as he concluded from King Bimbisāra's message that the Buddha was in Rājagaha, he asked the people where the Buddha lived. The people asked him from where he came and on hearing that he came from the north, they said: "Venerable Sir, you have over journeyed. The Exalted One lives in Sāvathī, forty-five yojanas distant from Rājagaha on the way by which you have come." The monk thought: "Now, it is too late. I cannot go to the Exalted One today. I will spend the night here and see the Exalted One tomorrow." He asked the people about the place where the ascetics who came to Rājagaha after sunset put up. The people pointed to a potter's small hut as the rest-house for visiting monks. With the permission of the potter, the monk entered the hut and sat there to spend the night.

Arrival of The Buddha

At dawn on that day the Buddha surveyed the world of living beings and on seeing Pukkusāti, the Buddha thought:

"This man of good family read the message sent by his friend King Bimbisāra and after completely renouncing his one hundred yojana-wide domain of Takkasilā, he became a monk out of reverence for Me. Today he will reach Rājagaha after travelling 192 yojanas and another forty-five yojanas beyond Sāvathī.

"If I do not go to him, he will pass the night and die hopelessly without attaining the lower three Fruitions. If I go to him he will realize the three lower Fruitions of the Noble Path and become liberated. I have developed and practised Perfections for aeons out of compassion for worthy beings. I will now go and see him for his spiritual uplift."

So early in the morning the Buddha cleaned his body and entered Sāvathī with the monks on the round for alms. In the afternoon, he left the city, rested for a while in the Fragrant Chamber and thought:

"This man of good family has done out of reverence for Me which is hard for many other people to do. Having renounced the one hundred yojana vast domain of Takkasilā, he set out alone without even a young servant to give him water for washing his face." The Buddha thought of this austerity of the monk and without calling the Mahātheras Sāriputta or Moggallāna or any other disciples, He left Sāvathī, taking His alms-bowl and robe by Himself.

The Buddha did not fly in the air or shorten the journey but went on foot as He knew that, out of reverence for Him, the monk did not travel by elephant, horse chariot or a golden palanquin but went barefooted without a slipper or a leaf-umbrella.

With a Buddha's splendour of all the great marks and six body-rays, etc. shrouded like the cloud-covered moon, the Buddha travelled incognito for the whole afternoon (i.e., about six hours) and covering a distance of forty-five yojanas, He arrived near a potter's hut at sunset, just after the monk Pukkusāti had entered the hut. The Buddha arrived with His glory covered in order to enable the monk to have complete rest. One, who is tired and weary, cannot absorb the Dhamma.

When the Buddha arrived near the potter's hut, He did not enter it impolitely as the Omniscient Buddha but stood at the entrance and asked for the monk's permission to stay there. Pukkusāti mistook the Buddha for an ordinary monk and gave his permission willingly, saying: "My friend, this hut is quiet. It is not small. You may stay here comfortably as you please."

(How could the monk Pukkusāti, who had renounced the one hundred yojana-vast kingdom of Takkasilā, be reluctant to share his accommodation in a deserted hut with a fellow-monk? He was not reluctant at all. Yet some vain and foolish monks (mogha purisa) are very miserly and possessive with regard to their abode (āvāsa-macchariya) and try to deny accommodation to fellow-monks.)

The Buddha, who was very tender and delicate, left the Fragrant Chamber which was like a celestial mansion and entered the potter's hut which was very filthy and loathsome with ashes, broken pots, grass straws and droppings of chickens and pigs. Here, amidst this collection of garbage, the Buddha made a bed of grass, spread the robe of rags and sat totally unperturbed as though He were in the Chamber that was fragrant with celestial scents.

Thus, as the two men of Khattiya families, who were credited with past good deeds, who renounced royal pleasures to become monks, who had golden complexions, who had attained transcendent states, the Buddha and Pukkusāti both sat in the potter's hut, making the hut very splendid like the crystal cave where the two lion-kings dwelt.

The Buddha never thought: "I am very delicate and yet I have travelled strenuously forty-five yojanas the whole afternoon (in six hours). I will now lie down on my right side to get over my weariness for a moment." Without having any such thought, the Buddha entered upon the fourth jhāna of Fruition (phala-samāpatti) while sitting.

Nor did the monk Pukkusāti think of lying down for a moment to overcome his weariness from the bare-footed journey of one hundred and ninety-two yojanas. He too entered upon the fourth jhāna induced by breathing while sitting.

(Herein the object of the Buddha's visit was to teach Pukkusāti and why did he enter upon the fourth jhāna instead of teaching the monk? The Buddha did not teach at once because, at that time, the monk was still tired and weary. He would not be able to appreciate the Teaching. So the Buddha waited to let his weariness pass away.

(Other teachers say that Rājagaha was a populous royal city with the air ringing with the ten kinds of sound, that the Buddha deferred preaching till midnight when the city would become quiet. This view is not acceptable, for certainly the Buddha could supernormally dispel even the sound travelling as far as the Brahmā-world. In other words, He could make that sound inaudible to the monk. In fact, the Buddha waited till the monk's recovery from his weariness.)

The Buddha left Savatthi at noon, travelled on foot to Rājagaha which was forty-five yojanas away, reached the potter's hut at sunset, entered the hut with the permission of the monk and became absorbed in phala-samāpatti for six hours. Arising from the jhāna at midnight, He opened both of eyes, which were endowed with five kinds of sensitivity, like opening the window of a golden mansion. Then He saw the monk Pukkusāti sitting absorbed in the fourth jhāna (induced by breathing) like a golden statue, without any movement of the hands, legs or head, grave and imperturbable like a firmly established door-post. The Buddha thought that the monk's posture was quite impressive and decided to start the conversation.

Of the four postures, viz., walking, standing, lying down and sitting, the first three lack dignity. The hands, the legs and the head of a walking monk shake. The standing monk's body is stiff. The one lying down is also unpleasant. In fact, only the sitting posture of the monk, who, after having swept his retreat in the afternoon, spread his leather sheet, cleaned his hands and feet, sits cross-legged is dignified. The monk Pukkusāti sat cross-legged in the fourth jhāna that was induced by breathing practice. This pleased the Buddha.

(The Buddha knew that Pukkusāti became a monk out of reverence for Him. Yet, He decided to ask him because if He did not do so, there would be no conversation and no conversation would mean no preaching. So, He started the conversation in order to pave the way for preaching).

The Buddha asked the monk to whom he dedicated his monastic life, who was his teacher and whose teaching he liked. The monk answered that he dedicated his life to the Buddha and so on.

Again, the Buddha asked him where the Worthy One, the Supremely Enlightened One lived. The monk Pukkusāti replied: "My friend, there is a city called Savatthi in the north country. The Worthy One, the Supremely Enlightened One, now lives in that city.” When the Buddha asked him whether he had ever seen the Buddha, and if he were to see Him now would he recognize Him. Pukkusāti’s reply was that he had not seen Him and that he would not know Him if he were to see Him now.

(Herein everyone knew the Buddha from His glory. This is not surprising. But it is hard for people to know the Buddha who went incognito as an ordinary monk on the round for alms; with His glory hidden. So the monk Pukkusāti answered honestly that he would not know the Buddha. He did not know, although he stayed in the same hut with the Buddha.)

Knowing that the monk’s weariness had vanished, the Buddha decided to preach to him “who had dedicated his monkhood to Me,” the Buddha said: “Monk! I will teach you. Listen to My Teaching. Bear it well in mind. I will teach you the Dhamma thoroughly.” (Up to that time, the monk Pukkusāti still did not know that his companion was the Buddha.)

Pukkusāti had renounced his kingdom after reading the message of his friend King Bimbisāra and had become a monk in the hope of hearing the sweet Dhamma of the Buddha. He had made such a long journey without meeting anyone who would care to teach him. So why should he refuse to welcome respectfully the teaching of his companion? Like a thirsty man, he was very anxious to drink the water of the Dhamma. So he gladly agreed to listen to the teaching respectfully. Then the Buddha gave the summary or contents of the Dhātuvibhaṅga Sutta as follows:

“Monk! A person or a being has six elements, six sense organs, eighteen modes of thought, four kinds of support. He, who exists on these four supports, is free from the current of conceit born of ego-illusion. When such current of conceit is absent in a monk, he is said to be one whose āsava or defilements are gone. (1) He should be mindful of the Vipassanā (Insight) Knowledge, (2) He should speak the truth, (3) He should strive to repudiate moral defilements, (4) He should practise the Dhamma only for the extinction of defilements.” (These are the contents in brief of the Dhātuvibhaṅga Sutta.)

After thus stating these fundamentals of the Dhamma, the Buddha explained them one by one in detail. (Reference: Dhātuvibhaṅga Sutta of the Majjhima-Nikāya.)

Pukkusāti’s Attainment of Anāgāmi State

When the Buddha explained the first dhamma, viz., mindfulness of Vipassanā Knowledge, the Buddha led the teaching up to arahatship and Pukkusāti attained the three lower Fruitions on the basis of his good deeds in the past and became an ariya (Noble One) in the anāgāmi state.

For example, while a king is eating food of various tastes in a golden bowl, he takes such amount of cooked rice as would suit the size of his mouth. When the young prince sitting on his lap shows the desire to eat, the king may put in his mouth the lump of rice that he has taken for his own consumption. The child will eat only such quantity of rice as would be in accord with the size of his mouth. As for the remaining rice, the king may eat it himself or put it back into the golden bowl. In the same way, the Buddha, the Lord of the Dhamma, gave a discourse leading to arahatship, a discourse in accord with the his own intellectual power and on the basis of his former good deeds, the monk Pukkusāti could consume three fourths of the Dhamma food, that is, the Path and became an anāgāmi-ariya.

Pukkusāti had no doubt about the Dhamma before he attained anāgāmi-phala and when he was following the Buddha’s talk on aggregates, sense-organs, elements or mental impressions, etc. But he wondered whether the highly distinguished man who looked like an ordinary man and who was teaching him might be the Buddha because he had heard that the Buddhas made it a practice to go about incognito in some places. However, when he attained the Fruition of Anāgāmi, he had absolutely no doubt that the teacher was the Buddha.

Before he recognized the Buddha, he had addressed Him as “My friend!” He did not as yet apologize to the Buddha for his mistake because the Buddha was still delivering the discourse according to the series of the fundamentals, and the monk did not have the opportunity to offer his apology.

Pukkusāti's Request for Ordination

At the end of the discourse there followed a dialogue between the Buddha and the monk Pukkusāti:

Pukkusāti: “The Exalted One, the Teacher of devas and humans, has come here out of great compassion for me! The Buddha who preaches the good Dhamma has come here out of great compassion for me! The Exalted One who understands all the Dhamma thoroughly come here out of great compassion for me.” (Saying thus joyously, he rose and put his head against the feel of the Buddha, and he added) “Glorious Buddha! Because of my foolishness, I have made a mistake. I thought that I should call you ‘my friend’, (and I have called you so erroneously.) Glorious Buddha! Kindly forgive me for the offence against which I should guard myself in future.”

Buddha: “Monk! Verily because of your foolishness, you have made a mistake. You thought that I should be called ‘friend’ (and you have called me so erroneously.) Monk! I forgive you for the offence because you admit your offence and make amends for it accordingly. Later you guard yourself against it. Such atonement and such self-restraint contribute to the welfare of those who are committed to My Teaching.”

Pukkusāti: “Glorious Buddha, may I receive ordination in your presence.”

Buddha: “Have you got your (own) bowl and robe?”

Pukkusāti: “No, Glorious Buddha, I have not.”

Buddha: “Monk! the Buddhas do not ordain those who do not have alms-bowls and robes.”

The Venerable Pukkusāti was very much pleased with the Buddha's Teaching. He expressed his appreciation, rose from his seat, paid respect to the Buddha and went away to search for the alms-bowl and robe.

(N.B. Why did not Pukkusati receive the alms-bowl and robes that appeared supernormally for the monks whom the Buddha ordained, simply by saying “Come, Bhikkhu!” It is said that he did not receive them because he had never donated the eight requisites of a monk in a previous life. (This explanation was not acceptable to the commentator). Certainly, as a man who had given alms and who had great aspirations, he could not be one who had never donated the eight requisites of a monk. In reality the bowls and robes created of supernormal power are meant only for the monks who was in their last existence. Pukkusāti was still subject to rebirth. So he could not have such supernormal requisites.

(The Buddha did not seek the bowl and robe for Pukkusāti's ordination because He had no opportunity to ordain him. The death of Pukkusāti was imminent and he was like a Brahmā to the potter's hut for temporary residence. So the Buddha did not seek the bowl and robe for him.)

Pukkusati went off in search of bowl and robe just after dawn. Dawn came all at once with the end of the Buddha's discourse and the emission of the Buddha's six body-rays.

The Buddha emitted the six hued rays as soon as His preaching was over. The whole hut was brightly illuminated. The six hued rays spread out in groups, as if enveloping all the quarters with gold garments or making all places bright with multi-coloured flowers. The Buddha resolved Himself to become visible to the people of the city and when the people saw the Buddha, they spread the news of His presence in the hut and the matter was reported to King Bimbisāra.

King Bimbisāra's Visit and Honour

When King Bimbisāra heard the report, he went to the potter's hut and after paying respect, he asked the Buddha when He had arrived. The Buddha replied that He had arrived at sunset, the previous day. The King again asked about the object of His visit. Then the Buddha said:

“Great King, your bosom friend, King Pukkusāti, read your message and after renouncing the world to become a monk, he made the journey out of regard for Me but having travelled forty-five yojanas unnecessarily beyond Sāvattthi, he entered the potter's hut and stayed here.

“For his spiritual welfare I have come here on foot and preached to him. Pukkusāti has now attained the Fruits of the three lower Paths and is an anāgāmi-ariya.”

On hearing this, the King was surprised and asked the Buddha where his friend King Pukkusāti was. The Buddha replied that he had gone out to get alms-bowl and robe for his ordination. King Bimbisāra immediately rushed out in the direction in which his friend had gone out for alms-bowl and robe. The Buddha returned to the Fragrant Chamber in the Jetavana monastery.

Pukkusāti's Death and Rebirth in Brahmā World

In his search for alms-bowl and robe, Pukkusāti did not go to his royal friend, King Bimbisāra, or to the merchants who had come from Takkaṣāla. He considered it unethical for him to search for them here and there, discriminating between the good and the bad like fowls. He decided to seek the real rags, not in big cities but in the fords, cemeteries, garbage heaps or narrow streets. So he tried to find really torn pieces of cloths in the garbage heap in the back-lanes.

While Pukkusāti was trying to do so, a mentally deranged cow (his enemy in a previous life) rushed towards him and gored him with her horns. Weak and extremely oppressed by hunger, Pukkusāti lost his life as he was hurled into the air. When he fell to the ground, he lay on the garbage heap like a golden statue. After his death he was reborn in the Aviha Brahmā Abode and before long he became a Brahmā arahat after attaining arahatship.

According to the Sagāthavagga Saṃyutta (the tenth sutta of the Aditta Vagga and the fourth Sutta of the Nānatitthiya Vagga) there were seven people who attained arahatship soon after their spontaneous (upapatti) rebirth in the Aviha Brahmā abode. They were: (1) Upaka, (2) Palaganda, (3) Pukkusāti, (4) Bhaddiya, (5) Khanda Deva, (6) Bahuraggi and (7) Singiya.

King Bimbisāra thought: “My friend King Pukkusāti renounced his kingdom merely after reading my message and had made such a long and arduous journey. He had done what is hard for ordinary people to do. I will honour my friend in the way the monks are honoured.” He sent his men to all the environs of the city to search for King Pukkusāti. The men found the King lying dead face down like a golden statue on the garbage heap. So they returned and reported to King Bimbisāra.

King Bimbisāra went there and mourned over his friend, saying: “We did not have the opportunity to honour our great friend while he was alive. Now he had died without anyone to help him.” The King had the corpse carried on a small couch, put in a proper place and not knowing how to honour a dead monk, he sent for the bathers, clothed the body in clean white garments and ornamented like a king

Then the corpse was placed on a palanquin and honoured with all kinds of music and fragrant flowers, taken to the outskirts of the city and cremated with fragrant fire-wood. The bones were then collected and enshrined in a ceṭiya.

Later on, many monks in Sāvattthi went to see the Buddha. They paid respect to the Master and sitting in a proper place they said: “Glorious Buddha, You have briefly preached the Dhamma to Pukkusāti. That man is now dead. What is his destination? What is his future life?”

Then the Buddha replied: “Monks, Pukkusāti was a wise man. He practised Vipassanā (Insight) meditation that accords with the transcendent Dhamma. He did not give Me any trouble on account of the Dhamma. Due to the extinction of the five fetters that lead to the lower sensual worlds, he will be reborn in the Avihā Brahmā-world and will attain in that very Suddhāvāsa Brahmā-world (Avihā being one of its five abodes). There is no possibility of his return to the lower sensual worlds from that Avihā abode.”

Story of The Asura King (Rāhu)

Rāhu, the Asura Deva King, was four thousand and eight hundred yojanas in height. The distance between his two arms was one thousand and two hundred yojanas. The thickness of his body was six hundred yojanas. His palms and his soles were three hundred yojanas in perimeter. The portion of the finger between two joints is fifty yojanas long. The distance between the two eye-brows was fifty yojanas. The mouth was two hundred yojanas long, three hundred yojanas deep and three hundred yojanas in circumference. The neck has (a girth of) three hundred yojanas. The forehead was three hundred yojanas. The forehead was three hundred yojanas in breadth and the head nine hundred yojanas.

Rāhu, the Asura King, thought: “I am too tall, I will not be able to look down and see the Exalted One.” So he did not go to the Buddha. But, one day, he heard words about the greatness of the Buddha and so he went, hoping to see the Master by any possible means.

Knowing the Asura Deva King's mind, the Buddha thought of the posture in which He should be viewed. Then since a person who is standing appears to be tall in spite of his short stature, the Buddha decided to show His body to the Asura-king in a lying posture. The Buddha told the Thera Ānanda to put a small couch outside the Fragrant Chamber and then He lay down on the right side on the couch like a lion-king.

Rāhu then went near the Buddha but he had to look up to see the Buddha's face, just as he had to stretch his neck and look up at the moon in the sky. The Buddha asked him why he had come to see Him only after a very long time. The Asura King replied that he had not come because he haboured under the misapprehension that he would not be able to stoop and see the Glorious Buddha.

Then the Buddha said to him: “Asura King! I have not developed the Perfections (Pāramīs) holding my head down (that is, relaxing my effort). I have given alms always holding up my head (that is, without relaxing my effort).”

On that very day, Rāhu, the Asura King, formally become one who took refuge in the Buddha.

Story of Devadatta

(The following story of Devadatta, from the time of his ordination to his being swallowed by earth, is condensed as far as possible, although a lengthy account should be given based on many stories about Devadatta in Pāli literature).

An account of Devadatta, up to the time of his ordination, has already been given. (Reference: “The ordination of six Sakyan princes and the barber Upāli”, Chapter 28.)

Of the six Sakyan princes and the barber Upāli after their ordination,

- (1) the Venerable Bhaddiya attained the threefold supramundane knowledge and became an arahat during the vassa in that very year.
- (2) the Venerable Anuruddha gained the Divine Eye (dibbu-cakkhu) and after hearing the Mahāvītakka Sutta, he attained arahatship (Āṅguttara Nikāya Vol 3.)
- (3) the Venerable Ānanda was established in sotāpatti-phala after hearing the discourse containing the simile of the mirror taught by the Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāni-putta. (Saṃyutta Nikāya, Vol 2.)
- (4) & (5) the Venerables Bhagu and Kimila later on developed Vipassanā meditation and attained arahatship.
- (6) Devadatta gained mundane psychic powers, remaining a worldling. He never became an ariya.

At another time while the Buddha was sojourning in Kosambī, He and His many disciples received abundant offerings. People came into the monastery with robes, medicines and other requisites in their hands and asked: “Where is the Exalted One? Where is the Venerable Sāriputta? Where is the Venerable Moggallāna? Where is the Venerable Mahā Kassapa? Where are the Venerables Bhaddiya, Anuruddha, Ānanda, Bhagu and Kimila?” They were always on the move, looking for the places where the eighty Great Disciples (Mahā Sāvaka) stayed. But there was nobody who bothered to ask Devadatta's whereabouts.

Devadatta's Attempt to gain Power

Then Devadatta thought: “I too became a monk along with Bhaddiya and others. They are monks of ruling (Khattiya) families; I too am a monk of such a family. But those who brought offerings with them asked for Bhaddiya and others. As for me, there was not a single person who cares to ask about me even by my name. Whom should I associate with and whom should I make devoted to me so that I have abundant offerings for my own?” He continued to ponder: “King Bimbisāra was established in the sotāpatti-phala together with one hundred and ten thousand wealthy brahmins the first time he saw the Buddha. It is not possible to be united with him. Nor is it possible to form an alliance with King Kosala. Prince Ajātasattu, son of King Bimbisāra, however, does not know a person's virtues or vices as he is young. I will manage to be one with him.” So thinking he went to Rājagaha and transformed himself into a boy. He adorned himself with four snakes, two on his hands and two on his legs, he also placed a snake on his neck, another one on his head and still another one on his left shoulder; he had the tails of these seven snakes interlocked as a waist band (belt) and put it on to decorate himself. Finally he came down from the sky and sat on the lap of Prince Ajātasattu.

The Prince was so scared and asked him who he was. The apparent boy said that he was Devadatta and the Prince requested him to show himself as the real Devadatta. Devadatta removed the guise and stood before the Prince in his original physical form, dressed in the monk robe and with an alms-bowl in his hand. Very much impressed by this magic, Prince Ajātasattu became Devadatta's devoted follower. He regularly went with five hundred chariots every morning and evening to see his teacher. He also sent five hundred pots of food, each pot containing food enough for ten monks.

Loss of Devadatta's Jhānic Power

His ego having become inflated because of the abundant offerings that he received, Devadatta conceived the evil desire to make himself a Buddha and lead the Sangha. As soon as this desire arose in him, Devadatta lost his supernormal powers based on mundane jhāna.

Kakudha Brahmā's report to Mahā Moggallāna

At that time, a lay disciple of the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna, a Koliya prince named Kakudha became a Brahmā after his death. Kakudha Brahmā came to Mahā Moggallāna with his body three gavutas (three-fourth of a yojana) long and reported how, being puffed up with self-conceit, Devadatta conceived the evil desire to make himself a Buddha and lead the Sangha and how he immediately lost his supernormal powers. After making this report, the Brahmā vanished on the spot.

The Venerable Mahā Moggallāna went to the Buddha and informed him of what Kakudha Brahmā had told him. The Buddha asked him whether he had verified the Brahmā's report by means of his psychic powers of knowing another person's mind. When the Venerable replied that he had, the Buddha said:

“Moggallāna! Keep this matter to yourself! Now that man Devadatta who is empty of the Path and its Fruition will show himself in his true colours.”

Then the Buddha gave a talk on five kinds of bogus teachers: (1) the teacher who claims to have pure morality without having it, (2) the teacher who claims to have pure livelihood without having it, (3) the teacher who claims to have pure preaching without having it, (4) the teacher who claims to have pure speech without having it, and (5) the teacher who claims to have pure intellectual vision without having it. Their respective disciples know all about these five kinds of teachers. But they do not tell their lay followers about their respective teachers because if they do so, their teachers, who have been receiving the four requisites from the laity, will be displeased. So they say nothing and connive at the deception of their teachers, believing that by their deeds they will one day reveal their true colour by themselves. The disciples have to protect only such teachers and such teachers crave for the protection of their disciples. As for the Buddha, He really has pure morality and so He claims it. He really has pure livelihood, pure preaching, pure speech and pure intellectual vision and so He claims to have all these pure assets. For this reason, there is no need for His disciples to protect Him in respect of morality livelihood, preaching, speech and intellectual vision nor does He in the least want such protection. (For details see the Cūlavagga of the Vinaya Piṭaka.)

The Buddha's Sermon with Regard to Devadatta's Gains

Then the Buddha left Kosambī City and arrived at Rājagaha where He resided in the Veḷuvana monastery. There, many monks reported to Him that Prince Ajātasattu went to Devadatta with five hundred chariots in the morning and in the evening, and that he sent five hundred pots of cooked food every day. Then the Master said:

“Monks, do not set great store by the gains of Devadatta. As long as Prince Ajātasattu goes to Devadatta with five hundred chariots every morning and evening and send five hundred pots of food daily, it certainly means decline of his good deeds. But their increase is not to be expected. (It is not certain.)

“Monk, for example, if the bile of a bear is cut and put in the nose of a wild dog, the animal will become worse and more violent. Likewise, so long as Prince Ajātasattu goes to Devadatta with five hundred chariots every morning and send 500 pots of food everyday, it certainly means Devadatta's decline in doing good deeds. His doing of more and more good deeds is not to be expected. (It is not certain.)

phalam̐ veḷuṃ phalaṃ nālam̐
Sakkāro kāpurisam̐ hanti gabbho assatim̐ yathā.*

“Monks, Devadatta's reputation for his gains will head to his self-destruction. For example, monks, (1) the banana plant bears fruit for its self-destruction, (2) the bamboo plant bears fruit for its self-destruction, (3) the reed-plant bears fruit for its self-destruction and (4) the Assatara mare bears the calf in her womb for her self-destruction. In the same way, Devadatta's reputation for gains will lead to his self-destruction.

“Monks, just as the banana fruit kills the banana plant, the bamboo fruit kills the bamboo plant, the reed fruit kills the reed plant and the calf in the womb kills its mother, the assatara mare; so also gains kill a man of corrupt and evil disposition.”

Devadatta's First Grudge against The Buddha

Then one day as the Buddha sat amidst a large assembly, preaching to the king and the people, caring Devadatta rose and covered the left shoulder with his upper robe (as a sign of respect), he raised up his joined hands in adoration towards the Buddha and said:

“Glorious Buddha, now you are old, far advanced in age and on the threshold of the last stage of life. Venerable Sir! Let the Exalted Buddha now live in peace without bothering about anything. Let him hand over the Sangha to me. I will lead and look after the Sangha.”

The Buddha said: “Devadatta! That is not proper. Do not wish to look after and lead the Sangha.” For the second time Devadatta made the same request and the Buddha rejected it.

When Devadatta made the request for the third time, the Master said: “Devadatta! I would not hand over charge of the Sangha even to Sāriputta and Moggallāna. Why should I hand it over to you, you evil one, eater of spittle?”

The words of the Buddha rankled Devadatta. “The Buddha rebuked me in the presence of the King and the people with the word ‘eater of spittle (kheḷāsaka)’, one who consumes the four impure, eater of spittle-like requisites! He exalts only Sāriputta and Moggallāna.”

So thinking, he was angry and displeased and after paying respect to the Buddha, he went away.

Pakāsaniya-kamma against Devadatta

Then the Buddha made the monks pass a resolution against Devadatta in Rājagaha city. It was an act called Pakāsaniya-kamma - called Ñatti-dutiya carried out by the assembly of monks after taking the proceeding kammavācā at which the motion is put but once and followed by the declaration of the Sangha's decision. Then the Venerable Sāriputta was nominated by vote to be the person entrusted with the task of making the resolution public in Rājagaha. In accordance with the Buddha's word of command, the Sangha nominated the Venerable Sāriputta, and he made the resolution against Devadatta well-known in the city.

On hearing this resolution, those who lacked faith and wisdom blamed the monks, saying: “These monks, these sons of the Sakyan prince, Buddha, are jealous. They are jealous of Devadatta's gains!” But those who had faith and wisdom said: “It could not be an evil act on the part of the Master to have the facts about Devadatta made public in Rājagaha.”

(Herein, a pakāsaniya-kamma is an ecclesiastical act to be performed by the Sangha according to Vinaya rules. It shows clearly that the acts and sayings of the monk, against whom the Sangha passed resolution, have nothing to do with the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha and that he acts and says only of his own free will.

(The resolution against Devadatta is somewhat like this: “Formerly Devadatta's behaviour was of one kind but now it is quite different. What he does corporeally or says by word of mouth is not to be identified with the Buddha or the Dhamma or the Sangha. It is to be identified only with Devadatta.” The resolution containing words to this effect was passed by the Sangha after taking votes. Then in accordance with the instructions of the Buddha, the Sangha formally nominated the Venerable Sāriputta (again by votes) to be the persona who was to declare Devadatta a persona non grata publicly in Rājagaha. So accompanied by many monks, the Venerable Sāriputta went into the city and made public the dissociation of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha from Devadatta by saying: “Formerly Devadatta's behaviour was of one kind, now it is quite different. What he does bodily or verbally should not be identified with the Buddha or the Dhamma or the Sangha. It should be identified only with Devadatta.” These in brief are the noteworthy points about pakāsaniya-kamma.)

Prince Ajātasattu

After he has been thus fully declared to be a monk whose acts and words were disavowed by the Sangha, Devadatta thought: “Now the Monk Gotama has repudiated me. I will now do what is harmful to His welfare.” So he went to Prince Ajātasattu and said:

“Prince, people in ancient times lived long but nowadays people are short-lived. There is the possibility of your death even as a prince. So kill your father and become a king. I will kill the Buddha and become a Buddha.”

Prince Ajātasattu thought: “The Venerable Devadatta is a powerful person. He says so perhaps because he has reasons for saying so.” So he tied a dagger to his thigh; shaking with fear, he hurried into the palace in broad daylight. The ministers who guarded the King seized and searched the Prince. When they found the dagger tied to his thigh, they asked him what he wanted to do. The Prince said that he wanted to kill his father. The ministers again asked him at whose instigation he tried to kill the King. The Prince admitted that Devadatta had incited him.

Then some ministers held the view that the Prince and Devadatta and all the monks should be killed. Some contended that the monks should not be killed as they did no wrong and that only the Prince and Devadatta should be killed. Still the rest of the ministers maintained that the Prince and Devadatta should not be killed nor should the monks be killed, that the matter should be reported to the King and action taken according to the King's instructions.

Then the ministers took the Prince to the King and informed him of the Prince's attempt to kill him. The King asked them about their views and the ministers stated their three different views. The King said:

“How can the Exalted One or the Dhamma or the Sangha be guilty of any offence? They are certainly not guilty. Has not the Exalted One already declared that Devadatta's present behaviour is quite different from his former behaviour and has not He publicly disavowed the acts and sayings of Devadatta?”

Then the King dismissed the ministers in the first group (that is, those who held the first view), demoted the second group of ministers and promoted those in the third group.

Then the King asked his son why he wished to kill him. The prince said that he wanted to become a king. King Bimbisāra then said: “Prince, if you want to be a king, then this kingdom is yours,” and he handed over his kingdom completely to Prince Ajātasattu.

Devadatta's Cruel Advice

As his wish was now fulfilled, Prince Ajātasattu was delighted and he told Devadatta about it. But to incite enmity in the Prince Devadatta said: “Like a man who covers his drum with a fox inside it, you think that you have achieved your object. After two or three days, your father will have a second thought about your impudence and make himself King again.”

The Prince asked his teacher what he should do. Devadatta cruelly advised him to exterminate his father. The Prince said that he was not desirable to kill his father with any weapon since he was of royal blood. Then Devadatta again gave devilish advice that the Prince should starve his father to death.

Ajātasattu's Act of Parricide

King Ajātasattu ordered his father King Bimbisāra to be imprisoned in a very hot and highly vaporous iron cage. He did not allow any one except his mother to see the King.

- (1) Then Queen Vedehi put the food in a golden bowl and took it into the iron cage. The King ate the food and sustained his life. King Ajātasattu asked how his father managed to keep himself alive and when he heard what his mother was doing, he ordered the ministers not to allow her to enter the cage with food.
- (2) Then the Queen hid the food in her knot of hair and entered the cage. The King ate the food and stayed alive. When King Ajātasattu heard this, he forbade the Queen to go into the cage with her hair knotted.
- (3) Then the Queen put the food in her golden footwear and entered the cage putting on them. The King subsisted on the food brought by the Queen in her footwear. When Ajātasattu learnt how his father was staying alive, he forbade his mother to visit the King in her footwear.
- (4) From that time on, Queen Vedehī bathed herself with fragrant water, coated her body with food (made of oil, honey, molasses and butter) and putting on her outer robe, she entered the iron cage. The King licked her body and in this way he kept himself alive. When the wicked Ajātasattu heard the news, he imperiously ordered the ministers. not to allow his mother to enter the cage.

Thus forbidden to get inside the cage, the Queen stood near the door of the cage and cried: “O Great King! You, yourself, did not allow this wicked son Ajātasattu to be killed when he was young. You, yourself, raised your own (potential) enemy. Now, this is the last time that I see you. From now on, I will not have the opportunity to see you. Forgive me if I have done anything wrong.” Thus muttering and weeping, she went back to her residence.

King Bimbisāra’s Death

From that time on, the King had no food to eat. Walking to and fro, he stayed alive only by means of the bliss of Sotāpatti-Fruition that he had attained. His mind being thus always absorbed in that Fruition, the King’s body became very splendid.

The wicked Ajātasattu asked his men how his father managed to survive. His men said that the King kept himself alive by walking to and fro and that he had become more splendid than before in his physical appearance. Then King Ajātasattu decided to put an end to the walking exercise of his father and told the barbers to gash the soles of his father’s feet, smear them with oil and salt and broil them before red-hot catch-embers.

When he saw the barbers, King Bimbisāra thought that someone had certainly brought his son to his senses and that the barbers therefore had come to remove his beard.

The barbers approached the king and stood paying respect to him. The king asked them about the object of their visit, and they informed him of their purpose. Then the king told them to do according to the desire of their master. The barbers requested the king to sit and after making obeisance to him, they said: “O Great King! We will have to carry out the order of King Ajātasattu. Do not be angry with us. What we have to do is most inappropriate to a good king like you.” Then holding firmly the soles of his feet with their left hands and sharp razors with their right hands, they gashed the soles, smeared and rubbed them with oil and salt and then broiled them before the red-hot catch-embers.

(In a previous life the King walked on the stupa platform with his footwear and trod on a mat with his uncleaned feet. The suffering that he now underwent was the lingering effect of that unwholesome act in the past, according to Commentaries.)

King Bimbisāra had to endure excruciating pain. Without harbouring any ill will, he contemplated the wonderful attributes of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha. Then withering away like a flower dumped on the stupa-platform, he became an attendant of Vessavana Deva King in Catumahārāja deva-world, and the supreme commander of deva ogres by the name of Janavasabha.

(Herein he was called Janavasabha because as King Bimbisāra he was a sotāpanna-ariya and the chief of one hundred and ten thousand brahmin merchants. “Jana” meaning “of 110,000 brahmin merchants”, and “vasabha” meaning “chief”.

(Why did he become a low-class in Catumahārāja deva-world although he was a great sotāpanna-ariya? The answer was given by Janavasabha Deva-yakkha himself.

(According to his answer, he passed through seven lifetimes as king on earth after his demise in Catumahārājā deva-world and seven lifetimes in Catumahārājā after his demise on earth. Now as a sotāpanna-ariya and by virtue of his many good deeds in respect of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha, he could have attained a higher deva-world. But because he had spent seven lifetimes successively in Catumahārājā world, his attachment to life (bhava-nikanti) in that deva-world was powerful and because of that powerful attachment he landed in the Catumahārājā deva-world. This was the confessions of the Deva-yakkha Janavasabha in the Janavasabha Sutta in Dīgha Nikāya. His confessions in verse read as follows:

Ito satta tato satta, saṃsārani catuddasa Nivāsam abhijānāmi, yattha me vusitaṃ pure.)

Belated Remorse of The Fool

On the very day of King Bimbisāra’s death, the wife of the foolish King Ajātasattu gave birth to a son, later called Udayabhadda. So the two messages, one reporting the birth of a son from the chief of the palace and the other reporting the death of the King’s father, Bimbisāra, came to the palace at the same time.

The ministers considered it advisable to submit first the report of the birth of a son and they did so accordingly. As soon as he read the report there arose in him an intense love for his son that excited his whole body and made him ecstatic to the marrow. At the same time he became aware of his gratitude to his father, thinking that at the time of his birth his father might have also experienced intense love for his son.

King Ajātasattu then ordered his ministers to release his father at once. But the ministers said that was impossible and submitted the report of the death of King Bimbisāra. On hearing the news, King Ajātasattu wept bitterly, went to his mother and asked her whether there arose intense love in his father at the time of his birth.

Queen Vedehī replied: “You foolish son! What do you say? During your childhood you had a whitlow on your finger. The royal nurses were unable to coax and make you stop crying. In the end they took you to your father who was seated in the court of law. Your father kept in his mouth your finger that was afflicted with the whitlow and due to the warmth of the mouth, the tumour erupted there. Out of great love for you your father did not spit out the pus mixed with putrid blood lest you should wake up and he swallowed it instead. Your father loved you so much.”

The Queen thus told him at length how his father was attached to him. King Ajātasattu wept bitterly and performed the funeral of his father.

Assassins sent by Devadatta

Then Devadatta went to King Ajātasattu and asked him to despatch men who would kill the Buddha. The King sent the assassins to Devadatta telling them to follow the instructions of his teacher.

Devadatta told the first man: “Man, you go to the place where the Monk Gotama is now living. You kill Gotama and come back by this way.”

Then he told a couple of men to kill the first man and come back by another way.

Then the third batch of four men was instructed to kill the two men (of the second batch) and return by another way.

The fourth batch of eight men was instructed to kill the four men (of the third batch) and come back by another way.

Then still another sixteen men (as the fifth batch) were told to kill the eight men (of the fourth batch) and return by another way.

Assassins attained Sotāpatti

Armed with a sword and a shield and a bow and a quiver of arrows, the first man went to the Buddha and stood with his rigid body near Him, trembling with fear and agitation.

Seeing him, the Buddha said: “Man, come here. Have no fear.” Then the man got over his fear and put his sword and shield as well as his bow and arrows in a suitable place. Then having approached the Buddha, he bowed his head at the feet of the Buddha and confessed and apologized for his offence. The Buddha forgave him and gave the series of talks on generosity, morality and other good deeds that lead to the attainment of the Path and Fruition. As a result the assassin became a sotāpanna-ariya and at the same time sought supramundane refuge in the Triple Gem.

Then the Buddha dismissed the assassin telling him not to go by the way instructed by Devadatta but to go by another way.

The two assassins (of the second batch) waited for the first assassin for a long time. Then going in the opposite direction they saw the Buddha seated at the foot of a tree. They went near the Buddha, paid respect and sat at a proper place. The Buddha gave them the series of Dhamma talks and, explained the four Truths and established them in the Fruition of the Sotāpatti. Like the first assassin, they too became sotāpanna-ariyas and sought supramundane refuge in the Triple Gem.

Again, the Buddha dismissed these assassins, telling them to go by another way.

Then the four assassins (of the third batch) ....

Then the eight assassins (of the fourth batch) ....

The sixteen assassins (of the fifth batch) waited for the eight assassins for a long time and going in the opposite direction, they saw the Buddha as did those who went before them. They paid respect to the Buddha and sat at a proper place. The Buddha gave them the Dhamma talks on the Four Truths and established them in the Fruition of Sotāpatti. After they had sought supramundane refuge in the Triple Gem, the Buddha dismissed the men, telling them to go by another way.

Then the first assassin approached Devadatta and said: “Sir, I cannot kill the Exalted Buddha. He is so very powerful.” Devadatta said: “Enough men, do not kill the Monk Gotama. I will kill him by myself.”

Devadatta caused Blood to bleed in The Buddha

After having helped the assassins to gain the Fruition of Sotāpatti, the Buddha was one day walking to and fro in the shadow of the Gijjhakūṭa Hill. Then Devadatta climbed the hill and rolled down a large rock with the intention of killing Him. As it rolled down, two promontories appeared automatically and blocked the rock. A layer of the rock flew off and caused blood to bleed at the foot of the Buddha.

The Buddha looked up and said to Devadatta: “You foolish man, you who can make no spiritual progress! You have caused blood to bleed in Me with ill-will and murderous intention. So you have done much evil.”

Then the Buddha said to the monks: “Monks, Devadatta has done this first heinous act (anantariya-kamma) because he has spilled my blood with ill-will and murderous intention.”

The monks carried the Buddha to the monastery in Maddakucchi Park. There the Buddha expressed the desire to go to the monastery in Jīvaka's mango grove and told the monks to take Him there. Accordingly, the monks took Him there.

On hearing the news, the great physician Jīvaka went to the Buddha and applied a highly potent medicine to the wound. Having bandaged the wound, he told the Buddha to keep the bandage intact until his return from his visit to a patient in the city. After calling on the patient and doing the needful for him, the physician came back but did not reach the city gate before it was closed.

Then the physician Jīvaka thought: “I have applied the powerful medicine to the foot of the Exalted Buddha and bandaged the wound treating Him like an ordinary patient. So I have made a grave mistake. This is the time to untie the bandage. If the bandage is not untied, He will suffer intense pain the whole night.” So thinking, Jāvaka was much worried. At that moment, the Buddha called Ānanda and said: “Ānanda, the physician Jīvaka came back after dark and could not reach the city gate before it was closed. He is worried because now is the time to untie the bandage. So you untie the bandage immediately.” Ānanda removed the bandage and the wound was gone, like the bark detached from the tree.

As soon as the city-gate was opened, Jīvaka hurried to the Buddha even before dawn and asked Him whether He suffered any pain. The Buddha said: “Jīvaka, I have overcome all pain since I gained supreme Enlightenment under the Bodhi tree” and then He preached the following verse:

*Gataddhino visokassa, vipamuttassa sabbadhi
Sabbagantha-pahīnassa, pariḷāho na vijjati.*

Jīvaka! There is absolutely no sorrow, no suffering in the arahat who has been liberated from samsāra, who has gone to the other shore of samsāra, who is free from all grief, who has no attachment whatever to all things including the body, etc., who has removed all his fetters.

(Pariāho (suffering) is of two kinds, viz., physical (kāyika) and mental (cetasika) suffering. Physical suffering due to cold, heat, etc., occurs in the arahat and so he is not free from physical suffering. The physician Jīvaka had this in mind when he asked the question. But as Lord of the Dhamma, the Buddha, was supremely skilful in preaching, and He answered that the arahat who possessed the above-mentioned attributes had no mental suffering. Jivaka asked whether the Buddha had any mental suffering and the Buddha said that he had none.)

By the end of the sermon, many living beings gained the Fruition of Sotāpatti and so forth.

Security provided to The Buddha by Monks

Many monks, who heard the report about Devadatta's attempt to kill the Buddha, surrounded the residence of the Buddha in one ring after another. They recited the scriptures loudly and walked up and down to guard, protect and ensure the security of the Buddha.

On hearing their recitation (and noise of their movement) the Buddha asked Ānanda (in spite of his knowledge), and when he told Him about the vigilant monks, He summoned the monks and said:

*Aṭṭhānam etaṃ bhikkhave anavakāso, yaṃ par' ūpakkamena Tathāgataṃ jīvitaṃ voropeyya.

Monks, it is wholly impossible for anyone to put effort to kill the Buddha.

Then the Buddha said to them (as He did to Venerable Mahā Moggallāna on one occasion) that those are five kinds of teachers in the world, that only these kinds of teachers need the protection of their disciples, that, as for the Buddha, He truly claimed pure morality, pure livelihood, pure teaching, pure speech and pure intellectual vision as he had all these virtues and therefore, he did not need the protection of His disciples. He added that it was impossible for any one to kill a Buddha and that Buddhas attained Nibbāna not by any one's attempt to kill them.

Finally the Buddha said to the monks.

“Monks, go back to your own abode. The Buddhas are not beings whose security of life depends only on other people's protection.”

Sending Nālāgīri The Elephant

(The sending of Nālāgīri occurs in the Sanghabhedakakkhandhaka of the Vinaya Cūḷa-Vagga, and the exposition of the Cūlahamśa Jātaka of the Asīti Nipāta. Here the latter is based.)

Due to the treatment given by the physician Jīvaka, the Buddha recovered His fitness and as before, He went about in the glory of a great Buddha, surrounded by monks. On seeing the Buddha, Devadatta thought: “It is impossible for any men to approach and kill the Monk Gotama when he sees Him in the glow of His physical body at its zenith. But King Ajātasattu's elephant, Nālāgīri, is vicious, wild and homicidal. He does not know any good thing about the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha. Only that wild Nālāgīri can kill the Monk Gotama.” So he went to the King and told him about his plan.

King Ajātasattu agreed to his plan. He summoned the mahout (elephant-driver) and ordered him to intoxicate Nālāgīri the elephant and send him the next morning along the same way by which the Buddha was taking. Devadatta also asked the mahout how much liquor the elephant consumed on other days and when he learnt that the animal drank eight pots of liquor, he told the mahout to give the animal sixteen pots of liquor the next morning and to send him towards the Monk Gotama. The mahout promised that he would.

King Ajātasattu had it announced by the beat of drum in the city that all citizens should do their business early the next morning and avoid going about in the streets as Nālāgīri would be made intoxicated and sent into the city.

Devadatta also left the palace, went to the elephant-shed and told the mahouts: “Men, we are the King’s teachers who can make the King’s servants promoted or demoted in their work. If you want to be promoted, then give the elephant sixteen pots of very potent liquor early in the morning and when the Monk Gotama comes into the city, you incite and enrage the animal with goads and spears. Let the elephant break open the shed, rush in the opposite direction of the Monk Gotama and kill Him.” The mahouts agreed to follow his instructions.

The news spread throughout the whole city. The Buddha’s lay devotees who adored the Triple Gem approached the Buddha and said: “Exalted Buddha, in collaboration with the King, Devadatta will send the wild elephant, Nālāgīri, tomorrow along the same way by which You are coming. So do not come into the city for alms tomorrow but stay here in this Veļuvana monastery. We will offer meals to You and the monks in the monastery.”

The Buddha did not say that He would not go into the city for alms. But He decided to teach the wild elephant the next day, perform the miracle (Pāṭihāriya)<sup>2</sup> by teaching, subdue the heretics, and without going about for alms in Rājagaha, return to Veļuvana with monks from the city. The Buddha knew that the lay followers in Rājagaha would bring many pots and bowls of food and that He would have His meal in the monastery. For this reason the Buddha accepted the invitation of the lay men.

Knowing very well the acceptance of their invitation by the Buddha, the lay men decided to bring and offer food at the monastery and went away.

The Buddha preached to the monks in the first watch of the night and answered the questions of devas and Brahmās in the second watch. The third watch was divided into three periods. In the first period, the Buddha lay down on the right side like a lion-king. In the second, He was absorbed in the Fruition of Arahatsip. In the third, He was filled with infinite compassion and after arising from that state, He surveyed the worthy beings, and saw Nālāgīri. The Buddha saw clearly that when He preached to the elephant, eight hundred and forty thousand beings would realize the Four Truths and become liberated. So, after cleaning His body at dawn, He called Ānanda and said: “Ānanda, tell all the monks who live in the eighteen monasteries around Rājagaha to come along with Me into the city.”

Venerable Ānanda acted according to the instructions of the Buddha. All the monks assembled in the Veļuvana monastery. The Buddha entered Rājagaha surrounded by many monks.

Then the mahouts carried out the instructions of King Ajātasattu and Devadatta. There was a very large gathering of people. At the meeting those who had faith in the Buddha said:

“Today, there will be a battle between the two bull elephants, the Buddha and Nālāgīri. We will witness clearly the admonition of the animal bull, Nālāgīri, by the Buddha Bull.”

So saying they climbed the turreted and unturreted mansions, house roofs, etc., to wait and see the battle.

But as for the heretics, who had no faith in the Buddha, they said: “This Nālāgīri elephant

2. Pāṭihāriya means removal of opposing evil deeds. There are three ways of removal: (1) removal by preaching (anusāsāni-pāṭihāriya), (2) removal by performance of miracle such as creation of different forms (iddhi-pāṭihāriya), (3) removal by knowing the listener’s mental state (ādesanā-pāṭihāriya).

Of these three ways, the third one is meant here. The second way belonged to Mahāthera Moggallāna and the first to Mahāthera Sāriputta. Though the Buddha adopted the third method, it was usually preceded by either of the previous two in accordance with the mental inclinations of the listener.

is vicious, violent and homicidal. He does not know anything good about the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha. Today he will destroy the bright, yellow and golden body of the Monk Gotama and terminate His life. Today we will clearly see the end of our enemy.”

So saying, they climbed the turreted mansions, etc and waited there.

When Nālāgīri the elephant saw the Buddha coming, it rushed towards the Buddha like a moving mountain with its trunk raised, his ears and tails set upright, scaring the people, destroying the houses and crushing the carts to pieces.

When the monks saw the elephant rushing, they said to the Buddha: “Glorious Buddha, the wild, vicious and homicidal Nālāgīri is coming along this way. This animal does not know anything good about the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha. We want the Glorious Buddha, the speaker by good words, to step aside (keep off the way along which the elephant is coming).” Then the Buddha said: “Monks! Have no fear! I can tame Nālāgīri.”

Then the Venerable Sāriputta said: “Glorious Buddha, it is the duty of the eldest son to attend to any matter that concerns his father. Let me tame the elephant.” But the Buddha turned down his request, saying: “Sāriputta, the power of the Buddha is one thing and the power of the disciples is a different matter. You need not take any trouble (for Me).” Most of the eighty great disciples made the same request but the Buddha did not give His consent.

Self-sacrificing Love of Venerable Ānanda

Then, because of his great love for the Buddha, the Venerable Ānanda could no longer restrain himself. He came forward and stood in front of the Master, bent on sacrificing his life for Him and allowing himself to be the first trampled to death by the elephant. The Buddha said: “Keep back, Ānanda. Do not come and stand in front of me.” Ānanda replied: “Glorious Buddha, this elephant is vicious, wild and homicidal. It is like the fire that destroys the world. Let it come to you after first trampling me to death.” The Buddha dissuaded Ānanda three times but the latter persisted in standing before Him. Finally, He had to remove him by His psychic power and put him among the monks.

Incident of A Child's Mother

At that moment, a child's mother saw the elephant and fearful of death, she fled, abandoning the child from her bosom onto the ground between the Buddha and the elephant.

Nālāgīri pursued the woman but being unable to overtake her, it turned back and went near the child. The Buddha focussed His separately intended loving-kindness (odissakamettā) on the elephant and in a very sweet voice of the Brahmā-king, He said:

“O Nālāgīri, they served you sixteen pots of liquor and made you drunk not to catch any other being but verily to kill Me. So do not go about harassing the pedestrians. Come straight to where I am.”

Thus the Master invited the elephant.

The Buddha's Power

On hearing the sweet words of the Buddha, the wild Nālāgīri opened his both eyes and saw the glorious body of the Buddha. He was shocked and owing to the power of the Buddha, he became sober and dropping his trunk and flapping his ears, he went to Him and crouched at the feet.

Then the Buddha said: “Nālāgīri, you are an animal and I am a Buddha. From now on, do not be vicious, violent and homicidal. Try to cultivate loving-kindness towards all living beings.” The Buddha stretched His right hand, and stroking the forehead of the elephant, He spoke the following two verses:

Mā kuñjara nāgam āsado Dukkham hi kuñjara nāgam āsado.

Na hi nāgahatassa kuñjara sugati hoti param yato.

*Mā ca mado mā ca pamādo na hi pamattā sugatim vajanti te.
Tvaññ'eva tathā karissasi yena tvañ sugatim gamissasi.*

O! elephant Nālāgīri, do not approach with murderous intent, with the desire to kill the Buddha who has never done any evil. To approach the Buddha with murderous intent is an evil that will lead to suffering. There is absolutely no possibility of good rebirth in the deva or human worlds after the death of anyone who wants to hurt or kill the Buddha.

O! elephant Nālāgīri, do not be conceited. Do not be unmindful of the ten good deeds. Those, who are unmindful of the ten good deeds, do not have good rebirth in deva and human worlds. You will have to do such good deeds as will ensure good rebirth (In other words, you will attain good rebirth only on the basis of good deeds.)

Nālāgīri elephant was overwhelmed with ecstasy. If he had not been an elephant, he would have attained the Fruition of Sotāpatti on the spot.

On seeing this miracle, the people gave a resounding ovation. They clapped their hands and joyously threw various ornaments over the elephant as their rewards. The ornaments covered nearly the whole body of the elephant and from that time he came to be known as Dhanapāla. At the time when Dhanapāla elephant was tamed by the Buddha, eighty-four thousand beings had the opportunity to sample the Dhamma, the juice of Deathlessness.

The Buddha established the elephant in the Five Precepts. The elephant gently collected the dust at the Master's feet, scattered it over his head and stepped back on its knees. He stepped at the last place within sight of the Buddha and after paying respect entered the elephant-shed. From that time he became a docile, good tempered and very tame elephant and did not harm any being for the rest of his life.

Having His wish fulfilled, the Buddha resolved that the ornaments that had accumulated be returned to their owners. He thought: "Today, I have performed a great miracle and so it is not advisable for Me to go about in the city for food." Having thus subdued the heretics, He left Rājagaha City and returned to the Veļuvana monastery, surrounded by monks like a triumphant king (back from the battlefield). The citizens went to the monastery with much food and offered alms lavishly. They sang the following song joyously:

Adaṇḍena asatthena, nāgo danto Mahesinā.*

Some animal trainers train elephants, horses and cattle by beating violently with iron spikes, sticks, spears, goads, hooks and canes. As for the Buddha, He has tamed Nālāgīri the elephant without using any destructive weapon and has removed his violent temper through loving-kindness.

Decline of Devadatta's Gains

Devadatta's attempt on the life of the Buddha caused a big outcry among the people. They loudly blamed King Ajātasattu, saying: "It was Devadatta who caused the death of our King Bimbisāra. It was Devadatta who sent the assassins. It was he who rolled down the rock; and now he sent the elephant Nālāgīri to kill the Master. Yet such an evil man is made teacher by King Ajātasattu who goes about with him."

When King Ajātasattu heard the people's reproach, he ordered the withdrawal of his regular offer of five hundred pots of food to Devadatta and he stopped going to see his former teacher. The citizens, too, ceased to offer any food to Devadatta who visited their houses for alms.

Five Things demanded by Devadatta

His gains having dwindled day by day, Devadatta decided to do some thing dramatic and spectacular for his living. He went to the Buddha and said:

“Glorious Buddha, I beg you to lay down the following rules for the monks:

- (1) All monks should live in forest hermitage for life. A monk, who lives in a monastery near a village, should be guilty of an offence.
- (2) All monks should always eat only the food that they obtain by going on the round for alms. A monk, who accepts the food which the lay men have offered after invitation, should be guilty of an offence.
- (3) All monks should always wear only the robe made of rags. A monk, who accepts the robe offered by lay men, should be guilty of an offence.
- (4) All monks should always dwell at the feet of trees. A monk, who goes to a monastery with a roof, should be guilty of an offence.
- (5) All monks should always avoid eating meat and fish. A monk who eats meat or fish, should be guilty of an offence.”

Then the Buddha said: “Devadatta, your demands are not proper (reasonable).

- (1) Let the monk live in a forest hermitage or in the monastery near a village according to his desire.
- (2) Let the monk eat the food that he gets by going round for alms or by accepting the food offered by lay men after invitation. Let him get the food in either way he likes.
- (3) Let the monk wear the robe made of rags or the robe offered by lay men according to his desire.
- (4) Devadatta, I have permitted the monks to dwell at the foot of trees for eight months.
- (5) I have permitted the monks to eat meat or fish provided they do not see or hear or have any suspicion about any creature being killed for their food.”

(Herein when Devadatta made the five demands, the Buddha knew instantly that his object was to create a schism in the Sangha. As concessions to these demands would be a hindrance to spiritual progress, the Buddha considered them unreasonable and said that a monk might live in forest hermitage if he wanted to, and so on.

In this connection, a good monk should know the wish of the Buddha as well as what is proper for Him.

(According to the Buddha, there are four kinds of monks, viz. (a) the forest-dwelling monk who will gain the Path and the Fruition by virtue of his great physical and intellectual strength, (b) the monk who cannot live in the forest because of his physical weakness and who can make spiritual progress only if he practises the Dhamma in the village monastery, (c) the monk who will make spiritual progress either in the forest hermitage or in the village monastery by virtue of his physical strength and forbearance, and (d) the (padaparama) monk who will make no spiritual progress in spite of his effort either in the forest or the village monastery,

- (a) The Buddha wants only the monk of the first kind to live in a forest hermitage. The hermitage is a proper abode for him and following his example, his disciples will want to live in the forests.
- (b) The Buddha wants the second type to live in a village monastery.
- (c) According to the Buddha, the monk of the third type should live only in a forest hermitage. The forest hermitage is good for him and following his example, his disciples will want to live there.
- (d) As for the (padaparama) monk who will not make much spiritual progress in this life, the Buddha wants him to live in a forest hermitage. Practice of austerities (dhutaṅga) and meditation in the forest hermitage will contribute to his attainment of the Path and Fruition in the next life and he will be a living example for his disciples.

(Thus when the Buddha says “(1) Let the monk live in a monastery near a village according to his desire”, He means “the monk (b) who cannot live in the forest because of his physical weakness and who will achieve his spiritual goal only if he practises the Dhamma in a village monastery.” This concession also enables other monks to live in the village monastery.

(If the Buddha accepted Devadatta's demands, it would rule out the possibility of spiritual progress for two kinds of monks: (1) the monk (b) who is physically weak and (2) the monk who lived in the forest when he was young but who cannot live there in his old age owing to decline in health and so has to live in the village monastery to achieve his spiritual goal. For these reasons the Buddha rejected Devadatta's demands.)

Devadatta's Attempt to create Schism

Devadatta was delighted when the Buddha refused to comply with his five demands. Together with his followers, Kokālika, Katamodaka Tissaka, the son of Queen Khanda and Samuddadatta, he rose, and after paying respect to the Buddha, went away. (The monk Kokālika, Queen Khanda's son Kadamodaka Tissaka and the monk Samuddadatta were Devadatta's close and trusted disciples.)

Then Devadatta went to Rājagaha with his followers and propagated their doctrine. They told the people that the Buddha had rejected what they regarded as their reasonable demands for five rules that would contribute to non-attachment, etc. and that they, on their part, would live in accordance with those five rules.

People, who lacked faith and intelligence, extolled Devadatta and blamed the Buddha. Those, who had faith and intelligence, criticized Devadatta for trying to create schism in the Sangha and undermine the authority of the Buddha. The monks, who heard the people's words, also criticized Devadatta and reported to the Buddha.

Then the Buddha called a meeting of the Sangha in connection with the matter reported by the monks and in the presence of all monks, He asked: “Devadatta, is it true that you are trying to create schism in the Sangha and destroy its authority?” Devadatta replied: “Yes, Venerable Sir!”

Then the Buddha said:

“Devadatta, what you are doing is not proper. Do not wish to see dissension in the Sangha. One who causes schism in the Sangha bears a very grave responsibility. One who causes schism in a united Sangha commits an evil that will lasts one whole kappa. He will suffer in hell for one whole kappa.

“Devadatta, one who restores unity to a disunited Sangha commits a good deed and enjoys life in the deva-world for one whole kappa. Devadatta, what you are doing is not proper. Do not wish to see dissension in the Sangha. One who causes schism in the Sangha bears a very grave responsibility.”

Although the Buddha thus admonished him seriously. Devadatta did not give up his attempt and carried out the preliminary plan for the schism. The next day, he decided to perform uposatha service and acts of the Sangha (Sangha-kamma) separately. In the morning, he approached the Thera Ananda who came into Rājagaha for alms, and he said: “Dear Ananda, from today I will perform the uposatha service and the acts of Sangha without the company of the Buddha and His monks.”

When Venerable Ānanda reported the matter to the Buddha, He breathed forth the following verse:

*Sukaram sādhunā sādhu
sādhu pāpena dukkaram.
Pāpam pāpena sukaram
pāpam ariyehi dukkaram.*

It is easy for a good man to do a good deed
It is hard for an evil man to do a good deed
It is easy for an evil man to do an evil deed

It is hard for a good man to do an evil deed.

Schism created by Devadatta

Then on that uposatha day, Devadatta rose from his seat in the assembly of monks and said that the Monk Gotama had rejected his demand for five rules that would lead to non-attachment, etc., that they would abide by the five rules and that those who liked the rules should vote for them. The votes were taken and the five hundred young monks of Vajji country who lived in Vesālī and who were ignorant of the Vinaya teaching voted for the rules as they thought that the rules represented the Dhamma, Vinaya and the sayings of the Buddha. Devadatta took the five hundred monks and went to Gayāsīsa.

Contribution of The Two Chief Disciples

Then the Venerable Sāriputta and the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna, the two Chief Disciples, went to the Buddha and the Venerable Sāriputta informed Him of Devadatta's schismatic defection and his departure for Gayāsīsa with five hundred monks. The Buddha reproached them for having no compassion for the young monks and urged them to go and save the monks from spiritual ruin. The two Venerables promised to do so and after paying respect to the Buddha they left for Gayāsīsa.

A Young Monk's Concern

Then a monk came and stood crying near the Buddha. The Buddha asked him why he was crying. The monk said that the two Chief Disciples of His, Venerables Sāriputta and Moggallāna had gone to Devadatta, probably because they preferred Devadatta's teaching. Then the Buddha said: "Monk, there is absolutely no reason why Sāriputta and Moggallāna should like Devadatta's teaching. In fact, they have gone there in order to enlighten the five hundred young monks who have become Devadatta's followers."

At that time, Devadatta was seated preaching in the midst of many of his followers. When he saw from afar the two Venerables coming, he said to the young monks: "Monks look over there! I have proclaimed my doctrine very well. Even the Monk Gotama's Chief Disciples, Sāriputta and Moggallāna prefer my teaching and they are now coming over to join me."

Then the monk Kokālika (one of the leaders of his sect) warned Devadatta: "Friend Devadatta, do not associate with Sāriputta and Moggallāna. They have evil desire and they follow their evil desires." But Devadatta said: "Friend, you should not say like this. Their coming here is good because it is motivated by their appreciation of my teaching."

When the two Venerables came near, Devadatta said, "Come, Sāriputta, sit here" and offered to share his seat with him. But the Venerable refused to accept his offer and took his seat in a suitable place. So did the Venerable Moggallāna.

Having preached to the monks the whole night, Devadatta said to the Venerable Sāriputta: "Friend Sāriputta, the monks are free from sloth and torpor. You carry on with your talk on the Dhamma. My neck is stiff and cramped. Let me stretch my back." (Here he imitated the Buddha in the way He urged the Venerable Sāriputta.) Venerable Sāriputta agreed. After spreading his big fourfold outer robe, Devadatta lay down by the right side. As he was tired, unmindful and devoid of intelligence, he instantly fell asleep.

Then the Venerable Sāriputta taught the five hundred young monks first by making them aware of their own mental states (ādesanā-pāṭihāriya). This was followed by his pointing out the Dhammas that they should avoid and the Dhammas that they should practise (anusāsānī-pāṭihāriya). The Venerable Mahā Moggallāna taught them first by performing miracles (iddhi-pāṭihāriya) and then telling them what to avoid and what to follow. Therefore the five hundred young monks gained the Fruition of Sotāpatti on the spot and became sotāpanna-ariyas.

After the five hundred young monks had become ariyas on the Sotāpatti Path, the Venerable Sāriputta told them that he and Venerable Moggallāna would return to the Buddha and that those who liked His teaching might go along with them. All the monks followed them and travelling by air by their psychic power, they reached Veḷuvana.

Vomiting of Blood by Devadatta

After the two Chief Disciples had gone away with the five hundred young monks, Kokālika, a teacher of the sect, woke Devadatta up by hitting the breast with his knee and saying: “Get up, Devadatta! Sāriputta and Moggallāna have taken away the young monks. Have I not told you that you should not associate with Sāriputta and Moggallāna, that they have evil desires and that they follow their evil desires?” Then Devadatta vomited hot blood on the spot.

Jātakas concerning Devadatta

When the monks living in the Veḷuvana monastery saw Venerable Sāriputta returning with the five hundred monks, they said to the Buddha: “Glorious Buddha, when the Venerable Sāriputta left for Gayāsīsa, he had only the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna as his companion. Now his return from there with so many followers is indeed glorious.” The Buddha said: “Monks, it is not only now that Sāriputta is glorious. When he came back to me as an animal in a previous life he was also glorious.” and He recounted the Lakkhanamiga Jātaka in the Sīla-Vagga of the Ekaka Nipāta. Again, when the monks reported that Devadatta imitated the Buddha by trying to preach like a glorious Buddha with the two chief disciples on the right and left side, the Buddha said: “Monks, it is not only now; also a long time ago Devadatta tried to imitate Me but it was in vain.” Then the Buddha told them the Viraka Jātaka of the Nataṃḍaḷha Vagga, Duka Nipāta.

The following days, too, the Buddha narrated the Kandagalaka Jātaka (Nataṃḍaḷha Vagga, Duka Nipāta), etc. in connection with Devadatta.

Again the Sakuṇa Jātaka (Kaliṅga Vagga, Catukka Nipāta) etc were recounted in connection with Devadatta's ingratitude.

Then in connection with Devadatta's attempt to kill the Buddha, he told the Kuruṅgamiga Jātaka (Kuruṅga Vagga, Ekaka Nipāta) and others.

Then one day the monks were talking about Devadatta's downfall in respect of the offerings he received from the laity and in respect of his spiritual life when the Buddha said: “Monks, it is not only now that Devadatta has his downfall. He had it too long ago,” and the He narrated Ubhatobhattha Jātaka (Asampadāna vagga, Ekaka Nipāta) etc.

Herein a short list of Jātakas which the Buddha recounted in connection with Devadatta is given below:

Ekaka Nipāta: Scriva Jātaka, Lakkhapa Jātaka, Kuruṅgamiga Jātaka, Vānarinda Jātaka, Tayodhamma Jātaka, Sīlava Jātaka, Saccamkira Jātaka, Sīngala Jātaka, Dummedha Jātaka, Asampadāna Jātaka, Ubhatobhattha Jātaka, Sīngāla Jātaka, Virocana Jātaka and Sanjīva Jātaka.

Duka Nipāta: Vinīlaka Jātaka, Dubbhiyamakkaṭṭa Jātaka, Manicora Jātaka, Viraka Jātaka, Kuruṅgamiga Jātaka, Sumsumāra Jātaka, Kaṇḍalaka Jātaka, Dhamma-dhaja Jātaka, Kāsāva Jātaka, Cūlanandiya Jātaka, Kumbhīla Jātaka, Upāhana Jātaka, Mahāpiṅgala Jātaka, Sabbadāṭhi Jātaka and Guttliā Jātaka.

Tika Nipāta: Romaka Jātaka and Jambukhādaka Jātaka.

Catukka Nipāta: Sakuna Jātaka, Kakkāru Jātaka, Kāḷābāhu Jātaka, Jambuka Jātaka, Vānara Jātaka and Khantivādī Jātaka.

Pañcaka Nipāta: Cūḷadhammapāla Jātaka and Sāḷiya Jātaka.

Sattaka Nipāta: Kapi Jātaka and Parantapa Jātaka.

Aṭṭhaka Nipāta: Cetīya Jātaka.

Navaka Nipāta: Tittira Jātaka.

Dasaka Nipāta: Nigrodha Jātaka and Kukkura Jātaka.

Ekadasaka Nipāta: Dhammadevaputta Jātaka.

Dvadasaka Nipāta: Sanmudavāṇija Jātaka.

Terasaka Nipāta: Amba Jātaka and Rum Jātaka.

Pakinnaka Nipāta: Candakinnarī Jātaka.

Visati Nipāta: Sattigumba Jātaka, Somanassa Jātaka.

The Last Days of Devadatta

Thus while residing in Rājagaha, the Buddha recounted many Jātaka stories concerning Devadatta and then He went to Sāvatti where He dwelt in the Jetavana monastery.

Having been ill for nine months, Devadatta had the desire to see the Buddha at the last moment. So he told his disciples to take him to the Buddha. But his disciples said: “You went about as the enemy of the Buddha when you were healthy. So, we dare not take you to Him now.” Then Devadatta said: “My disciples, do not ruin me. As a matter of fact, it was only I who bore grudge against the Buddha. He did not have the slightest grudge against me.”

*Vadhake Devadattamhi, core Aṅgulimālake.
Dhanapāle Rāhule ca, sabbattha samamānaso.*

My (cousin) brother, the Buddha, has the good-will towards His brother-in-law Devadatta who was bent on killing Him, towards Aṅgulimāla the robber who adorned himself with one thousand fingers, towards Nāḷāgiri the wild elephant, later called Dhanapāla, towards His own son, Rāhula and towards all living beings equally.

“Take me now to my brother, the Exalted Buddha.”

Thus Devadatta again and again entreated them to let him see the Buddha. Then his disciples laid him on a couch and carried him to Sāvatti where the Buddha was staying.

When the monks heard the news that Devadatta was coming, they reported to the Buddha. The Buddha said: “Monks, Devadatta will have no opportunity to see Me in his present life.”

(It was natural that Devadatta had no opportunity to see the Buddha from the time he made the five demands.)

In the eyes of the ordinary monks, Devadatta was on the way to Sāvatti to see the Buddha. The Buddha said: “Devadatta would not be able to see Me in the present existence, under any circumstances, though I may remain here.” The monks were nonplussed and they did not know what to make of the Buddha's saying. Therefore, they again and again informed Him of Devadatta's arrival at such and such a place. But He still insisted that whatever Devadatta did, “by no means would he see Me.”

But, from time to time, the monks reported the progress of Devadatta's journey saying that he was now one yojana away from Sāvatti. That he was now only a gavuta away that and that he had closed upon the pond near the Jetavana monastery. Finally the Buddha said: “Devadatta will not see Me at all even though he may get into the Jetavana monastery.”

Devadatta swallowed by Earth

The disciples bearing Devadatta laid down the couch on the bank of the pond near the Jetavana monastery and stepped into the pond to bathe. Devadatta sat up on the couch putting his two feet on the ground. Then his feet sank into the earth irresistibly. Down he went, the parts of his body sinking one after another, the ankle, the kneecap, the waist, the chest, and the neck, and the earth had gorged him up to the jaw-bones when he uttered the following verse:

*Imehi aṭṭhihi tam aggapuggalam devātidevaṃ naradammasārathim.
Samantacakkhum satapunnalakkhaṇam*

I, Devadatta, on my death-bed seek refuge in the Exalted One with these bones and this lingering life-force. With intelligent, noble, joyous mind motivated by the three noble root-conditions (I seek refuge in the Omniscient Buddha, the Supreme Being in the world, the All-seeing Teacher who can discipline all worthy beings and who possesses the thirty-two splendid marks of an extraordinary man by virtue of His countless good deeds.

(It was because of the Buddha's fore-knowledge of Devadatta's repentance that the Buddha ordained him. Even if he had not been a monk, he would certainly have committed the same heinous crime as a layman and later on he would not have been able to do the good deed that would contribute to his liberation from samsāra.

(The Buddha knew that after ordination Devadatta would do the two most evil deeds: causing the spilling of the Buddha's blood and creating schism in the Sangha and that later on he would do the good deed for his release from samsāra. So the Buddha ordained him. Indeed, because of this good deed, Devadatta will be a Paccekabuddha by the name of Atthissara, after one hundred thousand kappas.)

Devadatta's Suffering in Avīci Hell

After uttering the verse, Devadatta entered the earth and landed in the Avīci hell. It seemed as if he was to suffer unshaken in the hell because he had wronged the unshaken Buddha. In the great Avīci hell, one hundred yojanas in width, Devadatta's body was one hundred yojanas in height. His head was inside the upper iron pan up to his two ears. The two legs were inside the red-hot iron bottom up to the ankles. He was roasted standing and facing east. An iron stake with the thickness of a palm-tree protruding from the west side of the hell-pot pierced right through the middle of Devadatta's back, came out from the front breast and went into the east side of the hell-pot. Another iron stake came out of the south side of the hell-pot, passed through Devadatta's right side, came out from the left side and went into the north side of the hell-pot. Still another iron stake came from the iron pan, pierced right through the top of the head, came out of the bottom and went into the iron floor under the hell-pot. In this way Devadatta was roasted unshaken in the great Avīci hell.

(About the Avīci hell: In this realm: (1) the denizens of hell are jammed without any space, (2) the hell fires are continuous and cover the whole realm, leaving no space, and (3) the inhabitants have no respite in their suffering. They have to suffer all the time. Thus, because there is no vacant space among the inhabitants, or no cessation as regards the hell fires or suffering, the hell is called the great Avīci hell.)

Narration of Jātakas after Devadatta's Death

After Devadatta was thus swallowed up by the earth, the topic of conversation among the monks was Devadatta's inability to see the Buddha although he had travelled laboriously forty-five yojanas for his purpose. The Buddha said that Devadatta was swallowed by the earth also in one of his former lives and told the story of the elephant Sīlava. When the Bodhisatta was the elephant Sīlava, he put a man who had lost his way on his back and took him to a safe place. Yet the man came back thrice to cut the trunk, and when he went back with the last portion of the trunk he was swallowed up by the earth as soon as he went out of sight of the Bodhisatta. This man, a hunter, named Mittadubbhi became Devadatta. (Sīlava Jātaka, Varuṇa Vagga, Ekaka Nipāta)

Then again the Buddha recounted Khantivādā Jātaka (Pucimanda vagga, Calukka Nipāta) to show how King Kalābu (Devadatta) was gorged by the earth when he wronged the Bodhisatta, Hermit Khantivādi. The Buddha also told the Cūladhammapāla Jātaka (Maṇikuṇḍala Vagga, Pañcaka Nipāta) in which as King Mahāpatāpa (Devadatta) was swallowed by the earth for having wronged his own son, Cūladhammapāla, who was the Bodhisatta.

After the death of Devadatta people were overjoyed. They set up all kinds of flags and banana plants, etc, placed the pots full of water and celebrated their riddance of Devadatta. When this was reported to the Buddha by the monks, He said that in ancient times, too, the death of Devadatta delighted many people. To illustrate His saying, the Buddha recited Mahā Piṅgala Jātaka (Upāhana vagga, Duka Nipāta) in which people rejoiced at the death of the evil King Piṅgala in Vārānasi.

The monks asked the Buddha about the afterlife of Devadatta. The Buddha said that he had landed in the Avīci hell. The monks said: “Glorious Buddha, Devadatta had to suffer much in the present life and now at the end of this life also he has landed in the world of much suffering.”

Then the Buddha said: “Yes, monks, that is true. All beings whether monks or lay men who are unmindful in respect of good deeds have to suffer in the present life and the afterlife.” And the Buddha uttered the following verse.

*Idha tappati pecca tappati pāpakārī ubhayattha tappati.
“Pāpam me katan” ti tappati bhiyyo tappati duggatim gato.*

Monks, the man who does evil has to suffer because of the effect of his evil act. He has to suffer both in the present life and the afterlife. Stricken by his conscience, ‘I have done an evil deed’, he has to grieve in the present life. When he lands in the lower, evil world (after his death), he has to grieve extremely because of the effect of his deed.

By the end of the sermon many beings became sotāpanna-ariyas, etc. The sermon was beneficial to many people.

Chapter 37

STORY OF KING AJĀTASATTU

King Ajātasattu was so called because he was the enemy of his father, King Bimbisāra, even before his birth. (Ajāta (before birth)+sattu (enemy of his father).)

When the Prince was conceived in the womb of Vedelī, the Chief Queen of King Bimbisāra, the Queen strongly desired to drink the blood of the King's right arm. It was hard to fulfil and she considered it inadvisable to tell anyone about it. She dared not express it openly and as a result she became lean, pale and haggard in her physical appearance.

Seeing this change in the Queen, the King asked what was wrong with her. The Queen at first refused to answer but the King pressed for an explanation and at last she revealed the craving that had made her unhappy.

The King was overwhelmed with love and said: "You silly Queen! Why should you think it is hard to satisfy your desire?" Thus reproving her for her reticence, the King sent for a physician and after having his arm cut with a small golden knife, he had the blood taken in a golden cup, mixed it with water and made the Queen drink it.

When the soothsayers heard the news, they predicted that the child in the Queen's womb would become the enemy of the King, and that he would kill his father. On hearing their prediction, the Queen was worried. She did not wish to bear the potential murderer of the King. So she went to the garden to carry out abortion but her attempt was unsuccessful. In spite of her repeated attempts, she could not get rid of her pregnancy. (Later on the garden was named Maddakucchi — the garden where abortion was performed.)

King Bimbisāra inquired why the Queen often went to the garden and when he learnt what she was doing, he said: "We do not know as yet whether the child in your womb is a boy or a girl. Do not try to kill the child because, if you do so, our good reputation will be severely damaged all over Jambudīpa for our cruelty to our own child." He deterred the Queen from doing so and kept her under surveillance. The Queen then decided to kill the child after its birth.

When the child was born, the guards took him to a safe place. The Prince grew up and when he was shown to the Queen, she became deeply attached to him. (She lost all her desire to kill her son.) King Bimbisāra later appointed the Prince his heir-apparent.

(The subsequent association of Ajātasattu with his evil friend Devadatta and his killing of his father to become king have been described in the section on Devadatta.)

From the day he ordered his father to be killed, King Ajātasattu was unable to sleep. As soon as he shut his eyes, he felt like being pierced by hundreds of spears and had dream-like hallucinations about his destiny that kept him shaking and muttering. (This shows that those, who have done much evil, see signs of their impending descent into the lower worlds not only on their death-bed but long before the end of their lives.) The guards asked the King what ailed him but he just said: "Nothing." These nightmarish hallucinations plagued the King and made him reluctant to go to sleep. So every night he gave audience for a long time to keep himself awake. (Dīgha Nikāya, Vol. 1.)

King Ajātasattu adored the evil Devadatta who was a thorn in the side of the Exalted One and so he gave alms lavishly to Devadatta and built for him a monastery in Gayāsīsa, and at the instigation of his teacher he killed his father who was a sotāpanna. In this way, he ruled out the possibility of doing any good deed leading to the Sotāpatti Path and ruined himself most disastrously.

On hearing that Devadatta was gorged by the earth, King Ajātasattu was afraid, lest he should share the fate of his former teacher. He could not indulge in royal pleasure nor could he sleep peacefully. He became tremulous, restless and jittery, like a young elephant pricked with a sharp iron stake, He had visions of the earth cracking, the flames from the Avīci hell coming out, the earth threatening to swallow him up and the custodians of hell making him lie on his back on the red-hot iron floor and poking him with iron stakes. So, trembling like a beaten fowl, King Ajātasattu could not find any support even for a moment nor could he stand firm and steady.

He wanted to see the Buddha, pay respect and ask about his problem but because of the enormity of his evil deed, he dared not go to the Buddha.

Then, when the festival of the planet Kattikā was held in Rājagaha on the full-moon night in the month of Kattikā (November), the whole city was decorated like a celestial city, and brightly illuminated with fire torches and flames. While seated amidst his ministers on the golden throne in the audience hall, King Ajātasattu saw the physician Jīvaka and thought: “I will take Jīvaka as my guide and go to the Buddha. But I should not admit frankly that I dare not go to the Exalted One and tell him (Jīvaka) frankly to take me there. Tactfully, I will extol the beauty of the night and then ask the ministers which real noble sāmana or brāhmana can inspire us with faith and devotion. When the ministers heard my words, they will glorify their respective teachers and the physician Jīvaka will glorify his teacher, the Exalted One. Then I will go and see the Exalted One with Jīvaka as my guide.”

After planning this strategy, King Ajātasattu said:

“(a) Ministers, tonight is so delightful, being free from snow, mist, cloud, Asurinda (an enormous semi-divine being that is supposed to create lunar eclipse) and smoke, the five disturbing things that disturb the beauty of the moon-lit night, or pollute the air. (b) Ministers, tonight is so beautiful, being free from the five elements. (c) Ministers, tonight is so lovely to look at, being free from the five disturbing elements. (d) Ministers, tonight our minds are calm and serene because the night is free from the five disturbing elements. (e) Ministers, tonight should be very memorable since it is free from the five disturbing elements.”

Having thus extolled the full-moon night, the King added:

“Which samaṇa or brāhmana should we see tonight, who can inspire us with faith and devotion?”

By saying this, the King gave a hint to the physician Jīvaka. (a) The King had committed a heinous crime by killing his father, a great patron of the Buddha and a soṭāpanna-ariya at that time, and (b) by supporting Devadatta who did many things harmful to the Buddha. So he dared not go to the Buddha by himself. He knew that for the fulfilment of his desire to see the Buddha he must rely on Jīvaka who had built a monastery for the Buddha and who served the Buddha's medical needs.

Jīvaka did not fail to take his cue from the King. In fact, he knew it but because the assembly included many followers of the six heretical teachers, Jīvaka thought: “As followers of ignorant teachers, they themselves are ignorant, and they do not understand the rules to be observed at a meeting. If I start describing the noble attributes of the Exalted One, they will rise one by one and extol their teachers and then I will never come to the end of my description of the Exalted One's noble attributes. As the teachings of their six heretical teachers do not have substance or anything worthy of note, the King will not be pleased with what they say and he will ask me directly. Then I will tell the King without any distraction about the noble attributes of the Exalted One and take him to the Buddha.” Thus thinking deeply, Jīvaka said nothing despite the King's hint and sat silently.

The ministers, who were the disciples of the six heretical teachers, thought: “Today the King extolled the beauty of the night of the Kattikā full-moon. He really must have the desire to see one of the samaṇas or brāhmanas, to ask questions and hear his sermon. The King will greatly honour the teacher whom he adores and whose sermon he hears. It augurs well for the minister whose teacher becomes the King's teacher.” So each of them was bent on extolling his own teacher and leading the King to him. With this intention the ministers who were disciples of Pūrana Kassapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambala, Pakudha

Kaccāyana, Sañjaya and Nigantha Nāṭaputta extolled their respective teachers. (Read Sāmaññaphala Sutta of the Dīgha Nikāya for their extolling speeches.)

King Ajātasattu had seen the heretical teachers before. When he first saw them, their physical appearance did not, in the least, impress him. On the contrary, he was much disappointed. Now, when he heard the words of his ministers, he felt like a man who sees a very sour and acid fruit brought and put in his hand when, in fact, he wishes to eat a golden coloured, sweet, delicious, ripe mango. He longed to hear the sweet Dhamma concerning the jhāna, supernormal powers, three characteristics of existence, etc. and so when he (in addition to his disappointment with the heretical teachers' physical appearance) heard their followers praising them, he became much dispirited and said nothing.

Although he was displeased with their saying, King Ajātasattu thought: "If I show my anger and have these ministers seized by the neck and turned out of the palace hall, other people will not have the courage to say anything, fearing that the King treats in the same way every one who speaks." So, although he did not like their words, the King did not reproach them and remained silent.

Heroic Words of Jīvaka

King Ajātasattu thought: "Only the ministers whom I do not wish to listen to are talking. Physician Jīvaka, who I wish to hear, is silent like the Garuḷa bird that has swallowed the brain of a nāga. I am so unfortunate!" Then he had an afterthought: "Jīvaka is a disciple, an attendant of the quiet Exalted One. So he himself is quiet and lives in silence like a disciplined ascetic. He will not speak if I do not ask him. So I must act like a man, who when trampled by an elephant, has to clasp the animal's foot."

So thinking, the King said directly:

"Friend Jīvaka, why are you keeping silent? These ministers never tire of glorifying their teachers. Do not you have any teacher like these ministers? Do you have no teacher because you are a commoner without any official post or privileges granted by my father? Or do you have no teacher because of lack of faith?"

Thus the King asked Jīvaka directly, about the reason for his silence. Jīvaka thought: "The King wants me to speak of the attributes of my Teacher. Now, it is not the time for me to remain silent. But it is not proper for me to describe the noble attributes of the Buddha just as these ministers extol their teachers in a posture of reverence to the King." So Jīvaka rose, bowed most respectfully in the direction of the Teacher's residence in Jīvaka's mango-grove, raised his joined hands above his head and said:

"Great King! Do not think that I am the devotee of just a so called, self-styled samaṇa of doubtful characteristics. Certainly, at the time of my teacher's conception in His mother's womb, at the time of His birth, at the time of His renunciation, His attainment of Buddhahood, and His preaching of the Dhammacakka Sutta, the ten thousand universes shook quiveringly. In this and that way, the Exalted One performed miracles of fire and water. In this and that way, He came down to earth from the deva-world of Tāvātimsa. I will tell you about the Exalted One's noble attributes to the best of my ability. Listen to me attentively." With this preamble, Jīvaka went on to give an account of the Buddha.

"Great King, deva among the people! My Teacher, the Possessor of such attributes as Araham, and Sammāsambuddha now lives with one thousand two hundred and fifty monks in the mango-grove monastery that we have donated to him.

"Our Teacher, the Exalted One, is an araham because He possesses the attributes of morality (sīla-guṇa), mental concentration (samādhi-guṇa), wisdom (paññā-guṇa), liberation (vimutti-guṇa) and insight-knowledge of liberation (vimutti-ñāṇa-dassana-guṇa) that make Him worthy of special honour by devas, humans and Brahmās ... He is an Exalted One (Bhagavā) because he possesses sixfold glory. Such good reputation of our Teacher, the Exalted One has spread beyond the highest abode of Bhavagga [in the arūpa or formless worlds].

“I want you, Great King, to see our Teacher, the Exalted One. If you see our Teacher, your mind will certainly become calm and serene.”

Preparations for The Visit to The Buddha

Even as he heard the noble attributes of the Buddha, King Ajātasattu was overwhelmed with five kinds of ecstasy. So, he wished to see the Buddha instantly and knowing that there was no one except Jīvaka who could arrange transport for his visit to the Buddha at that time, he told Jīvaka to go and prepare the elephant transport.

(Herein, there are various kinds of transport, such as horses, chariots, etc., but the elephant transport is the best of all transports. King Ajātasattu decided that he should go to the Supreme Buddha by means of the supreme transport. Horses and chariots are noisy, making their sounds audible in the distance. But the elephant makes no noise although it may not go quickly. The King considered it advisable to go to the quiet and calm Buddha by means of quiet and calm elephants. So he told Jīvaka to harness the elephants.)

Then Physician Jīvaka had five hundred female elephants and the state elephant adorned with all trappings.

The King did not tell him explicitly to prepare the female elephants for transport. But being intelligent, he got the female elephants ready with all equipments. In doing so, he was motivated by the reflection: “The King wants to go and see the Exalted One tonight. But kings have many enemies. If anything untoward happens to the King on the way, people will blame me and say that I lead the King out of the palace at an untimely hour of the night, heedlessly taking advantage of his compliance with my wish. Moreover, they will also blame the Exalted One, saying that the Exalted One preaches, taking advantage of His influence over people without regard for proper time. Therefore, I will make my plan so that the Exalted One and I maybe above reproach and the King may be well-protected.”

Again he thought: “Men are never in fear of women. So I will make the King go happily, surrounded by women.” After having five hundred female elephants adorned with full trappings, he had the five hundred female courtiers dressed as men and instructed them to accompany the King, each armed with swords and spears.

Still another thought occurred to Jīvaka: “On account of his heinous crime of parricide, there is no special good deed for this King Ajātasattu that will contribute to the attainment of the Path and Fruition in his present life. It is customary with the Buddhas to preach only when they see someone credited with extra-ordinarily good deed, which may serve as a support of spiritual progress (upanissaya-paccaya). Now, I will assemble the people. Then the Buddha will preach the Dhamma in view of the former good deed of someone in the assembly, the good deed essential to his spiritual uplift. The sermon will benefit many people.” Instantly, he sent a message to every part of the city, announcing also by the beat of drum, the King's plan to visit the Buddha and hear the Dhamma, and that people are to go along with the King for his security according to their official position.

Then the people thought: “It is said that our King will go and see the Buddha. What kind of Dhamma will He preach? What can we profit by making merry in this planetary festival? We will go to the monastery where the Buddha is going to preach to the King.” So all of them waited for the King on the way with fragrant flowers in their hands.

After having done all the necessary things, Jīvaka told the King that the elephants were ready and that it rested with him to choose the time for his journey.

Ajātasattu's Visit to The Buddha

Then King Ajātasattu mounted the royal elephant and with a female courtier dressed as a man and seated on each of the five hundred female elephants, and with fire-torches lighted, he set out from Rājagaha City with great royal pomp and splendour and went to Jīvaka's mango-grove, which was then the residence of the Buddha.

Herein “great royal pomp and splendour”, may be explained as follows:

King Ajātasattu was the ruler of two countries, viz., Anga and Magadha, each three hundred yojanas in width. He was a great monarch and although no arrangements were made in advance for his visit to the Buddha, (as arranged by Jīvaka) five hundred female courtiers came out instantly dressed as men, with swords suspended from shoulders and with ruby-handled spears in their hands.

(Moreover sixteen thousand female dancers also accompanied the King. Behind those dancers, their attendant elderly women went along on foot.

(Behind the elderly women were the eunuchs who guarded the palace; behind the eunuchs were sixty thousand ministers exquisitely attired in various garments and walking on foot.

(Also walking on foot behind the ministers were about ninety thousand provincial princes, adorned with various ornaments and fully armed like young men possessed of magical powers (vijjādhara).

(Behind the princes were ten thousand brahmins, who, having bathed, smeared themselves with unguent and adorned themselves with golden flowers, etc., wore one hundred kahāpaṇa worth waist garment and donned five thousands kahāpaṇa worth outer robes covering the left shoulder. Raising their right hands and chanting: “May the Great King overcome all dangers!” they went on foot.

(Behind the brahmins were the musicians; behind them were the royal archers; behind them was the elephant-brigade; behind it was a big cavalry; behind it was the chariot-division; behind it was the infantry and behind the infantry were the members of eighteen assemblies dressed and adorned with various ornaments befitting their official position.

(Thus, as instructed by Jivaka, the troops, ministers, etc. were deployed in such a way that the arrow shot from end of the procession could not reach the King. As for him, he walked close by the King, very vigilant to save the King's life promptly in case of emergency.

(The fire-torches were so numerous that they could not be counted by hundreds or thousands. With such royal pomp and splendour the King went to the residence of the Buddha.)

King Ajātasattu's Fright

King Ajātasattu came out of the city and as he approached the mango-grove, he became scared. He trembled with great fear and his hair stood on end.

He was much frightened because the silence in the monastery raised doubt about Jivaka's sincerity. As a matter of fact, Jivaka had told him before that he would have to approach the Buddha silently. So the King had banned music and the musicians had only held their musical instruments during their journey. They had not spoken loudly and they all had travelled showing signs by their hands when necessary.

Now in the grove, not even the sneezing of a monk was to be heard, and kings usually delighted only in places where there was sound. King Ajātasattu became weary and sick of the deep silence and suspicious of Jivaka. He thought: “This Jivaka says that there are one thousand two hundred and fifty monks in his grove. But I don't hear even the sneezing of someone in this place. Jivaka may not be speaking the truth. Perhaps, he has deceived me and taken me out of the city. Perhaps, he wants to seize me and usurp my throne with the help of the army. Certainly, Jivaka is strong enough to match the strength of five elephants. He is also hanging about me and there is no armed attendant near me. Oh! It is all over with me!”

Thus scared, King Ajātasattu was unable even to mask his fear with royal demeanour and he clearly expressed his fear to Jivaka by asking:

“Jivaka! You are not deceiving me are you? You are not handing me over to my enemies, are you? Why is it that among so many monks numbering one thousand two hundred and fifty, there is no sneezing, no coughing and no talking?”

Then Physician Jivaka said:

“Great King, be not afraid. I do not deceive you. I will not hand you over to your enemies. Great King, go ahead. Within the circular hall there are oil lamps burning brightly.”

(Herein Jivaka thought: “The King does not know that I never take life. If I do not console him, he will come to ruin here.” So he consoled the King to allay his fear effectively by telling him twice not to be afraid and assuring him that he was not being deceived.

(Then to make his assuring more weighty, he told the King twice to go forward and said the oil-lamps were burning brightly in the hall. The implication of this last remark was that the illumination in the hall left no doubt about the presence of good people and the absence of insurgents and robbers who always went about in the dark. Jivaka's speech was then deeply meaningful indeed.)

Ajātasattu's Questions on The Advantages of Monastic Life

Then King Ajātasattu went by elephant as far as possible and at the gate of the monastery he dismounted. As soon as he put his feet on the ground, the power and glory of the Buddha pervaded his whole body. He sweated so profusely that he was nearly forced to change his garments. He remembered his parricide and became overwhelmed with fear. So he dared not go direct to the Buddha. Instead, he took Jivaka's hands and like a visitor looking around the monastery, he complimented Jivaka, saying: “You have built this building wonderfully! You have built this building wonderfully!” When they came to the entrance of the circular meeting-hall, the King asked Jivaka where the Buddha was: In fact, it was customary with kings to affect ignorance and ask in spite of their knowledge.

Then Jivaka thought: “The King is like a man who stands on earth and asks where the earth is; like a man who looks up to the sky and asks where the sun and the moon are; like a man who stands at the foot of Mount Meru and asks where Mount Meru is. I will now show him the Buddha.” So Jivaka raised his joined hands towards the Buddha and said: “Great King, that person seated before the monks, leaning against the middle pillar and facing east is the Exalted One.”

Then King Ajātasattu approached the Buddha and paid his respect. Standing at a place, he looked again and again at the monks who were serene and dignified like a very clear lake, dead silent without any coughing or sneezing, their eyes calmly fixed on the Buddha without casting a single glance at the gorgeous gathering of the King and his people.

The King marvelled and exclaimed:

“The monks are so serene. May my son, Prince Udayabhadda, have such serenity!”

(Herein King Ajātasattu's exclamation should not give one the impression that he wanted his son to lead a monastic life and become serene. In fact, at the sight of the monks, he became clear in his consciousness and remembered his son. Naturally, getting an object that is hard to come by or seeing something marvellous reminds one of one's beloved relatives or friends. The King uttered the above words because he remembered his son (and not because he wanted to have his son ordained).

(In another sense, his exclamation was due to his worry about his son and his desire for the Prince's serenity. For he thought: “The day will come when my son, seeing that I am still young, asks me where his grandfather is. If he comes to know somehow or other that his grandfather was killed by his father, he will take it into his head to kill me and become king.”

(In spite of his worry about his son and his desire to make the Prince serene, the King was destined to be killed by his own son. In the lineage of King Ajātasattu there were five cases of parricide: (1) Prince Ajātasattu killed his father, King Bimbisāra, (2) Prince Udaya killed his father, King Ajātasattu, (3) Prince Mahāmuṇḍika killed his father, King Udaya, (4) Prince Anuruddha killed his father Mahāmuṇḍika, and (5) Prince Nāgadāsa killed his father, King Anuruddha. Then the people of the country unanimously resolved to have nothing to do with the king who disgraced their lineage and made away with King Nāgadāsa.)

Before the King made his exclamation, the Buddha had divined the thought of King Ajātasattu as he stood in silence before Him. The Buddha knew that the King dared not speak to Him, that he remembered his son as he looked again and again at the monks and that unless He broke the ice, he would not have the courage to say anything. So deciding to speak first, the Buddha said just after the King's exclamation.

“O King! Your mind is now with your beloved one.”

Then King Ajātasattu thought: “Oh! Marvellous indeed is the greatness of the Exalted One! There is no one equal to me in having wronged the Exalted One. I killed (my father) the greatest supporter who was an ariya; donor of the Buddha. Not only that, misguided by Devadatta, I sent assassins to kill the Buddha. Perhaps, Devadatta thought he had my support when he rolled the rock from the Gijjhakuta hill to kill the Buddha. I have done so much evil and yet now the Buddha has started the conversation with me. The Buddha indeed firmly possesses the tādi attribute in terms of five characteristics. Therefore, we will never ignore such kind of Exalted One and never seek refuge (or a teacher) elsewhere.”

(The five tādi characteristics are (1) equanimity without any love or hatred in the vicissitudes (lokādhamma) whether desirable (iṭṭha) or undesirable (aniṭṭha) of life, (2) repudiation of defilements; (3) having crossed over the current of samsāra; (4) freedom from lust, etc.; (5) possession of morality, faith, etc. that makes him worthy of being pointed out as a man of moral integrity, faith, etc. (The Mahāniddeśa contains its elaboration).

(Alternatively, (1) the ability to have desirable perception (iṭṭha-saññā) at will, in regard to undesirable (aniṭṭha) beings or phenomena; (2) the ability to have undesirable perception (aniṭṭha-saññā) at will, with regard to desirable (iṭṭha) beings and phenomena; (3) the ability to have desirable perception at will, in regard to both desirable and undesirable beings and phenomena: (4) the ability to have undesirable perception at will, in regard to both desirable and undesirable beings and phenomena and (5) the ability to have equanimity at will, in respect of both the pleasant and undesirable beings and phenomena. These five Noble Powers (ariyiddha) are the five tādi-characteristics.

— Sīlakkhandha Abhinava Tikā, Vol. II. —

So thinking, he was much delighted and in response to the Buddha's remark, he said:

“Glorious Buddha, I love my son, Prince Udayabhadda, dearly. May my son, Prince Udayabhadda, have the same serenity that the monks now have.”

King Ajātasattu reflected: “If after paying respect to the Exalted One, I go to the monks, here and there, and pay respect to them, I will have turned my back to the Exalted One and that will mean irreverence to Him on my part. Certainly, a man, who, after paying respect to the king, goes to the crown prince and pays respect, show lack of respect for the king.” So after paying respect the Buddha, the King bowed to the monks with both hands raised from the place where he was standing and sat down at a proper place.

Then King Ajātasattu said:

“Glorious Buddha, if You permit me to ask, I would like to ask You a few questions about a certain thing.”

The Buddha said:

“Great King, You may ask Me about anything you like,” thereby extending to the King the invitation of the Omniscient Buddhas.

(Note: Two kinds of invitation.)

Invitation of questions is of two kinds: (1) the invitation by Omniscient Buddhas and (2) the invitation by their disciples.

When someone wants to ask an Omniscient Buddha about something, the Buddha says confidently and without any reservation: “Ask me about anything you like. I will answer all your questions thoroughly.” This kind of invitation is made only by Buddhas and the intellectually mature Bodhisattas.

As for their disciples, they do not say “Ask me about anything,” but they say with reservation: “I will answer your question if I can, only after I have heard it.”

On being thus invited by the Buddha in the manner of Omniscient Buddhas, King Ajātasattu became much delighted and enthusiastic and he asked the following questions:

“Glorious Buddha, there are many skilled occupations and craftsmen. They belong to warriors riding elephants, warriors riding horses, warriors riding chariots, archers, flag-bearers, military strategists, commandos who slip behind the lines of the opposing army and cut off the enemies' heads, princes distinguished in fighting, daredevils who make speedy attacks on the enemy, warriors who are valiant like bull-elephants, very brave warriors, warriors clad in armour, trustworthy servants, cooks, barbers, those who bathe other people, butlers, flower stringers, laundry workers, weavers, maker of reed mat walls, potters, arithmeticians, and those who count by their fingers; besides these, there are many other similar crafts-men. These people live long, profiting by their skills. By means of their skills they make themselves, their parents, their wives and children and their friends comfortable and vigorous. Moreover, they give alms to monks and brahmins so as to reborn in the deva-world in their afterlife.”

“Exalted Buddha, can one point out the benefits of a monastic life like those of skilled occupations, benefits which one can realize by himself in the present life?”

Then the Buddha thought: “Nowhere at this place are many princes and ministers who are the followers of heretical teachers, those who are outside the pale of My Teaching. If I give my sermon in two parts, showing the impurity of their teachers' doctrines (kaṇha-pakkha) in the first part and the purity of My doctrine (sukka-pakkha) in the second part, these people will blame Me, saying that I talk only about the doctrinal conflicts and controversies of the monks from the time of the arrival of their King who has come here with great effort to hear the Dhamma. As a result, they will not hear the Dhamma respectfully. If the King himself talks about the doctrine of the heretics, the people will not blame Me. They will let Me say what I like. In fact, people naturally follow the king (issarānuvattako hi loko). Now I will make it the King's responsibility to describe the teaching of the heretics.” Then the Buddha asked the King if he remembered having put the question to the other monks and brahmins.

The King said that he did and the Buddha asked him how they had answered the question and urged him to state their answer if he did not mind it. The King said: “Sir! I do not mind doing so in a place where the Exalted One or a man like the Exalted One is sitting.”

(What is implicit here in the King's reply is this: It is troublesome or hard to tell a person pretentious to be wise about anything because he is apt to criticize every sentence and every word. The real wise man, however, extols the speech that he hears if it is flawless and he corrects the language, sentences and words if there are flaws in the speech. The Buddha has no peer in the world in respect of real wisdom. Hence the King's reply as mentioned above.)

Thus urged by the Buddha to recount the answers given by the heretical teachers, the King told Him how he once approached the six heretical teachers, viz., Pūraṇa Kassapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambala, Pakudha Kaccāyana, Nigantha Nāṭaputta and Sañjaya Belatthaputta and asked them about the advantages of monkhood in the present life. The six teachers described only their respective doctrines like a man, who being asked about a mango tree, describes a jack fruit tree, or vice versa. The answers were at variance with the question but, although the King was disappointed with the heretical teachers, he considered it inadvisable for a King like him to rebuke such religious persons as monks and brahmins in his country. So he neither accepted nor rejected their sayings. Nor did he show his displeasure by word of mouth. Instead, he got up and went back without taking note of their words and now he asked the Buddha about the present advantages of a monastic life.

Then the Buddha gave an elaborate talk on the advantages of monkhood in the present life. For example, (1) a man-slave was honoured by the king after his ordination; (2) a farmer who paid taxes to the king was honoured by the latter after he became a monk. (3) To show the higher advantages of monkhood, the Buddha referred to the life of a man of either low or high caste who had heard His Teaching, inspired with faith, he became a monk and practiced the (a) lower morality, (b) medium morality and (c) higher morality. Then he guarded his senses, developed mindfulness, easily contented, rejected hindrances; he gained the first jhāna, (4) the second jhāna, (5) the third jhāna and (6) the fourth jhāna. (7-14) Still making further progress, he attained insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa), psychic powers (manomayidhi-ñāṇa), supernatural powers (iddhividha-ñāṇa), the divine-ear (dibbasota-ñāṇa), penetrative knowledge of the mind of others (cetopariya-ñāṇa), remembrance of former existences (pubbenivāsānussati-ñāṇa), knowledge of the dying and reappearance of other beings (cutupapata-ñāṇa) and extinction of all mental intoxicants (āsavakkhaya-ñāṇa or arahatta-magga-ñāṇa). Thus, the monk gained as the present advantages of his sacred life the eight kinds of progressively higher, extraordinary knowledge up to arahatship.

(For details, read the Sāmaññaphala Sutta of the Dīgha-Nikāya.)

Refuge sought by Ajātasattu

When the Buddha thus described in detail the present advantages of monkhood with arahatship as its apex, King Ajātasattu followed the whole talk attentively, expressing his appreciation verbally from time to time. He thought: “In the past, I did not ask many monks and brahmins about these matters but like a man who pounds the husks of grain, I have never received any thing substantial. Marvellous indeed is the greatness of the Exalted Buddha! He has answered these questions, enlightening me very much as if with the brilliance of a thousand oil-lamps. For a long time, ignorance has deceived me, making me blind to the greatness and power of the Exalted One.”

Overwhelmed with ecstasy arising from the contemplation of the Buddha's attributes, the King clearly showed his faith in the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha in the following words:

“Venerable Sir, very delightful indeed is the Teaching! Just as in the world what has been upside down is set right, just as what has been covered is uncovered, just as a man who has lost his way is shown the right way, just as torches are lighted in order that those who have eye-sights may see various visual forms in the darkness, so also, You have in many ways made the Dhamma very clear to me. Venerable Sir! I seek refuge in the Exalted One, the Dhamma and the Sangha. Let the Exalted One regard me, from today, as a lay devotee established in saraṇa-gamana for life.

“Venerable Sir! I am overwhelmed with guilt stemming from foolishness, confusion and ignorance. For the sake of kingly pleasures, I have killed my father, a great monarch who practised justice and ruled righteously. Let the Exalted One forgive me for the offence, regarding it as an offence that will make me mindful and vigilant in future.”

Thus the King sought refuge in the Buddha, etc. and apologized for his offence. Then the Buddha said:

“O King! You are indeed overwhelmed with guilt arising from your foolishness, confusion and ignorance. You have killed your father, the great monarch who practised justice and ruled righteously. But we forgive you that offence because you admit it and make amends for it. If a man admits his offence, atones for it accordingly and guards himself against it in future, then such atonement and self-restraint mean spiritual progress under the system of My Teaching.”

Then King Ajātasattu said:

“Very well, Venerable Sir! We will now go. We have many things to do.” The Buddha replied: “O King! You may go as you wish.” The King accepted the Buddha's Teaching with much pleasure, extolled it delightedly, rose from his seat, paid respect and went away.

Note on *Saraṇa-gaṃana

Herein note on Saraṇa-gaṃana will be mentioned briefly.

There are seven points regarding Saraṇa-gaṃana:

- (a) Saraṇa (Refuge),
- (b) Saraṇa-gaṃana (Refuge taking or Refuge consciousness),
- (c) Person established in Saraṇa-gaṃana,
- (d) Forms of Saraṇa-gaṃana,
- (e) Fruit of Saraṇa-gaṃana,
- (f) Contamination of Saraṇa-gaṃana, and
- (g) Destruction of Saraṇa-gaṃana.

(a) Saraṇa (Refuge).

The Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha are the threefold Saraṇa (Refuge) because those, who seek its protection, overcome their fear, alarm, physical and mental suffering and various miseries in the lower worlds after death. In other words, the Buddha helps beings overcome various perils by contributing to their welfare and averting their misfortunes. So does the Dhamma by making beings free from hardships of life and consoling them. And so does the Sangha by making them gain a great benefit even from a few good acts. Hence the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha constitute the real threefold Refuge that ensures beings freedom from all suffering.

(b) Saraṇa-gaṃana (Refuge taking or Refuge consciousness)

Great wholesome consciousness (mahākusala-citta) that makes one inclined for the Three Jewels by removing defiling unwholesome mental states through devotion and veneration to the Three Jewels, Great Consciousness of Action (mahākiriya-citta) regarding the arahats, and Path Consciousness (maggacitta) regarding the Noble Ones established in the Path, maggatṭha ariyas. All these forms of consciousness are called saraṇa-gaṃana. Conviction that the Three Jewels are the real factors that eliminate fear and suffering by means of such consciousness is saraṇa-gaṃana. This is a definition.

(c) Person established in *Saraṇa-gaṃana

A person who has the consciousness described above is one who is established in the threefold Refuge. Thus we should first understand the three aspects (1) Saraṇa (2) Saraṇa-gaṃana and (3) Person established in Saraṇa-gaṃana.

(d) Forms of *Saraṇa-gaṃana

It is of two forms: (1) supramundane and (2) mundane.

(1) Supramundane saraṇa-gaṃana is implicit by way of fulfilment of function in a single thought-moment when the ariyas realize the Four Truths and attain the Paths, thereby overcoming all defilements and focusing their minds on Nibbāna. (By this is meant as follows: supramundane saraṇa-gaṃana is Path-consciousness. Path-consciousness is focused on Nibbāna, and this means uprooting the defilements that make saraṇa-gaṃana impure. So, although the Path-consciousness arises from the focus not on the Three Jewels but on Nibbāna, the fulfilment of its function involves the recognition of the Three Jewels as the real Refuge. In other words, at the moment of Path-consciousness, one is also possessed of the supramundane saraṇa-gaṃana. For example, it is said that one knows the Four Truths at the moment of Path-consciousness. Having Nibbāna as its object, the Path-consciousness is concerned only with the truth about the end of suffering. But it also roots out ignorance that makes us blind to the Four Truths. Thus although the ariya focuses his mind only on Nibbāna, he becomes aware of the three other Truths that do not directly concern Nibbāna, viz., the Truths about Suffering, the Cause of suffering and the Way to the Cessation of Suffering.)

(2) The mundane saraṇa-gamana arises in an ordinary person (worldling) when he contemplates the attributes of the Buddha, the Dhamma and Sangha in the effort to remove the depravities (upakkilesa) that defile saraṇa-gamana. Basically this saraṇa-gamana means faith in the Buddha, etc. or Right View (Sammā-diṭṭhi) based on faith or a mental factor of wisdom (paññā-cetasika). As one of the ten meritorious actions (puñña-kiriya), it is called Diṭṭhijukamma.

Here faith too is termed saraṇa-gamana and so is the faith and wisdom combined. Mundane consciousness, with regard to the Threefold Refuge, is of two kinds: intelligent consciousness (ñāṇa-sampayutta saraṇa-gamana) and unintelligent consciousness (ñāṇa-vippayutta saraṇa-gamana). The former is the consciousness of the children who recite the Refuge-formula at the advice of their parents. Here it is only a matter of faith (saddhā-cetasika). The intelligent saraṇa-gamana is based on the knowledge of the noble characteristics of the Three Jewels and here faith and wisdom are jointly mentioned as saraṇa-gamana because they are easily felt. The actual saraṇa-gamana however, is the consciousness that is led by faith and wisdom.

Again, the mundane saraṇa-gamana is of four kinds:

- (1) Attasanniyyātana-saraṇa-gamana = saraṇa-gamana by giving up oneself to the Three Jewels;
- (2) Tapparāyana-saraṇa-gamana = saraṇa-gamana by finding one's support in the Three Jewels;
- (3) Sissabhāv'ūpa-gamana saraṇa-gamana = saraṇa-gamana by becoming a pupil of the Three Jewels; and
- (4) Panipātta saraṇa-gamana = saraṇa-gamana by showing great reverence to the Three Jewels.

Of these four:

- (1) Giving up oneself to the Three Jewels involves declaration as follows: "From today onwards I give up myself to the Buddha; I give up myself to the Dhamma; I give up myself to the Sangha."
- (2) Finding one's support in the Three Jewels involves supplication as follows: "From today onwards kindly recognize me as one who finds support in the Buddha, in the Dhamma and in the Sangha."
- (3) Becoming a pupil of the Three Jewels involves supplication as follows: "From today onwards, kindly recognize me as a residential pupil (antevāsika) of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha."

(In the Mahājanaka Jātaka, the Bodhisatta pointed out lifeless mango tree bearing fruit and the other mango tree bearing no fruit as his teachers because they instructed him for his welfare. Therefore, one speak of the Dhamma as one's teacher and speak of oneself as its pupil.)

- (4) Showing great reverence to the Three Jewels involves supplication as follows: "From today onwards kindly recognize me as one who worships, welcomes, raises one's hands in adoration, venerates only the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha."

One who adopts any of these four modes of seeking refuge is one who fulfils one's saraṇa-gamana.

Alternatively,

- (1) declaration, uttering: "I give up myself to the Buddha, to the Dhamma, and to the Sangha," or "I offer my life to the Three Jewels," or "I have offered my body to the Three Jewels," or "I have offered my life to the Three Jewels," or "I am aware of my approach to the Buddha as my refuge till the end of my life, ... to the Dhamma ... and ... to the Sangha ... ," or "the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Sangha are my refuge", all these utterances of declaration constitute attasanniyyā-saraṇa-gamana.

- (2) In the story of Pippali, a youth who later became the well-known Mahā Kassapa, donned the robe by himself and set out from his brahmin village of Mahā Titttha to visit the Buddha. On his way, he saw the Buddha at the foot of the banyan tree called Bahu-puttaka between Rājagaha and Nālanda. The Buddha was waiting for him from a distance of three gavutas. As soon as Pippali saw the Buddha, he decided that “this noble ascetic must be the satthā (teacher) of devas and humans, the sugata (good wayfarer) who has really attained Nibbāna through excellent practice, and the Sammāsambuddha (Perfectly Self-Enlightened One) who has rightly penetrated the right doctrines by Himself. Then he took refuge in the Buddha by uttering: “If I am to see the satthā of devas and humans, I will see only You. If I am to see the sugata, I will see only You. If I am to see the Sammāsambuddha, I will see only You. (i.e. I will see no other person with my eye of wisdom as my Satthā, Sugata, and Sammāsambuddha. I will see only You as my Satthā, Sugata, and Sammāsambuddha.)” His utterances indeed amounted to the third mode of taking refuge which is sissabhāv'ūpa-gamana saraṇa-gamana.
- (3) The Saraṇa-gamana that is marked by the desire to scale protection and shelter in the Three Jewels, as in the case of the ogre Ālāvaka, the deva kings, Hemavata and Sātāgira, is termed Tapparāyana-saraṇa-gamana.
- (4) In the Brahmāyu Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya, after the Buddha had answered the eight question put by the Brahmin Brahmāyu, the latter was much impressed and so after rising, he bowed his head to the feet of the Buddha. He also sucked the Buddha's feet with his mouth and massaged them vigorously, saying: “O Gotama! I am the Brahmin Brahmāyu” and thus mentioning his name.

This gesture of the Brahmin Brahmāyu showing deep reverence for the Three Jewels is Panipata saraṇa-gamana.

In short, there is no uniform gesture for the four kinds of saraṇa-gamana. There are many kinds of bodily and verbal actions by which one can show reverence for the Three Jewels. The Commentary distinguished between four kinds of saraṇa-gamana explains the four kinds of reverences.

Four Kinds of Reverence (Panipāta)

Reverence may be of four kinds, reverence for relatives, reverence from fear, reverence for the teacher and reverence for one who, as one of the Three Jewels or Refuges, is worthy of excellent offering.

The saraṇa-gamana necessarily presupposes the fourth kind of reverence. It has nothing to do with the others.

Indeed reverence with faith is essential to saraṇa-gamana. This consciousness erodes only when there is reverence for the bogus Buddha, bogus Dhamma and bogus Sangha in place of three genuine Jewels.

- (1) So a Sakyan or a Koliyan prince has no saraṇa-gamana if he reveres the Buddha, regarding the Buddha as a senior member of their family.
- (2) Neither is it saraṇa-gamana, if a man reveres the Buddha out of fear that as a powerful teacher honoured by kings, the Buddha might do harm to him if he showed no respect.
- (3) A man may remember having learnt (some craft) from the Buddha when He was still a Bodhisatta and now he reveres the Buddha, regarding Him as his former teacher. Another man may have heard the Buddha's sermon on, say, the apportionment of one's wealth, i.e., a wise person should spend one fourth of his income on enjoying life, two fourths (one half) to be invested in business, and the remaining one fourth to be saved for any emergency. So he looks up to the Buddha as his teacher and reveres Him for the advice with regard to his material welfare. Now neither of these two men's reverence has anything to do with saraṇa-gamana.
- (4) But a certain man reveres the Buddha, believing that He was the real Jewel, the real Refuge, worthy of alms given as foundations for welfare hereafter. Only this man has saraṇa-gamana.

For a layman or a laywoman who seeks refuge in the Buddha, recognizing the Buddha as a being worthy of excellent offering (aggadakkhiṇeyya-puggala), his or her saraṇa-gamana is not adversely affected even though he reveres a relative of alien, heretical monastic Order, to say nothing of revering a non-heretical monk or a layman in his family. So also a layman or a laywoman who has sought refuge in the Buddha will not have his or her vow damaged by revering the king out of fear. The same is true in the case of a layman paying respect to a heretic who happens to be his former teacher.

(e) Fruit of Saraṇa-gamana

The chief immediate benefits of supramundane saraṇa-gamana are the four Fruitions of the Path gained by ariyas. The subsequent benefit is extinction of samsāra. In other words, it is the total extinction of the illusions of permanence, pleasantness and substantiality as regards the impermanent, unpleasant and insubstantial psychophysical phenomena, etc., are the benefits of mundane saraṇa-gamana.

(f) Contamination of Saraṇa-gamana

Mundane saraṇa-gamana gets debased owing to ignorance, doubt and misconceptions about the noble attributes of the Three Jewels. It is not bright, vast and great. The supramundane saraṇa-gamana is free from corruption. It is always clean and pure.

(g) Destruction of Saraṇa-gamana

Supramundane Saraṇa-gamana can never be destroyed. The ariya who is established in it does not point out as his or her teacher anyone other than the Three Refuges even in the next life. It is only the mundane saraṇa-gamana that tends to come to destruction.

Its destruction is of two kinds: (1) disastrous destruction and (2) non-disastrous destruction. The destruction is disastrous when one reveres and seeks refuge in other heretical teachers in one of the ways described above, thereby giving rise to craving, wrong belief, etc. When the destruction follows death, it is not disastrous because it does not involve doing any evil. (The vow taken by Buddhists nowadays as regards taking refuge in the Buddha, etc. is mundane. Like the observance of the moral precepts, its duration is not fixed and it ends only with death. This end is not disastrous because it does not involve craving, wrong belief and other unwholesome states of consciousness.)

Note on Upāsaka (Lay-devotee)

(Sutta Silakkhan the Commentary)

Some brief note on upāsaka may be mentioned as follows:

- (1) Definition of an upāsaka
- (2) Function of an upāsaka
- (3) Morality of an upāsaka
- (4) Livelihood an upāsaka
- (5) Failure of an upāsaka
- (6) Success of an upāsaka

These six aspects should be understood.

(a) Definition of An Upāsaka

An upāsaka is he who seeks refuge in the Three Jewels, irrespective of his birth, high or low. (Relevant examples contained the Saṃyutta Nikāya.)

(b) Function of An Upāsaka

His function is to follow the Three Jewels, namely, the Buddha, the Dhamma and Sangha. (Upāsatiṭṭhi upāsako — He follows the Three Jewels; therefore he is upāsaka. Upāsako — a devotee of the Triple Gem).

(c) Morality of An Upāsaka

His morality is the observance of the Five Moral Precepts. (Relevant examples contained in the Saṃyutta Nikāya.)

(d) Livelihood of An Upāsaka

His livelihood excludes the five kinds of wrong trades: (1) trade in arms, (2) trade in human beings, (3) trade in meat and fish, (4) trade in alcohol, and (5) trade in poison. Avoiding these five wrong trades, he earns his living righteously by tending cattle, buying and selling goods and farming.

(e) Failure of An Upāsaka

His failure lies in the destruction of his observance of the Five Precepts and right livelihood. (If his observance of the precept is impaired or if he earns his living by taking up one of the five wrong trades, his life as an upāsaka is ruined.) Moreover, there are five things that make his life rough, nasty and disgusting: (1) lack of faith, (2) lack of morality, (3) performance of and indulgence in worldly rites and rituals with regard to what has been seen, heard or experienced as conceived by the foolish and the ignorant, (4) disbelief in the Law of Kamma and belief in rituals, and (5) performance of good deeds in the Order of the Buddha only after seeking recipients in the sects of the heretics. (These five deeds lead an upāsaka to his failure.) (Examples in the Aṅguttara Nikāya.)

(f) Success of An Upāsaka

His success consists in the fulfilment of his morality and right livelihood. (He is an upāsaka as long as his morality and right livelihood remain intact.) Besides, if he maintains the following five practices, he is said to be successful as an upāsaka. The five practices are: (1) faith that makes one an upāsaka comparable to a jewel, an upāsaka comparable to a paduma lotus, and an upāsaka comparable to a puṇḍarika lotus; (2) unimpaired morality; (3) non-indulgence in earthly rituals; (4) belief in one's own deeds good and bad; (5) performance of good deeds in the Order of the Buddha before seeking recipients in the systems of the heretics. These five lead to an upāsaka to his success. (Examples in the Aṅguttara Nikāya.)

King Ajātasattu's Loss and Gain

Not long after the King's Ajātasattu's departure the Buddha addressed the monks: "Monks, the King has destroyed his own position. Monks, if King Ajātasattu had not killed his father, King Bimbisāra, the righteous monarch, who ruled his kingdom lawfully, the Sotāpatti Path-Wisdom would have occurred to him on the spot. (He would have become a sotāpanna-ariya.)"

The Buddha added: "Monks, if he had not put his father to death, he would have attained the Sotāpatti Path while seated here as he heard this Sāmañña-phala Sutta. But now, on account of his association with his wicked friend, his potentiality to attain that Path has been injured. Nevertheless, since he has taken refuge in the Triple Gem and since his refuge which is my threefold Teaching is supreme, he may be compared to a man who, after having been sentenced to death for murder, escapes the death penalty by getting good support and by giving just a handful of flowers (as a small fine). Although he ought to suffer in the Avīci hell for his heinous crime of parricide, he will suffer only in the Lohakumbhī hell after his death, for he has the good support in My Teaching. He will land in that hell and remain there for thirty thousand years and come up and stay on the surface for thirty thousand years. Then (after sixty thousand years) he will be released from Lohakumbhī.

(Herein Ajātasattu's gain will be mentioned according to the Commentary. One may asked: "Had he benefited from his hearing of the Sāmañña-phala Sutta?")

The answer is: Yes, he had, and his benefit is enormous. Since the moment of his parricide he had known no sleep, by day or by night, for there appeared to him signs of his woeful rebirth. Only after listening to the sweet and soothing Sāmañña-phala Sutta, he could sleep well whether it was day or night. And he lavishly honoured the Three Jewels. No other worldling had faith (pothujjanika-saddhā) that was equal to Ajātasattu's. (Sound sleep, merit accrued from his honour done to the Triple Gem, possession of unique faith of a worldling, etc. were his gain that was realised in his present life. His afterlife benefit would be his attainment of Parinibbāna after becoming a Paccekabuddha, by the name of Vijitāvī.)

Note on Ajātasattu's Enlightenment

If it is true that King Ajātasattu could have gained the Sotāpatti-Path Knowledge instantly but for his parricide, how can he become a Pacceka Buddha and attain Parinibbāna? If it is true that he will become a Paccekabuddha and attain Parinibbāna, how could he have gained the state of a sotāpanna? Enlightenment of a Paccekabuddha consists in the fulfilment of five things: (1) manussatta (a human life), (2) liṅga-sampatti (being a male), (3) vigatāsava-dassana (discernment leading to freedom from āsavas), (4) adhikāra (service), and (5) chandatā (aspiration). Enlightenment of a disciple requires only two factors: (1) adhikāra and (2) chandatā. As regards the duration of time for their fulfilment of pāramīs, it takes two asaṅkhyeyyas and a hundred thousand aeons for the Enlightenment of a Paccekabuddha, one asaṅkhyeyya and a hundred thousand aeons for that of a Disciple. In realising the Four Truths, the former has no teacher while the latter has. For these reasons, are not the two kinds of Enlightenment basically different from each other?

The answer is that they cannot be different. For Ajātasattu will fulfil whatever is necessary for the attainment of Enlightenment as a Paccekabuddha, only after suffering for sixty thousand years in the Lohakumbhī hell. Indeed those who seek Enlightenment as a Disciple will gain it as Paccekabuddhas, if circumstances are not favourable for them to become Disciples. For they must have resolved to gain release as Paccekabuddhas. (This is the answer given by the first school of teachers. According to them, although the King had the potential for gaining release as a disciple, he could not do so in the present life because of his association with his evil friend, Devadatta, which made circumstances unfavourable and damaged the prospects for his attainment of sotāpatti-magga. But later on he will fulfil everything that will contribute to his attainment of Paccekabuddhahood and he will gain release.)

But according to other teachers, Ajātasattu had resolved to gain only the Enlightenment as a Paccekabuddha. But in the absence of any definite prediction of a Buddha, even those who have performed good deeds for Paccekabuddhahood cannot gain maturity of their Enlightenment in their capacity as Paccekabuddhas; instead they will attain Enlightenment as disciples in the presence of a Buddha. Hence the Buddha said: "Monks, if he had not put his father to death, he would have attained Sotāpatti Path while being seated here as he heard this Sāmañña-phala Sutta."

Of the three kinds of future personages, namely, the future Buddha, the future Paccekabuddha and the future Disciple, only the future Buddha is free from the pañcānantariya-kamma; the other two future Ones are not. That is true. Though Devadatta had been assured (though he had received the definite prediction) that he would become a Paccekabuddha, because of his grudge that he had long harboured, he committed the ānantariya-kamma by creating schism (saṅghabhedaka-kamma) and causing bloodshed to the Buddha (lohit'uppādaka-kamma) which were most serious crimes. Taking these into consideration, it may be understood that future Paccekabuddhas and future Disciples are not so invulnerable. It may also be understood therefore that King Ajātasattu missed his opportunity to gain Sotāpatti Knowledge in the present life because of his parricide and that he will later on become a Paccekabuddha by the name of Vijitāvī in accordance with the law of Paccekabuddha Enlightenment (Paccekabuddha-Bodhi Niyāma). This is the view of the other teachers. Choose between these two views what you think is more reasonable. (Exposition on the Sāmañña-phala Sutta, Sīlakhandha Tika, Vol. II)

End of the Story of Ajātasattu

Chapter 38

BUDDHA'S BRAHMIN PARENTS IN HIS PREVIOUS EXISTENCE

On one occasion, after residing in Sāvatti for the rains retreat, the Buddha set out on a journey, taking into consideration the opportunities that would be provided by it, such as promoting His health, prescribing fresh rules of conduct for the Order of Bhikkhus, taming (through dialogues and discourses) those who deserved to be tamed, discoursing on the Birth Stories of Himself wherever the situation was appropriate. Travelling in stages, the Buddha arrived at Sāketa at evening and entered the Añjana forest (for the night's stay).

On hearing the news of the arrival of the Buddha, the townsfolk of Sāketa thought that it was not proper to go and visit Him at night. They waited till the next morning, then, taking flowers, perfumes and other offerings with them, they approached the Buddha, and making their obeisance, and exchanging courteous words of greeting with Him, and remained there till it was time for Him to go on the daily alms-round.

When it was time for going on the alms-round, the Buddha, in the company of bhikkhus, entered Sāketa. At that time, a wealthy brahmin of Sāketa was leaving the town when he saw the Buddha near the town's gate. On seeing Him, the brahmin felt an intense filial love for Him and weeping with joy and uttering: "O my son, I have not seen You for such a long time!" he drew near to Him.

Even while the brahmin was drawing near Him, the Buddha said to the bhikkhus: "Bhikkhus, let Brahmin Sāketa alone: let him do as he pleases." And as a mother cow would treat her own calf, the Brahmin viewed the Buddha at close range from the front, from the back, and from the left side and from the right side, Then embracing Him, he said: "Oh, my son! my son! so long have I not seen You! so long have You been away!"

(It may be noted here that if the Brahmin were to be restrained from these outpourings of affection, he would not be able to contain the intense feeling and probably die of heart-break.)

Brahmin Sāketa said to the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, I am able to offer food to the Bhagavā and the company of bhikkhus. May the Bhagavā, out of compassion, do me the favour of accepting the offering." The Buddha indicated His consent by remaining silent. The Brahmin led the way to his place holding the Buddha's alms-bowl in his hands. He sent word to his wife at home to say: "My son is coming! spread out a suitable place for His stay." The wife did as she was told by her husband and stood all agog to receive the Buddha. As she saw the Buddha nearing her house, she went to Him, and saying: "My son, it is a long time that I have not seen You", she fondled the Buddha's feet and wept with joy. She requested the Buddha to proceed to her home where they (brahmin couple) respectfully offered the Buddha and His company of bhikkhus with food. After He had finished His meal, the Brahmin took the alms-bowl and washed it himself.

The Buddha then discoursed to the brahmin couple in a way fitting to them and at the end of the discourse they became Stream-Enterers, having become ariyas. They requested the Buddha: "May the Bhagavā and his company of bhikkhus, during their sojourn at Sāketa, receive offering of alms-food only at our home." The Buddha replied: "brahmin couple, it is not the custom for Buddhas to have a permanent place to receive alms-food as you request." Thereupon, the brahmin couple requested the Buddha: "In that case, Venerable Sir, may the Bhagavā and his company of bhikkhus go for alms (elsewhere) but take the meals at our home only, and go back to the monastery after giving us some talk on the Dhamma." To this request the Buddha consented as a special favour.

From that time, the Brahmin came to be called by the people as 'the Buddha's father' and the wife of the Brahmin as 'the Buddha's mother'. The clan of Brahmin Sāketa also earned the name of 'the Buddha's clan'.

Thereupon, the Venerable Ānanda asked the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, I know your parentage (as Queen Mahā Māyā Devī and King Suddhodāna) and yet why is it that the Brahmin Sāketa and his wife are called the Buddha's parents?" And the Buddha explained: "Ānanda, this brahmin couple had been my parents in the past for five hundred continuous existences; (besides), they had been my elder uncle and elder aunt (i.e., elder brother to the Bodhisatta's father and elder sister to the Bodhisatta's mother for five hundred continuous existences; they had also been my younger uncle and younger aunt (i.e., younger brother to the Bodhisatta's father and younger sister to the Bodhisatta's mother) for five hundred continuous existences. The brahmin couple call Me their son due to the extraordinary affection that had existed in the past." The Buddha then uttered this stanza.

*Pubbeva sannivāsena paccuppaññāhitena vā
evam taṃ jāyate pemaṃ uppalamva yathodake.*

Due to having lived together in previous existences and having done some beneficial thing to each other, there arises love between two persons. It is like the case of the water lily (or any other water plant) that grows in the marsh where mud and water jointly cause its arising.

The Buddha spent His days in Sāketa for as many persons as there were in that town that deserved to gain enlightenment. Then He proceeded His way to Sāvatti. The brahmin couple further sought guidance from the bhikkhus from whom they got appropriate instructions and in due course attained the three higher maggas after which they realized Nibbāna without any substrata of existence remaining - i.e. anupādisa parinibbāna.

Eighty-four Thousand Beings gained Enlightenment on The Occasion of The Funeral of The Brahmin Couple

When the brahmin couple passed away the brahmin community of Sāketa assembled together with the common objective of paying due respects to one of their members. Similarly, the Stream-Enterers, the Once-Returners and the Never-Returners, all ariyas who had been associates in the practice of the path with the brahmin couple, assembled together with the common objective of paying their respects to one of their members. Those two groups of people placed the remains of the brahmin couple on a bier with gabled roofs, and amidst floral tributes and sprinkling of perfumes about the bier, they carried it out of the town.

The Buddha (as of His daily routine) viewed the sentient world with His Buddha-Eye consisting of knowledge that discerns the natural bent and latent proclivities of individuals (āsaya-nusaya-ñāṇa) and knowledge of the maturity and immaturity of the faculties of beings (indriyaparopariyatti-ñāṇa) for that day and came to know the passing away, in total cessation of the brahmin couple; and seeing that His presence and preaching at the funeral of the deceased ones would lead to the enlightenment of the multitudes attending the funeral, He left Sāvatti for the cemetery at Sāketa, carrying His alms-bowl and big robe Himself.

On seeing the Buddha, the people said: "The Bhagava has come to attend to the funeral of His father and mother" and paid their obeisance to Him. The townsfolk brought the bier to the cemetery in reverential ceremony. They asked the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, what is the proper way to venerate the brahmin couple who had been ariya laydisiples?"

The Buddha replied in the following stanza revealing the fact that the deceased couple had attained arahatship and that they deserved veneration that was due to arahats:

Ahimsakā ye munayo niccam kāyeva saṅvutā te yanti accutam thānam yattha gantvā na socare.

The arahats who do not harm others are always restrained in their (physical verbal and mental) actions. Having gone to Nibbāna through magg-knowledge, they are free from sorrow. They have realized the four maggas and phalas and attained to the deathless Nibbāna. — Dhammapada, 225 —

(The Commentary to the Dhammapada says that at the end of that stanza a great number of people attained Stream-Entry and higher stages of Path-Knowledge.).

After uttering the above stanza the Buddha delivered the Jarā Sutta that He knew would benefit the audience at that time. (Refer to Sutta Nipāta, 4. Aṭṭhaka Vagga, Jarā Sutta, the sixth in that vagga or group of discourses.) By the end of the Jarā Sutta, eighty-four thousand beings perceived the Four Truths and became ariyas.

(This is the story of Brahmin Sāketa and his wife.)

The Story of Viṭaṭṭha (also known as Mittadubhi)

Three princes: (1) Prince Pasenadi, son of King Mahā Kosala of Sāvatti, (2) Prince Mahā Licchavī, son of King Licchavī of Vesālī, and (3) Prince Bandula, son of King Malla of Kusināra, who were on their way to Takkaṣiḷa (Taxila) to get their education under a famous Professor there, met at a rest house outside the city. They introduced themselves, learned one another's names, parentage and clan, and also the purpose of their journey, and they became friends. After having completed their education under the guidance of the great teacher in due time, they bid farewell to the teacher and left Taxila together and returned to their respective homes.

Of these three princes, Prince Pasenadi demonstrated his prowess and skill before his royal father, King Mahā Kosala, who was so pleased with his son's capabilities that he anointed him king and so the Prince became King Pasenadi of Kosala.

Prince Mahāli of the Licchavis also demonstrated his prowess and skill before the Licchavis so arduously that both of his eyes went blind. The Licchavī princes felt very sorry at the fate of their teacher Prince Mahāli and conferred among themselves to afford suitable status to him without abandoning him. They unanimously resolved to name him as lord of a certain toll gate which had a yearly revenue of a hundred thousand pieces of silver. Prince Mahāli lived on the revenues collected at the toll gate and took charge of educating and training the five hundred Licchavī princes.

When Prince Bandula demonstrated his prowess and skill before the Mallas, he was tricked by someone: an iron rod was secretly concealed inside one of the bamboos which he was to cut with his sword. There were sixty bundles of sixty bamboos each standing before him. His royal father commanded: "Now son, cut these bamboos with your sword," by way of testing the prince's might. Prince Bandula leapt up to a height of eighty cubits and cut down the sixty bundles of bamboos one by one. At the last bundle he noticed a strange frictional noise from inside the bamboo which had the concealed iron rod inside. Discovering the nature of the dirty trick played upon him, he threw away his sword and wailed: "Oh, there was not a single one out of this big crowd of my kinsmen and friends who would out of kind regard for me warn me of this trick. Had I been forewarned, I could very well have cut that iron rod too without letting it betray its presence there by its frictional noise." Then he said to his royal parents: "I shall kill all the Malla princes and make myself king." To this the parents replied: "Dear son, it is a time-honoured tradition with us Mallas to rule by turns. We cannot approve of your idea." On being repeatedly refused approval of this idea of his, Prince Bandula became frustrated and said: "Then I will go and live with my friend King Pasenadi of Kosala," and he went to Sāvatti.

When King Pasenadi of Kosala learned the arrival of his friend Prince Bandula, he went out to greet him and escorted him into the city with much pomp and honour. King Pasenadi of Kosala made Bandula his Commander-in-Chief and Bandula sent for his royal parents and let them live in Sāvatti. This is an account of the three Princes: Prince Kosala, Prince Mahāli of the Licchavis, and Prince Bandula of the Mallas.

King Pasenadi of Kosala tries to become closely acquainted with The Sangha

One day, King Pasenadi of Kosala was standing on an upper floor of his multi-gabled palace, looking out towards the high road in the city when he saw thousand of bhikkhus going to the houses of Anāthapiṇḍika, the rich man, Cūla Anāthapiṇḍika, the rich man, Viśākhā, the donor of the Pupphārāma Monastery, and Suppavāsā, the rich man's wife, to collect alms-food. He asked his men where these bhikkhus were going and they reported to him that two thousand bhikkhus daily collected their alms-food — the daily food, the ticket food (i.e., specially arranged, invited food offering at the donor's place), or sick-bhikkhu's food at the house of Anāthapiṇḍika; and five hundred each at the house of Cūla Anāthapiṇḍika, at the house of Visākhā, and at the house of Suppavāsā. The King was impressed. He also wanted to be a regular donor of alms-food to the Sangha. He went to the Jetavana Monastery and invited the Buddha and a thousand bhikkhus to the palace and offered food for seven days when he personally served the food. On the seventh day, he said to the Buddha: “Venerable Sir, may the Bhagavā and five hundred bhikkhus come to the palace to receive our food offerings every day.” The Buddha replied: “Great King, it is not the custom of Buddhas to receive alms-food from the same donor every day. People like to see the Buddha visits to their home too.”

“In that case, Venerable Sir, may the Bhagavā let one regular bhikkhu, together with five hundred other bhikkhus, come to the palace for daily alms-food offering.” The Buddha assigned the Venerable Ānanda to head five hundred bhikkhus to go to the palace for the daily alms-food.

The King attended to the offering of food to the bhikkhus personally for seven days without assigning these duties to anyone. On the eighth day, he was preoccupied with state affairs and forgot to offer alms-food to the Sangha.

As it was not the custom in the royal palace to carry out anything without orders, the attendants just provided seats to the bhikkhus but no offering of food took place for lack of orders. Many of the bhikkhus were disappointed and saying: “We cannot remain here” and left. On the next day also, the King forgot to feed the Sangha and many of the bhikkhus left the palace. On the third day also, the same thing happened and all the bhikkhus left but only the Venerable Ānanda remained.

Noble ones endowed with great past merits take things with wise circumspection. They foster the lay supporters' faith in the Teaching. To wit: there are certain disciples of the Buddha beginning with Venerable Sāriputta and Venerable Mahā Moggallāna who were two Chief Disciples; Therī Khemā and Therī Uppalavanna who were two Chief Female Disciples; Citta, the rich man, and Prince Hathakaḷavaka who were two foremost lay disciples; and Nandamātā, wife of the rich man of Veḷukaṇḍaka and Lady Khujjuttarā who were two foremost female lay disciples, they were acclaimed by the Buddha as foremost in their own right, who were endowed with the Ten Perfections (Pāramī) to a certain extent and were, therefore, noble persons of great past merit, blessed with their previous aspirations. The Venerable Ānanda also had fulfilled the Ten Perfections over a hundred thousand aeon (kappas) and was a noble one of great past merit, blessed with previous aspirations. He was circumspect by nature. So, being desirous of fostering the faith of the supporters, he alone remain in the palace for the daily food-offerings.

The palace officials prepared a suitable place and made food offerings to the only bhikkhu, the Venerable Ānanda. King Pasenadī of Kosala came to the palace after every other bhikkhu had left the palace. On seeing the food for the Sangha left untouched, the King asked: “Have not the revered ones come?” and the officials replied that only the Venerable Ānanda came. The King was angry because he felt that the bhikkhus had let such a big amount of food go to waste. He went to see the Buddha and complained: “Venerable Sir, I had prepared food offerings for five hundred bhikkhus but only the Venerable Ānanda. came. All the food remains untouched. How is it, Venerable Sir, that those bhikkhus have such disregard for our invitation to the palace?”

Thereupon, the Buddha did not say anything against the bhikkhus but said: “Great King, these bhikkhu disciples are not very well acquainted with you. Probably that is why they did not go to your palace.” On that occasion, the Buddha discoursed to the bhikkhus, the Kula Sutta, setting out nine reasons for bhikkhus that make it not proper to go to the lay supporters of all the four castes, and nine reasons that make it proper to go to the lay supporters. (Āṅguttara Nikāya, Navaka Nipāta, Pathama Paṇṇāsaka, 2 - Sihanāda vagga, 7 - Kula Sutta).

The Kula Sutta

(Lay supporters whose houses ought not to be visited by bhikkhus).

“Bhikkhus, homes of lay supporters who come under these nine conditions should not be visited by bhikkhus, if they have never been there, or if they happen to be there already, they should not stay there. Now, these are the nine (improper) conditions:

- (3) If they do not respectfully offer proper seats;
- (4) If they hide from bhikkhus their property worth offering to bhikkhus;
- (5) If they offer only a little whereas they possess much to offer;
- (6) If they offer inferior things whereas they have superior things worthy of offering;
- (7) If they do not offer things respectfully but do so disrespectfully;
- (8) If they do not come near bhikkhus to listen to his teaching;
- (9) If they do not listen to the bhikkhus discourse respectfully.

“Bhikkhus, homes of lay supporters who are of the above nine (improper) conditions should not be visited by bhikkhus, if they have never been there; and if a bhikkhu happens to be at such a home already, he should not stay there.”

“Great King, those bhikkhus left you probably because they are not on intimate terms with you. That indeed is so. Wise ones of past are known to have gone to their intimate ones in times of serious illness, near unto death, although they were respectfully looked after by people not intimate to them.” On being requested by King Pasenadi of Kosala to tell about that story, the Buddha related to him the story of Kesava Jātaka contained in the Catukka Nipāta (This story was also referred to when the Brahmā Baka was tamed by the Buddha and has mentioned earlier.)

After hearing the Buddha’s discourse, King Pasenadi of Kosala saw the need to become intimate with the bhikkhu Sangha and thought of some way to fulfil this aim. He struck on the idea of marrying one of the Sakyan princesses. “If I were to raise a Sakyan princess to the status of Chief Queen,” he thought, “the Bhagavā would become my relation and his disciples would consider me as an intimate person.” Thereupon, he sent an ultimatum to the Sakyan princes demanding the hand of a Sakyan princess in marriage to him. When the royal messengers charged with the mission asked: “Which princess that is, the daughter of which Sakyan prince, would his Majesty specify?” The King said: “Any Sakyan princess would do, provided her ancestry is ascertained by you.”

At the city of Kapilavatthu, the Sakyans held a council to answer the ultimatum. They did not like to go to war with their rival kingdom, for if they refused to comply with King Pasenadi's demand their kingdom would certainly be invaded. Since the Kosala were a different clan from the Sakyans, they could not give in marriage anyone of their own kin to a non-Sakyan. It was Prince Mahānāma the Sakyan who conceived a way out of the dilemma. "I have a very beautiful girl born of one of my slaves (named Nāgamuṇḍā); the girl is called Vāsabhakhattiyā. Let us give her away." They agreed. Formal reply was then given to the delegation from Kosala: "We shall comply."

"The daughter of which Sakyan prince are you going to give?"

"It is the daughter born of Mahānāma, the Sakyan Prince, cousin of Buddha Gotama, son of Amitodāna. Vāsabhakhattiyā is the name of the princess."

The delegation returned to Sāvatti with the favourable news. King Pasenadi of Kosala was pleased and said: "Go and bring the Sakyan princess without delay. But mark this: kings as a rule are crafty. A slaves daughter might be posed as a princess. So you must ascertain her genuineness by watching her at table: make sure she eats together with her Sakyan father."

The delegation went again to Kapilavatthu and announced: "Our King of Kosala would accept only a princess who eats together with you Sakyans."

"Very well, friends," said Mahānāma the Sakyan.

When it was meal time, Vāsabhakhattiyā, fully attired and adorned as a princess, was brought to the dining table where Mahānāma the Sakyan was sitting, and there it was made to appear that the two ate together. The delegation was satisfied with what they saw and returned to Savatthi with the girl.

(This neat trick was carried out thus:

When the Sakyans were confronted with the 'dining test' required by King Pasenadi of Kosala, the Sakyans were quite at a loss about what to do. But Mahānāma reassured them with the instruction that after the bogus princess was being seated at Mahānāma's dining table, and the prince was just about to put his first morsel into the mouth, he was to be intervened with an urgent message which must be seen by him forthwith. The plan got the approval of the Sakyans and was carried out accordingly.) (This was taken in by the delegation from Sāvatti.)

Back at their capital, the delegation reported to the King what they had witnessed. King Pasenadi of Kosala was delighted. He made (after the customary anointing ceremony) Vāsabhakhattiyā, the Chief Queen, and she was waited on by five hundred court ladies. Not long afterwards, the Chief Queen, who became very dear to the King, gave birth to a son with golden complexion.

When it was time for the young prince to be named, the Kosala King sent a royal message to the royal grand father Mahānāma, the Sakyan, informing him of the birth of a son and asking him to suggest a suitable name for the princeling. It so happened that the messenger who took the royal message to the Sakyan court was slightly hard of hearing. After reading the Kosala King's message, Mahānāma remarked: "Vāsabhakhattiyā was previously a girl of great personal influence. And now after giving birth to a son she is going to be a favourite (vallabhā) of the Kosala King!" Now, the joyous expression 'favourite' i.e. an intimate darling, vallabhā in the local dialect, sounded as 'viṭaṭūbha' to the Kosalan messenger who took that word as the name to be given to the Kosalan Prince. He reported to King Pasenadi of Kosala: "Viṭaṭūbha is the name, your Majesty, that his royal grandfather suggests for the princeling." The King mused: "Possibly, Viṭaṭūbha is a clan name of yore with us" and named his son, Viṭaṭūbha. Then with a view to pleasing the Buddha, the King made Viṭaṭūbha, Commander in-Chief, even in his tender age.

Viṭaṭūbha was brought up as a Prince in all regal style. When he was seven years old, he came to notice how other princes were receiving dolls and other children's presents from their maternal grand parents and so he asked his mother, Chief Queen Vāsabhakhattiyā: "Mother, other princes get children's presents, such as dolls and the like, from their maternal grandparents. But I have received none from my maternal grandparents. Why is it? Have you no parents?" The mother replied: "Dear son, the Sakyans of course are your maternal grand parents. But they live far away from us. That is why they cannot send you any gifts."

When Viṭaṭūbha was sixteen, he said to his mother: "Mother, I would like to see my maternal grandparent's palace." And the mother discouraged him with the words: "Dear son, it is not advisable for you to do that. After all, what use is there in your seeing your maternal grandparent's palace?" But Prince Viṭaṭūbha was insistent and after many repeated requests, the mother could do nothing but to yield to his wish.

Viṭaṭūbha informed his father, the King, of his intended journey and left Sāvatti, leading a big army. Chief Queen Vāsabhakhattiyā had in the meantime sent a secret message to the Sakyans asking them to keep up appearances when Viṭaṭūbha arrived so that the whole conspiracy would not in anyway be betrayed. This message gave the timely opportunity for the younger Sakyan princes, i.e., who are junior to Viṭaṭūbha to leave the city and remain in the remote country during his visit because they could not make obeisance to Viṭaṭūbha as would be normally expected. Those Sakyans, who were to receive Viṭaṭūbha, met him on arrival at Kapilavatthu, at the royal rest house.

There, Viṭaṭūbha was introduced to his maternal grandfather and maternal uncles whom he had to make obeisance. Having done his turn of paying respects, he saw no one paying him respects. "Why, are there no Sakyan to pay respects to me?" he asked. The Sakyan elders then said: "Dear son, your younger cousins have gone on a visit to the country." They entertained Viṭaṭūbha lavishly.

After staying two or three days in Kapilavatthu, Viṭaṭūbha left the city with his big army. When every visitor had gone, a slave girl came to cleanse with diluted milk the seat where Viṭaṭūbha had sat at the royal rest house, all the while cursing: "Fie! Profaned is in this place — profaned by Viṭaṭūbha, the son of slave girl Vāsabhakhattiyā." These words were overheard by one of Viṭaṭūbha's men who had come back to the place to fetch his arms that he had forgotten to take away with him. He asked how far the girl's curse was true and was told that Vāsabhakhattiyā was the child born of Mahānāma the Sakyan and his slave maid Vāgamuṇḍā. The Kosala soldier related this news to his comrades and it soon became the talk of the town that Chief Queen Vāsabhakhattiyā was a daughter of a slave girl.

When Viṭaṭūbha learned this news, he was quick to understand the situation. "Well, let the Sakyans cleanse my seat with diluted milk now, when I become king, I will wash my seat with the blood from the Sakyan's throats?" He said to himself, bearing an ominous grudge against the Sakyan Clan.

After arriving back at the capital, the King's ministers reported the news to the King. King Pasenadi of Kosala was very angry, with the Sakyans. "This presenting a slave girl for my queen is preposterous; it is an insult against my honour?" he roared and withdrew all the rank and status accorded to his Chief Queen and Commander-in-Chief, allowing them only slaves' rank and status.

Two or three days later, the Buddha paid a visit to the royal palace of King Pasenadi of Kosala where he sat on the specially arranged seat. The King made his obeisance to the Buddha and said to Him: "Venerable Sir, the kinsmen of the Bhagavā have deceived me. They had sent me a slave girl's daughter, saying that she was a princess. I have discovered this and have therefore downgraded both mother, Vāsabhakhattiyā, and son, Viṭaṭūbha, to the slave's rank and status."

The Buddha said: "Great King, the Sakyans had done a wrong thing, they ought to have given you a princess as befitting your lineage. However, Great King, I wish you to consider this: Vāsabhakhattiyā was a daughter of Mahānāma the Sakyan; and moreover she has been anointed as Chief Queen by you who are of royal blood. Viṭaṭūbha is of your own blood. What does maternal lineage matter? It is paternal lineage that counts. This important fact was recognized by wise people of past and therefore, a firewood-gatherer, a poor peasant girl, was made the Chief Queen, and the boy born of this Chief Queen of humble origin became King Kaṭṭhavāhana of Bārāṇasī, a city with an area of twelve yojanas."

When King Pasenadi of Kosala had heard the story of Kaṭṭhavāhana, he was satisfied with the dictum “that only paternal lineage is of real significance.” Accordingly he reinstated the Chief Queen and the Commander-in-Chief to their previous ranks and status. (Ref: Ekaniṣāṭṭha for the story of Kaṭṭhavāhana.)

The Story of Bandula, The Commander-in-Chief and His Wife Mallikā

The Commander-in-Chief of King Pasenadi of Kosala was Bandula, a Malla prince. His wife Mallikā was the daughter of King Malla of Kusināra. Even after some years of wedlock, the couple did not beget any offspring. Bandula therefore sent Mallikā to her father's home. Mallikā thought that it would be well if she visited the Buddha before leaving Sāvattī. So, she went to the Jetavana monastery and made obeisance to the Buddha. On being asked where she was going next, Mallikā told the Buddha how she was being sent home to her father because she failed to produce any child. Thereupon, the Buddha said: “In that case there is no need for you to go home to your father. You should go back to the home of the Commander-in-Chief.” Mallikā was very happy with these words and, making her obeisance to the Buddha, she went back to her husband. Bandula asked her why she had come back. She told him what the Buddha had said to her. Bandula pondered: “The Bhagavā is far sighted. He must have fore-knowledge about Mailikas probable pregnancy.” And so he let her stay with him.

Not long afterwards, Mailikā was pregnant. She had an intense craving as is often the case with pregnant women. She told her husband about it. She wanted to bathe in the auspicious royal lake where the Licchavis usually got anointed king and she also wanted to drink its water. Bandula said: “Very well,” and putting her on his chariot and, taking his great bow that needed a thousand men to harness, they left Sāvattī and entered Vesālī from the city gate assigned to Mahā Licchavī for enjoyment of tolls collected at that gate. Mahā Licchavī's house was just close by.

Mahā Licchavī recognized the sound of Bandula's chariot thumping on the threshold of the city gate. He had great foreboding: “Disaster is afoot today for the Licchavi's,” and he warned them. The auspicious royal lake was very heavily guarded, inside as well as outside. It was covered with iron netting so that even birds could not gain entry to it.

Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief, alighted from his chariot, drove away the guards with his cane and cut open the iron netting with his scimitar. He and his wife entered the lake, bathed there and, coolly putting her in the chariot, headed home by the same route that he had come.

The guards reported the matter to the Vajjī princes. Infuriated, the Vajjis mounted on five hundred chariots and gave chase. When the chase was reported to Mahā Licchavī, he called out: “O young Licchavī princes, don't do that! That Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief will destroy you.” To that the princes replied: “Sir, we cannot stand it. We must catch him!”

Mahā Licchavī had known the might of his schoolmate, Bandula, and warned the Vajjī princes thus:

“Well, princes, if you must give chase, when you see Bandula's chariot depressed down to the wheel hub, turn back from wherever you saw it.”

“If you don't turn back, but still pursue him, do turn back when you hear a great roaring sound.”

“If you don't turn back, but still pursue him, you will see holes at the front of each of your chariots. Turn back wherever you see these holes! Don't go any further.”

The Licchavi's ignored the advice and proceeded on hot pursuit. When Mallikā saw they were being pursued, she told Bandula what she saw. “Well, (watch well). When all the five hundred chariots are seen as one (i.e., when they all were in a straight line from him), tell me!” he said. Mallikā informed her husband when the pursuing chariots were seen as a single one. Then Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief, gave the reins of the horse to her saying: “You hold them!” Then he stood in the chariot and drew his great bow that needed a thousand strong men to do it. At that moment, the chariot sank to the level of the wheel hub. The Licchavis saw this but did not heed Mahā Licchavī's warning and drove on. Bandula, as the Commander-in-Chief, after proceeding a while, pulled at the bow string producing a thunderous sound. The Licchavis heard it but still they did not turn back. Then Bandula sent an arrow which pierced through all the five hundred pursuing chariots, it passed through the chest of the Licchavī princes and struck the ground.

The Licchavī princes were still unaware that they had been shot and cried: "Hey, Bandula, stop!" all the while still following Bandula. Then Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief, halted a while and said: "All of you Licchavis are dead men. I need not fight with dead persons!"

"But we do not look like dead men, do we?"

"Then take off the mail armour from the last Licchavī Prince."

When they did as they were told, the lifeless body of the rearmost Licchavī prince dropped to the floor of the chariot. Then Bandula told them to drive home and prepare for the funeral of all of them. "Before taking off your mail armour, you may leave your last word to your wives," he added. The Licchavis did as they were told. All of them perished.

Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief, drove back with his wife, Mallikā, safely home. She bore him twin sons sixteen times so that the couple had thirty-two robust sons, all brave and strong. They had their training completed in all the arts when they were allotted a thousand men each as their followers. Whenever Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief, appeared in court, he and his thirty two sons, together with thirty two thousand strong warriors would filled the whole courtyard.

The Commander-in-Chief Bandula performing as A Judge

One day, there arose an uproar at the court of justice complaining that a miscarriage of justice had taken place. The matter was reported to Bandula the Commander-in-Chief, who then went to the Court of Justice, heard the case afresh, and passed judgment, declaring who the rightful owner was. The people joined in their loud approval of the righteous judgment.

King Pasenadi of Kosala heard the sound and asked what it was. On being told about it, the King was very pleased and placed him in charge of the Court of Justice; the former justices were all removed from service. Bandula thus got an additional duty as judge which he discharged with uprightness.

The disgraced judges, being deprived of their usual bribes, plotted against Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief. They conspired to make false allegations that Bandula was aspiring to the throne. The King believed the words of the disgraced judges. He was greatly ill at ease. He wanted to do away with Bandula but since Bandula was a popular figure he dared not put Bandula to death in the city. So he invented a wicked ploy. He had his trusted men stage an 'uprising' at the border regions. Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief, and his thirty-two sons were ordered to put down the 'uprising,' and to bring back the insurgents. The King sent along his chosen generals with Bandula, with orders to murder Bandula and all his sons.

When Bandula got to the so-called area of unrest, the King's men planted as insurgents fled. Bandula carried out measures to turn the remote region into flourishing settlements, and returned to the city. When they were a good distance away from the city, the captains, who were sent along with them, beheaded Bandula and his thirty-two sons.

On that day, Mallikā, the wife of the Commander-in-Chief, was preparing to offer a meal to the two Chief Disciples, the Venerable Sāriputta and the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna together with five hundred bhikkhus at her home. Early that morning, she had received a message that her husband Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief, and her thirty-two sons had been beheaded. She kept the news to herself, having slipped in the note of message inside her jacket. While she was attending on the two Chief Disciples at table, her maids, after having offered rice, were bringing ghee to the table, when they accidentally broke the vessel containing ghee. The two Chief Disciples witnessed this. The Venerable Sāriputta asked Mallikā: "What has the nature of breaking up had broken up. Don't let it prey on your mind.” Thereupon, Mallikā produced the grim message from inside her jacket and said: “Venerable Sir, they sent me this message to tell me that my thirty-two sons, together with their father, had been beheaded. Even that news I did not allow to prey on my mind; how would this pot of ghee prey on my mind?”

The Venerable Sāriputta gave a discourse beginning with the stanza: Animitta manaññātaṃ macānam ida jvitaṃ (etc.). Then he rose from his seat and returned to the Jetavana monastery. (Ref: Sutta Nipāta, 3. Mahā vagga; 7 Salla Sutta.)

When the offering of food to the Sangha was finished Mallikā sent for her thirty-two daughters-in-law and said: “Dear daughters-in-law, your husbands, though faultless, have suffered the consequence of their past deeds. Do not be oppressed by sorrow, grief and lamentation. Also do not bear malice against the King.” These words were overheard by the King's secret agents who reported to the King that Bandula and his sons were free of guilt. The King was remorseful. He went to Mallikā's house and apologized to Mallikā and her thirty-two daughters-in-law. Then he offered Mallikā to name any boon she would like.

Mallikā said: “Great King, let the boon be considered as having been granted to me.” After the King had returned, she offered special alms-food to the Sangha for the benefit of the dear departed ones. Then she took her bath and went to see the King. She bowed before the King and said: “Great King, you have granted me leave to name a boon. I have no other wish than your permission to allow me and my thirty-two daughters-in-law to return to our respective parents.” The King gave his assent gladly. Mallikā sent home her thirty-two daughters-in-law to their respective parents homes and she herself returned to hers.

Mallikā lived in her parents' home in Kusinārā for a long time. When the Buddha passed away and she learned that his remains were being carried to Kusinārā by the Mallas, she got the idea to honour the Buddha by adorning the Buddha's body with the (famous) mahālatā gown which she did not wear since the death of her husband. She took it out from its place, cleaned it with perfumed water and awaited the arrival of the Buddha's remains.

The mahālatā gown was a very rare piece of adornment which only three persons had the good fortune to possess, namely. Visākhā, Mallikā wife of Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief, and Devadinya the thief. (This is according to the Commentary on the Mahāvagga, Dīgha Nikāya.)

According to the Commentary on the Dhammapada it was possessed by these three ladies in the whole human world, viz., Visākhā, Mallikā, wife of Bandula the Commander-in-Chief, and the daughter of a rich man of Bārāṇasī.

When the remains of the Buddha were being carried past her house, she requested the carriers of the bier: “Please! Please wait a moment,” and she (respectfully) encased the Buddha's body in the mahālatā gown which covered neatly from head to sole. The golden-hued body of the Buddha, clothed in the great gown, wrought with the seven kinds of gems made a gorgeous spectacle.

Mallikā's mind was filled with ecstatic delight in seeing the magnificence of the Buddha's body. Her conviction in the Triple Gem soared. She made this wish: “O Exalted Buddha! May I, in my faring the samsāric journey, be always perfect in my personal appearance even without the need to embellish myself.” (Commentary to the Mahāvagga (Dīgha Nikāya) on Mahāparinibbāna Sutta.)

After she had passed away, Mallikā was reborn as a celestial being in the Tāvātimsa Deva realm. On account of her wish she was endowed with unrivalled beauty. She had a dress magnificently finished with the seven kinds of gems and also a mansion of like description. (See details in the commentary on Vimāna Vatthu, 3-Pārīchattaka Vagga, 8-Mallikā. Vimāna Vatthu).

King Pasenadi of Kosala let the nephew of Bandula, named Dīghakārāyaṇa, to succeed him as Commander-in-Chief. This token of his high regard for Bandula did not, however, appease the nephew He kept awaiting his opportunity to revenge the death of his innocent uncle.

The King was never happy since the assassination of the innocent Bandula. A feeling of guilt possessed him, so much so that he did not find pleasure in his kingly luxuries. At that time, the Buddha was sojourning at the market town of Medaḷupa, in the province of the Sakyans. The King of Kosala, wishing to see the Buddha, put up a rustic tent built of branches of trees in the vicinity of the Buddha's monastery and stayed there. There, leaving the regal paraphernalia with Dīghakārāyana, the Commander-in-Chief, he entered the Buddha's chamber alone.

(The reason for the King's leaving his regal paraphernalia with Dīghakārāyana were: (1) he considered it improper to look ostentatious in the presence of the Buddha; and (2) he intended to have a private dialogue with the Buddha which he believed would gladden him. That indeed is so. For, when the regal paraphernalia was sent to the palace, it was understood by the royal attendants that (they did not need to wait on the King in the meantime and that) they should return to the palace.

As the Kosala King went alone to the Buddha's monastery, Dīghakārāyana felt uneasy with the thought: "This King had previously private conference with Gotama the recluse;" after which my uncle Bandula and his thirty-two sons were assassinated; now he is again in conference with Gotama the recluse. What might this mean? Might I be the target this time?"

As soon as the King had entered the Buddha's chamber, Dīghakārāyana, the Commander-in-Chief, took the regal paraphernalia to Viṭaṭūbha, cajoled and coerced Viṭaṭūbha to accept kingship then and there. Then he left a charger, a scimitar and a royal maid for Pasenadi of Kosala with a note saying: "Do not come after us if you wish to stay alive!" After that he took Prince Viṭaṭūbha to the palace in Sāvatti as the new king with the white umbrella held above him.

When the Kosala King came out of the monastery after having cordial conversation with the Buddha, he saw none of his army: he asked the maid who told him what she heard and saw. Thereupon, he headed for Rājagaha to muster help from his royal nephew, King Ajātasattu with the object of deposing Viṭaṭūbha the usurper. On his way, he had to make do with a meal of broken rice and to drink unfiltered water. As he was of a delicate constitution, that food proved indigestible for him. It was late in the evening when he got to the city of Rājagaha. The city gates were already closed. So he had to spend the night at a rest-house outside the city, intending to see his nephew King Ajātasattu the next morning.

That night, the Kosala King suffered from indigestion due to the upset condition of phlegm, bile and wind. He could answer the call of nature only two or three times before he became totally exhausted. He slept in the bosom of the young maid who was his sole company. He died at dawn the next day. (At the time of death, the Kosala King was eighty years of age, the same age as the Buddha. (Ref: Majjhima paṇṇāsa Pāli, Dhammacetiya Sutta).

When the young maid found that the King had passed away, she wailed loudly: "My Lord, the Kosala King, who had ruled over the two provinces of Kasi and Kosala, had died uncared for outside the city on this rest-house where the homeless make it their home." On hearing her lamentation people came to know about the death of the Kosala King. They reported it to King Ajātasattu who came out and saw his dead uncle. He arranged for a fitting funeral with much ceremony. Then he mustered his troops by the beat of the gong, intending to capture Viṭaṭūbha.

The ministers of King Ajātasattu pleaded, at his feet, saying: "Great King, if your royal uncle (the Kosala King) were alive, your visit to Savatti would be proper. But now that Vitatubha, your younger cousin, is on the throne, and he had also a right through kinship to the throne, your expedition is not advisable." (And Ajātasattu accepted the ministers' advice.)

Prince Viṭaṭūbha, after ascending the throne at Sāvatti, remembered his grudge against the Sakyans. He left the city at the head of a big army to make war against and destroy the Sakyans. Early in the morning, the Buddha viewed the world of beings with his Buddha-

Eye and saw that danger was imminent for His kinsmen the Sakyans. He thought it right and proper to protect them. So after going on the alms-round, He took a rest in His scented Chamber in a noble resting posture (like the lion) lying on His right side. In the evening He went to Kapilavattu by His psychic power and reappeared sitting at the foot of a tree with bare branches in the vicinity of the city of Kapilavattu.

Not far away from that tree there was a shady banyan tree near the boundary between Kapilavattu and Viṭaṭūbha's country. When Viṭaṭūbha saw the Buddha, he made obeisance to Him and said: "Venerable Sir, how is it that the Bhagavā is sitting underneath this skeleton of a tree when it is still hot? May You come and sit underneath shady banyan tree which is near our boundary." The Buddha replied: "Great King, so be it. Shelter provided by kinsman is cool enough." Viṭaṭūbha was not slow to take the hint. He surmised (rightly) that the Buddha was there to give His benign protection to His kinsmen. So he withdrew his forces after respectfully making his obeisance to Him. The Buddha reappeared in the Jetavana monastery by His psychic power.

Viṭaṭūbha did not forget the insult he suffered at the hands of the Sakyan. He took out another expedition against the Sakyan city. On this occasion too the Buddha was there and he was obliged to withdraw. For the third time he led a mighty force towards the Sakyan territory, only to meet with the Buddha before he could start operation and had to withdraw,

When King Viṭaṭūbha set out for the fourth time the Buddha saw that the time for the evil misdeeds of the Sakyan was taking effect and so He did not intervene. The past misdeeds of the Sakyans consisted in spreading poison in a stream on a certain day in their previous existence.

Viṭaṭūbha came with a big army intent on destroying the Sakyans. The Buddha's kinsmen, on the other hand, were averse to taking life. They would rather give up their own life than destroy life. They know that they were past masters in archery, so they thought of frightening away the enemy by their feats in archery. They put on mail armour and came out pretending to join battle. They sent arrows into the enemy which did not hit anyone but passed through their shields or through holes in their ear lobes (pierced while young for wearing ear-rings).

When Viṭaṭūbha saw the arrows, he thought that the Sakyans were shooting them in earnest. "They say the Sakyans don't destroy life," he said, "but now they are trying to kill us with arrows!"

One of his men said: "Lord, inspect your forces and you will know."

"The arrows come in the direction of our men."

"But there is no one being hit on this side, Great King. Would your Majesty make a count of your men," replied the men boldly. The King ordered to make a count and found that no one had fallen.

Viṭaṭūbha withdrew his forces a little and ordered his men: "O men, slay all those who say they are Sakyan. But spare my grand father Mahānāma and those who are together with him. Thereupon Viṭaṭūbha's forces made a dash for the kill. The Sakyans did not see anything to hold on to. Some of them stood holding on to tufts of grass while others stood holding on to clusters of reed. When asked by the enemy: "Are you not Sakyan?" these Sakyans did not and could not utter a lie, those Sakyan holding on to the grass so replied: "These are not Tectona grandis trees but only grass, and those Sakyans holding on to the reeds replied: "These are not Tectona grandis trees, but only reed." Those Sakyans and Mahānāma together with the Sakyans that remained together with him were spared. Those who held on to the grass later came to be known as Grass Sakyans, and those who held on to the reeds as Reed Sakyans. All other Sakyans were put to the sword, not even infants were allowed to live. Viṭaṭūbha then cleansed his seat with the enemy's blood from their throats. Thus was the Sakyans clan exterminated by Viṭaṭūbha.

Mahānāma, the Sakyan was captured alive. On his way to Viṭaṭūbha's country, when it was time for the morning meal, they dismounted and the table was laid; Viṭaṭūbha informed Mahānāma to join him. Persons of royal blood as a rule never share a meal with sons of a slave. Mahānāma therefore, noticing a pond nearby, said: “My grandson, I need a washing up before I eat.” “Then, Grand father, take a bath,” replied Viṭaṭūbha.

Mahānāma knew that if he refused to eat with Viṭaṭūbha, he would be put to the sword. “It were better to take my own life,” he mooted. So he untied his coil of hair, made a knot at the end of his hair which was spread out, and putting both his big toes together inside the hair, he dived into the water. Mahānāma was possessed of such merit that his presence underneath the water caused warmth in the realm of Nāgas. The King of Nāgas looked for the strange phenomenon and on seeing the plight of Mahānāma, he appeared before him and letting him sit on his hood, carried him down to the realm of Nāgas where Mahānāma survived for twelve years.

Viṭaṭūbha and Company meet Their Fate

King Viṭaṭūbha was left waiting for the return of his royal grand father. “He should be back any time,” he kept on saying to himself. When he had waited rather too long: “Something is wrong,” he thought and he had his men wade into the water, dive into it, and search around the pond. As it was already dark, he sent his men all around to search any possible nook and corner with oil lamps. When he had left no stone unturned, he gave up the search at that locality and assuming his grandfather must have fled from him, he and his army left the place.

He arrived at the Aciravati river at nightfall and it was too late to enter the city. So he and his army had to camp on the river bank for the night. Some of his men lay on the sandbank to rest while others lay on higher ground. Among the first group there were some who had not committed evil deeds in the past; among the second group there were some who had done evil deeds in the past. It so happened that to both groups, swarms of white ants made their stay impossible. They were driven to seek fresh quarter for the night. Those who had done no bad actions in the past, who were lying on the sand bank, therefore found it necessary to move to high ground; those who had done bad actions in the past, who were lying on high ground, found it necessary to move to the sand bank.

After the people had made these shifting of locations, there arose black rain clouds and all of a sudden there was a deluge that caused the Aciravati to burst its banks. Viṭaṭūbha and his army were carried away in the floods down to the ocean where they were devoured by fishes and turtles.

The Past Evil Actions of The Sakyans

The massacre of the Sakyans became a subject of a lively talk among the people. “O men,” they would say, “the massacre of the Sakyans is absolutely uncalled for and the brutality they suffered, their small children even not being spared, is most improper.” This sort of popular opinion came to the ear of the Buddha, who said: “Bhikkhus, the Sakyans meet with a seemingly undeserved fate in their present existence. However, if their present fate is considered against their past evil action, they met the kind of death appropriate to the cause thereof.” The bhikkhus requested the Buddha to relate the nature of their past evil action. And the Buddha briefly related to them, how in a certain existence in the past, they had united themselves in one mind and spread poison into a stream (causing mass destruction of fish in it).

Again, the following day, at the assembly of bhikkhus for hearing the Teaching, the bhikkhus were discussing about the fate of Viṭaṭūbha: “Friends, Viṭaṭūbha together with his company, after slaying such a great number of the Sakyans, became victims of fishes and turtles in the ocean even before achieving his ambition.” When the Buddha came to the assembly and asked the bhikkhus: “Bhikkhus, what was that you were talking about when I came?” They told the Buddha about their subject of discussion. Then the Buddha said: “Bhikkhus, just as all the villagers in a sleeping village are swept away by a great flood, so also, even before their ambitions in life are fulfilled, all living beings who are forgetful and sleeping (i.e., not vigilant) have their lives cut short and are carried away by Death to the ocean of the four miserable states.” Then the Buddha uttered this stanza:

*Pupphāni heva pacinantam
byāsattamanasam naram
suttam gāmam mahoghova maccuādāya gacchati.*

(Bhikkhus) like one who gathers choicest flowers, a person, who hankers after sense-pleasure, craving for what he had not got and clinging to what he has got, is carried away by Death to the ocean of the four miserable states, just as a whole village that are soundly asleep are swept away to the ocean by a great flood.

By the end of the discourse many beings attained enlightenment such as Stream-Entry. This discourse is therefore a very beneficial discourse for all.

The Two Mallikās differentiated

There were (at the time of the Buddha) two Mallikās in Sāvatti, one was Mallikā, wife of Bandula, the Commander-in-Chief, the other was Mallikā, Queen of the Kosala King. The former was a Mallan princess of Kusinārā about whom we have mentioned earlier. We shall now describe Queen Mallikā in a brief way.

This future queen was daughter of a flower seller in the city of Sāvatti. She was a maiden of great beauty, with a large store of great past merits. One day, when she was sixteen, she went flower-gathering in the company of other girls, carrying three lumps of barley cakes in a flower basket.

As the group of girls were leaving the city, they met the Buddha, surrounded by a wondrous aura of six hues, in the company of many bhikkhus, who was entering the city. Mallikā was deeply moved by the glory of the Buddha and in a super state of devotional faith she offered her three lumps of barley cakes to the Buddha. The Buddha accepted the alms in the alms-bowl, which was donated by the four Great Guardians of the Four Quarters.

Mallikā paid her obeisance at the feet of the Buddha, with her mind filled with delightful satisfaction (pīti), derived from reflection on the attributes of the Buddha and stood at a suitable place. The Buddha looked at her and gave a smile. The Venerable Ānanda asked the Buddha about the reason for the smile. “Ānanda,” said the Buddha, “on account of her offering of these three lumps of barley cakes with the volition of the first impulsion this young girl will become Chief Queen of the Kosala King this very day.”

Mallikā was overjoyed to hear the words of the Buddha and went to the park with her companions. It was the day when the King of Kosala fought a battle with his nephew Ajātasattu and was defeated. He escaped on horseback and on hearing the singing of Mallikā, he turned towards the park, being attracted by the girls voice. Where as all the other girls fled with fear at the sight of the King, Mallikā, who was destined to become Queen felt no fear. Instead, she came forward and took the reins of the King's charger in her hand.

Still sitting on horseback, he inquired the girl whether she was married or not. On learning that she was unmarried, he dismounted and as he was tired from the heat of the sun and the wind, he took a rest in the bosom of Mallikā. After having rested, he took the girl on horseback and entered the city accompanied by his army. He had the girl escorted to her parents' home. That evening, he sent (to Mallikā's house) the royal carriage reserved for the use of Chief Queen, in which she was brought to the palace with pomp and ceremony. Then placing her on a ceremonial seat wrought with precious gems, she was anointed Chief Queen. From that day, Mallikā became the beloved Chief Queen. (These details are based on the Commentary on the Jātaka, Volume Three, Sattaka Nipāta; 10-Kumnāsapiṇḍi Jātaka).

Thus the two Mallikās should be known: Mallikā the Kosala Queen was the daughter of a flower-seller: Mallikā, wife of Bandula, Commander-in-Chief, was the daughter of one of the Malla princes.

Chapter 39

HOW THE ĀṬĀNĀṬIYA PARITTA CAME TO BE TAUGHT

At one time, the Buddha was staying in the monastery on the Gijjakuta Hill near Rājagaha. During that time, Dharaṭṭha, Virūḷaka, Virūpakka and Kuvera, the Four Great Guardian Kings of the four quarters, held a conference at the celestial city of Āṭānāṭiya, the abode of Kuvera. After they had carefully arranged for the defences of Tāvātimsa, the abode of Sakka, King of Devas, (against the Asuras) at the four directions, by employing hordes of yakkhas, gandhabbas, kumbhaṇḍas, and nāgas, they composed stanzas called the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta on the subject of the seven Buddhas (preceding Buddha Gotama). “Whosoever disregards and goes against the authority of the Buddhas' Doctrine and the authority of our commandments shall be meted out specific punishments,” they proclaimed. They also placed at the four quarters a big number of yakkhas, gandhabbas, kumbhaṇḍas, and nāgas for their own protection. Around midnight, they went to the Buddha in resplendent appearances, their personal radiance flooding the entire Gijjakuta Hill. After having approached the Buddha, and making obeisance to Him, they sat at a suitable place.

(Note: It was unusual for devas to sit before the Buddhas' presence, they usually remained standing. But here they were sitting, out of reverence for the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta — Commentary).

The company of yakkhas who came with the Four Great Guardian Kings behaved in different ways in the presence of the Buddha: some of them made obeisance to Him and sat in a suitable place: some exchanged words of felicitations and sat in a suitable place; some raised their joined palms in the direction of Him and sat in a suitable place; some declared their names and lineage and sat in a suitable place; some sat remaining silent.

At that assembly of devas, Vessavaṇṇa addressed the Buddha in these words; “Venerable Sir, among very powerful yakkhas, some have pious faith in the Bhagavā while others have not. It is the same with yakkhas of middling powers and those of small powers. Venerable Sir, most yakkhas do not have reverence for the Bhagavā (i.e., they do not like the Bhagavā) because the Bhagavā preaches refraining from killing, stealing, unlawful sexual conduct, lying and taking intoxicants whereas yakkhas generally do not refrain from killing, stealing, unlawful sexual conduct, lying and taking intoxicants. For these yakkhas who lack morality the five moral precepts is anathema.

“Venerable Sir, there are many bhikkhu disciples of the Bhagavā who dwell in monasteries in remote places. These remote places are permanent residences of very powerful yakkhas, who do not show reverence to the Bhagavā. To win their confidence, to serve as protection for bhikkhu-disciples, bhikkhunī-disciples, male lay disciples and female lay disciples of the Bhagavā, to let them be free from harassment of yakkhas, and for a peaceful, carefree life in all the four bodily postures for everyone, may the Bhagavā teach them the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta to the disciples.”

(Herein, Vessavaṇṇa acted as spokesmen for the four Great Guardian Kings because he was well acquainted with the Buddha and was also an accomplished speaker.)

The Buddha accepted Vessavaṇṇa's proposition by remaining silent.

Seeing that the Buddha approved his suggestion, Vessavaṇṇa recited the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta thus:

The Āṭānāṭiya Paritta (Pāli).

— (This is the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta) —

Then Vessavanna said: "Venerable Sir, this is the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta which is to be used as protection for bhikkhu-disciples, bhikkhunī-disciples, male lay disciples, female lay disciples, to let them be free from the harassment of yakkhas, and for a peaceful, carefree life in all the four bodily postures for everyone. Venerable Sir, if a yakkha, or a gandhabba, or a kumbhaṇḍa, or a nāga were to possess with intention to harass any one of the bhikkhu-disciples, or bhikkhunī-disciples, or male lay disciples, or female lay disciples who has learnt this Paritta well, that yakkha will not enjoy the respect and reverence in the village or town which is my prerogative (to allow or disallow them such respect and reverence). Venerable Sir, that yakkha cannot have mansion of his own or get my permission to reside permanently in my city called Aḷakamaṇḍā." After mentioning to the Buddha, the disqualification that surround a recalcitrant yakkha, etc., Vessavaṇṇa went on to say that just as there were recalcitrant men who defied the authority of king, there were also recalcitrant yakkhas who did not obey the authority of the four Great Guardian Kings and that, in case those recalcitrant yakkhas were to possess and harass the four classes of the Buddha's disciples (bhikkhu-disciples, bhikkhunī-disciples, male lay disciples and female lay disciples), thirty-eight deva Generals, such as Inda, Soma, Varuṇa, should be invoked and reported to, describing details. After that, Vessavaṇṇa bid the Buddha farewell in these words: "Venerable Sir, we have many affairs to attend to, we shall go now." (For the Myanmar rendering of Āṭānāṭiya Paritta and details of Vessanna's additional remarks, reference may be made of Pāthika Vagga.)

The Buddha said: "Great Guardian Kings, you know the time to go. (i.e., you may go as you please.)"

Then the four Great Guardian Kings rose from their seats, made obeisance to the Buddha and vanished there. The company of yakkhas, who arrived together with the four Great Guardian Kings, bade farewell to the Buddha in different ways as on their arrival, some rose to make obeisance to the Buddha and vanished from there; some exchanged memorable words of felicitation and vanished from there; some raised joined palms in the direction of the Buddha and vanished from there and some just vanished without saying anything.

The Buddha relates The Story of The Visit of The Four Great Guardian Kings

On the next morning, the Buddha related to the bhikkhus the story of the visit of the four Great Guardian Kings and recited the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta. Then he said:

"Bhikkhus, learn the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta; study it again and again, commit it to memory. Bhikkhus the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta is beneficial to all. It will serve as protection for bhikkhu-disciples, bhikkhunī-disciples, male lay disciples, female lay disciples; it could enable them to free themselves from harassment of yakkhas, and to lead a peaceful, carefree life in all the bodily postures.”

Ritual for Reciting The Āṭānāṭiya Paritta

The reciter of Āṭānāṭiya Paritta must have a thorough knowledge of the Paritta, both in word and meaning. He must be able to enunciate every word correctly. Should there occur any flaw in enunciating it or any deficiency in reciting it, the efficacy of the Paritta will not be as great as it should. Its efficacy depends on the overall efficiency in the reciting.

If the reciter has any self motive of personal gain in the learning and reciting the Paritta, the objective of the Paritta, will not be achieved. The reciter should be primarily motivated by a desire to gain liberation from the round of rebirths, and recite the Paritta in an attitude of good will to all.

— Commentary on Pāthika vagga —

In driving out the yakkha that has possessed a person, Mettā Sutta, Dhajagga Sutta, Ratana Sutta should be tried first. Only if the reciting of those Suttas for even whole days fail, should Āṭānāṭiya Paritta be recited.

Some teachers advised: The reciting bhikkhu should abstain from cakes made from dough, fish, meat and non-vegetarian foods, nor should he dwell at a cemetery. The reason is that yakkhas are fond of those kinds of food, and like to frequent cemeteries so that they could get better opportunity to possess men.

The place where the Paritta is to be recited should be plastered with fresh cow-dung. A clean seat should be spread for the reciter, who should see to his personal cleanliness.

The bhikkhu who is to recite the Paritta should be brought to the assigned place at the house of the victim, surrounded by an armed guard. The recital should not be made in an open space. It must be made in a fully enclosed room, well guarded with armed men. The reciter should have an attitude of good will to all (i.e., including the recalcitrant yakkha). The diffusion of mettā is the internal security for the reciter while an armed guard is the external security. These precautions are necessary for a trouble-free recital.

First of all, the victim must be made to get established in the (Five) Precepts. Only after being established in the Five Precepts should the Paritta be recited for his protection. These measures should put an end to the harassment of yakkhas.

If the yakkha does not release the victim after the end of the recital, the victim should be carried to the monastery and laid on the stupa precincts. An offering, at the place where the victim is lying, will be made to the Buddha together with offerings of lights. The stupa precincts must then be swept clean. Auspicious stanzas (of Maṅgala Sutta) should then be recited as a preliminary measure. Then a loud proclamation should be made calling upon all bhikkhus residing within the monastic area to assemble on the stupa precincts. There will be a certain tree in a grove in the vicinity of the monastery where a guardian tree spirit is traditionally said to reside. A person should be sent to that tree to act as official messenger of the congregation of bhikkhus, where he should say: “O yakkhas, your presence is wanted by the bhikkhu-Sangha.” The yakkhas who resided in that area (including the yakkha who has possessed the victim) cannot neglect the formal invitation because he does not dare to disregard the authority of the Buddha and the four Great Guardian Kings.

Then the victim must be asked: “Who are you?” (Addressing the victim here is addressing the yakkha that has possessed him.) When the yakkha reveals his name, the bhikkhus should say: “Friend so-and-so, we share our merit in our offerings of flowers, seat, and alms-food to the Buddha. The Sangha have recited for your benefit auspicious stanzas; these stanzas are the friendly gift of the Sangha to you. Now, out of respect for the Sangha, release this victim.”

The recalcitrant yakkha should respond to the request of the bhikkhu congregation, made in loving kindness. If he does not respond, then an invocation should be made to the thirty-eight deva Generals, such as Inda, Soma, Varuṇa, and they should be told in these terms: “Deva Generals, as you know, this yakkha has disregarded our request made in loving-kindness. So we have to use the authority of the Buddha.” Having let the deva Generals know the necessity of resorting to the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta in those terms, a recitation of the Paritta should be made. This is the procedure where the victim is a lay person.

In the case of a bhikkhu being possessed by a yakkha, the place for the congregation of bhikkhus should be cleaned; a loud proclamation about the convening of the bhikkhu congregation made, sharing of merit made to the recalcitrant yakkha (for the offerings of flowers, etc., to the Buddha) and a genial request made to him to withdraw. Only when the yakkha remains unresponsive should the Āṭānāṭiya Paritta be recited. (This is the procedure for bhikkhu-victims).

The Buddha's Discourse to Sakka: Sakka Pañha Sutta

At one time, the Buddha was residing at the Indasāla Cave where the Odina woodier tree stood on the slope of the Vedyaka hill, north of Ambasaṇḍa brahmin village, which lay to the east of the City of Rājagaha, in the province of Magadha.

(The brahmin village was known as Ambasanda because it was situated by the side of a mango grove. The Vedyaka hill got its name from a grove of gracefully straight and round trees like columns of sapphire growing around the hill. Indasāla Cave got its name from the Odina woodier tree that stood at its entrance. It was originally a natural stone cave which was later embellished with engravings.)

Signs of Imminent Death appeared to Sakka

As the Buddha was staying at the Indasāla Cave where the Odina woodier tree stood on the slope of the Vedyaka hill near Rājagaha, there appeared to Sakka the five signs that proclaim the approaching death of a deva; (these are: 1. the flowers adorning his person wither; 2. the dress become soiled; 3. the armpit sweat; 4. personal appearance declines; 5. listlessness sets in.) Sakka knew these signs well and said to himself: “Alas, my life span has ended.”

When the five signs of imminent death appear to devas, those with little merit in store are gravely concerned about their next (oncoming) existence. These devas with vast store of merit remember their previous good deeds of giving, observing moral precepts and achieving concentration, and being assured of a good destination in the higher deva realms, remain unperturbed.

As for Sakka, he was fearful and despondent, for he would now lose all the greatness of a Sakka, namely, the Tāvatiṃsa Deva realm which is ten thousand yojanas wide; the Vejayantā palatial mansion that is a thousand yojanas tall; the Sudhammā Assembly Hall, three hundred yojanas wide, for the hearing of the Dhamma; the Coral Tree (the Pariochattaka) which is a hundred yojanas high; the Paṇḍukambalā stab of emerald, which is sixty yojanas long, fifty yojanas wide and fifteen yojanas high; twenty five million celestial dancers; his follower devas who are denizens of Catumahārāja realm and Tāvatiṃsa realm; and celestial parks known as Nandavana Park, Cittalatā Park, Missaka Park, Phāsuka Park.

Then Sakka pondered: “Is there any samaṇa or brāhmaṇa outside the Buddha's Teaching who can allay my worries and fears of death and help perpetuate my Lordship of Devas?” He saw none. He continued pondering and he thought of the Buddha: “The Buddha can allay fears and worries that oppress hundreds of thousands of Sakkas like myself.” Thus he had a strong desire to see the Buddha.

“Where is the Bhagavā residing just now?” he considered. He saw that the Buddha was residing at the Indasāla Cave. He then said to his companions, the Tāvatiṃsa devas: “Friends, the Bhagavā is residing at the Indasāla Cave where the Odina woodier tree stands on the slope of the Vedyaka hill near Rājagaha. Friends, it were well if we go there to see the Bhagava.” The Tāvatiṃsa devas said: “Very well, Lord.”

(Herein, the time and circumstances of Sakka's seeing the Buddha may be noted. A few days ago, Sakka had paid a visit to the Buddha at the Jetavana monastery, in the company of his close attendants such as Mātali but without a big retinue. At that time the Buddha saw that Sakka was not yet ripe for enlightenment and that after two or three days' time he would become obsessed with death after seeing signs of nearing the end of his life, and then he would visit Him in the company of devas from both the Catumahārājika and Tāvātimsa Deva realms to ask fourteen questions and that, at the end of the question concerning equanimity, he would attain Stream-Entry along with eighty thousand devas of Catumahārājika and Tāvātimsa Deva realms. Seeing this situation, the Buddha dwelled in the jhānic absorption of arahatta-phala so that Sakka did not get an opportunity to see him.

On his part, Sakka was thinking: "About three days back the Bhagavā did not give me audience because I went to see him alone. Perhaps, I was not endowed with sufficing condition (of ripened merit) to gain enlightenment. It is customary for the Bhagavā to go to the end of the world-system to preach the Doctrine if there is someone who has sufficing condition for enlightenment. This time, if I go to the Bhagavā along with a company of followers, there must be at least one of them who is endowed with sufficing condition and the Bhagavā would discourse to him. In that way, I shall have my opportunity to hear the discourse which will set my troubled mind at ease." That was why he called the Tāvātimsa devas to accompany him. (This is as explained in the Commentary.)

Then Sakka, on second thought, considered that it would not be wise for him to go straight to the Buddha in the company of devas from Catumahārājika and Tāvātimsa. "It would look somewhat lacking in grace on my part. This Pañcasikha Deva, is well acquainted with the Bhagavā, being used to rendering personal service to the Bhagavā. He has the privilege of seeing the Bhagavā and asking questions freely. It would be well if I were to send him first, apprise my coming to the Bhagavā and obtain the Bhagava's permission, then only I will put my questions to the Bhagavā." Accordingly, he said to Pañcasikha: "O Pañcasikha, the Bhagavā is now residing at Indasāla Cave where the Odina woodier tree stands on the slope of the Vedyaka hill near Rājagaha. It would be well if we approach the Bhagavā there."

"Very well, Lord," said Pañcasikha. Then taking his lute known as Beluvapaṇḍu, and strumming it in accompaniment with a song, thereby letting the other devas know that Sakka was about to go somewhere, stood by the side of Sakka.

At the musical signal of Pañcasikha, Tāvātimsa devas got ready to go. Then just as soon as a strong man were to flex his bent arm, or bend his spread-out arm, they suddenly appeared on the Vedyaka hill lying to the north of Ambasaṇḍa brahmin village, eastwards from Rājagaha in the province of Magadha.

At that time, the Vedyaka hill and Ambasaṇḍa brahmin village were aglow with celestial lights. People living in that area were in awe with wonder at the extraordinary glowing of lights. "Today the Vedyaka hill seems aflame! There are so many glowing lights on the Vedyaka hill and above Ambasaṇḍa brahmin village! What is the matter?" People were talking in great wonder, with goose flesh forming on their skin.

(It should be noted that the visit to the Buddha by Sakka and company was rather too early. They were there after nightfall, when even children had not gone to bed. It was the custom of devas and Brahmās to visit the Buddha around midnight. But now that Sakka was so uneasy at the thought of death that he made the visit in the first watch of the night.)

Then Sakka said to Pañcasikha: "O Pañcasikha, Buddhas generally dwell in jhāna. If it is the time while the Bhagavā is dwelling in jhāna, it is not proper for person like me who is not free of greed, hatred and bewilderment. Go now and ask permission of the Bhagavā for me to see him. Having got permission, we shall go near the Bhagavā."

"Very well, Lord," said Pañcasikha. Then carrying the Beluvapaṇḍu lute in his left arm, he drew near to the Indasāla Cave. He took up his position not too close to the Buddha and not too far either, just a suitable distance away from where the Buddha could hear his music.

Deva Pañcasikha's Songs to The Accompaniment of His Lute

From that appropriate position Deva Pañcasikha played his lute singing songs<sup>1</sup> on the subjects of the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sangha, the Arahat, and of sensual pleasures.

- (1) Vande te pitaraṃ bhaadde timbaruṃ sūriyavacchase yena jātāsi kalyānī Ānanda janantī mama.

My noble Lady of glowing complexion like the radiant sun
Offspring of Lord Timbaru!
You are as fair as fair can be,
Possessing the five qualities of feminine beauty,
The source of my delight.
Out of my fondness for you,
I worship your father Timbaru.

- (2) *Vātova sedataṃ kanto pāṇiyamiva pipsato
Aṅgīraṣi piyāmesi dhammo arahatāmiva.*
(3) *Āturasseva bhesajjāṃ bhojanamiva jighacchato
Parinibāpaya maim bhadde jalantamiva vārinā.*

- (2-3) O glowing complexioned Lady!
Just as a sweating man welcomes a cool breeze,
Just as a thirsty man welcomes drinking water;
Just as the arahat welcomes the Dhamma;
Just as one afflicted by malady welcomes the medicine,
Just as a famished one welcomes the food.
So also I, the deva with Five Knots, adore you.
Just as water quells the blaze,
O my noble Lady!
Let your smile quell the fire of passion in me!

- (4) *Śitokadaṃ pokkharaniṃ yuttam kiṅjakkhareeṇunā
Nāgo ghammābhitattova ogāhe te thamīdaram.*

Just as a tusker oppressed by heat
Wishes to descend into the cool waters of a lily pond,
So also I would fain descend into your soft bosom.

- (5) *Accaṅkusova nāgo va jitaṃ me tuttatomaram
Kāraṇam nappajānāmi sammatto lakkhanūruyā.*

O my noble Lady! Just as a tusker in musk,
Defying the pike that checks him, is blinded by passion,
I too, being infatuated with your graceful thighs,

1. The word-for-word renderings in the original Myanmar, beautiful and learned, are penned by the Sibhani Sayadaw who presided over the Fifth Buddhist Council in Mandalay. He was awarded (1) Narinda bhisiri Saddhamma dhaja mahā dhammarājādhi rājaguru and Narinda bhisiri Sadhammajotipala dhaja mahā dhammarājādhi rājaguru title by King Mindon and Narindha bhi dhaja atuladhipati siri pavara mahā dhammarājā dhirājaguru title by King Thipaw. The Sayadaw wrote the Burmese meaning of the songs in his treatise “Kavi maṇḍana medanī”. Only the gist of each song is given here in English prose.

Am blinded by passion.

- (6) *Tayi gedhitacittosmi cittam vipariṇāmitam.
Patigantum na sakkomi vanikaghastova ambujo.*

O, Lady of radiant complexion!
How I wish to possess you!
Just as a fish that has swallowed the hook.
Is unable to cast it out,
So also my fervour for you is irreversible,
O, how my mind flusters!

- (7) *Vamūrusaja mam bhadde saja main mandalocane
Palissaja mam kalyāni etaṃme abhipattitam.*

O, Lady with lovely thighs!
May you, my beloved, embrace me gently.
O you Perfection personified!
How I yearn for your tender embrace!

- (8) *Appako vata me santo kāmo vellitake siyā
Anebhahāvo samuppādi arahanteva dakkhiṇā.*

Previously, I had known little sensual desire.
But since I have set my eyes, on you,
The possessor of long hair bent at the tips,
Sensual desire has risen by leaps and bounds in me,
Just as the fervent enthusiasm that arises
In one who makes offerings to an Arahat,

- (9) *Yam me atthi kataṃ punnam Arahantesu tādisu
Tam me sabbaṅgakalyāṇi tayā saddhim vipaccatam.*

O Maiden blessed with the five feminine charms!
In me there is past merit.
On account of serving Arahats, the stable ones.
May that merit now result in my nuptial tie with you.

- (10) *Yam me atthi kataṃ punnam asamim pathavimaṇḍale
Tam me sabbaṅgakalyāṇi taya saddhim vipaccatam.*

O Maiden blessed with the five feminine charms!
In me there is past merit (such as alms-offerings)
Done upon the entire-expanse of this great earth.
May that merit result in my nuptial tie with you.

- (11) *Sakyaputtova jhānena ekodi nipako sato
Amatam muni jigāsāno tamahām sūriyavacchase.*

The sage, son of sakya clan (born of King Suddhodāna and Queen Mahā Māyā) who delights in jhāna and who resorts to seclusion,
Who is wise and mindful,
Desires for the Deathless (Nibbāna)
O, my Lady of radiant complexion!
Likewise I desire for you.

- (12) *Yathāpi muni nandeyya patvā sambodhimuttamam
Evam nandeyyam kalyāṇi missibhāvam gato tayā.*

O Embodiment of Elegance!
The Sage, having attained the Supremely Perfect Wisdom (through the seven purities),
Delights in his Enlightenment.
So also, it would delight me greatly.
If I were to be joined with you.

- (13) *Sakko ce me varam dajjā tāvatimsā namissaro
Tā ham bhadde vareyyāhe evam kāmo dalho mama.*

O, my beloved! If Sakka, Lord of Tāvatiṃsa, were to grant me a boon of my choice,
I would opt for you
(rather than for Lordship of Devas).
O my noble Lady!
So firm is my fondness for you.

- (14) *Sālam va na ciram phullam pitaram te sumedhase.
Vandamāno namassāmi yassācetādisī pajā.*

O my Lady of great intelligence!
Like the sudden blooming forth of the coral tree,
You came into existence
As the illustrious daughter of Lord Timbaru
Whom I worship on account of you.

At the end of Pañcasikha's songs, the Buddha praised him: "Pañcasikha, your lute is in perfect harmony with your singing: neither the lute nor the singing dominated (or out rivals) each other."

(Note: The Buddha praised Pañcasikha not because he enjoyed the music, but only for some purpose. For He (being an arahat) is neutral towards all pleasurable or painful sensations because He is possessed of equanimity in six ways (vide Koṭhika Sutta of Saḷāyatana Vagga, Saṃyutta Pāli). Yet He openly praises Pañcasikha to let him know that He approves of the devas action. If He did not give expressed approval, Pañcasikha might withdraw wrongly thinking that he was not welcome. In which case Sakka and company would not have the opportunity to put Sakka's questions and to hear the Buddha's answers to him that would lead to their enlightenment.)

After praising Pañcasikha, the Buddha asked him: "Pañcasikha, when did you compose these verses on the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sangha, the arahat and sensual pleasures?"

Pañcasikha replied: "Venerable Sir, at one time the Bhagavā was staying at the foot of the Ajapāta Banyan Tree, near the bank of the Nerañjarā river, in the Uruvelā Forest (on the eighth week after the Buddha's Enlightenment). Venerable Sir, during that time I fell in love with Sūrijavacchasā, daughter of Lord Timbaru. She, on her part, was in love with Sikhandī, son of Mātali, Sakka's charioteer. Venerable Sir, when I saw that I had to lose Sūrijavacchasā, I went to the mansion of Lord Timbaru and played my Beluvapaṇḍu lute, singing these verses on the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Sangha, the arahat, and sensual pleasures." (The author repeats the verses here.) Venerable Sir, on my playing the lute and singing those verses, Sūrijavacchasa said to me: 'Lord, I had never seen the Bhagavā myself, but while I was dancing at the gathering of Tāvatiṃsa devas at the Assembly Hall for hearing the Dhamma, I had heard of the Bhagavā. Today, you are singing in praise of the Bhagavā, and so you get your opportunity of meeting me.' Venerable Sir, since that day

I had never got the opportunity to see her.”

Sakka goes before The Buddha's Presence

Sakka was glad that Pañcasikha was conversing cordially with the Buddha and said to him: “O Pañcasikha, go and say to the Bhagavā on my behalf: ‘Sakka, Lord of Devas, and his ministers with their retinues make obeisance with their heads at the feet of the Bhagavā.’” “Very well, Lord,” said Pañcasikha, and having approached the Buddha, he said: “Venerable Sir, Sakka and his ministers with their retinues make obeisance with their heads at the feet of the Bhagavā.”

Thereupon, the Buddha said: “Very well, Pañcasikha, may Sakka, his ministers and their retinues be well. Indeed, all beings — devas, human beings, asuras, nāgas, gandhabbas — want to be well.” (This is the customary mode of response of the Buddha to the arrival of mighty devas.)

When the Buddha had said that Sakka entered the Indasāla Cave and making obeisance to Him and stood at a suitable place. Pañcasikha and other Tāvatiṃsa devas also followed Sakka into the cave, made their obeisance to the Buddha and stood at a suitable place.

The Indasāla Cave was not a big one to accommodate this big crowd. However, at that time, the cave became not only spacious enough for the big crowd but its floor, which was normally uneven was then even; the darkness inside also gave way to the dazzling lights of the devas - only that the lights were not as magnificent as the Buddha's aura which surrounded (enveloped) Him to a range of eighty cubits, where the deva's lights were outshone by the Buddha radiance.

Then the Buddha said to Sakka: “Wonderful indeed Sakka, unprecedented it is Sakka, that Sakka of Kosiya clan find time to come here amidst the multifarious duties.”

Sakka said: “Venerable Sir, I have been intending to see the Bhagavā for a long time but various matters concerning Tāvatiṃsa devas had held me back.”

(In this context, “various matters concerning Tāvatiṃsa devas” may be explained here. Sakka as Lord of Devas, has to act as judge or arbiter in disputes between Tāvatiṃsa devas. Devas are born as full grown adults as male or female in the bosom of deva parents. Their spouses also appear on the bed simultaneously. Female attendants to those spouses of devas appear surrounding the bed. Slaves also appear inside the mansion. For that kind of clear-cut cases no disputes arise as to ownership. Devas that appear at the boundary between two mansions form a bone of contention regarding the question of who owns these devas. Disputes arise on that account which are referred to Sakka for a decision.

Sakka would then adjudge ownership of those devas that appear nearer to one of the disputants mansions. Where the distance of the appearance of a certain deva is the same, the deva that was born (i.e. appear suddenly) facing either of the disputants' mansions is declared by Sakka as belonging to that mansion. If that deva was born without facing any of the two mansions then the case has to be concluded by declaring that neither side wins the dispute, and that the deva in question belongs to Sakka. This is the nature of Sakka's duty in matters concerning Tāvatiṃsa devas. Besides those duties, normal life of devas in the enjoyment of sensual pleasures also take up much of Sakka's time. — Commentary

Then Sakka continued: “Venerable Sir, on another occasion (i.e. about three days ago) the Bhagavā was staying at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvatti, (in the chamber built of celestial wood, donated by King Pasenadi of Kosala). I had gone there in the hope of paying my respect to the Bhagavā but, at that time, the Bhagavā was dwelling in jhāna. Bhūjati, Queen of Vessavanna, the Great Guardian King, was standing in worshipping posture by the Bhagavā then. I had said to her: “Sister, say to the Bhagavā on my behalf: ‘Venerable Sir, Sakka, Lord of Devas, and his ministers with their retinues make obeisance with their heads at the feet of the Bhagavā.’” To this, Bhūjati replied to me: “Lord Sakka, this is not the time to see the Bhagavā; He is in solitary seclusion.” Then I said to her:

“Sister, in that case, when He rises from jhāna (phala-samāpatti), say to Him, on my behalf: ‘Venerable Sir, Sakka, Lord of Devas, and his ministers with their retinues make obeisance with their heads at the feet of the Bhagavā.’ How is it, Venerable Sir, did Bhūjati report to You of my message and do You recall it?”

The Buddha said: “Sakka, Lord of Devas, that celestial maiden did report to Me your message and I do recall it. As a matter of fact, I rose from the absorption in the jhāna of Fruition simultaneously with the sound of the rolling of your chariots wheels.”

(Note: There were four principal mansions where the Buddha resided in the Jetavana Monastic compound, namely: (1) Kareri Kuṭi, with the magnificent array of water sycamore trees at its entrance and whose boughs and branches intertwined with one another, provided a pleasant cool shelter as if a pandal had been put up; (2) Kosamba Kuṭi with the great ‘Ceylon’ oak tree whose foliage provided shelter at its entrance; (3) monastic building built of scented wood known as the Gandha kuṭi; (4) monastic building built of celestial wood, called Salaḷāgara monastery. Each of them cost one hundred thousand pieces of silver. The Salaḷāgara monastery was donated by King Pasenadi of Kosala; the other three were donated by Anāthapiṇḍika.

— Commentary on the Dīgha Nikāya, Vol 2 —

Prior to the discourse on Sakka’s questions, when the Buddha was residing in the Salaḷāgara monastery, Sakka had paid a visit to the monastery but as his faculties were not fully ripe yet, the Buddha did not receive him, but continued to dwell on the jhānic absorption of Fruition for a predetermined duration.

Bhūjati was a Queen of Vessavana, the Great Guardian King. She was a Once-Returner, an ariya at the second stage of enlightenment, and so did not find deva pleasures agreeable to her. She spent her time in making obeisance to the Buddha with her joined palms raised above her head.

Sakka returned home after leaving his message with Bhūjati, after paying his respect toward the Buddha in Salaḷāgara monastery. As he drove away skywards, the wheels of his chariot filled the whole Jetavana monastery compound with a strange musical sound as though five kinds of musical instruments were playing. At that very moment, the Buddha rose from His predetermined dwelling in the attainment of arahatta-phala. That being so, the Buddha’s first sense cognition thought was the sound of the chariot. However, it must be noted that the Buddha did not rise from jhāna absorption due to that sound; it was only the predetermined time for arising.

Sakka’s Report to The Buddha

Sakka continued to say: “Venerable Sir, I had learnt from those Tāvātimsa devas, who were there previous to me, that during the time of the appearance of Buddhas, who are Homage-Worthy and Perfectly Self-Enlightened, the number of asuras decline and the number of devas swell. Venerable Sir, I have personally observed this fact that when the Buddha, who is Homage-Worthy and Perfectly Self-Enlightened, appears in the world, the number of asuras decline and the number of devas swell.”

The Story of Deva Gopika

“Venerable Sir, in this city of Sāvattthi, there was once, a Sakyan princess named Gopika, who had faith in the Triple Gem and was in the habit of observing the Five Precepts. She disliked being a female and conducting herself well with a view to being reborn as a male person. She was reborn in the Tāvātimsa Deva realm as my son. He is known as Deva Gopika in Tāvātimsa realm.

“Venerable Sir, three bhikkhus, on the other hand, practised the noble Practice under the Buddha but, at their death, they were reborn as gandhabba, devas inferior to Tāvātimsa devas. These gandhabba devas enjoy sensual pleasures fully and they come to the gathering of devas in the Assembly Hall to entertain the (Tāvātimsa) devas with their music. To them

Deva Gopaka said:

‘Revered Sirs, in what manner of attention did you listen the Bhagava's Teachings? As for me, I was a mere woman (in my former human existence) who could observe just the Five Precepts, but being greatly dissatisfied with womanhood, I conducted myself well with a view to gaining manhood at the next rebirth, with the result that I am now reborn as a son of Sakka, Lord of Devas. In this Tāvātimsa Deva realm I am known as Deva Gopaka.

‘As for you, revered Sirs, you had been bhikkhus who had practised the Noble Path under the Buddha, and yet you are now reborn as gandhabba devas, inferior to Tāvātimsa devas. That looks a very unsatisfactory matter to us.’

On hearing these words of rebuke which sounded as a warning to the three gandhabba devas, two of them gained mindfulness that set them up at the first jhāna there and then, and were reborn in the Brahmāpurohita realm. The third one continued enjoying himself in the Sensuous Sphere.” (Sakka's report not ended yet.)

In this story of Deva Gopaka, the destination of the three former bhikkhus is remarkable. Although they had conducted themselves well as bhikkhus, they were reborn as gandhabba devas, and were called samaṇa devas (devas who had been samaṇas in their former existence). This was because they had, in the past, been gandhabba devas for many existences so that there had in them a liking for that existence (bhavanikanti). Gandhabba devas belong to the realm of the Four Guardian Kings.

When Deva Gopaka met the three sammaṇa devas, he reflected on what previous merit they were endowed with so that they had such attractive appearance. He saw that they had been bhikkhus in their previous existence. Then he reflected whether they had been established in morality and saw that they had been established in morality. He further reflected whether they had further merit and saw that they had attained jhāna. He again reflected where these bhikkhus lived and saw that they were the bhikkhus who went to his (the then Sakyan lady Gopaka) house for daily alms-food. He reviewed their case thus: “Persons established in morality can wish for any of the six deva realms. These bhikkhus do not have rebirth in the higher deva realms. Further, persons who have attained jhāna usually are reborn in the Brahmā realms. These bhikkhus do not get reborn in the Brahmā realms. As for me, I had followed their instruction and am now born as Sakka's own son. These bhikkhus who are reborn as inferior devas as gandhabbas are the aṭṭhiveda type of persons who need goading to the extreme.” That was why he said the words of rebuke: “Revered Sirs, in what manner of attention did you listen to the Bhagava's Teachings? (etc.)”

“Aṭṭhiveda persons who need goading to the extreme” is a reference to the Patoda Sutta, Kesi vagga of Tatiya Paṇṇāsa Aṅguttara Nikāya (Catukka Nipāta) where four types of trained horses and four types of trained men are described. The gist of that exposition:

Four Types of Trained Horses

(1) the horse that responds just by the hint of the use of the goading stick (the chāyā ditṭha), (2) the horse that responds only when struck, so that his hair comes off, (the lomavedha), (3) the horse that responds only when struck, so that his skin is torn off (the cammavedha) and (4) the horse that responds only when struck, so that he feels unbearable pain (the aṭṭhivedha).

Four Types of Trained Men

(on the analogy of the four types of trained horses)

(1) On hearing that so and so in such and such place is suffering from illness, or had died, he has urgent religious awakening (samvega), and he strives to gain Insight and Path-Knowledge, (the chāyāditṭha); (2) On witnessing someone suffering from illness or die in his presence, he has urgent religious awakening, and he strives to gain Insight and Path-Knowledge, (the lomavedha); (3) On witnessing one of his family suffering from illness or die in his presence, he has urgent religious awakening, and he strives to gain Insight and Path-Knowledge (the cammavedha); (4) Only on meeting with some serious illness himself, he has urgent religious awakening, and he strives to gain Insight and Path-Knowledge, (the aṭṭhivedha).

Deva Gopaka placed those three bhikkhus in the fourth category above and therefore considered that they ‘needed goading to the extreme’.

In Sakka’s story the passage, “two of them gained mindfulness that set them up at the first jhāna there and then, and were reborn in the Brahmāpurohita realm” needs some explanation. On hearing the words of Deva Gopaka, two out of the three samaṇa devas thought: “Normally, we ought to be rewarded for our service in entertaining them, but now, instead of any rewards, we are being scolded right from the start, like salt sprinkled onto a hotplate. How is this?” Reflecting on their past existence, they saw vividly that they had been bhikkhus, that they had pure morality, that they had attained jhāna, and that they used to go to Gopaka the Sakyan lady’s residence, for daily alms-food.

They reflected their situation thus: “Person established in morality can wish for any of the six deva realms. Person who have attained jhāna usually are reborn in the Brahmā realms. Yet we have not been able to get rebirth in the higher deva realms or in the Brahmā realms. The young lady, who followed our instructions, is now reborn in the higher deva realm. Although we had been bhikkhus and practised the Noble Path under the Bhagavā, we are reborn as gandhabba devas, which are inferior class of devas (due to our liking for gandhabba existence where we had been repeatedly reborn before). That is the reason why this Deva Gopaka is saying words of rebuke.” The two of them took these words to heart and regained mindfulness of the first jhāna (i.e., they attained the first jhāna) and, based on that concentration, they contemplated, on the impermanence, woefulness and non-self nature of mind and matter, conditioned by causes, and attained anāgāmi-phala there and then.

An anāgāmi-puggala or a Never-Returner has a class of supramundane consciousness that does not fit well with the Five Aggregates pertaining to the gandhabba existence of the Sensuous Sphere; that class of consciousness is superior to that of the Sense Sphere existence. Hence as soon as anāgāmi-magga was attained, these two ariya devas passed away from the deva existence and were reborn in the Brahmāpurohita realm, the middle plane of the three Fine-material realms, because they attained the first jhāna which is the medium class of jhāna. Although it is said that they were reborn in the Brahmāpurohita realm, their bodies did not appear in that Brahmā realm. They remained in Tāvātimsa Deva realm (at the Assembly Hall for the discussion of the Dhamma) in the form of Brahmāpurohita Brahmās instead of the gandhabba deva forms.

The third gandhabba deva was unable to give up his clinging to the gandhabba existence and so remained in his present existence as a Catumahārājikā deva.

(These details are as explained in the Commentary.)

After Sakka, Lord of the Devas, has related in prose to the Buddha the story of Deva Gopaka, he further spoke in fifteen stanzas on the same subject. Then in three more stanzas, he sang in praise of the Buddha’s attributes, the Teaching of the Buddha, and the purpose of his visit which was to attain the supramundane magga-phala like that attained by those two Brahmās. He then concluded his last three stanzas with a request that if the Buddha would permit, he would put certain questions (and hear the Buddha’s answers on them). The last of Sakkas eighteen stanzas is as follows:

*Tassa dhammassa pattiya āgatamhāsi mārisa
Katāvākāsā bhagavatā pañham pucchemu mārisa.*

O, Venerable One, who is free from all forms of dukkha, we have come here for the benefit of gaining the Supramundane dhamma that those two Brahmās gained. O, Venerable One, who is free from all forms of dukkha, if the Bhagavā would, out of compassion, permit us, we would ask some questions.

Then the Buddha reflected: “This Sakka has long been virtuous. Whatever question he might like to ask, it will be of benefit to him. He is not going to ask unbeneficial questions. If I answer to his questions he will understand readily.”

The Story of Magha, The Young Man of Macala Village

The Commentary elaborates the passage: “This Sakka has long been virtuous” by relating the past existence of Sakka, when he had lived a virtuous life as Magha, a young man in the village of Macala, in the province of Magadha. That was at a time before the advent of the Buddha.

Early one morning, Magha went to the open space in the village, where the villagers met to discuss community affairs, to tidy the ground. Another man found the ground inviting and spent his time there. Magha was glad that his effort was useful to others. So he selected a spacious place in the centre of the village, swept it clean, strew it with clean sand and, in the cold season, he collected faggots and made small fires there. The villagers, young and old, gathered there to warm themselves by the fireside.

One day, Magha thought about the ease and comfort enjoyed by the king, his ministers and officials in the city. He also thought about the Moon Deva and the Sun Deva up in the skies. What previous actions had they done so that these great people on earth and the great devas in the sky enjoy such ease and comfort? Surely they must have done pure meritorious deeds that have led to their present state. Reasoning correctly thus, he decided to go on doing pure meritorious deeds in the footsteps of those great persons.

He woke up early in the morning, took his breakfast of rice gruel, and taking the necessary tools and implements, he went to the place where the four main roads met. He removed rocks that stood in the way, cut down trees that were growing too close by the roadside to allow free carriage way, and levelled the roadway. He set up a rest house at the road junction, dug a rectangular pond, built bridges and spent the whole day earning merit and retired only at sunset.

Seeing Magha's daily routine, a villager asked him: “Friend Magha, you leave the village early in the morning and come back only late in the evening. What have you been doing?”

“Friend,” said Magha, “I am doing pure meritorious deeds, I am paving the way to the deva-world.”

“What do you mean by pure meritorious deeds?”

“Don't you know what is pure meritorious deed?”

“No, I don't.”

“Haven't you seen the glorious state of the king, the king's ministers and officials when you visit the city?”

“Yes, I did.”

“Well, the king and those great people enjoy their elite status because in the past they had done pure meritorious deeds. I am doing that sort of work that leads to similar state, Have you not heard of the Moon Deva and the Sun Deva?”

“Yes, I have.”

“I am paving the way to the deva-world.”

“Friend Magha, are you doing these works all by yourself?. Are you the only person fit for the sort of work? Could not other people also do it?”

“Friend, there is nothing that forbids anyone to do it.”

“In that case, friend Magha, let me know when you go to the countryside tomorrow.”

The next day Magha had a partner in his good works. In due course he had by his side thirty-three strong youths who volunteered on his projects. This team of Magha and thirty-three youths had a common mind in seeking merit. They went about together mending roads, digging tanks, building rest houses and bridges. They executed their projects with might and main, generally finishing a particular work within the same day.

The Village Chief plans for Magha's Ruin

The chief of Macala village was a rogue. He found Magha's social undertakings unacceptable because he himself sold liquor in the village and when there occurred brawls and quarrels, he increased his income through fines collected as penalty. His trade was dwindling when youths did not visit his place for drinks but went out on sheer social projects. Therefore, he used his official position to cause the ruin of Magha and his comrades. He misinformed the King that a band of bad hats had been troubling his village. When asked by the King what lineage those criminals belonged to, the chief of Macala said: "Great King, they come from good families."

"How come that men of good families turn bad? Why did you keep the bad news till now?"

"Great King, I was afraid that they might turn on me. May Your Majesty pardon me for this!"

The King believed the chief's words and ordered the arrest of the so called criminals, despatching a contingent of his men with him.

Magha and Party arrested

Magha and party, after returning from their work and having had their evening meal, were discussing the next day's plan for meritorious deeds in the village centre when the chief surrounded them, placed them "under arrest by the King's orders" and were taken to the King.

The wives of those youths heard the news of the arrest and said: "That serves them right. These men of ours have been giving lame excuses for shirking their household duties and spending their time in the countryside everyday."

The Royal Elephant refuses to trample on Magha and Company

When Magha and party were presented to the King, without investigating them, he passed the order that the band be trampled to death by the royal elephant. As they were taken to the place of execution, Magha said to his comrades: "Friends, will you listen to my words?" "Dear Magha, we are in this plight for listening to your words. Nevertheless, we shall continue to do so. What is your advice?"

"Friends, death comes to all wayfarers in this samsāra. Now, are you robbers (as alleged by the village chief)?"

"Certainly not," they replied.

"Friends, asseveration of truth is the only reliance for all people in the world. So, declare the truth like this: 'If we are robbers (as alleged by the chief) let the elephant trample on us; if we are not robbers let the elephant not trample on us.' "

The thirty-three youths made their asseveration as instructed. The royal elephant, far from trampling on them, dared not even come near them but trumpeted in fear and ran away. The mahout goaded the elephant with the spike and other sharp points to come back to the site but to no avail.

When the situation was reported to the King, he ordered: "In that case, conceal the criminals under matting and let the elephant trample over it." The King's men did as ordered but this time the royal elephant showed even greater fright, trumpeted in a doubly loud sound and ran away.

The King finds out The Truth and rewards Magha and Company

When the King learned the miraculous news he summoned the chief of Macala village and asked: “Is it true that the royal elephant refused to trample these men?”

“That is true, your Majesty. This is because their leader (Magha) knows a mantra that frightens elephants.”

Thereupon the King sent for Magha and asked: “Is it true that you know a mantra that frightens elephants?”

Magha replied: “Your Majesty, I have no such mantra. What my associates and I did was to make a solemn declaration: ‘If we are robbers and enemies of the King let the elephant trample on us, if we are not, let the elephant not harm us.’”

Then the King asked: “What sort of activities did you engage yourselves in?”

“Your Majesty, we repair roads, build rest-houses for travellers at road junctions, dig tanks and build bridges, or repair old bridges. We go to various places to carry out this kind of undertakings.”

“Why do you think the village chief reported falsely against you?”

“Your Majesty, the chief used to enjoy a good income from selling liquor when the youth of the village were forgetful and wanted to enjoy themselves. But since we engaged ourselves in useful work and are not forgetful as before, the chief loses his usual income. That was the reason for reporting against us.”

Then the King said: “O Magha, the royal elephant, though a mere animal, understands your good qualities whereas I, even though a human being did not understand them. From now, you be the chief of Macala village. I present you with my royal elephant. Let the slanderer, that old chief, be your slave. From now on, do meritorious deeds on my behalf too.” And he lavished the group with rich rewards.

On their happy journey home they rode the elephant by turns. Magha said to his friends: “Friends, meritorious deeds are generally aimed at future existence. But here we are reaping the merit of our good deeds, even at the present, like the brown lily growing in the water. Let us do good deeds with still greater zeal.” Then he said further: “What sort of meritorious work shall we do now?” And all agreed, after discussion, that they would build a big rest-house at the road junction as a permanent shelter for travellers coming that way. “But let us make it a point that our wives have no share whatever in our good deeds. They had been unkind to us. They failed to understand us. Instead of thinking about our release, they even showed delight at our misfortune.”

Magha and Party build A Big Rest-house

The thirty-four youths, headed by Magha, each gave a morsel of rice and a bunch of grass a day to feed the elephant which was sufficient for the animal. As the group cut down trees for timber, the elephant dragged them and placed them on the work site. The group began in earnest, shaping the timber for the construction of a big rest-house.

Magha's Four Wives

Magha had four wives by the names of Sūjā, Sudhammā, Cittā and Nandā. Of these four, Sudhammā asked the chief carpenter about the reason why Magha and party are spending the whole day in the forest. The chief carpenter told her about the rest-house construction project. Sudhammā requested him to arrange for her contribution in the project but he told her that Magha and party had decided against contribution of any kind from their wives. Thereupon, Sudhammā bribed the chief carpenter with eight ticals of silver to see to her contribution in the project.

The chief carpenter agreed. He went to the village centre and loudly proclaimed to Magha and party that it was time to start work for the day. When he was sure that everyone in the party was on his way to the forest, he said: “Boys, you go ahead. I have some business that is keeping me back.” He went in another direction and chose a tree fit for making a ridge-pole. He sent it to Sudhammā and said: “Keep this until I send someone for it.”

The construction project progressed from stage to stage: collection of timber, site clearing, foundation-work, structural frame and scaffolding were all ready and in place, except the rafters. At that juncture, the chief carpenter announced that to fix the rafters he needed a ridge-pole but that he forgot to find a piece of timber of a special kind for the purpose. The working party blamed the man for his forgetfulness and asked him where to find one at this belated stage. "Let us try and inquire at our kinsmen's places," said the chief carpenter. Magha and party went into the village asking whether anyone had got some suitable piece of timber for making a ridge-pole.

Sudhammā said she had got one. The party of workers asked the price for it, but she said: "I don't want any price, but let it be my contribution." Magha scoffed at the idea. "Come men, let's go," he said, "this woman shall not be allowed to contribute. We will get one from the forest." So saying, they left the village.

Back at the work site, the chief carpenter, sitting on the scaffolding for fixing the ridge-pole, asked: "Where's the timber for the ridge pole?" Magha and his friends explained the situation. The chief carpenter then looked up to the sky and said: "Young men, today is a very auspicious day; another equally auspicious day will not be around at least for another year. You have collected all the timber in this structure with so much trouble. If we were to leave it unroofed, it will rot as it is. Let Sudhammā have her contribution and share the result of the merit in the deva-world. Please get the timber for the ridge-pole from her house."

In the meantime, Sudhammā had an inscription that read: "This is Sudhammā Rest-House" carved on the lower surface of the ridge-pole which was wrapped up with a piece of new cloth. Magha's men then came back and said: "O Sudhammā, please bring the ridge-pole. Let things take their own course. We shall now share the merit with you." Sudhammā, in handing over the ridge-pole, warned them: "Don't take off that cloth-wrapping until eight or sixteen rafters have been fixed to the ridge-pole!"

The builders obeyed her warning. They removed the cloth-wrapping on the ridge-pole only after it had been put in place, needing only to be nailed down. Then an observant villager, looking up the building, noticed the inscription. "What is written there?" A literate villager read it out to them: "It reads: 'This is Sudhammā Rest-house.' "

At that, Magha and company protested loudly: "Remove that ridge-pole men! We, who had laboured all along, have got none of our names on this building, whereas, Sudhammā, by putting in a piece of timber a cubit long got her name for the whole Rest-house." But even while they were protesting, the chief carpenter nailed down all the fixtures at the ridge-pole, thus putting the finishing work.

The builders, later on, marked out three portions on the floor space of the big rest-house: one for the King and his officers, one for the common people and one for the sick.

Sharing of Responsibility in The Running of The Rest-house

There were thirty-three flooring boards used in the building of the Rest-house, each assigned to one of Magha's men. The elephant was given the instructions by Magha that whenever a guest arrived and sat on the board assigned to one of the thirty-three co-builders, the elephant was to take the guest to the house of that co-builder where the guest would get every care and attention. These instructions were satisfactorily followed by the elephant so that every guest who came to the rest-house got food, lodging and massage services at the co-builders house for the day.

Contributions by Magha's Family

(1) Magha had a coral tree planted not far away from the rest-house. Beneath the tree, he laid a big stone slab. (2) Nandā, one of Magha's wives, dug a big tank not far away from the rest-house. (3) Cittā, another wife of Magha, created a garden in the vicinity. (4) Sūjā, the senior most wife of Magha, was not interested in works of merit. She spent much of her time in front of the mirror, tending herself to look beautiful. Magha said to her: "Now Sūjā, Sudhammā had the opportunity to contribute her mite in the building of the rest-house; Nandā has a tank to her credit; and Cittā has created a garden. But you have done no meritorious deed. Please do some good deed for the benefit of others. Sūjā replied: "My lord, for whom did you perform these good deeds? Are your good deeds not mine also.” She was not interested. She just went on her way beautifying herself

The Hereafter of Magha and Party: Magha is reborn as Sakka

Magha lived the full life span and at the death of that existence he was reborn in the Tāvatiṃsa Deva realm as Sakka, Lord of Devas. His thirty-three friends, at their death, were also reborn in Tāvatiṃsa Deva realm as Sakka's close assistants.

(Of the four wives of Magha, Sudhammā, Cittā and Nandā, at their death, were reborn as the three queens of Sakka. The senior most wife of Magha, Sūjā, who did not listen to Magha's advice but spent her time embellishing herself, at her death was reborn as a paddy bird in a ravine.)

Sakka's Grand State

Sakka's Vejayanta palace was seven hundred yojanas high; the flag post on the top of it is three hundred yojanas high. As the result of planting the coral tree when he was Magha, the celestial coral tree, three hundred yojanas in diameter of foliage, with a trunk of fifteen yojana girth, (with a height of a hundred yojanas) arose in the Tāvatiṃsa realm. For his former deed of laying a stone slab for the use of the public, there arose his majestic Paṇḍukambalā rock throne of emerald colour which is sixty yojanas in length (fifty yojanas in width and fifteen yojanas in height.)

For having donated timber in the construction of the rest-house, Sudhammā Assembly Hall for the discussion of the Dhamma arose, much to the fame and honour of Queen Sudhammā. (Likewise) for her former donation for public use of a tank, Nandā tank arose in Tāvatiṃsa realm to the credit of Queen Nandā, and for her donation for Public use of a garden, Cittalatā Park, sixty yojanas wide, appeared in Tāvatiṃsa realm to perpetuate the name of Queen Cittā.

Sakka sat at the Sudhammā Assembly Hall on a golden throne one yojana long, with a white umbrella three yojanas wide, held above him, surrounded by thirty three assistants or celestial Chieftains and three deva queens, while twenty-five million celestial dancers kept Sakka and his queens entertained. His followership comprised devas of Catumahārāja and Tāvatiṃsa realms.

The Strange Destiny of Sūjā

Magha was glad that his three former wives in the human existence were now deva queens but where had Sūjā been reborn? He reviewed the destiny of this former wife and saw that she was a paddy bird in a ravine. “Alas! this girl disregarded my words and is now having an ignoble existence,” Sakka said to himself, and he went to the place where Sūjā the paddy bird lived.

Sūjā recognized Sakka as Magha of her previous existence and she held down her face in despondency. “O you stupid girl!” he scolded her, “You spent all your time in preening yourself. And now you are afraid to look up to me. Sudhammā, Nandā, and Cittā are now deva queens. Come with me and see our happy state.” So saying, he took her to Tāvatiṃsa realm where she was put at the Nandā Park. He then resumed his seat on the golden throne at the Vejayantā Palace.

Sūjā is slighted by The Deva Dancers

The deva dancers asked Sakka: “Where have you been just now, Lord?” Sakka was reluctant to answer. But when pressed further by them, he told them the truth. He said that Sūjā, having been reborn a paddy bird in a ravine, had been brought by him and that she was now staying at the Nandā Park.

The deva dancers, who had been servants at Sūjā's household in their past existence, went to the Nandā Park to see their former mistress. They poked fun at her funny appearance. “Look at Sūjā's beak, it's like a spike for hunting crabs!” Poor Sūjā was deeply hurt when those girls, who had been her household servants in the human world and whom she had treated with disdain, were now so scornful of her. She entreated Sakka to send her back to her own place: “What use is there for me with these palaces glittering with gold and gems? This Nandā Park has no attraction for me. All beings feel at home only where they are born. Send me back to the ravine. That is where I belong.”

Sakka complied with her wish. Before leaving her at the ravine he asked: “Now, will you listen to my word (this time)?” And Sūjā replied: “Yes, I will, my Lord.” “Then take upon yourself to observe the Five Precepts. Observe them well without the slightest flaw. I will then make you Chief of those deva maidens in two or three days.”

Sūjā, the paddy bird, was observing the Five Precepts when, two or three day later, Sakka came to test her virtue. He took up the form of a fish and floated spine downwards in front of Sūjā in a stream. Thinking that it was a dead fish, Sūjā seized it by the head when, lo! its tail fluttered. Sūjā said: “Oh, it’s a live fish!” and let it go. Then Sakka standing in the sky, cried out: “Good! Good! you observe the Five Precepts well. For this virtuous conduct, I shall make you Chief of the deva maidens two or three days hence.”

Sūjā was reborn as A Potter’s Daughter

Sūjā, as a paddy bird, lived a life span of five hundred years. Since she would not eat live fish, she was mostly starving herself. Although she was failing in her health due to starvation, she never breached the Five Precepts. At her death, she was reborn as the daughter of a potter in the city of Bārāṇasī.

Sakka reviewed the fate of Suja, the paddy bird, and seeing that she was now the potter’s daughter, he thought of helping her in life as it was not appropriate for him to take her to Tāvātimsa realm straight from the potter’s house. So he turned himself into an old man selling golden cucumbers. He was not however selling them for any amount of money: “I will sell them only to those who have morality,” he said to the would-be buyers, who said: “Old man, we do not know what is meant by morality. Name your price for these.” But the old man insisted: “They will go only to those who observe morality.” The villagers said among themselves: “Let’s go, men, this old man is rather quaint!” And so they left.

The potter’s daughter asked them: “You went to buy cucumbers. Where are the cucumbers?”

“Dear girl, that cucumber vendor is rather quaint. He says he will sell his cucumbers only to those who observe morality. Perhaps he has got daughters who were fed on morality. But, as for us, we do not even know what morality means.”

On hearing this strange news, Sūjā rightly surmised that these golden cucumbers must have been meant for her only, so she went to the old man and said: “O Father, give me the cucumbers.”

“My little girl, do you observe morality?”

“Yes, Father, I observe morality well without a flaw.”

“These cucumbers which are solid gold are for you,” said the old man who was Sakka in guise. After leaving the whole cart of golden cucumbers in front of the potter’s house, he vanished to Tāvātimsa.

Sūjā is reborn as A Daughter of Vepacitti Asura

The potters daughter observed the Five Precepts throughout her life and, on her death, she was reborn as the daughter of Vepacitti Asura. Thanks to the observance of morality in her two previous existences as a paddy bird and as a potter’s daughter, she possessed great beauty and charm. Vepacitti Asura planning to marry his daughter to a suitable husband, and called an assembly of asuras.

Sakka reviewed the destiny of Sūjā again. He saw that Sūjā was now born as an Asura and that her marriage was being planned. “Now is my chance to get Sūjā,” he thought, and setting his mind on eloping her, went to the assembly of asuras in the guise of an asura. As he sat in the midst of asuras no one noticed him as stranger.

Vepacitti Asura handed her daughter a garland saying: “Make your choice of the bridegroom by throwing this garland above the head of anyone of your fancy.” Sūjā looked around and, on seeing Sakka in the guise of an asura, she was inflamed with love, a love that had bound the two in many previous existences. “This is my bridegroom (lit, my husband),” she declared, throwing the garland above Sakka’s head.

Thereupon, seizing Sūjā’s arm firmly, Sakka went up into the sky. Then only the asuras know that it was Sakka and raised a cry: “Friends, hold him! Hold this old Sakka! He is our enemy. We will never give up our Sūjā to this old Sakka.”

Vepacitti Asura asked his followers: “Who is it that has taken away my daughter?”

“My Lord, it is that old Sakka!”

Then he said to his followers: “This Sakka is the most powerful person besides myself. So make way.”

Sakka succeeded in his amorous venture. He made Sūjā, Chief of the twenty-five million celestial dancers in Tāvātimsa.

Thereafter, Sūjā said to her husband: “My Lord, I have no relatives here in Tāvātimsa. So take me wherever you go.” Sakka conceded to this wish.

(This is the story of Magha)

The Buddha had known the virtue of Sakka since the latter’s previous existence as Magha, the young man of Macala village. That was why He bethought Himself: “Whatever question Sakka might like to ask, it will be of benefit to him; he is not going to ask unbeneficial questions. If I answer his questions, he will understand readily.”

Then the Buddha replied to Sakka in verse:

*Puccha vāsava maṃ pañhaṃ yam kiñci manasicchasi.
Tassa tasseva pañhassa ahaṃ antaiṇ koromi te.*

Vāsava, Lord of Devas, whatever question you may like to ask, put it to Me. I, the Teacher of the three worlds, will clear any doubts and uncertainties concerning your questions.

Sakka’s Questions and The Buddha’s Answers

Thus obtaining the Buddha’s expressed consent, Sakka spoke in verse his (first) question thus:

(1) The First Question and Answer

On Covetousness and Stinginess

“Venerable Sir, all beings, whether deva or human, asura, nāga, or gandhabba, have an earnest desire to be free from enmity, danger, enemies, sorrow and anger. However, they live in enmity and danger amidst enemies, sorrow and anger. What is the factor that fetter them thus?”

To that question the Buddha answered as follows:

“Sakka, King of Devas, all beings, whether deva or human, asura, nāga, or gandhabba, have an earnest desire to be free from enmity, danger, enemies, sorrow and anger. However, they live in enmity and danger amidst enemies, sorrow and anger. This is due to issā (envy) and macchariya (meanness, stinginess).

Envy and Stinginess differentiated

Here envy (issā), means begrudging other’s well being and status.

(1) It has the character of feeling displeased with other’s gain, whether already acquired or about to acquire.

(When the sign or character of the displeasure in someone who begrudges another person's gain, already acquired or is likely to be acquired, is noticed, the fact of the arising of envy in that person should be known through the knowledge of Abhidhamma, the ultimate truth about natural mental phenomena.)

(2) Envy has the function of dissatisfaction with others prosperity.

(It is the function of envy to feel distressed to get annoyed, when someone sees or hears other's gain.)

(3) Envy is manifested to the insight of the yogi, as turning away from others' well being. (To the yogi, who has insight into mental phenomena, the result of envy is manifested as the turning away in disgust from the success and wellbeing of others. Of the four kinds of manifestation, this is the manifestation of result.)

(4) The proximate cause of envy is other people's wellbeing or status. (Envy arises due to other person's prosperity. If one has no occasion to see or hear of another person's wealth, there is no cause for envy to arise.) (Commentary on the Abhidhamma)

The character of envy that reveals itself as begrudging others wellbeing and status should be explained regarding both lay persons and bhikkhus. To wit: Someone may have acquired through his own effort and qualities, in any form of enterprise, valuable things, such as vehicles or horses or cattle or precious stones.

Another person, with envy in him, may find it an eyesore to see that successful man prosper. He is very displeased with the other man's good fortune. "When will this fellow meet his downfall? How I wish he become a pauper!" Such evil thoughts occupy the envious person. And if the successful man does meet with bad fortune, the envious one rejoiced to see it.

An envious bhikkhu sees another bhikkhu surrounded by fame and followership on account of the latter's learnedness and efforts such as teaching the doctrine. The one with envy is all the time thinking about the decline of the successful bhikkhu. If the latter does sink in popularity, the former is pleased.

In this manner, the character of envy should be known as begrudging other's well being and feeling displeased with other's gains. (Commentary on the Abhidhamma)

It is in the nature of envy to feel irritated by some gain that someone is enjoying as a matter of fact. Even the likelihood of someone meeting with some good fortune cannot be tolerated by envy. Envy longs for another person's failure and downfall. (Leda Sayadaw: Paramattha Deplane, Chapter on Mental concomitants) This is an explanation on envy (issā).

Macchhariya: Stinginess, Miserliness, Meanness

Stinginess is also called meanness. It is a mean attitude concerning one's own possessions.

(1) It is characterized by a secretiveness about one's gains or status already enjoyed or about to enjoy. (One oppressed by macchhariya, an evil state of mind, is secretive about one's success.)

(2) Stinginess functions as a reluctant attitude about one's own good fortune; the reluctance is the attitude that no one should enjoy similar fortune. One oppressed by stinginess is loath to share his gain or status with someone else. This meanness is the function of macchhariya.

(3) Macchhariya is manifested as unwillingness to share one's gain or status with any other person. If perforce when there is occasion to share it, the stingy person feels very strongly against it. Or put it in another way, if it comes to sharing his property with someone or making any donation to someone, he would part with a very tiny portion of it reluctantly. (To a wise one with insight, stinginess is manifested as meanness about one's property (or rights). This is the natural manifestation. Considered from another angle, stinginess manifests itself in anger when one is forced to part with one's property (or rights). This is manifestation by way of function, i.e., how the manifestation works out itself. Or yet viewed in another way, it manifests itself as parting with only an insignificant part of one's possession under unavoidable circumstances, i.e., giving away merely as name-sake which does not amount to a real meaningful gift. This is manifestation as result.

- (4) The proximate cause of stinginess is one's own possession or rights.

— Commentary to Abhidhamma —

Five Kinds of Macchhariya or Stinginess or Meanness

- (1) Stinginess or meanness about living place: monastery, dwelling place, park, day resort, night camp etc., (āvāsa-macchhariya).
- (2) Stinginess or meanness about one's circle of friends or relatives, i.e., unwillingness to see one's or relatives friends to be on friendly terms with others (kula-macchhariya).
- (3) Stinginess or meanness to share any form of gain with another (lābha-macchhariya).
- (4) Stinginess or meanness in being painful to see others look as attractive in appearance as oneself or gain as fair a reputation as oneself (vaṇṇa-macchhariya).
- (5) Stinginess or meanness to share doctrinal knowledge with others, (dhamma-macchhariya).

(To expand this:)

- (1) "Living place" may mean any living space for bhikkhus, whether the whole monastic complex or a room or space allotted for residing by day or by night. A bhikkhu, who has a specific place to dwell, lives in comfort as a bhikkhu and enjoys the four bhikkhu requisites (i.e., food, robes, lodging, medicines). A stingy or mean bhikkhu cannot agree to the idea of sharing his living place with some other bhikkhu who fulfils his bhikkhu obligations, big or small. If that other bhikkhu happens to get a chance of living there, the stingy one is wishing in his own mind that the newcomer leave soon. This attitude or state of mind is called stinginess or meanness about living quarters. Exception: If the co-resident of a living place is quarrelsome, the unwillingness to share with him is not stinginess.
- (2) Stinginess about ones friends or followership: Kula-macchhariya (kula: clan; supporter to a bhikkhu).

The relatives and lay supporters of a bhikkhu form the subject of stinginess or meanness here. A stingy bhikkhu wants to monopolise them. He does not wish any of them going to the monastery of another bhikkhu or let them have any relationship between them and the bhikkhu. Exception: If the other bhikkhu is of an immoral type (dussīla), the unwillingness to see that happen does not amount to stinginess. As immoral bhikkhu is likely to debase his lay supporters; so the unwillingness to have relations with one's own relatives and lay supporters is proper. It is stinginess only when that other bhikkhu is a virtuous one.

- (3) "Any form of gain" includes the four bhikkhu-requisites, which are robe, alms-food, dwelling, medicine. When, on seeing a virtuous bhikkhu receiving the four requisites, a bhikkhu harbours such thoughts as "May that one be deprived of these gains", this is stinginess or meanness about gain. Exception: Where the unwillingness to see another bhikkhu receive the four requisites is justifiable, there is no evil of stinginess or meanness. It is justifiable where that other bhikkhu is in the habit of misusing the four requisites, thus destroying the faith of the donors, or if that bhikkhu does not make proper use of them but hoards them without giving them away in time so that they turn unusable (having gone stale or gone to rot.)
- (4) "Vaṇṇa" means personal appearance or attributes. Meanness regarding Vaṇṇa means displeasure at other person's good looks or attributes in the sense that no one must have the same good looks or the same good attributes as oneself. The mean person (bhikkhu) hates to discuss about other peoples personal attractiveness or good name concerning morality, practice of austerity, or practice of dhamma.
- (5) "Dhamma" is of two kinds: pariyatta-dhamma, learning the piṭaka and paṭivedha- dhamma, attainment of the Noble Path culminating in magga-phala nibbāna. The latter is the property of ariyas who are never stingy or mean about their Insight-Knowledge. In fact they are desirous of sharing it with all beings, devas, humans and Brahmās. They wish all beings to acquire the paṭivedha-dhamma they have gained for themselves. Therefore the expression Dhamma-macchhariya can mean only stinginess or meanness about learning, pariyatta dhamma. Here the meanness lies in not wanting other people know what one has acquired by learning the difficult and obscure passages in the Pāli Text and in the commentaries. One wishes to remain the sole authority in the matter of learning. Exceptions: The unwillingness to share the book knowledge may be justified on two counts:-

- (i) where the learner's integrity is doubtful while the purity of the Dhamma (Doctrine) needs to be safeguarded;
- (ii) where the value of the Dhamma is carefully considered and the type of person needs to be saved in his own interest.

These two exceptions need to be understood properly.

- (i) In the first case, there are some persons in the world who are fickle minded and change from one faith to another, from samaṇa to brāhmana to a heretical ascetic. If such an unreliable bhikkhu were to be taught the Piṭaka, he might distort the subtle teachings of the Piṭaka to suit his own purpose. He might misinterpret the meanings of scriptural terms such as meritoriousness and demeritoriousness. He might put the Buddha's Teachings into the mouth of some heretic and claim them that they were what the heretic teacher said. There would be confusion. Therefore keeping the Piṭaka from those unreliable bhikkhus so as to preserve the purity of the Dhamma is justified.
- (ii) In the second case, where the learner bhikkhu is of the type of person who is likely to claim arahatship even though not yet an arahat, that would be his ruination. Keeping the Piṭaka from such an unreliable bhikkhu is also justifiable. It is in his own interest that the profound Dhamma is not imparted to him, so that the non-sharing of the learning in such cases is not stinginess or meanness.

Stinginess exists in the case of a teacher where he is afraid that his pupil might outshine him, or excel him in the interpretation of the Dhamma and so withholds the learning.

Evil Consequences of The Five Kinds of Stinginess

- (1) One who acts with stinginess in dwelling (āvāsa-macchhariya), is reborn as a demon or hungry spirit, and due to the meanness about his living quarters, he is destined to carry the filth of that dwelling place on his head wherever he goes.
- (2) One who is stingy about relatives and followership (kula-macchhariya), feels painful to see his relatives and lay supporters making offerings to other bhikkhus. The greater the degree of stinginess, the greater the pain. In extreme cases, thinking his relatives and lay supporters have turned away from him, the stingy bhikkhu suffers heart-burning to such an extent that he may vomit blood, or his entrails would go to pieces and come out.
- (3) Stinginess about bhikkhu requisites (lobha-macchhariya), whether in respect of those of the Sangha or of a sect of the Sangha, not sharing them with fellow-bhikkhus, leads to rebirth as a demon or a hungry spirit or a python.
- (4) Stinginess about personal appearance or attributes (vaṇṇa-macchhariya), that makes one self-admiring and deprecating of others, leads to ugliness in appearance in future existences.
- (5) (Penetration of the Dhamma (paṭivedha-dhamma), i.e. attainment of magga-phala nibbāna, arises only in the mind of the ariya who has destroyed all the defilements so that stinginess no longer arises in him, he is never selfish about what he has understood from the practice of the Dhamma.) Stinginess about the Dhamma is possible only in respect of learning. Stinginess regarding one's learning (pariyattidhamma macchhariya), keeping one's knowledge to oneself, leads to rebirth as a dullard, an ignoramus, a stupid person.

(Or explained in another way:)

- (1) Āsāva-macchhariya leads to rebirth in niraya where the stingy one is baked on hot iron sheets. (This is because he had prevented others from enjoying the peace and comfort of living quarters.)
- (2) Kula-macchhariya results in dearth of good fortune in future existences. (This is the result of denying others their right or receiving offerings at the homes of the lay supporters.)
- (3) Lobha-macchhariya leads to rebirth in niraya where the stingy one wallows in human excreta. (This niraya is particularly nauseating. This kind of result follows the stingy one because he had deprived others of the pleasure of the enjoyment concerning the bhikkhu requisites.)
- (4) Vanna-macchhariya results in a complete lack of presentable appearance and good attributes in future existences. A detestable appearance and an abominable reputation is what he inherits for his past meanness. Whatever good he might do, goes unnoticed by anyone like arrows shot away in the dark night
- (5) Dhamma-macchhariya sends the bhikkhu down to the niraya of hot ashes.

Envy arises from consideration of other people's property. Stinginess arises from consideration of one's own property. Since the object of thought differs, envy and stinginess cannot arise together.

In the world, enmity, punishment and antagonism between persons arise due to envy and stinginess which are two evil fetters. These fetters are eliminated only by sotāpatti-magga. Unless envy and stinginess have been eliminated by Stream-Entry Knowledge, people's wishes for freedom from enmity, etc. will never be fulfilled; they will live miserably surrounded by enmity, etc. This is the explanation to the Buddha's answer to the first question. Why is it that all beings live in enmity and danger amidst enemies, sorrow and anger although they have an earnest desire to be free from them.

On hearing the Buddha's answer Sakka was delighted and said:

“Venerable Sir, that indeed is so. O well-spoken One, that indeed is so. Having learnt the Bhagava's answer, all my doubts are cleared, all uncertainties have left me.”

(2) The Second Question and Answer

On Love and Hatred as The Causes of Covetousness and Stinginess

After receiving with delight the Buddha's answer, Sakka put his next question thus:

“Venerable Sir, what is the cause of envy and stinginess? What is their origin? What is their genesis? What is their source? When what factor is present, do envy and stinginess arise? When what factor is not present, do envy and stinginess do not arise?”

To this question the Buddha replied as follows:

“Sakka, King of Devas, envy and stinginess have objects (i.e. living beings, conditioned formations) that one likes (relishes) and objects that one dislikes as their cause, as their origin, as their genesis, as their source. When objects that one likes and objects that one dislikes are present, envy and stinginess arise. When objects of like and dislike are not present, envy and stinginess do not arise.”

(Herein, something (living being, conditioned formation) that one wants to possess is an object of one's liking, irrespective of its intrinsic nature of disagreeableness. This is because defilements delude the mind into liking something that is of a disagreeable nature. Something (animate thing or conditioned formation) belonging to another person is an object of one's dislike even though it is a good thing. This is because for one who looks at it in anger (i.e., with a biased mind) that good thing appears hateful.)

— Commentary and Sub-Commentary on Machavagga, Dīgha Nikāya —

Stinginess arises on account of objects that one likes. Envy arises on account of objects that one dislikes. In another mode of explanation, both envy and stinginess arise out of likes and dislikes. This will be elucidated as follows:

For a bhikkhu, a co-resident pupil or some living thing of his fancy may be there as objects of his liking. For a lay person, there are his children and his possessions, such as elephants, horses or cattle, which are objects of his liking. When the bhikkhu or the lay person is away from them, even for a short time, he feels uneasy. When the bhikkhu or the lay person sees someone else having similar objects or that person's liking, there arises in that bhikkhu or lay person envy against the other person. If some other person were to come and ask that bhikkhu or lay person to loan him that favourite pupil (of the bhikkhu) or the children or elephant or horse (of the lay person) for some purpose for a short time, the bhikkhu or lay person would refuse, saying: "I cannot loan him/her (or it) to you. He/she (or it) will get tired or feel bored." In this manner, there arise both envy and stinginess on account of some object of one's liking.

(Again,) for bhikkhus, there are bhikkhu requisites, such as alms-bowl or robes, which are objects that he likes. For lay person, there are various possessions, such as clothing and ornaments, which are objects that he or she likes. When that bhikkhu or lay person sees someone else having similar objects of that other person's liking, that bhikkhu or lay person has an evil thought: "Oh it would be well if that person did not have those agreeable things!" This is envy. If someone were to ask that bhikkhu or lay person to loan, for a short time, that property of one's fancy, the bhikkhu or lay person would refuse, saying: "Ah! that is not possible. I value that thing so much that I very seldom use it myself." This is how an object of one's liking gives rise to stinginess.

Furthermore, whether for a bhikkhu or a lay person, there are persons or things such as a wayward pupil or child, or an inferior article in his or her possession. Although those persons and things are actually not likable person or things, yet, due to the deluding nature of defilement, these very person and things become objects of their liking. That bhikkhu or lay person would feel self-satisfaction about those persons or things. "Who else can have such valuable assets?" they would think. Thus entertaining thoughts of self-admiration on account of greed (lobha) for these possessions, envy, the evil desire to deny others of these (kinds of) possessions, arises. (This is envy that springs from self-esteem and that arises due to the likelihood or possibility of other persons to come into possession of (the kind of) things one possesses.

(In another way:) As in the aforesaid case where one entertains thoughts of self-admiration on account of greed for their possessions (of no intrinsic worth), one wishes: "Oh that, that person did not have those things!" Thus envy arises. This is envy that springs from what other people already possess. (This latter explanation is not given in detail since it has already been shown in the Commentary. The former explanation is made in an inferential way which is suitably modified to be in line with the Sub-Commentary thereto, and Mulaṭṭikā to the Aṭṭasālinī.) If someone came and asked for a loan of these persons or things of one's liking even for a short time, the owner is not willing to part with them. This is how persons or things that ought not to be cherished can also become a source of envy and stinginess.

(3) The Third Question and Answer

On How Love and Hatred arise due to Craving

Sakka received with delight the Buddha's answer and asked the next question.

"Venerable Sir, what is the cause of like and dislike? What is their origin? What is their genesis? What is their source? When what factor is present, do like and dislike arise? When what factor is not present, do like and dislike not arise?"

And the Buddha answered thus:

“Sakka, King of Devas, like and dislike have craving or hankering (chanda taṇhā) as their cause, as their origin, as their genesis, as their source. When craving or hankering is present, like and dislike arise. When craving or hankering is not present, like and dislike do not arise.”

(Herein, chanda is synonymous with desire or wish. Chanda is used in two ways: wishing to see, hear, smell, taste, touch or to know, and craving for sense objects. The former is a wholesome factor called Kattukamyatā chanda which is the mental concomitant chanda, a wish to do. The latter is taṇhā which is the mental concomitant lobha, hankering after various sense objects. What is meant here is the latter type, namely, lobha, taṇhā-chanda.

Five Kinds of Taṇhā-chanda

- (1) Taṇhā-chanda developed as pariyesana-chanda, while seeking objects of sense pleasure.
- (2) Taṇhā-chanda developed as paṭilābha-chanda, while acquiring objects of sense pleasure.
- (3) Taṇhā-chanda developed paribhoga-chanda, while enjoying objects of sense pleasure.
- (4) Taṇhā-chanda developed sannidhi-chanda, while storing and securing of sense pleasure.
- (5) While bestowing rewards or gifts, as visajjana-chanda, i.e. giving out one's property with expectation of reciprocal gain, as the bestowing of salaries and awards by rulers upon their men in the belief that these men will render their service by attending upon them and safeguarding them.

Hankering or Craving causes likes or dislikes. When one gets what one hankers after or craves for, one likes and has a fondness for the thing acquired. When one fails to get what one hankers after or craves for, one hates that objects of one's craving i.e., dislike arises in him.

(4) The Fourth Question and Answer

On How Craving arise due to Firm Opinion

After receiving with delight the Buddha's answer, Sakka put his next question thus:

“Venerable Sir, what is the cause of craving or hankering (chanda taṇhā)? What is its origin? What is its genesis? What is its source? When what factor is present, does craving or hankering arises? When what factor is not present, does craving or hankering does not arise?"

The Buddha gave the answer:

“Sakka, King of Devas, craving or hankering has deliberation, decision, (vinicchaya-takka) as its cause, as its origin, as its genesis, as its source. When there is deliberation, decision, (vinicchaya-takka), craving or hankering arises. When there is no deliberation, decision, craving or hankering does not arise.”

(In this matter, vitakka is not mere thinking about something in general. It is making up the mind about something after due deliberation (vinicchaya-vitakka). In making up the mind, the Buddha has pointed out the decision may be made in two ways: (1) taṇhā-vinicchaya, decision that is influenced by kinds of craving and (2) ditṭhi-vinicchaya, judgment made through 62 wrong views.

A decision influenced by craving cannot come to a judgment as to good or bad, agreeable or disagreeable. That is because, as the saying goes, one man's food is another man's poison. For example, earth-worm is a delicacy for certain rulers of the remote regions whereas it is nausea to those of the middle region or kingdoms. Venison is a delicacy for rulers of the middle region whereas it is disagreeable to those of the remote regions. In fact, decision influenced by craving is not a correct decision. After having acquired something, whether it relates to a visible object, or a sound, or an odour, or a taste, or a tangible object, one considers how much will go to others and how much will be kept for oneself. This manner of making a decision is the function of vinicchaya-vitakka.

Summing up: Where one makes up one's mind about something that has been acquired after deliberating on it, and becomes attached to whatever is decided by oneself to remain one's own, craving or hankering arises in respect of that object. That is the explanation of the Buddha's answer that vinicchaya-vitakka is the cause of craving or hankering.

(5) The Fifth Question and Answer

On How Firm Opinion arises due to Illusory Concepts

Having learnt with great satisfaction the Buddha's answers, Sakka put another question thus:

“Venerable Sir, what is the cause of vinicchaya-vitakka? What is its origin? What is its genesis? What is its source? When what factor is present, does vinicchaya-vitakka take place? When, what factor is not present, does vinicchaya-vitakka not take place?”

And the Buddha replied:

“Sakka King of Devas, vinicchaya-vitakka has illusory perceptions (saññā) associated with papañca-dhamma, which tends to prolong the samsāra, as their cause, as their origin, as their genesis, as their source. When there are illusory perceptions, vinicchaya-vitakka takes place. When there are no illusory perceptions, vinicchaya-vitakka does not take place.”<sup>2</sup>

(Herein, there are three kinds of illusion that tend to diffuse the mind, they are, craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna) and wrong view (diṭṭhi). They are called the diffusing factors (papañca-dhamma), because they tend to prolong the round of rebirth, and one, who is under their spell, is called as “one who is attached to the world, who is egoistic, who is deluded.” In other words, these three factors are hindrances that make one conceited and forgetful. In our present context, the illusion of craving is meant. There are six kinds or categories of illusory perception (saññā), according to six sense objects, viz., perceptions about visible objects (rūpa-saññā), perceptions about sounds (sadda-saññā), perceptions about odours (gandha-saññā), etc. Vinicchaya-vitakka is developed based on those illusory perceptions.)

(6 – 8) The Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Question and Their Answers

On The Practice of Meditation

Then having learnt with much delight the Buddha's answer, Sakka asked further;

2. 108 kinds of craving: Basically there are 3 types of craving: Craving for sense pleasure, craving for becoming, craving for non-becoming. Alternatively, craving for sense pleasure, craving for form, craving for the formless--(for details, see Book of Analysis by Ashin Setṭhila-- P.T.S publication). As each type of craving arises with respect to six objects of sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, mind, it expands to 18 types. Again as each of them is concerned with 3 moments of past, present and future, it becomes  $18 \times 3 = 54$  in member, which, when considered for both internal and external aspect, multiples to 108.

“Venerable Sir, by what practice does a bhikkhu extinct the illusory perceptions (group of saññas associated with diffusing factors, papañca) that lead to Nibbāna where all perceptions cease?”

Meditation or Contemplation of Sensation (Vedanā)

- (a) Sakka, King of Devas, I declare that vedanā, i.e. mentally agreeable sensation (somanassa-vedanā), is of two types:- that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.
- (b) Sakka, King of Devas, I declare that actually disagreeable sensation (domanassa-vedanā), unpleasant sensation also is of two types:- that which should be resorted to and that which should not be resorted to.
- (c) Sakka, King of Devas, I declare that mentally neither-agreeable-nor-disagreeable-sensation (upekkhā-vedanā) is of two types:-that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.

(Exposition in brief)

- (a) (i) Sakka, King of Devas, I have said earlier: ‘I declare that somanassa-vedanā is of two types:- that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted.’ The reason for this statement is this: should you understand that in resorting to a certain pleasant sensation, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not resort to that pleasant sensation. Somanassa-vedanā that tends to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness should not be resorted to. The same should be understood to apply to the two other kinds of sensation.
- (ii) Of the two types of mentally agreeable sensation, you should understand that in resorting to a certain pleasant sensation, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should resort to that somanassa-vedanā. Somanassa-vedanā that tends to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness. should be resorted to. The same should be understood to apply to the two other kinds of sensation, i.e., domanassa-vedanā and upekkhā-vedanā.
- (iii) Of the type of somanassa-vedanā that should be resorted to, there is the one that arises together with initial application of the mind and with sustained application of the mind (called savitakka savicāra somanassa). And there is (also) the one that arises without initial application of the mind and without sustained application of the mind (avitakka avicāra somanassa). Of these two, the latter, i.e. avitakka avicāra somanassa is superior.

“Sakka, King of Devas, it is for this reason that I have said: ‘I declare that somanassa vedanā is of two types:- that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted.’ ”

(Conclusion to para (a) above)

- (b) (i) Sakka, King of Devas, I have said earlier: ‘I declare that domanassa-vedanā is of two types:- that which should be resorted to and that which should not be resorted to.’ The reason for this statement is this: you should understand that in resorting to a certain mentally disagreed sensation, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not resort to that unpleasant sensation.
- (ii) Of those two types of domanassa-vedanā, you should understand that in resorting to a certain unpleasant sensation, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should resort to that unpleasant sensation.
- (iii) Of the types of domanassa-vedanā that should be resorted to, there is the one that arises together with initial application of the mind and with sustained application of the mind, (savitakka savicāra domanassa). And there is (also) the one that arises without initial application of the mind and without sustained application of the mind, (avitakka avicāra domanassa). Of these two, the latter, i.e., avitakka avicāra domanassa, is superior.

(Para (b) above explained)

“Sakka, King of Devas, it is for this reason that I have said: ‘I declare that there are two types of domanassa vedanā-that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.’ ”

(Conclusion to para (b) above)

- (c) Sakka, King of Devas, I have said earlier: ‘I declare that upekkhā-vedanā is of two types-that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.’ The reason for this statement is this: you should understand that in resorting to a certain mentally neither agreeable-nor-disagreeable sensation, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not resort to that upekkhā-vedanā.
- (i) Of those two types of upekkhā-vedanā, you should understand that in resorting to a certain neutral sensation, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not resort to that neutral sensation.
- (ii) Of those two types of upekkhā-vedanā, you should understand that in resorting to a certain neutral sensation, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should resort to that neutral sensation.
- (iii) Of the type of upekkhā-vedanā that should be resorted to, there is the one that arises with initial application of the mind and with sustained application of the mind (savitakka savicāra upekkhā). And there is also the one that arises without initial application of the mind and without sustained application of the mind (avitakka avicāra upekkhā). Of these two, the latter, i.e. avitakka avicāra upekkhā, is superior.

(Para (c) above explained)

“Sakka, King of Devas, it is for this reason that I have said: ‘I declared that upekkhā vedanā also is of two types:- that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.’ ”

(Conclusion to para (c) above)

“Sakka, King of Devas, a bhikkhu, who practises thus, is one who works for the extinction of illusory perception (group of saññas associated with diffusing factor, papañca) that lead to Nibbāna where all perceptions cease.”

When the Buddha answered thus giving an analytical exposition of meditation of vedanā, Sakka was delighted and said, expressing his approval:

“Venerable Sir, that indeed is so. O, Well-spoken One, that indeed is so. Having learnt the Bhagava's answer, I have been rid of all doubts about this question, all uncertainties have left me.”

(In this connection, the Commentary discusses, as follows, some interesting points on the subtleties of the Dhamma.)

In the present question, Sakka asks the Buddha about the practice that leads to Nibbāna in a subjective manner. The Buddha answers in an objective way about the three kinds of sensation (i.e. method of insight-development through contemplation of somanassa-vedanā, domanassa-vedanā and upekkhā-vedanā. Since the Buddha's answer consists of contemplation of three vedānas, the Commentary speaks of three questions somanassa-pañhā, domanassa-pañhā, and upekkhā-pañhā, one on each of the three sensations.

The question asked by Sakka was: “by what practice does a bhikkhu work towards Nibbāna?” The Buddha does not give a straight answer, such as: “In this way, a bhikkhu practices the way leading to Nibbāna.” Instead he replied: “Sakka, somanassa-vedanā is of two types: that which should be resorted to, and that which should not be resorted to.” This might strike as incongruent to those not conversant with the Buddha's various methods of teaching.

The Commentary elucidates this problem in the following way:

In this sixth question of Sakka, is the Buddha's answer relevant to Sakka's question? (One might ask.)

The answer: Yes, it is.

And the explanation is this: Sakka asks subjectively a practice towards attaining Nibbāna. It is a personal question. The Buddha gives the answer to suit the temperament of Sakka, for working towards Nibbāna. The answer revolves around contemplation of the mind, which is suited to Sakka's mental make-up. The Buddha opens up the subject of meditation of mental phenomena with contemplating on the three kinds of vedanā. Therefore, the answer is a relevant answer.

(This is an explanation in brief.)

To expand this:

For devas, the mind is a more appropriate subject for contemplation than the body. Amongst mental aggregate, vedanā is most vivid to perceive.

The physical composition of devas is more subtle than that of human beings. Being a result of superior kamma, their digestive capacity is also remarkably greater than that of human beings so that very rich deva nutriment can easily be digested. This means a need for regular feeding. When a deva misses a meal, he feels the pangs of hunger very acutely. In fact, it can lead to dissolution of the body like a lump of butter placed on a heated slab.

This shows that, to a deva, the truth of painful sensation (dukkha-vedanā) is very easily perceivable. Similarly, the pleasant sensation due to superior kinds of deva; pleasures that may be indulged in to greater and greater degree is also easily perceivable: this also holds true for neutral sensation (upekkhā-vedanā) which is peaceful and wholesome. That is why the Buddha chooses the contemplation of the three kinds of sensation, somanassa-vedanā, domanassa-vedanā, upekkhā-vedanā as a suitable practice for Sakka.

This will be elaborated further: There is meditation for insight (vipassanā) into the physical aspect of one's body and meditation for insight (vipassanā) into the mental aspect of one's body. Of these two main methods, the Buddha prescribes the former to those who have the capacity to perceive physical phenomena. It may be taught briefly or in an elaborate way. Usually, the essential nature of the Four (Primary) Elements is taught in detail as the meditation subject (catu dhātu vavattāna kammaṭṭhāna), on physical phenomena. To those who have the innate capacity to perceive mental phenomena, a suitable subject on mental phenomena is taught. In such a case, the physical basis of the mind has to be contemplated first before proceeding to the contemplation of mental phenomena. In the case of Sakka too, this was the procedure: physical phenomena was first touched upon briefly. However, in the recorded text of the Teaching that preliminary aspect is not specified, and the discourse on mental phenomena alone is recorded.

With devas, mental phenomena are better perceived. So the three kinds of sensation are taught first. When mental phenomena is contemplated at the outset, there are three approaches: (1) through contact (phassa) (2) through sensation (vedanā), and (3) through mind (citta). (The three approaches are adopted only at the initial stage of meditation. Once the nature of mental phenomena is grasped and when the impermanence (anicca), woefulness (dukkha) and unsubstantiality (anatta) of mental phenomena is contemplated upon, all mental phenomena are comprehended.

To explain this further:

(1) With some yogis, after contemplation of the body (i.e. physical phenomena) has been mastered in a brief manner or in an elaborate manner, the contact (phassa) (which is a mental phenomenon), falling on the physical phenomena that is under contemplation, becomes evident. (2) With some yogis, the sensation experienced in respect of the physical phenomena, which is under contemplation, becomes evident. (3) With some yogis, the consciousness which cognizes the physical phenomenon under contemplation, becomes evident. (In these three ways, the interrelationship between mind and body comes to be understood by the yogi.)

Comprehending Contact (Phassa), etc.

- (1) Contact, sensation, perception, volition, and consciousness are a group of five key mental concomitants that arise together. In the discussion on the three types of yogis, the one who perceives vividly contact (phassa) between mind and matter does not comprehend contact alone. Rather, he comes to realize that sensation (vedanā), which experiences the contact, is also there; that perception (saññā), which perceives the object of contemplation is also there; that volition (cetanā), which brings into play all associated mental factors is also there; that consciousness (viññāṇa), which cognizes the object of contemplation, is also there. Thus the five closely related mental factors headed by contact are comprehended.
- (2) The yogi, who perceives sensation, does not comprehend sensation alone. Rather, he comes to realize that, along with the arising of that sensation, there arises contact between the mind and the physical phenomena under contemplation; he also realizes that there also arises perception which perceives it; that there also arises volition which motivates the associated mental factors; and that there also arises consciousness which cognizes the object of contemplation. Thus the five mental factors headed by contact are comprehended.
- (3) The yogi, who perceives consciousness, does not comprehend consciousness alone. Rather, he understands that besides the consciousness, there also arises contact whereby the mind meets the object of contemplation; that there also arises sensation which experiences the contact; that there also arises perception which perceives the object; and that there also arises volition that motivates the associated mental factors. Thus the five mental factors headed by contact are comprehended.

Having comprehended contact and its four associated mental factors (phassa pañcamaka), the yogi contemplates on what is the basis of their arising. Then he discerns that the five mental factors have the corporeal body as their basis. The body, in the ultimate sense, is the corporeality that has arisen, made up of the Primary Four Elements (Bhūta-rūpa) and Secondary Element (Upādāya-rūpāni). Thus, the truth that contact and its associating four mental factors arise dependent on the body is understood. The basis, where the mental factors arise, is seen in its reality as physical phenomena or matter (rūpa); and that the five associated factors headed by contact is mental phenomena or mind (nāma); and that there is just mind and matter (nāma and rūpa) and nothing else. Between the two interrelated phenomena, matter comprises the aggregate of corporeality; mind comprises the four mental aggregates. Thus, there are just the Five Aggregates (Khandā). Indeed, there is no aggregate apart from mind and matter; there is no mind or matter apart from the Five Aggregates.

The yogi then contemplates: “What is the cause of the arising of the Five Aggregates?” He understands fundamentally and truly that the Five Aggregates arise due to ignorance (avijjā), craving (taṇhā) and kamma (action). Thus, he understands that the continued phenomenon of the five aggregates is the effect of this cause, namely, avijjā, taṇhā and kamma and that apart from cause and effect, there is nothing that can truly be called person or being, and that all are aggregates of conditioned phenomena. Thus, having comprehended that mind and matter arise from cause, the yogi continually contemplates on the impermanence, woefulness, and insubstantiality (anicca, dukkha, anatta) of mind and matter, thereby gaining insight into the mind-matter complex stage by stage (This effort and its rewards indicate strong insight, balava vipassanā.)

The yogi, who has advanced to this high level of insight, becomes very eager to attain magga-phala. He strives for the development of insight, encouraging himself with the thought: “I am going to achieve magga, phala, nibbāna even today.” When four appropriate factors, namely, weather, associates, food, and discourse that are conducive to his enlightenment are present together, he attains the Path-Knowledge. And even at one sitting of meditation, the culmination of insight development may be realized and arahatship attained.

In the above manner, the Buddha has already shown how a yogi, to whom contact is comprehended, or sensation is comprehended, or consciousness is comprehended, may, through proper insight development, gain arahatship.

In Sakkapañña Sutta, the Buddha discourses on contemplation of mental phenomena, concentrating on sensation (vedanā) as the meditation subject appropriate for Sakka. This is so because devas including Sakka will not find either contact (phassa) or consciousness (viññāṇa) as comprehensible as sensation (vedanā). Therefore, sensation is appropriate subject of meditation for devas for gaining insight into mental phenomena.

To explain this further:

The arising of pleasant sensation (sukha-vedanā), and unpleasant sensation (dukkha-vedanā), is very evident. When pleasant sensation arises, the whole body is permeated with it. One gets excited. There is a feeling of ease, as if being fed with butter refined a hundred times over, or being applied on the skin with oil refined a hundred times over, or relieving heat by taking a bath with cool clear water contained in thousand pots. It causes the person who experiences it to exclaim: “Oh! this is pleasant! really pleasant!”

When unpleasant or painful sensation arises also, it pervades the whole body causing great agitation and discomfort. It is as though lumps of red hot iron were inserted into the body, or as though molten iron were poured down over one's body, or as though a bundle of burning faggots were thrown into a forest of dried trees and grass. It causes the person experiencing it to groan painfully: “Oh! this is painful! really painful!”

Thus, the arising of pleasant sensation and unpleasant sensation is quite evident.

This is not the case with neutral sensation (upekkhā-vedanā), which is not so evident. It is as though hidden by darkness. In the absence of any pleasant sensation or painful sensation, the yogi can only use his reason to understand the neutral sensation which is neither pleasant nor unpleasant. It is like a hunter chasing a deer, making a reasoned guess where the deer's hoof prints appear at one end of a slab of rock as ascending it, and appear at the other end as descending therefrom, and coming to the conclusion that the deer must have walked across the rock. Where pleasant sensation has been clearly noted in the yogis' awareness, and later unpleasant sensation also has been clearly noted, the yogi can, applying his reason, judge that during the moments when two kinds of sensation are not felt, there has arisen in him a neutral sensation that is neither pleasant nor unpleasant. In this way the yogi comprehends neutral sensation (upekkhā-vedanā).

Thus, the Buddha first taught Sakka contemplation of physical phenomena and then proceeded to the subject of the three sensations as method of contemplating mental phenomena. This method, whereby a discourse on contemplation of physical phenomena is followed by a discourse on the three sensation as meditation subject, is a common method used by the Buddha to suit the hearer in each situation. It can be found, besides the present discourse to Sakka, in many other discourses, namely, Mahāsatipaṭṭhāna Sutta (Dīgha Nikāya), Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, Cūḷatanhāsāṅkhaya Sutta, Mahā Taṇhā Saṅkhaya Sutta, Cūḷa Vedalla Sutta, Mahā Vedalla Sutta, Raṭṭhapāla Sutta, Magaṇḍhiya Sutta, Dhātuvibhaṅga Sutta, Āneñjasappāya Sutta (all in Majjhima Nikāya) and the whole of Vedanā Saṅyutta.

The Commentary says: “In the Sakkapañña Sutta, meditation on the physical phenomena, being simply an object of sensation, is not expressly mentioned. Probably this is why it is not on record in the Pāli text.” This statement is rather terse and obscure. Its purport will, therefore, be brought out here:

The Commentary says: “The Bhagavā taught Sakka and other devas contemplation of physical phenomena first and then proceeded with contemplation of mental phenomena, through the three sensations which was the way they could understand the Dhamma, considering their capacity (lit natural bent of mind) to comprehend.” This statement might be challenged by certain persons pointing out the fact that there is no mention in the text that the Buddha taught contemplation of physical phenomena to Sakka. The answer lies in the fact that devas are highly perceptible to mental phenomena, and among all mental phenomena, sensation is best understood by them. It is the Buddha's method in teaching those with a strong capacity to understand mental phenomena, to make a preliminary discourse on physical phenomena just to provide a grounding for understanding mental phenomena, on which latter subject He would dwell at length. In the present case, Sakka and his company had a strong capacity to understand mental phenomena and so the Buddha mentioned physical phenomena simply as an object of sensation, showing them what constitutes physical phenomena. And having stated it in a most brief manner, the Buddha taught the three kinds of sensation in an elaborate manner. Therefore, it must be noted that physical phenomena forms just a preliminary subject as object of sensation, and hence this fact is not recorded in the text. This is the purport of the terse commentarial statement referred to above.

Now we shall deal with the expositions of the Buddha's elaborate manner of teaching the subject of meditation on the three kinds of sensation as stated in (a), (b) and (c) above. The explanation on them, as contained in the Commentary and the Sub-commentary, will be condensed as best as we can.

Reference (a)(i) above:

“The mentally agreeable sensation that tends to increase demeritoriousness and to decrease meritoriousness (and which should not be resorted to)” means somanassa-vedanā. This kind of pleasant sensation is called gehasita somanassa-vedanā. (Visible object, sound, odours, tastes, tangible objects and thoughts (or ideas), these six sensuous objects serve as a house of craving and therefore termed ‘geha’.) This mentally agreeable sensation arises together with craving because of these sensuous objects. If one allows the repeated arising of that kind of sensation, demeritoriousness grows and meritoriousness wanes every day. That is why the Buddha said this gehasita somanassa-vedanā is not to be resorted to.

Reference (a)(ii) above:

“The mentally agreeable sensation that tends to decrease demeritoriousness and to increase meritoriousness (and which should be resorted to)” means pleasure bent on renunciation (nekkhammasita somanassa-vedanā). Herein, taking up the homeless life of a bhikkhu, attainment of jhāna, realization of Nibbāna, Insight-knowledge, and all meritorious actions that break away from the hindrances are called Nekkhamma, renunciation or emancipation from worldliness. Let’s expand this: One sets one's goal of release from the round of rebirth and, leaving hearth and home, goes to the monastery, takes up the life of bhikkhuhood, establishes oneself in the Purity of the four kinds of bhikkhu precept (catupāri suddhi sīla), practises the ascetic practice, meditates for concentration by kaṣiṇa devices, attains the first Fine Material Jhāna, and cultivates Insight using that jhāna as the foundation, all these practices are called acts of renunciation (nekkhamma). Pleasure derived from these activities are called pleasure bent on renunciation. If one cultivates the repeated arising of this kind of nekkhammasita somanassa-vedanā, demeritoriousness decrease and meritoriousness increases. That is why the Buddha said this pleasant sensation bent on renunciation should be resorted to.

(Note: Gehasita somanassa-vedanā, that should not be resorted to, pleasure of the senses arise together with craving for the six kinds of agreeable sense objects that are cognized at the six sense-doors. As there are six sense objects which constitute the bases of these mentally agreeable sensations, there are six kinds of such sense-pleasure.)

Regarding the naturally agreeable sensation bent on renunciation (nekkhammasita somanassa-vedanā), there are also six kinds based on the agreeable sense objects of six kinds that cause the arising of the pleasant sensation, beginning from the first step of renouncing householder's life to attaining of mundane and supramundane jhānas up to the third jhāna. In the Teaching, the two categories of pleasant sensation, the six gehasita somanassa-vedanā and the six nekkhammasita somanassa-vedanā occur frequently. With regard to domanassa-vedanā and upekkhā-vedanā which will be mentioned in due course, the terms of six gehasita and six nekkhammasita will also appear frequently. It should be noted that these terms are also used with reference to the six sense objects.

Reference (a)(iii) above:

In the third paragraph of (a), of the type of pleasant sensation, i.e. Nekkhammasita

somanassa-vedanā, there is, firstly, the one that arises together with initial application of the mind (vitakka) and sustained application of the mind (vicāra). This refers to the pleasurable sensation that arises from the time of taking up bhikkhuhood till the attainment of the first jhāna.

And secondly, there is the one that arises without the initial application of the mind (vitakka) and sustained application of the mind (vicāra). This refers to the pleasurable sensation that arises at the attainment of the second and the third jhānas. The second is superior to the first. In this (third) paragraph, the Buddha compares the two ways in which two bhikkhus many attain arahatta-phala.

To expand this statement:

The first bhikkhu, in contemplating the pleasant sensation that arises together with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind [i.e. pleasant sensation pertaining to the Sense Sphere (Kāmā-vacāra somanassa-vedanā) and pleasant sensation pertaining to the first jhāna of the Fine Material Sphere (Rūpa-vacāra paṭhana-jhāna somanassa-vedanā)], contemplates: “On what does the pleasant sensation depend?” And he perceives that it depends on the physical body. Then he proceeds to contemplate on the three characteristics (anicca, dukkha and anatta) of mental phenomena (as has been described above). And in due course he attains arahatta-phala.

The second bhikkhu, in contemplating the pleasant sensation that arises without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (i.e. the second and the third jhāna of the Fine Material Sphere (Rūpa-vacāra dutiya tatiya jhāna somanassa-vedanā) and developing insight as mentioned earlier on, attains arahatship.

In the above two cases, the object of meditation of the second bhikkhu which is the pleasant sensation not in association with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to the object of meditation of the first bhikkhu which is the pleasant sensation associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. The thoughts of the second bhikkhu that contemplate on the mind-object (sensation) in its three characteristics, being not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, are superior to the thought of the first bhikkhu which are associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. In the matter of attainment of the Fruition consciousness also, that of the second bhikkhu which is being not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior than that of the first bhikkhu which is associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind.

(These are some important points about (a) Somanassa-vedanā.)

Reference (b)(i) above:

“The unpleasant sensation which tends to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness (and is therefore not to be resorted to),” refers to gehasita domanassa-vedanā. When one does not get some desirable visible object, or sound, or odour, or taste, or tangible object, or thought cognized through or by the eye, the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body and the mind, one feels miserable. When these six kinds of sense objects that one has enjoyed do not last, they are painfully missed by one who cherishes them. Thus unpleasant sensation (domanassa-vedanā) arises in one on account of the six sense objects. If these unpleasant sensations are allowed to arise repeatedly, demeritoriousness increases, and meritoriousness decreases. That is why the Buddha said that unpleasant sensation arising out of the six sense objects should not be resorted to.

Reference (b)(ii) above:

“The unpleasant sensation which tend to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness (and should therefore be resorted to)” means nekkhammasita domānassa-vedanā (unpleasant sensation inclined to renunciation). To the bhikkhu who has renounced the worldly life and taken the practice of insight-development through various methods of contemplation, visible objects, sound, odours, tastes, tangible objects, and thoughts are perceived as impermanent and subject to change. Further, there comes the realization that, in truth and reality, the six sense objects in the past as well as at present are impermanent, subject to change, and are woeful. This realization is Insight-knowledge. Once the true nature of the six sense objects is understood, the mind of that bhikkhu yearns for release from the six sense objects which arise in the conditioned phenomena of mind and matter. Directing his mind to Nibbāna, he has an ardent desire, (Pihā, ardent desire, a mild form of lobha (greed) in the ultimate sense) to attain the Supramundane.

(In this connection, the Pāli term Pihā needs some explaining. The expression: ‘the ardent desire to attain the supramundane’, does not mean that pihā takes the arahatta-phala as its object, because pihā is a mild form of lobha which primarily is a demeritorious factor. Not to speak of a demeritorious factor, even meritorious factors divested of wisdom do not take Nibbāna as their object. Hence pihā does not take Nibbāna as its object. The fact is that the yogi had had hearsay knowledge of Nibbāna. The sublime attributes of Nibbāna has not only been learnt from other people, they have become imbued in the yogi's mind through book learning, meditation and insight development, and a yearning of Nibbāna has thus already been formed. This knowledge, of course, still remains in the province of concept (paññatti) only, but a fairly close idea of Nibbāna is obtained by intelligent reasoning. As a matter of fact, jhāna, magga, phala, nibbāna, belong to the province of the Supramundane; they are, therefore, as subtle as they are profound, even to get a true idea by a yogi who has not become an ariya. At best, only he can visualise the Supramundane and wish for attaining it, pihā)

After the arising of the ardent desire to attain the Supramundane, the yogi tries towards his goal by cultivating Insight. If, in spite of these earnest efforts, the goal is still not reached, the yogi gets frustrated. “Alas, how success evades me for all my efforts over such a long period,” he says to himself. The unpleasant sensation he now experiences is called Nekkhammasita Domanassa-vedanā. The repeated arising of this kind of unpleasant sensation is conducive to success.

The more disappointed he is, the greater his resolution to attain his objective, which turns into a sufficing condition (upanissa paccaya) for success. Demeritoriousness decreases in him and meritoriousness increases. That is why the Buddha said that nekkhammasita domanassa-vedanā should be resorted to.

Although unpleasant sensation (domanassa-vedanā) is a mental factor definitely accompanied by initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (savitakka savicāra), the yogi is apt to take gehasita domanassa vedanā as the unpleasant sensation that arises together with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (savitakka, savicāra) and nekkhammasita domanassa-vedanā as the unpleasant sensation that arises without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (avitakka avicāra). Therefore, unpleasant sensation is mentioned in these two ways.

To further explain: In this Teaching, a bhikkhus cultivates Vipassanā meditation (Insight), after getting established in jhāna, whether threshold jhāna upacāra or first jhāna, and if he cannot attain magga-phala he feels dejected domanassa-vedanā. In such a case, the jhānas which were used as ones for development of magga-phala are called unpleasant (domanassa), by way of a figure of speech because the jhāna as preliminary steps in his course of the Path-practice are to him something he does not want. If, in spite of the disappointment, he perseveres and ultimately attain magga-phala, the supramundane dhamma that he realizes is (also) called domanassa in a figurative sense since it is the outcome of, or is caused by, the unpleasant sensation.

The yogi (bhikkhu), regarding his own thoughts associated with the initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind which cause his unpleasant sensation, or regarding his own thoughts which are not associated with initial application of the mind or sustained application of the mind which cause his unpleasant sensation as unpleasant sensation itself (associated with or dissociated with initial application of the mind as the case may be), then reflects: “Oh, how long it would be before I can successfully gain insight into unpleasant sensation which arises together with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind?” Or as: “How long it would be before I can successfully gain insight into unpleasant sensation which arises without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind?”

Furthermore, he considers the Fruition-knowledge, that is caused by unpleasant sensation associated with (or arising together with) initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, as attainment of Fruition (phala-samāpatti), though unpleasant sensation associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind; and the Fruition-Knowledge, that is caused by unpleasant sensation not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, as attainment of Fruition through unpleasant sensation which is not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. Thinking thus, he reflects: “How long it would be before I can attain Fruition which is caused by unpleasant sensation associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind? Or, Fruition which is caused by unpleasant sensation not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind?” He then enters upon a series of courses of rigorous practices extending from three months to six months, and then to nine months.

First of all, he commits himself to a three-month training schedule. During the first month, he allows himself to sleep two out of the three watches of a night, meditating during one watch of the night. In the middle period, the second month, he allows himself to sleep only one watch of the night, meditating during two watches of the night. In the third month, he allows himself no sleep but meditates during the three watches of the night, alternating between walking and sitting. It may be well if this training ends up in arahatta-phala. Otherwise, he does not relent but takes upon himself an additional six months of rigorous training.

In these six months, three periods of two months each are marked out, i.e., waking portions and sleeping portion of the nights are adopted, as in the three-month training. After the six-month training, if he still does not attain arahatta-phala, the bhikkhu does not relent, but take an additional nine months of rigorous training.

This nine-month training is made up of three periods of three months each. During the first period, the yogi allows himself to sleep two out of the three watches of the night and meditates during one watch. In the middle period, he allows himself to sleep only one watch of the night, meditating during two watches. In the third period, he allows himself no sleep but spends the whole night meditating, in alternating postures of walking and sitting. After this manner of rigorous practice, if the bhikkhu still does not attain arahatta-phala, despondency sets in his mind. He reflects: “Alas, I am still not one of those who are invited to assemble at the yearly congregation where purity is admitted (visuddhi pavāraṇā).” He feels very sad like the bhikkhu-elder Mahāsīva of Gāmantapabbhara. Tears may flow down on his face.

The Story of Bhikkhu-elder Mahāsīva

In Sri Lanka, there once lived a bhikkhu-elder named Mahāsīva who had eighteen groups or sets of bhikkhus learning at his feet. Thirty thousand of his pupils had attained arahatship under his tutorship. One of the thirty thousand arahats thought to himself: “Infinite qualities in terms of morality, etc. have I acquired. How about the qualities attained by my teacher Mahāsīva?” And he knew that his teacher was still a worldlyling. He reflected thus: “Alas, our teacher Mahāsīva has been the support of others, but is not the support of himself. I will now admonish our teacher.” So thinking, he travelled by jhāna in the air, descended near the bhikkhu-elder's monastery, and went near Mahāsīva, who was sitting at a secluded place. He made obeisance to the teacher and sat at a suitable place.

The teacher said to this pupil: “O! observer of the ascetic practice of eating from one bowl only: what calls you here?” (This is a term of endearment used by bhikkhu-elders of past to bhikkhus who practise Insight-meditation.)

The pupil: “Venerable Sir, I come to learn from you a discourse of appreciation (anumodanā) for use at an offering ceremony.”

“Not possible, friend.”

“May I learn it at the place where you usually stop and consider the direction you should make for the day's alms-gathering?”

“Other bhikkhus will be putting their question to me there.”

“May I learn it on the alms round?”

“There too, other bhikkhus will be putting their questions.”

“May I learn it where the venerable one robes himself fully (with the upper robe), or rearranging the robes for going to the village, or where the alms bowl is made ready for alms-gathering, or at the place of taking the gruel meal at the rest-house after the alms-round?”

“At those places, bhikkhu-elders will be asking questions to clear up their doubts concerning Commentarial literature.”

“May I ask on your return from the alms-round?”

“Then also other bhikkhus will be asking questions.”

“May I ask on the way from the village to the monastery?”

“Then also other bhikkhus will be asking question.”

“May I ask after your meal at the monastery? ... or at the place of seclusion when the venerable one washes his feet? ... or at the time the venerable one washes his face?”

“At those times, also other bhikkhus usually ask questions, friend. From that time till the next day's dawn, there are bhikkhus coming to me endlessly without a moment's break, friend.”

“May I then ask at the time the venerable one is cleaning his teeth and washing his face?”

“(Impossible friend,) other bhikkhus will be asking their questions.”

“May I ask when the venerable one enters the monastery and sits there?”

“Then also, there will be other bhikkhus asking questions.”

“Venerable Sir, as a matter of fact, there should be a moment to spare when the venerable one sits in meditation in the monastery after having washed his face, during the moments of shifting the sitting posture for three or four times. From what the venerable says, would there be no time to die too? Venerable Sir, you are like the leaning board providing others support, but not being one's own support. My real purpose in coming to you is not to learn a discourse from you.” So saying, he disappeared.

The Bhikkhu-elder Mahāsīva retires into The Forest

Venerable Mahāsīva then saw the real purpose of that bhikkhu's visit. “This bhikkhu does not want to learn the Teaching. He came here to admonish me. But this is not the time for me to go out into seclusion in the forest. I must wait till morning,” he said to himself. He made ready to leave with bowl and robes which he kept handy. He taught the whole day and the first and middle watches of the night. When, in the third watch of the night, one of the pupils was leaving, he slipped out together with him (letting everyone think he was one of the pupils.)

Other pupils awaiting for the next class thought that the teacher was out to answer the call of nature. The student bhikkhu who went out together also took the teacher for a co-student.

Mahāsīva was confident that arahatta-phala should not take more than a few days to attain. He would come back from the forest seclusion after attaining arahatship. So he did not bid farewell to his pupils when he left the monastery on a thirteenth of Visakha for a cave known as Gāmanta pabbhāra (i.e. a cave in the vicinity of a village). By the full moon day, he had not attained arahatta-phala. “I have thought I could attain arahatta-phala in a few days,” he thought, “but the vassa period has arrived. I will spend the vassa here and will accomplish my task at the end of the vassa, on the Pavāraṇā day.” So, regarding three months as though it were three days, he went into ardent practice. But at the end of the three months he was still unable to attain arahatship. Mahāsīva reflected: “I had come here hoping to attain arahatta-phala in three days, but three months have passed without my attaining it. My fellow-bhikkhus have joined the Sangha congregation of arahats now.” He felt miserable and tears streamed down his face.

Then he pondered: “Perhaps I have been indulgent: I have alternated the four bodily postures (i.e. lying, sitting, standing, walking) in my meditating work. I will now renounce the lying posture and will not wash my feet until I attain arahatta-phala.” So he kept away his cot at a corner and resumed meditation. Another vassa passed by, and no arahatship was at hand. Each vassa ended not with enlightenment but with tears — tears of noble desire unfulfilled. In this way, twenty-nine years marked by twenty-nine assemblies of the arahats (at the end of each vassa) went by.

Young boys from the village noticed the ruptures that had developed on both the feet of Mahāsīva and they tried their best to patch them up with thorns. Then they joked among themselves: “Oh, how I envy those ruptured feet.”

A Celestial Maiden comes to The Rescue

On the full moon day, in the month of the Thadingyut, on the thirtieth year of his ardent practice, Mahāsīva sat leaning against the board and took stock of the situation. “I have been at it for thirty years, and arahatta-phala is still beyond my reach. Clearly, arahatship is not for me in this life. How I miss the opportunity of attending the congregation of arahats together with my fellow bhikkhus.” An unpleasant sensation (domanassa-vedanā) overwhelmed him. Tears came rolling down his face.

At the time, a celestial maiden stood before him sobbing. The bhikkhu elder asked: “Who is there weeping?”

“I am a deva maiden, Venerable Sir.”

“Why do you weep like this?”

“Venerable Sir, I think weeping is the way to attainment of magga-phala and I am weeping (following your example) in the hope of attaining one magga-phala or two magga-phalas.”

At this, the old bhikkhu's pride was rudely shaken. He said to himself: “Now, Mahāsīva, you have made yourself the laughing-stock of a young deva maiden. Does it become you?” A strong feeling of religious emotional awakening, Samvega, overtook him. He redoubled his right endeavour and (soon) attained arahatta-phala along with the four Discriminative Knowledges (Paṭisambbhidā-nāṇa).

Now that he felt relaxed mentally, he thought of stretching himself awhile. He cleaned up his cot, filled his water pots, and sat at the head of the walk way, reminding himself the need to wash his feet that he had neglected for these thirty years.

Sakka appears and washes Mahāsīva's Feet

Mahāsīva's pupils remembered their teacher on the thirtieth year of his departure and saw (by their special powers) that he had attained arahatship. Knowing what had crossed in the teacher's mind, they said: “It is ridiculous to let our teacher trouble himself to wash his own feet while his pupils like ourselves are living.” Thinking thus, all the thirty thousand arahat-pupils travelled in the direction of the cave where Mahāsīva was sitting, all of them vying with one another to get the opportunity of washing their teacher's feet.

Mahāsīva however insisted that he must do the job, which he had neglected for thirty years himself. At that juncture, Sakka thought to himself: “The bhikkhu-elder is insisting on washing his feet himself, refusing them to be washed by his thirty thousand arahat pupils. It is absurd that my revered one should bother to wash his own feet while a lay supporter like myself is living. I will go there and do the job.” He took his Queen Suja with him and appeared at the scene. Putting his Queen in front, he announced to the thirty thousand arahat-bhikkhus: “Make way, Venerable. Sirs, a woman is coming.” He then made obeisance to Mahāsīva and sat squatting before him, and said: “Venerable Sir, let me wash your feet.”

“O Sakka of the Kosiya clan, I have left my feet unwashed for thirty full years. Human body smells by nature. The smell is so pungent that even for a deva staying a hundred yojanas away from a human body, its smell is as obnoxious as carrion tied around his neck. So leave the washing to me.”

Sakka replied: “Venerable Sir, as for us the natural smell of the human body is obscured by the fragrance of your morality, which rises beyond the Sense Sphere Deva realms (Kamāvācara) and reach the topmost realm of the Brahmās. Venerable Sir, there is no fragrance that surpasses the fragrance of morality. Your morality has compelled us to render personal service to you.” Then Sakka took firm hold of the bhikkhu-elder’s ankle with his left hand and washed his soles with his right hand till they glowed like the soft soles of a child. After doing this personal service to the bhikkhu-elder, Sakka made obeisance to him and returned to his celestial abode.

This is the story of the Bhikkhu-elder Mahāsīva

In this way, a yogi, who finds himself unable to attain arahatship, feels (as in the case of Mahāsīva): “Ah, how I miss the opportunity of holding congregation with fellow-bhikkhus who are arahats”. He becomes dependent suffering domānassa-vedanā. When he attains *jhāna*s or Insight-Knowledge or magga or phala as the outcome of, or caused by, that unpleasant feeling which he considers either as associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, or not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. Such attainments are called, figuratively, as unpleasant sensation with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, or unpleasant sensation without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. It should be noted that the Buddha termed these attainments as figures of speech, taken from the point of view of result or that of cause.

Thus, according to the yogi’s view of the unpleasant sensation, either as associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, or as not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, when in due course the unpleasant sensation leads to jhāna or Insight-Knowledge, or magga-phala, these attainments are called, figuratively, as unpleasant sensation with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, or as unpleasant sensation without initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind.

In this context, where a bhikkhu contemplates the jhāna, whether neighbourhood absorption (upacāra-jhāna) or the first jhāna, called unpleasant sensation with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (savitakka savicāra), as impermanent, woeful and unsubstantial, and considers: “Where does this unpleasant sensation originate?” he comes to understand that it has its origin in the body as its base. From this understanding, he progresses, stage by stage, to arahatship. (Ref: the process of insight development on the practice for the understanding of Contact (phassa), etc. discussed earlier on.)

If there is another bhikkhu who contemplates the second jhāna, the third jhāna, etc. which are called the unpleasant sensation which is not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (avitakka avicāra), as impermanent, woeful and unsubstantial, by stages he attains arahatship.

In the above two cases, both have unpleasant sensation as the object of Insight meditation but the unpleasant sensation, which is not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to the unpleasant sensation which is associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. Regarding the Insight-Knowledge gained from the meditation also, the former is superior to the latter. Regarding the fruition of the final Path-Knowledge (Arahatta-phala) also, the former is superior. That is why the Buddha says that, of the two types of unpleasant sensation, the one that is not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind is superior.

These are points to note concerning (b) Domanassa-vedanā.

Reference (c)(i) above:

The neutral sensation (upekkhā) which tends to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness (and is therefore not to be resorted to) means gehasita-upekkhā, neutral sensation inclined to sense-pleasures. It means strong attachment to sense-pleasures. When some agreeable object arises at the six doors, i.e. eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind, one is unable to overcome the defilements and falls prey to that sense object just as a fly is 'caught' by (i.e. unable to let go) a lump of jaggery. One who relishes sense-pleasures is imprisoned by them.

Repeated resort to gehasita-upekkhā tends to increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness. That is why the Buddha said that gehasita-upekkhā should not be resorted to.

Reference (c)(ii) above:

The neutral sensation which tends to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness (and should, therefore, be resorted to) means nekkhammasita-upekkhā, neutral sensation inclined to renunciation. It is a neutral attitude to both agreeable and disagreeable objects arising at the six sense-doors, i.e., eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. Agreeable sense objects are not attached to. Disagreeable objects do not cause anger or vexation. Neither-agreeable-nor-disagreeable sense objects do not cause bewilderment (moha) due to unbalanced attitude. The yogi contemplates all the six sense objects as impermanent, woeful, and subject to change and thus discerns all of them as they really are. This neutral attitude is a form of neutral sensation which arises with wisdom in the mental process of the yogi. (In other words:) This evenness of attitude is also called indifferent feeling, equanimity (tatramajjhataṭṭā). It means detached attitude to both agreeable and disagreeable sense objects. Vedanupphēkkā and balanced attitude, equanimity (tatramajjhataṭṭā) are taken as upekkhā.)

That being so, resorting to the six kinds of neutral sensation inclined to renunciation, six nekkhammasita-upekkhās, at all times, i.e. from the time of becoming a bhikkhu, throughout all the stages of bhikkhu practice beginning with practice of Ten Reflections (anussati), till the attainment of jhānas, up to the fourth jhāna, decreases demeritoriousness and increases meritoriousness. Therefore the Buddha said nekkhammasita-upekkhā should be resorted to

Of the two types of nekkhammasita-upekkhā, namely, the one associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (savitakka savicāra upekkhā), (the neutral sensation that arises at all times, from the time of becoming a bhikkhu throughout all the stages of insight-development through various contemplations, up till the attainment of the first jhāna) and the one not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (avitakka avicāra upekkhā), (at the attainment of the second jhāna, etc.) the first one is superior to the second.

The above passage compares the arahatta-phala attained by two bhikkhus, i.e., in two ways of bhikkhu practice: (a) The first bhikkhu, in contemplating a neutral sensation associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, considers: "On what does this neutral sensation depend?" And he comes to the right understanding that it arises dependent on the body. From that understanding, he proceeds to gain Insight-knowledge, stage by stage, until he becomes an arahat. (b) The second bhikkhu, contemplating on the neutral sensation not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind (that arises at the second, the third, and the fourth jhānas) gains Insight-knowledge, stage by stage, until he becomes an arahat.

Of those two bhikkhus, the neutral sensation that serves as the object of meditation of the second bhikkhu, being not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to the neutral sensation that serves as the object of meditation of the first bhikkhu which is associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind. Regarding the thoughts that arise in the two bhikkhus during their meditation, the thoughts that arise in the second bhikkhu, being not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to the thoughts of the first bhikkhu which are associated with initial application of the mind sustained application of the mind. Regarding the attainment of the arahatta-phala won through contemplation of the neutral sensation, the attainment of the second bhikkhu, being not associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind, is superior to that of the first bhikkhu which is associated with initial application of the mind and sustained application of the mind

These are the points to note concerning (c) Upekkhā-vedanā.

Sakka is established in Stream-entry Knowledge

Having discoursed on pleasant sensation, unpleasant sensation and neutral sensation that lead to arahatship, the Buddha concluded the Teaching with these words:

“Sakka, King of Devas, a bhikkhu, who practises thus, is one who works out the extinction of illusory perceptions associated with craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna) and wrong view (diṭṭhi) that prolongs the suffering in saṃsāra leading to Nibbāna where all perceptions cease.”

At that moment, Sakka attained the Fruition of Stream-entry.

The Benevolent Desire, Chanda, of The Buddhas

The benevolent desire of the Buddhas is the noblest intention to bestow the highest blessing, the superior or exalted mind, never of inferior or lower type. Wherever the Buddhas make a discourse to an individual or to a congregation, they always show the way to the attainment of the arahatship. Amongst the hearers, some attain Stream-entry, some become Once-returner, some become Never-returner, and some attain arahatship, according to the sufficing condition, i.e. the ripeness of their past merit.

To bring in a simile here:

The Buddha is like the royal father, the hearers of His Teaching are like the princelings. The father makes morsels of food in the size that he usually takes, and feeds them into the mouths of the princelings. The princelings take in as much food, only of what their mouths can receive. Similarly, the Buddha disseminates the Dhamma in the highest level, i.e. arahatship: From amongst the hearers some attain the first fruition, some the second, some the third, and some the fourth, i.e. arahatship, according to the capacity of understanding.

Sakka is reborn as Sakka A Second Time

After attaining Stream-entry, Sakka passed away in the presence of the Buddha and was reborn as Sakka for a second time.

There is an important point to note in this connection: When a deva passes away no corpse remains like in the case of a human being. The body ceases to exist, disappears just like a flame disappears. That indeed is so. Whereas, when a human being dies, the kamma-born corporeality (kammaja-rūpa) disappears first. Seventeen thought-moments after the disappearance of kamma-born corporeality, mind-born corporeality (cittaja-rūpa) disappears. Within a few moments, nutriment-born corporeality (āhāraja-rūpa) disappears since no external nutriment sustains it. Temperature-born corporeality (utya-rūpa) however stays on for a long time, taking its own process. With devas it is totally different. This is so because devas have a type of rebirth quite different from human beings. They are born instantly as adults. When their kamma-born corporeality dissolves, the remaining kinds of corporeality, i.e. mind-born, temperature-born, and nutriment-born corporeality, all these dissolve simultaneously. The result is that there are no physical remains when a deva passes away. The body vanishes there and then.

Special note: The difference in the fact of the presence of the human dead body and the absence of the deva dead body at their passing away is a matter that requires some basic understanding<sup>3</sup> of the arising of the aggregates of a human being and those of a deva at the

3. Some basic understanding: Readers could enhance their understanding of this chapter by studying moment of conception.

- (i) At the moment of conception or rebirth (paṭisandhi) of a human being, three corporeality units (kalāpas), each a mere speck of an atom, come into being, namely, the body decad (kāyadasaka-kalāpa), the sex decad (bhāvadasaka-kalāpa), the base decad (vatthudasana-kalāpa). The kamma-born corporeality and the mind-born corporeality, temperature-born corporeality and nutriment-born corporeality arise at the due moment. Whenever these four types of corporeality advance to the stage of static moment (thikhaṇa), each unit of the element of heat (tejo-dhātu) inherent in those corporeal units continuously produces temperature-born corporeality, resulting in multiplication of utuja kalāpas and the growth of the human body. This continuous increment of the temperature-born corporeality has the effect of its constituting most of the bulk of the human body so much so that it is, so to speak, virtually “the owner of the house” of the human body, turning the three other types of corporeality (i.e. kamma-born, mind-born, and nutriment-born corporeality) into mere “guests at the house”. This is the nature of corporeality in human beings as well as all other womb-born beings. When they die, the kamma-born corporeality, the mind-born corporeality and the nutriment-born corporeality in them vanish away, like guests in the house leaving the body; but temperature-born corporeality, which is like the owner of the house, remain for a long time.
- (ii) In the case of devas, kamma-born corporeality, arising at the moment of instant rebirth, constitutes the whole of the deva body which is three gavutas long, and is like the owner of the house while the three other types of corporeality (i.e., mind-born, temperature-born, and nutriment-born corporeality) are like guests at the house, sharing space within the deva body. Therefore, devas and Brahmās, who are reborn instantly as adults, do not leave behind any remains of their body at death. The three types of corporeality other than kamma-born corporeality (like guests who cannot stay on in the house when the house is no more) vanish when the kamma-born corporeality dissolves at death. This is a profound matter. It is intelligible to those who have a grounding in the phenomenal processes of mind and matter.)

Since Sakka passed away and was reborn as Sakka even while listening to the discourse, no one among his celestial company knew that it was not the same old Sakka. Only Sakka himself knew it, besides him only the Buddha knew it by his All-knowing Wisdom.

(9–11) The Ninth, Tenth, and Eleventh Questions and Answers

On The Patimokkha Restraint

Sakka now thought: “The Bhagavā has made it very clear to me about pleasant sensation, unpleasant sensation and neutral sensation just as clear butter oil has been extracted out of a lump of butter. But this evidently is the result, magga-phala, the supramundane, for which there must be the cause by way of appropriate practice. Certainly, the supramundane magga-phala cannot be had merely by asking, like a bird soaring up the sky. There must be the practice that leads to the Supramundane. I shall now ask the Bhagavā the preliminary practice whereby arahatship is attained.” So he asked the Buddha:

“Venerable Sir, in which way does a bhikkhu practise the Bhikkhu Morality of Restraint (Pātimokkhasamvara-sīla)?”

On being asked thus, the Buddha replied:

“Sakka, King of Devas, (i) there are two kinds of bodily conduct: that which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.

“Sakka, King of Devas, (ii) there are two kinds of verbal conduct: that which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.

“Sakka, King of Devas, (iii) there are two kinds of quests: that which should be taken up, and that which should not be taken up.”

(i) “Sakka, King of Devas, I have said: ‘There are two kinds of bodily conduct: that which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.’ The reason for my saying so is this: should you understand that in adopting a certain mode of bodily conduct, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not adopt such mode of bodily conduct. (Bodily conduct that tends to increase demeritoriousness and decreases meritoriousness should not be adopted. The same interpretation should be made in respect of the next two statements.)

Of the two kinds of bodily conduct, should you understand that in adopting a certain mode of bodily conduct demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases you should adopt such mode of bodily conduct. (Bodily conduct that tends to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness should be adopted. The same meaning should be taken in respect of the next two statements.)

“Sakka, King of Devas, that is the reason why I said: ‘Sakka, there are two kinds of bodily conduct: that which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.’

(ii) “Sakka, King of Devas, I have said: ‘there are two kinds of verbal conduct: that which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.’ The reason for my saying so is this: you should understand that in adopting a certain mode of verbal conduct, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not adopt such mode of verbal conduct.

“Of those two kinds of verbal conduct, you should understand that in adopting a certain mode of verbal conduct, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should adopt such mode of verbal conduct.

“Sakka, King of Devas, that is the reason why I said: ‘Sakka, there are two kinds of verbal conduct: that which should be adopted, and that which should not be adopted.’

(iii) “Sakka, King of Devas, I have said: ‘Sakka, there are two kinds of quests: that which should be taken up, and that which should not be taken up.’ The reason for my saying so is this: you should understand that in taking up a certain quest, demeritoriousness increases and meritoriousness decreases, you should not take up such quest.

“Of those two kinds of quests, you should understand that in taking up a certain quest, demeritoriousness decreases and meritoriousness increases, you should take up such quest.

“Sakka, King of Devas, that is the reason why I said: ‘Sakka, King of Devas, there are two kinds of quests: that which should be taken up, and that which should not be taken up.’”

“Sakka, King of Devas, a bhikkhu, who practises thus, is one who practises the Bhikkhu Morality of Restraint (Pātimokkhasamvara-sīla).”

When the Buddha answered thus, Sakka was delighted and said, expressing approval: “Venerable Sir, that indeed is so. O Well-Spoken One, that indeed is so. Having learnt the Bhagava's answer, I have been rid of all doubts about this question: All uncertainties have left me.”

Note: In question six, seven, and eight, Sakka asked the practice that leads to Nibbāna through the cessation of illusory perceptions, and the Buddha replied by a discourse on the three kinds of sensation that are the fundamentals of the practice leading to Nibbāna. He distinguished between sensation that should be resorted to and sensation that should not be resorted to. Of those two types of sensation, the sensation that should not be resorted to is not the practice leading to Nibbāna; only the sensation that should be resorted to is the practice that leads to Nibbāna. Yet why does the Buddha discuss about the sensation that does not lead to Nibbāna? This is a likely question to be asked by one who does not see the Buddha's purpose. However, the Buddha knows the disposition of Sakka such that if Sakka understands the need for abandoning the sensation that should not be resorted to, recognising it as a defiling factor, then he would be prepared to cultivate the sensation that should be resorted to, recognising it as a cleansing factor. Thus, the discussing of both the types of sensation is conducive to Sakka's understanding. The Buddha's method helped Sakka to adopt the proper practice.

In the present question on Bhikkhu Morality of Restraint, (i.e. restraint that is the obligatory virtue for bhikkhu), the mode of bodily conduct that should not be adopted, the mode of verbal conduct that should not be adopted, and the kind of quest that should not be taken up, do not constitute Bhikkhu Morality of Restraint. Yet, only if one is able to abandon them, can one fulfil the practice of bodily conduct that should be adopted, verbal conduct that should be adopted, and the kind of quest that should be taken up because all of them are the factors that cleanse the mind. That is why the three defiling factors are discussed along with the three cleansing factors in pairs. This method, the Buddha knows, suits the disposition of Sakka in taking upon himself the proper practice.

Only when factors that ought not to be resorted to are made clear, would factors that ought to be resorted to become a mode of practice. This is the reason for the Buddha's discussion of the pairs of useless factors and useful factors in the present set of questions on the Bhikkhu Morality of Restraint, just as in the previous set of questions on sensation.

In the present set of answers, only bodily conduct that should be adopted, verbal conduct that should be adopted, and the kind of quest that should be taken up, constitute the Bhikkhu Morality of Restraint. The bodily conduct, the verbal conduct, and the quest that should not be resorted to are defiling factors, and they must first be seen as such by Sakka.

Regarding the kind of quest that should be taken up, it may be spoken of in connection with the course of action (kamma-patha) or in connection with the prescribed form of training precept, i.e.,

- (i) Bodily conduct that should not be resorted to are three evil bodily actions, namely, killing, stealing, and sexual misconduct. This is speaking in terms of course of action. Physically committing the breach (lit. breach at the body-door) of the moral precepts laid down by the Buddha constitutes bodily conduct that should not be adopted. This is speaking in terms of precept.

Bodily conduct that should be adopted are: refraining from killing, refraining from stealing, and refraining from sexual misconduct. This is speaking in terms of courses of action. Physically restraining (lit. restraint at the body-door) from transgressing the moral precepts laid down by the Buddha constitutes bodily conduct that should be adopted. This is speaking in terms of precept.

(The same distinction should be understood in respect of verbal conduct.)

- (ii) Verbally committing four evil verbal actions, such as lying, slandering, etc. is verbal conduct that should not be adopted. Refraining from transgressing the four evil verbal actions in one's speech is verbal action that should be adopted.
- (iii) Quest (pariyesanā) involves physical and verbal actions. It is covered by bodily conduct and verbal conduct, except that in defining the Eight Precepts with Right Livelihood as the eighth (Ājīvaṭṭhamaka-sīla), a specific term "quest" needs to be mentioned because these Eight Precepts involve actions at the body-door and verbal-door (i.e. physical actions and verbal actions), and not without effort. Quest is essentially the effort needed in making the quest.
- (iv) Quest is of two kinds, ignoble and noble. The two kinds of quest are described in the Pāsarāsi Sutta, Mūlapaṇṇāsa. The gist of the teaching is this: where someone, who himself is subject to birth, ageing, death and destruction, seeks things animate (i.e. wife, children, servants, cattle, poultry, etc.) and inanimate (such as gold and silver, etc.) which are also subject to birth, ageing and death, (i.e. arising, decay and dissolution) this amounts to ignoble quest (anariya-pariyesanā), the quest that should not be taken up. If someone who is himself subject to birth, ageing and death, seeing the fault in seeking things animate or inanimate, and seeks the deathless dhamma (i.e. Nibbāna where no rebirth occurs) this is called noble quest (ariya-pariyesanā), the quest that should be taken up.

- (v) Explained in another way: There are five ways of seeking gains that are not proper, (for bhikkhus) namely: (i) By scheming, i.e. creating a favourable or highly admirable impression of oneself on the lay supporters; (ii) By 'talking up' or extolling the lay supporters; (iii) By hinting at a suitable occasion for making offerings; (iv) By belittling the lay supporters for their alleged close-fistedness; (v) By pursuing gain with gain, i.e., by making gifts to lay supporters with the expectation of receiving their offerings.

There are also six places which a bhikkhu should not resort to, namely, (i) a spinster's house, (ii) a hermaphrodite's house, (iii) a liquor seller's house, (iv) a prostitute's house, (v) a widow's or divorcee's house, (vi) a monastery of bhikkhunīs.

Not resorting to the five ways of seeking gains mentioned above, the six places described above, and the twenty-one ways that are not allowable quest (anesanā), all these make up the kinds of quest that should not be taken up (anariya-pariyesanā). Refraining from all these improper kinds of quest, and living on the food collected at the daily alms-round, is righteous way of seeking gains which constitute noble quest (ariya-pariyesanā).

Where a certain bodily conduct, etc. is not to be resorted to, if it is an act of killing, the conduct is improper right from the beginning, such as procuring of lethal weapons or poison, or any effort connected with it. In the case of bodily conduct that should be resorted to, all the actions connected with it are proper right from the beginning. If one is disabled to perform a deed that should be resorted to, at least the intention should be made, for that intention may be carried through if circumstances permit, bringing it to a successful conclusion.

Explained otherwise:

- (i) Bodily conduct that can cause a schism in the Sangha, like Devadatta's conduct, is improper conduct that should not be resorted to. Paying devotion to the Triple Gem twice or thrice a day, like the habit of Mahātheras Sāriputta and Mahā Moggallāna, is conduct that should be resorted to.
- (ii) Verbal conduct as giving orders to kill someone, like that of Devadatta sending marksmen on a mission of assassination, is conduct that should not be resorted to. Extolling the virtues of the Triple Gem, like the habit of Mahātheras Sāriputta and Mahā Moggallāna, is verbal conduct that should be resorted to.
- (iii) Ignoble quest, such as that of Devadatta, is quest that should not be taken up. Noble quest, such as that of Mahātheras Sāriputta and Mahā Moggallāna, is quest that should be taken up.

Whereas Sakka puts only one question concerning Bhikkhu Morality of Restraint, the Buddha's answer is threefold – bodily conduct, verbal conduct and quest; the commentary speaks of it as three questions.

The Buddha's concluding statement. "A bhikkhu who practises thus ----" purports to say that the bhikkhu who refrains from the bodily conduct, verbal conduct and quest that ought not be resorted to, and who takes up bodily conduct, verbal conduct and quest that should be taken up, is one who practises the supreme bhikkhu practice of morality, incumbent on a bhikkhu, which constitutes the necessary condition that precedes arahatship.

(12) The Twelfth Question and Answer

On The Restraint of The Faculties (Indriya Samvara Sīla)

After receiving the Buddha's discourse with delight, Sakka put the next question:

"Venerable Sir, how does a bhikkhu practise so as to keep his faculties well guarded?"

The Buddha answered as follows:

"Sakka, King of Devas, there are two kinds of visible objects cognizable by the eye, those that should be resorted to, and those that should not be resorted to.

“Sakka, King of Devas, there are two kinds of sound cognizable by the ear, those that should be resorted to, and those that should not be resorted to.

“Sakka, King of Devas, there are two kinds of odour cognizable by the nose, those that should be resorted to, and those that should not be resorted to.

“Sakka, King of Devas, there are two kinds of taste cognizable by the tongue, those that should be resorted to and those that should not be resorted to.

“Sakka, King of Devas, there are two kinds of tangible objects cognizable by the body, those that should be resorted to, and those that should not be resorted to.

“Sakka, King of Devas, there are two kinds of Dhamma object made up of mind and matter cognizable by the mind, those that should be resorted to, and those that should not be resorted to.”

When the Buddha had made this brief exposition, Sakka said to the Him:

“Venerable Sir, what the Bhagava has said in brief, I understand the meaning at length as follows: Venerable Sir, if a certain visible object, cognizable by the eye, tends to (repeat:) increase demeritoriousness and decrease meritoriousness, that visible object should not be resorted to. If (on the other hand) a certain visible object cognizable by the eye, tends to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness, that visible object should be resorted to.

“Venerable Sir, if a certain sound cognizable by the ear tends to (repeat from above) –; a certain odour cognizable by the nose tends to (repeat from above) –; a certain taste cognizable by the tongue tends to (repeat from above) –; a certain tangible object cognizable by the body tends to (repeat from above) –. A certain thought about mind or matter, cognizable by the mind, tends to increase demeritoriousness and decreases meritoriousness, that thought should not be resorted to. If (on the other hand,) a certain thought about mind or matter tends to decrease demeritoriousness and increase meritoriousness, that thought should be resorted to.

“Venerable Sir, being able to understand the meaning in detail of what the Bhagavā has said briefly, I am now rid of all doubts; there is no uncertainty in me.”

(Note: Sakka had benefitted from the previous discourses of the Buddha on the three kinds of sensation and on the three kinds of what is to be resorted to and what should not be resorted to. When the present brief answer from the Buddha was given, he had the right understanding based on the Buddha's previous preachings and accordingly began to address the Buddha about his understanding.

The Buddha remained silent, allowing Sakka to go ahead what he had to say about the meaning of the brief statements. It was not the custom of the Buddha to allow such a thing, if the hearer of a discourse is not competent enough to state how he understands it, or to allow a competent hearer, if he is not willing to come forward with an explanation of what he understands of it. Here Sakka was competent as well as willing. Hence the Buddha's permission.)

Now to elaborate on the various sense objects as to their worthiness or unworthiness;

- (i) If a certain visible object tends to arouse defilements such as rāga (attachment), in the mind of a bhikkhu who sees it, that visible object is an unworthy one. He should not look at it. If a certain visible object arouses in him a sense of repulsiveness, perception of repulsiveness (asubha-saññā), or strengthens the conviction in him of the truth of the Dhamma Saddhā, in the Teaching, or arouses the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), then that visible object is a worthy one. He should look at it.
- (ii) If a certain song, beautifully composed, that is heard by a bhikkhu tends to arouse defilements such as rāga (attachment) in him, that sound is an unworthy one. He should not listen to it. If, on the other hand, a certain song, even coming from a potters girl, enables the bhikkhu, who hears it, to reflect on the law of cause and effect and strengthens his conviction in the truth of the Dhamma Saddhā, tending to disenchantment with sentient existence and thoughts of renunciation, then that sound is a worthy one. He should listen to it.

- (iii) If a certain odour tends to arouse defilements such as rāga (attachment) in the mind of a bhikkhu who smells it, that odour is an unworthy one. He should not smell it. If a certain odour causes the bhikkhu, who smells it, to gain a perception of loathsomeness of the body, that odour is a worthy one. He should smell it.
- (iv) If a certain taste tends to arouse defilements such as rāga (attachment) in the mind of a bhikkhu who tastes it, that taste is an unworthy one. He should not taste it. If a certain taste causes the bhikkhu, who tastes it, to gain a perception of loathsomeness (āhāre paṭikūla-saññā) of the food swallowed or if it sustains him to gain the Ariya Truth, like in the case of Sāmaṇera Śīva (nephew of Thera Mahā Śīva) who became an arahat while taking his meal, then that taste is worthy one. He should eat it. [In this connection, we have looked for the name of Sāmaṇera Śīva in the Sub-Commentary and in the Visuddhi-magga but do not find it. In the Visuddhi-magga, there is the story of Sāmaṇera Bhāgeyya Sangharakkhita who attained arahatship while taking his meal (Vis. I, Chapter on Sila)]
- (v) If a certain tangible object tends to arouse defilements such as rāga (attachment) in the mind of a bhikkhu who touches it, that tangible object is an unworthy one. He should not touch it. If a certain tangible object (which is proper for a bhikkhu) causes the bhikkhu still training himself to attain arahatship through exhaustion of the moral taints (āsavas) completely like in the case of the Venerable Sāriputta, etc. or is conducive to zeal, or serves as a good model for future bhikkhus, then that tangible object should be resorted to.

It is noteworthy in this connection that many bhikkhus during the Buddha's time denied themselves the luxury of lying down; for instance, the Venerable Sāriputta never lay on a bed (cot) for thirty whole years; the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna for as many years; the Venerable Mahā Kassapa for a hundred and twenty years; the Venerable Anuruddha for fifty years; the Venerable Bhaddhiya for thirty years; the Venerable Sona for eighteen years; the Venerable Raṭhapāla for twelve years; the Venerable Ānanda for fifteen years; the Venerable Rāhula for twelve years; the Venerable Bākula for eighty years; the Venerable Nālaka (the one who practised self-denial Moneya to perfection) for as long as he lived. (i.e. till his final decease, parinibbāna).

- (vi) If a certain Dhamma object about mind or matter tends to arouse defilements such as rāga (attachment) in the mind of a bhikkhu who thinks about that object; or tends to arouse covetousness in him, that thought is an unworthy one. He should not entertain such a thought. If a certain thought promotes kind feelings towards others, such as: "May all beings be well, be free from trouble, etc.", as in the case of the three bhikkhu-elders (narrated below), that thought is a worthy one. He should nurture such a thought, such a Dhamma object.

The Story of The Three Bhikkhu-elders

Once, three bhikkhu-elders made a vow among themselves, on the eve of the rains-retreat period, not to indulge in demeritorious thoughts such as sensuous thoughts (during the three month vassa period) and made a certain monastery their rains retreat.

At the end of the rains retreat, on the Sangha assembly day, on the full moon of Thadingyut (October), Sangha-elder (who is the most senior of the three bhikkhu-elders) put this question to the youngest of the three bhikkhu-elders: "How far did you allow your mind to wander during the three months of the rains-retreat?" To which, he replied: "Venerable Sir, during these three months, I did not allow my mind to wander beyond the precincts of the monastery." The bhikkhu's admission implies that his mind wandered sometimes within the monastery precincts which may mean sense objects such as visible objects that came into the monastery precincts, but since there were no female visitors (lit. forms of uncommon nature), his mind had no occasion to wander about through unbridled thoughts.

The Sangha-elder then asked the second bhikkhu-elders: “Friend, how far did you allow your mind to wander during the three months of the rains retreat?” To which the second bhikkhu-elder replied: “Venerable Sir, during these three months, I did not allow my mind to wander beyond my room.”

Then the two junior bhikkhu-elders asked of the Sangha-elder: “Venerable Sir, how far did you allow your mind to wander during the three months of the rains-retreat?” To which, the Sangha-thera answered: “Friends, during these three months, I did not allow my mind to wander outside of my body.” That indeed was true, the Sangha-elder did not do anything (i.e. physically verbally or mentally) without being mindful of, without having first reflected on the action that was about to take place so that there was no moment left for any thought to wander forth outside the body. The two junior bhikkhu-elders said to the senior-most elder: “Venerable Sir, you are wonderful!”

The moral: the type of thought that occurred to these three bhikkhu-elders is of the worthy type; a bhikkhu may well entertain such thoughts.

(13) The Thirteenth Question and Answer

On The Various Elements

Thus having received the Buddha's discourse with delight, Sakka, King of Devas, further asked his next question:

“Venerable Sir, do all samaṇas and brāhmanas have the same teaching, the same practice, the same view, and the same ultimate goal?”

To this, the Buddha's reply:

“Sakka, King of Devas, not all of the samaṇas and brāhmanas have the same teaching, the same practice, the same view, and the same goal.”

(Herein, Sakka puts this question because he has known, prior to his becoming an ariya, that the so called samaṇas and brāhmanas have diverse teaching, practices, views and goals which he now understands them as vain. He wants to know the reasons why there are such a diversity of teachings, practices, views and goals among them.)

Sakka further asked:

“Venerable Sir, what is the reason for the diversity of teachings, practices, views, and goals among all samaṇas and brāhmanas?”

And the Buddha replied:

“Sakka, King of Devas, all beings in this sentient world are of various dispositions. Whatever attracts their fancy, these beings hold on to it, firmly believing it to be the only truth, and rejecting all other views as vain. That is why all of the samaṇas and brāhmanas have no common teaching, no common practice, no common view, and no common goal.”

(Individual dispositions differ among persons. When one wants to go, another wants to stand; when one wants to stand another wants to lie down. It is difficult to find two individuals of the same disposition. If dispositions differ among one another, regarding even postures, how could views, practices and teachings be the same among them? The Buddha points out this diversity as the reason for the differences in teachings, practices, views and goals among samaṇas and brāhmanas.)

(14) The Fourteenth Question and Answer

On The Final Crossing Over

Further, Sakka asked this question to the Buddha:

“Venerable Sir, do all samaṇas and brāhmanas attain the Indestructible (i.e. Nibbāna) where they can find refuge and where all yokes, bonds are overcome? Do all of them practise the Noble Ariya Path which is the right practice for the attainment of the Indestructible? Do they have the Indestructible as the final goal?”

(Sakka's question is about Nibbāna as the ultimate reality, and about whether holders of diverse views take up the practice of the Ariya Path to attain Nibbāna.)

The Buddha answered:

“Sakka, King of Devas, not all samaṇas and brāhmanas attain the Indestructible (i.e. Nibbāna) where they can find refuge and where all yokes, bonds are overcome. Not all of them practise the noble Ariya Path which is the right practice for the attainment of Nibbāna; nor have the Indestructible as their final goal.”

(Since individual disposition differ among the so-called samaṇas and brāhmanas, their teachings, practices, views and goals differ. Therefore, how could they attain Nibbāna, the ultimate reality, as their common goal? The Buddha makes this clearly in His reply that only those who practise the Ariya Path can attain Nibbāna.)

Sakka then put his last question thus:

“Venerable Sir, what is the reason that not all samaṇas and brāhmanas attain the Indestructible (Nibbāna) where they can find refuge and where all yokes, bonds are overcome? Why is it that they do not practise the Noble Ariya Path which is the right practice for attainment of the Indestructible? Why is it that not all of them have the Indestructible as their final goal?”

And the Bhagavā replied:

“Sakka, King of Devas, those bhikkhus who are free from defilements through the Ariya Path which causes the extinction of craving (in other words, those bhikkhus who are inclined to Nibbāna where all craving is extinct) attain the Indestructible Nibbāna where they find refuge and where all yokes, bonds are overcome. They are the ones who practise the Noble Ariya Path which is the right practice to attain Nibbāna, the Indestructible. They have the Nibbāna the Indestructible, as their final goal. That being so, not all samaṇas and brāhmanas attain Nibbāna the Indestructible, where they find refuge and where all yokes are overcome. Not all of them practise the Noble Ariya Path which is the right path to attain Nibbāna the Indestructible. Not all of them have Nibbāna the Indestructible as their final goal.”

(Thus took place a verbal exchange between the noblest of ariyas and Sakka, an ariya, on the subject of Nibbāna, the ultimate reality. They spoke the language of the ariyas which is magnificent as a fully blossomed sal tree. For us worldlings, that language and its meanings are not comprehensible because our field of knowledge does not go beyond the sense faculties. (In other words, our range of perception is limited to our senses only.) The point the Buddha makes here is that only arahats, who have been liberated from defilements through the Ariya Path that destroys craving, attain Nibbāna the ultimate reality. Not all samaṇas and brāhmanas attain Nibbāna.)

The Buddha's Teaching has Nibbāna the ultimate reality as its culmination. Hence, when the question of Nibbāna has been dealt with fully, there is the end of all questions.

On hearing the Buddha's reply, Sakka was delighted and said: “Venerable Sir, that indeed is so. O Well-spoken One, that indeed is so. Having learnt the Bhagava's answer, I have been rid of all doubts about this question. I have no uncertainties now!”

(End of the fourteenth question and answer)

After receiving the Buddha's discourse with much delight, Sakka, King of Devas said to Him:

“Venerable Sir, craving is a disease, an open sore, a dart (thorn). Craving attracts all beings to endless existences, thereby sending them now to high planes of existence and then to low planes of existence.

“Venerable Sir, whatever question I did not have even the opportunity to ask of the so-called samaṇas and Brāhmanas outside this Teaching, the Bhagavā has given me the answer. The Bhagava has by this answer cleared all darts of doubt that had long been troubling me.”

The Buddha then asked Sakka:

“Sakka, King of Devas, do you remember having put these questions to other samaṇas and brāhmanas?”

“Yes, I do, Venerable Sir.”

“What were their answers? If it is not too much trouble, may I know it?”

“When the Bhagavā or someone as great as the Bhagavā ask (lit. sits before me), there is no trouble for me to answer.”

“Very well, then Sakka, King of Devas, let us hear what you have to say.”

“Venerable Sir, I had put these questions to those samaṇas and brāhmanas whom I took for forest dwellers. They were not only unable to answer my question but even asked me who I was (that could ask such profound questions). I said I was Sakka, King of Devas and then they (were interested and) asked me what merit I had acquired to become Sakka. I told them the seven meritorious acts, as I had learnt, that lead to Sakkahood. Then they were greatly pleased, saying: ‘We have seen Sakka in person, and we have also got Sakka's answer to our questions!’ Indeed, Venerable Sir, those samaṇas and brāhmanas were merely my pupils. I had never been their pupil.

“Venerable Sir, I am now, an ariya disciple of the Bhagavā, a Stream Enterer, who is forever safe against the four miserable existences of apāya and whose fortunate destiny is thus assured, and who is on the way to the three higher maggas.”

The Delightful Satisfaction of Sakka

Then the Buddha asked Sakka whether he had previously experienced delightful satisfaction of this nature. Sakka replied: “Yes, Venerable Sir, I remember having experienced delightful satisfaction of this nature previously.”

“What kind of delightful satisfaction do you remember having experienced before?”

“Venerable Sir, in the past, there took place a great battle between the devas of Tāvātimsa and those of the asuras. The Tāvātimsa devas were the victor. Then as victor, I was very glad to reflect on the fact that the Tāvātimsa devas would now have the special privilege of enjoying both their own food pertaining to the Tāvātimsa realm as well as the food pertaining to the Asura realm. (However) Venerable Sir, my delightful satisfaction, then, was pleasure bolstered up with armed might. It was not helpful for disenchantment with the wheel of existence, for destroying desire, for cessation of the round of rebirth, for abandoning attachment, for special apperception, for an understanding of the Four Truths, for the realization of Nibbāna.

“Venerable Sir, the delightful satisfaction that I now have, on hearing the Bhagava's discourse, is of a (superior) kind that does not need bolstering up with armed might. It is indeed conducive to disenchantment with the wheel of existence, to destroying desire, to cessation of the round of rebirth, to abandoning attachment, to special apperception, to an understanding of the Four Truths, to the realization of Nibbāna.”

The Six Benefits for Sakka on attaining Stream-Entry Knowledge

Then the Buddha asked: “Sakka, King of Devas, what benefits do you see (in your present status) so that you speak of its great delight?”

“Venerable Sir, I see six great benefits (in my present ariyahood) and that is why I extol it so much. The six are:

(1) *Idheva tithamānassa devabhūtuṃ me sato
Punarāyu ca me laddho evaṇ jānāhi mārisa.*

O Venerable One, who is free from dukkha, even while I have been listening to your discourse in this Indasāla Cave, I have been reborn as Sakka (by the name of Maghava) and will live thirty-six million years, by human reckoning, in the Tāvātimsa Deva realm. May the Venerable One, who is free from dukkha, take note of it. Venerable Sir, this is the first benefit that is behind extolling of my ariyahood.

(2) *Cutāham diviyā kāyā āyuṇ hitvā amānusaṃ
Amūlo gabbhamesāmi yattha me ramatī mano.*

O Venerable One, who is free from dukkha, when I die from deva existence and have relinquished the thirty-six million years' life, by human reckoning, of Tāvātimsa Deva existence, I shall, without any bewilderment (at death), be reborn in the human world in a high class or clan of my own preference. Venerable Sir, this is the second benefit that is behind my extolling of my ariyahood.

(When an ariya passes away and takes another rebirth, he is never in a bewildered state. Mindful and with clear comprehension, he passes away from one existence to another, which is always in a fortunate destination. If reborn in the human world, he always belongs to the royal (warrior) caste or brahmin caste. Sakka has a desire for such noble birth when he reappears as a human being.)

(3) *Svāham amūlhapaññassa vihariṇ sāsane rato
Ñāyena viharissāmi sampajāno paṭissato.*

O Venerable One, who is free from dukkha, taking delight in the Teaching of the Perfectly Enlightened One, I (known by the name of Maghava) shall (enjoying, physical health) dwell in mindfulness and clear comprehension befitting an ariya. Venerable Sir, this is the third benefit that is behind my extolling of my ariyahood.

(4) *Ñāyena me carato ca sambodhi ce bhavissati
Aññatā viharissāmi sveva anto bhavissati.*

O Venerable One, who is free from dukkha, in me (known by the name of Maghava) who thus dwell in the noble practice of an ariya, if sakadāgāmī-magga arises, then, to gain still higher Path-Knowledge of anāgāmī-magga and arahatta-magga, I shall dwell in still further practice of the Path. When sakadāgāmī-magga is attained that will be my last human existence. Venerable Sir, this is the fourth benefit that lies behind my extolling of my Ariyahood.

(5) *Cutāham mānusa kāyā āyūṃ hitvāna mānusaṃ
Puna deva bhavissāmi devalokamhi uttamo.*

O Venerable One, who is free from dukkha, when I (known by the name of Maghava) pass away from the human existence and leave behind the human body, relinquishing the human life, I shall be reborn in the Tāvātimsa Deva realm as Lord of Devas. Venerable Sir, this is the fifth benefit that lies behind my extolling of my ariyahood.

(6) *Te pañtatarā devā akanitthā yassasino
Ante me vattamānamhi so nivāso bhavissati.*

O Venerable One free from dukkha, those devas, the ariya-Brahmās of the Akaniṭṭhā realm, the topmost of the planes of existence, is superior in all respects, such as life span and knowledge, to all other devas and Brahmās. They have big followership. When I have my last existence, I (known by the name of Maghava) shall be reborn in that Akaniṭṭhā Brahmā realm. Venerable Sir, this is the sixth benefit that lies behind my extolling of my Ariyahood.

(The six benefits that Sakka enjoys on hearing the discourse in the Indasāla Cave are:-

(i) Attaining Stream-Entry at Indasāla cave; passing away and instant rebirth, also at Indasāla cave, as Sakka again; (ii) On passing away from that Sakka existence, rebirth in a noble lineage in the human world in a non-bewildered state, his path to final enlightenment as an arahat being limited to seven existences only; (iii) Continued practice of the path in his future existences without bewilderment; (iv) Attaining sakadāgāmī-magga in a human existence which will be his last human existence; (v) On passing away from that last human existence, being destined to become Sakka (for the third time); (vi) Attaining anāgāmī-magga as Sakka, and being reborn in progressively higher existences in the five Pure Brahmā realms namely: Aviha realm, Atappa realm, Sudassā realm, Sudassī realm, Akaniṭṭhā realm; and to attain arahatship in the Akaniṭṭhā realm.

The sixth benefit, which is to result in rebirth in the five Brahmā-worlds should be noted here particularly for the immense durations of sublime existence in the Pure Abodes: As an anāgāmī-puggala (Non-Returner), Sakka will enjoy the ecstasy of a Pure Brahmā in the Avihā realm for a thousand aeons (mahā-kappas); passing away from that realm, he will be reborn in the Atappā realm for two thousand aeons; then in the Sudassā realm for four thousand aeons; then in the Sudassī realm for eight thousand aeons; and finally, in the Akaniṭṭhā realm for sixteen thousand aeons. Thus a total of thirty-one thousand aeons of the ecstasy of the Brahmā existence.

In the matter of the kind of extraordinarily prolonged existence full of ecstasy there are only three outstanding ariya disciples under Buddha Gotama's Teaching, namely; Sakka, Anāthapiṇḍika and Visākhā. They enjoy similar life span.

Sakka concluded with these words:

“Venerable Sir, it is because I see these six benefits that I extol the delightful satisfaction (of my attainment).”

Then Sakka repeated his former experience with the forest-dwelling samaṇas and brāhmanas who failed to answer his questions, but how he had to teach them the seven modes of conduct leading to Sakkahood. (Please refer to his story which was related to the Buddha earlier.)

Then he sang in praise of the Buddha in the following stanzas:

*Tañhā sallassa hantāraṃ buddhaṃ appaṭipuggalaṃ
Ahaṃ vande mahāvīraṃ buddhamādicca bandhunam*

To the Buddha, the unrivalled One, Knower of the Four Truths, kinsman of the Sun (having Gotama clan as common lineage) (or in an other sense, being father of the sun in the propagation of the Supramundane), the One possessed of great endeavour, who has destroyed all darts of craving, the Perfectly-Enlightened One, I (known as Maghava) make my obeisance with raised palms.

*Yam karomasi brahmauno samam devehi marisa
Tadajja tuyham dassama handa saman karoma te*

O Venerable One, who is free from dukkha, formerly we had paid our tribute to the Brahmā, as with other devas; but from today onwards, we shall give our offerings to You. Now, we pay our obeisance to You!

*Tvameva asi Sambuddho tuvam sathā anuttaro
Sadevakasmim lokasmim natthi te paṭipuggalo*

O Venerable One, who is free from dukkha, You alone are the Perfectly-Enlightened One, Teacher of devas and humans. There is none to equal You, in personal glory or in the embodiment of the Dhamma in all the worlds of sentient beings including the world of devas.

Sakka's Reward to Pañcasikha Deva

After singing in praise of the Buddha in those three stanzas, Sakka said to Pañcasikha:

“O Pañcasikha, through your good offices, we have the privilege of seeing the Homage-Worthy, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddha. I am greatly indebted to you for this. I appoint you to your father's office (as Chief of Gandhabba devas). You will be the (next) chief of gandhabbas. I also betroth you to Sūriyavaschāsā, the maiden of exquisite features whom you deeply yearn for.”

Sakka's Joyous Utterance

After that, Sakka was so glad that he slapped the good earth (as though a person were to slap his friend's arm in intimate affection) and uttered these words of joyous expression thrice:

Namo tassa bhagavato arahato sammā sambuddhassa

Veneration to the Exalted One, the Homage-Worthy, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened.

(In this connection, Sakka slapped the good earth because (he attained the Supramundane,) while he remained on the earth and also because this great earth has produced such a marvellous personage as the Buddha, so that he had a profound regard for the good earth.)

After listening to the Buddha's answers, Sakka acquired the Eye of the Dhamma, being able to dispel certain defilements and thereby understand that “whatever is in the nature of arising, has the nature of perishing”. He thus attained Stream-Entry, as also did the eighty thousand devas who were in his company then.

This discourse, being a series of answers to Sakka's questions, is known (in the Piṭaka) as the Discourse Concerning Sakka's Questions, Sakka Pañha.

Chapter 40

THE BUDDHA DECLARED THE SEVEN FACTORS OF NON-DECLINE FOR RULERS

(As we have said earlier on,) the Buddha spent the earlier twenty vassas at various places and preached the noble Doctrine that led to the liberation of the multitudes and spent the latter twenty-four vassas in Sāvatti only. After the end of the vassa or rains-retreat, He set out on journeys of three kinds of periphery (as described earlier on) and tamed those worthy of taming. The number of discourses and dialogues are as varied as they are wide so that they cannot be treated fully within the confines of this work. Just as a drop or two of sea water would suffice to understand that the sea is saltish, so also in this book, only a few examples from the suttanta (discourses) can be given that should give the reader a fair idea of the richness of the Doctrine. Scholars, who wish to gain further knowledge from the Buddha's extensive teachings, are advised to read from the (Myanmar) translations of the Piṭaka (with the help of the Commentaries and Sub-commentaries. We shall henceforth confine our narrative to the events and discourses that belong to the period extending from around the forty-fourth vassa onwards which was the period close to His realization of Parinibbāna.)

At one time (when the Buddha had completed his forty-fourth vassa) the Buddha of Illustrious Attributes was staying at the mountain abode, up on Gijjakuṭa Hill, near Rājagaha. (The place name Gijjakuṭa means 'Vulture Peak' probably derived from the shape of the peak, or from the fact that it was the roosting place of vultures.)

At that time, King Ajātasattu (of Rājagaha) was very keen on invading Vesālī, the country of Licchavis. "I will exterminate them however powerful and mighty they may be, play havoc with them, cause their ruin," he was saying all the time, a haughty monarch as he was.

The reason for his deep-seated hatred of the Licchavis could be traced to some unhappy incidents thus:

Rājagaha and Vesali were two flourishing cities on either side of the River Gaṅga which flowed east and west, with Rājagaha on the southern side and Vesālī on the northern side. There was a caravan station known as Paṭṭanagāma (The present-day Patna was probably around that place.) With Paṭṭanagāma in the middle, the region extending about half a yojana came under the domain of King Ajātasattu while the region of the same extent towards the other side of that region came under the domain of the Licchavīs.

There were rich deposits of precious materials originating at the hillside near Paṭṭanagama. As King Ajātasattu learnt about the treasures and was making plans to go there, the Licchavīs reached there first and took away all the treasures. When King Ajātasattu arrived and learnt that the Licchavīs had stolen a march on him, he went back home with great fury.

In the following year too, the Licchavis were ahead of King Ajātasattu in getting there and enjoying the find. King Ajātasattu's anger knew no bounds. He was obsessed with the thought of exterminating, destroying and ruining the mighty Licchavīs. In all his four bodily postures he was cursing aloud. He even went so far as giving orders to his men to plan an expedition.

On second thoughts, however, he restrained his action. "War is disastrous to both sides. There is no clash of arms that do not result in loss of life (and property). By taking wise counsel, I may not have harsh consequences. There is no one in the world greater in wisdom than the Buddha. Just now the Buddha is staying near my city, on his mountain abode on Gijjakuṭa Hill. I shall send a minister to Him and seek His advice, on my proposed expedition. If my plan is of any benefit to me, He would remain silent; if it is against my own good, He would say: “What good is it for the king to go on such an expedition?” Reflecting thus, he said to the Brahmin Vassakāra (his Chief Minister):

“Here, Brahmin, go to the Bhagavā. Pay homage at His feet and convey my message. Enquire after His health whether the Bhagavā is free from any affliction and disease, whether He is well and fit, and is well at ease. Say to the Bhagavā: ‘Venerable Sir, King Ajātasattu of Magada, son of Queen Vedehī, pays homage at Your feet. He enquires after the Bhagava’s health whether the Bhagavā is free from affliction and disease, whether the Bhagavā is well and fit, and is well at ease.’ Then say to Him: ‘Venerable Sir, the King wishes to make war against the Vajjī princes, the Licchavis of Vesālī, and is making self-glorious declarations that he will exterminate the Vajjī princes, however powerful and mighty they might be, and that he will play havoc with them and cause their ruin.’ And then carefully note what the Bhagavā says and report back to me. The Bhagavā never speaks false.”

“Very well, Your Majesty,” said the Brahmin Vassakāra and he went to the Gijjakuṭa Hill amidst a splendid formation of carriages. Once there, he (ascended from the carriage) approached the Buddha, and after exchanging greetings and concluding courteous words of felicitation, sat at a suitable place. Then he said to the Buddha:

“Revered Gotama, King Ajātasattu of Magada, son of Queen Vedehī pays homage at Your feet. He enquires after Your health whether You are free from affliction and disease, whether You are well and fit, and whether You are well at ease. Revered Gotama, King Ajātasattu wishes to make war against the Vajjī princes, the Licchavī of Vesālī, and is making self-glorious declaration that he will exterminate the Vajjī princes, play havoc with them, and cause their ruin.”

Seven Factors of Growth, Non-decline for Kings

At that time, the Venerable Ānanda was at the back of the Buddha, fanning Him. (In this connection it may be pointed out that the Buddhas, by virtue of their infinite merit, do not feel too cold nor too hot. Ānanda’s fanning the Buddha was merely an act of veneration.) When the Buddha had heard the Brahmin’s words He did not say anything to him but entered into a dialogue with Venerable Ānanda:

(He said: “Ānanda, do the Vajjī princes hold meetings frequently? Do they have meetings many times? What have you heard?”

(Ānanda: “Venerable Sir, I have heard that the Vajjī princes hold meetings frequently, and that they have meetings many times.”

(i) The First Factor of Growth, Non-decline

“Ānanda, so long as the Vajjī princes assemble frequently and have many meetings, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

(Note: Frequent meetings means three or more meetings every day. ‘They have meetings many times’ means never skipping a day without meeting.

The advantages of frequent meetings is that fresh information is always forthcoming from the eight directions. If up-to-date information is not forthcoming, unrest at remote places and border areas might go unnoticed at the capital; so also breach of law and order in the country might not be duly reported. If no prompt action is taken against lawless elements this will be taken as laxity on the part of those in authority and the law and order situation will deteriorate. This is a sure way of decline for rulers.

If, on the other hand, frequent meetings are held, up-to-date information from all over the country can reach the capital and prompt action can be taken whenever necessary. The bad people will then know that they do not stand any chance against this sort of efficient administration and will disperse. This is a sure way of prosperity for rulers.)

(ii) The Second Factor of Growth, Non-decline

“Ānanda, do the Vajjī princes assemble in harmony and do they disperse in harmony? Do they act in harmony in discharging their duties in the affairs of the Vajjī country? What have you heard?”

“Venerable Sir, I have heard that the Vajjī princes assemble in harmony and disperse in harmony, and that they act in harmony in discharging their duties in the affairs of the Vajjī country.”

“Ānanda, so long as the Vajjī princes assemble and disperse in harmony and act in harmony in discharging their duties in the affairs of the Vajjī country, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

(Note: ‘To assemble in harmony’ means never appearing late at the appointed hour of meeting on any excuse. When the time for the meeting is announced by gong or by bell, all turn up in time, leaving aside whatever activities they may be engaged in. If one happens to be taking his meal, he must leave the table at once in the middle of his meal; if one happens to be dressing himself up, he must attend the meeting even though not fully dressed up yet.

‘To disperse in harmony’ means leaving the meeting chamber all at the same time after the meeting has concluded. If some have left the meeting chamber and others were to remain, the ones who have gone might harbour suspicion against those who remain, with the uneasy thought that they stay behind to make important decisions behind their back. This sort of suspicious speculation is poisonous for the rulers’ mind.

In another sense: ‘to disperse in harmony’ means to be keen to undertake what is to be undertaken (as the follow up action consequent to the deliberations and decisions at the meeting). For example, if a rebellion needs to be quelled and someone is to take charge, everyone is eager to shoulder the responsibility.

‘Harmony in discharging duties’ means rendering every possible assistance among one another. For example, if one of the members is found to be falling short of his duty, the others would send their sons or brothers to render help. Where a visitor needs to be entertained, the responsibility is not shirked but all join in the task. In meeting their individual social obligations too, whether for happy occasions or sad occasions, all the members act as one whole family.)

(iii) The Third Factor of Growth, Non-decline

“Ānanda, do Vajjī princes abstain from enacting ordinances that have not been enacted previously, and do they abstain from revoking what has been enacted previously, and do they follow the time-honoured Vajjī traditions and practices? What have you heard?”

“Venerable Sir, I have heard that the Vajjī princes abstain from enacting ordinances that have not been enacted previously, and that they follow the time-honoured Vajjī traditions and practices.”

“Ānanda, so long as the Vajjī princes abstain from enacting ordinances that have not been enacted previously, and abstain from revoking what has been enacted previously, and follow the time honoured Vajjī traditions and practices, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

(Note: ‘Enacting ordinances’ means imposing taxes and fines. Imposing fresh taxes and fines that were not done before, and not revoking traditional taxes and fines is an important principle for rulers. ‘Following Vajjī traditions and practices’ means acting in accordance with traditional code of justice. For instance, execution of accused persons without trial is a flagrant disregard of tradition and practice. Whenever fresh taxes and fines are enacted the people naturally resent it. They may even feel that they are fleeced and in that case they may leave the country in disgust and turn to robbery and crime in remote places, or some of the discontented lot may join gangs of bandits, cause strife in out of the way areas.

Revoking traditional taxes and fines will result in loss of revenue. This will render the rulers unable to meet state expenditures. The armed forces and civil servants will have reductions in their remuneration. This will lower their efficiency and the standards of their services will fall, effecting the might of the army.

If the time-honoured Vajjī traditions and practices are disregarded and people are executed without trial, relatives of the victims of injustice will bear grudge against the rulers. They may go to remote places and resort to crime themselves or may join gangs of bandits and roam the country. These are causes of decline for rulers.

In a country where the ordinances enacted are the same ones that have been traditionally enacted, the people will accept them without murmur. They will feel happy about their obligations and go about their normal activities such as agriculture and trading.

Where rulers do not revoke traditional taxes and fines their revenues in kind and in money are flowing in every day. The armed forces and civil servants enjoy their usual remuneration as they are properly provided and made happy, Their services remain as trustworthy and dependable as in the olden days.

In Vajjī system of justice, there were stages of careful scrutiny in the administration of criminal justice. When a man was brought before the authorities and was accused of theft, he was not put into custody but was properly examined. If there was no proof of theft, he was allowed to go. If someone was suspected of a crime, he was handed to the officials of the justice department where he was given a proper hearing. If found not guilty, he was released. If the judges suspected him of the crime, he was referred to a panel of learned persons who were well versed in social ethics. If the panel of learned persons found him not guilty he was released. If they considered him not free of fault, he was then referred to a review board of eight jurors (who belonged to the eight categories of families with an honourable tradition and who were free from the four kinds of improper official conduct.) If the review board found him not guilty, he was released but, if he was not free from blame, he was committed to the King through the Commander-in Chief and the Heir-apparent. If the King found him not guilty, he was released. If he was not free from blame, the traditional criminal code, 'dhammathat', was caused to be read in his presence. The code contained specific descriptions of acts of crime with specific punishments attached to them. The King ascertained the nature of crime the man had committed that answered the description in the list of crimes in the code, and the prescribed punishment was meted out to him.

The Observance of the Vajjī tradition described above was very reassuring to the people. When one of their kith and kin was punished for a crime the people did not blame the Vajjī princes. They knew the King had dispensed justice and that the fault lay with the perpetrator only. Being satisfied that they had full protection of the law, they went about their usual business honestly. This adherence to the time-honoured system of justice is thus a factor of progress for rulers.)

(iv) The Fourth Factor of Growth, Non-decline

“Ānanda, do Vajjī princes treat their elders with courteous regard, deference, esteem and veneration, and do they consider that the advice of elderly people are worth listening to? What have you heard?”

“Venerable Sir, I have heard that the Vajjī princes treat their elders with regard, deference, esteem and veneration, and that they consider the advice of elderly people are worth listening to.”

“Ānanda, so long as the Vajjī princes treat their elders with regard, deference, esteem, and veneration, and consider that the advice of elderly people are worth listening to, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

(The terms 'regard, deference, esteem and veneration', all denote a deep sense of respect, indebtedness, genuine affection and humility. 'To listen to their advice' means to seek their counsel twice or thrice every day.)

If young princes do not have a sense of respect for their elders and do not go to them for advice, they will be ignored by the elders, and lacking proper guidance, they will tend to indulge themselves in sensual pleasures and forget their princely duties, thus leading to their ruin.

Where princes hold their elders in esteem, the latter will advise them on state craft, pointing out the traditional practices. In military strategy, they have practical experience so that in a given situation they can give sound guidance, such as how to advance, how to retreat. Drawing on the rich experience and mature wisdom of their elders, the princes can thus carry on their proud tradition, perpetuating their national glory.

(v) The Fifth Factor of Growth, Non-decline

“Ānanda, do the Vajjī princes refrain from carrying away, by force, women and girls and keeping them? What have you heard?”

“Venerable Sir, I have heard that the Vajjī princes do not carry away, by force, women and girls and keep them.”

“Ānanda, so long as the Vajjī princes refrain from carrying away, by force, women and girls and keeping them, they are bound to prosper, there is no reason for their decline.”

(Herein, where the rulers forcibly take any woman or girl without consent, the people will be very angry. “They have taken away a mother from our house!” “They have taken away our girl whom we have nurtured with such great devotion!” “They have kept them at the palace!” People will complain. They will leave the country, go to the remote regions and become criminals themselves, or they may join gangs of bandits and roam the country. This is a cause of decline for rulers.)

Where the rulers do not forcibly take away women and girls and keep them, the people are free from molestation and anxiety and they go about their usual business. They contribute to the wealth of the rulers. So, restraint of rulers is a factor for their progress.)

(vi) The Sixth Factor of Growth, Non-decline

“Ānanda, do the Vajjī princes hold in respect, reverence, honour, and veneration their traditional shrines within and without the city? Do they see to it that appropriate offerings and oblations are made at those shrines as of yore, without remiss? What have you heard?”

“Venerable Sir, I have heard that the Vajjī princes hold in respect, reverence, honour, and veneration their traditional shrines within and without the city. They see to it that appropriate offerings and oblations are made at those shrines as of yore, without remiss.”

“Ānanda, so long as the Vajjī princes hold in respect, reverence, honour, and veneration their traditional shrines within and without the city, and see to it that appropriate offerings and oblations are made at those shrines as of yore, without remiss, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

(Where the rulers do not venerate the traditional shrines whether inside or outside of the city and are remiss in making the customary offerings and oblations that are due to them, the guardian spirits do not afford them protection. Although the guardian spirits are not able to cause fresh misfortune to the people, they can aggravate the existing misfortune such as a worsening in coughs and headaches. In time of war, they do not join forces against the enemy. Thus the rulers stand to meet with decline.)

Where rulers do not neglect the customary offerings and oblations that are due to guardian spirits at the traditional shrines, the latter give them protection. Although the guardian spirits are not able to bring fresh fortunes to the people, they can attenuate the existing misfortune such as causing immediate relief in coughs and headaches. In times of war, they join forces with the local combatants. They may cause delusion to the enemy into thinking that the local army is twice or thrice its actual numbers; or they may show up terrifying sights before the enemy. Keeping the traditional guardian spirits in their good mood through customary offerings and oblations is a factor of prosperity for rulers.)

(vii) The Seventh Factor of Growth, Non-decline

“Ānanda, do the Vajjī princes see to it that arahats are given suitable protection and security so that those arahats, who have not yet visited the Vajjī country, may go, and so that those arahats, who have already arrived, may live in the Vajjī country in a genial atmosphere? What have you heard?”

“Venerable Sir, I have heard that the Vajjī princes make careful provisions for the protection of and security for arahats so that those arahats, who have not yet visited the Vajjī country, may go and so that those arahats, who have already arrived, may live in the Vajjī country in a genial atmosphere.”

“Ānanda, so long as the Vajjī princes see to it that arahats are given suitable protection and security so that those arahats, who have not yet visited the Vajjī country, may go, and so that those arahats, who have already arrived, may live in the Vajjī country in a genial atmosphere, they (the princes) are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

(In this matter, ‘protection’ means necessary measures to ensure safety and ‘security’ means safeguarding the peace and friendly atmosphere. For noble persons, their protection and security need not be provided using a powerful armed guard. What is needed is to make sure that annoyance is not caused to these noble ones by such improper ways as felling of trees near their monastery, hunting or fishing in the vicinity. Careful provisions for the protection and security are intended to guarantee a genial atmosphere for arahats. They reflect the friendly attitude of the Vajjī princes towards the noble ones.

Where the rulers of a country do not have a friendly attitude towards arahats, who have not yet visited their country, it is due to their lack of faith in the Triple Gem. In that case when bhikkhus visit their country, they would not welcome them, (repeat:) would not go to them and pay homage, would not converse with them cordially, would not ask questions concerning the Doctrine, would not listen to their discourse, would not make offerings to them, would not hear the joyous remarks of the donee-bhikkhus, and would not arrange for their stay. They earn the reputation that such and such a ruler has no faith in the Triple Gem as when bhikkhus visited their country, they would not welcome them, ... (repeat from above) ... would not arrange for their stay. Due to this ill-repute, bhikkhus do not travel by the city gate of such a ruler, and if they cannot avoid using the road that passes by the city of that ruler, they would not enter the city. And thus there is no arrival of arahats, who have not yet visited that city.

If those bhikkhus, who have already visited that city, do not find a genial atmosphere, the bhikkhus will feel that they have visited a wrong place. “Who would live in such an unfriendly city where the rulers are so disrespectful?” they would say, and leave the place. Where a place is shunned by bhikkhus due to non-arrival of bhikkhus and departure of bhikkhus who have already visited, there, the place becomes devoid of bhikkhus. Where bhikkhus do not stay, guardian spirits do not stay either.

Where guardian spirits do not stay, demons have the run of the place. Where the demons thrive, strange diseases that are not known previously are caused by them. Opportunity for earning merit on account of seeing virtuous persons, seeking answers to doctrinal point, etc., is lost. This state of affairs is cause of decline for rulers.

The happy consequences of caring for the virtuous persons may be understood on the basis of the above unhappy consequences arising out of lack of such caring.)

Then the Buddha said to the Brahmin Vassakāra, Chief Minister of Magadha:

“Brahmin, on one occasion I taught the Vajjī princes these seven principle of progress while I was staying at the Śārandada shrine in Vesālī.

“Brahmin, so long as these seven factors of growth, non-decline remain with the Vajjī princes, and so long as the Vajjī princes carefully abide by these seven principles, they are bound to prosper; there is no reason for their decline.”

Then the Brahmin Vassakāra replied to the Buddha: “Revered Gotama, careful abidance of just anyone of those factors of growth would ensure the prosperity of the Vajjī princes, allowing no cause whatever for their decline. How much more so, if they carefully abide by all the seven factors!

“O revered Gotama, it is not likely that King Ajātasattu will conquer the Vajji country simply by making war upon it, unless he can successfully seduce the Vajji princes or sow seeds of dissension among them.

“O revered Gotama, we shall go now. We have many affairs to attend to.”

“Brahmin, you know the time to go (i.e. go when you wish ).”

Then the Brahmin Vassakāra, being greatly pleased with the Buddha's words, expressed his delight, rose from his seat and departed.

(Sāranda Shrine was pre-buddhistic shrine set up to propitiate a demon of that name. With the advent of the Buddha, a monastery was built on the site, hence the monastery was still known as Sāranda Shrine.

The Brahmin's suggestion of seduction was meant to resort to acts of friendliness towards the enemy with lavish presents and messages of goodwill and amity. When the enemy was led to thinking that Ajātasattu was a real friend and remained unprepared for war, then only Chief Minister would advise the king to attack.

His second idea of sowing seeds of dissension also was another strategy to weaken the enemy. Both the two ideas flowed out of the Buddha's seven factors of growth.

It might be asked: “Did the Bhagavā know that the Brahmin Vassakāra would benefit from the discourse?”

The answer is, “Yes.”

“And then why did the Bhagavā make the discourse?”

He made the discourse out of compassion for the Vajji princes. To elaborate: The Buddha knew with His supreme wisdom that if He did not give the discourse to the Brahmin, King Ajātasattu would invade the Licchavī Country, capture the Licchavī princes and destroy them in two or three days time. By giving the discourse, King Ajātasattu would first use the strategy of sowing dissension among the Licchavī princes and move to destroy them only after three years.

Three more years of survival would provide the Licchavīs opportunities for more meritorious deeds that would establish them in good stead. Hence the discourse was given out of great compassion by the Buddha.)

The Fall of Vesālī

When Brahmin Vassakāra returned from the Buddha and got back to the palace King Ajātasattu asked him:

“Brahmin, what did the Bhagavā say?”

“Your Majesty, according to Buddha Gotama, the Vajjians cannot be captured unless through deceit or through causing a disunity among them.”

“If we employ deceit, we shall have to suffer losses in our armed forces. We had better try to cause a disunity among them. But Brahmin, how should we go about it?”

“In that case, hold a meeting at the palace and announce your intention to make war with the Vajjians. Then I shall pretend to disapprove of the idea and leave the council chamber. At that, you should feign anger with me and blame me openly. Thereafter, I shall send gifts to the Vajjians in open daylight which you should promptly find out and confiscate. Then branding me as a traitor, you should, instead of inflicting physical punishment, appear to choose to disgrace me, shave my head and expel me from the city. Then I shall speak out defiant words to the effect that ‘I know the defence system of your city; I will lead the Vajjians to destroy the city walls and ransack the city.’ At those impertinent words from me you should show great anger and order my immediate departure.”

King Ajātasattu carried out Vassakāra's scheme in detail.

The Licchavī princes learnt that Vassakāra had left Rājagaha. But they had fears of him as a crooked person. “Let him not cross the Gaṅgā to our shore”, they protested strongly. However, some of the Licchavīs said: “Vassakāra is in his plight because he spoke in our defence.” So the Licchavis allowed the Brahmin to cross the Gaṅgā.

Brahmin Vassakāra came up to the Licchavī princes and on being asked the reason for his banishment, he told them what had taken place at the Rājagaha court. The Licchavīs were sympathetic with Vassakāra. They thought he was treated rather too severely for such a small offence.

“What was your official status at the Rājagaha court?” They asked of Vassakāra.

“I was the Judge (i.e. Minister of Justice).”

“Then you keep that post at our court,” the Licchavis told him. Vassakāra proved himself a very competent judge. The Licchavīs then learned the princely arts from him.

Vassakāra sows Dissent among The Licchavī Princes

When Brahmin Vassakāra had established himself as the royal teacher, he started to put his scheme into effect. He would call up a Licchavī prince in private and ask some trifling thing such as:

“Do youths under your Royal Highness do cultivating?”

“Yes, they do.” (would be the natural answer)

“Do they yoke a pair of oxen?”

“Yes, they do.”

The dialogue did not go further. The two parted. But when one of the Licchavīs who saw the private discussion asked the Licchavī who had conversed with Vassakāra about the subject of their discussion, and was told the truth, the inquirer naturally could not believe it. “There must be something that he is holding to himself,” he thought. A wedge had been thus placed between the two princes.

On another day, Brahmin Vassakāra took another Licchavī prince to privacy and asked: “Your Royal Highness what did you have for breakfast today?” And that was all. When some other Licchavī princes asked about the meeting and was told the truth it struck them as queer. Another wedge had been laid at another place.

On another occasion, Brahmin Vassakāra asked another Licchavī prince in private: “Your Royal Highness is said to be in straitened circumstances, is that true?”

“Who told you so?” asked the Prince.

“Prince so and so told me.”

And so ill-will between two innocent Licchavī princes was created.

Yet on another occasion, Brahmin Vassakāra said to another Licchavī prince in private: “Your Royal Highness is called a coward by someone.”

“Who dare call me a coward?” asked the prince.

“Prince so and so did.”

Thus enmity arose between two innocent Licchavī princes.

After three years of insidious scheming, Brahmin Vassakāra brought the Licchavī princes to such a state that no two princes had faith in each other. Then to test the effectiveness of his scheme, he had a public proclamation made by the beat of the gong, for an assembly of the Licchavi princes. Each bearing a grudge against another, none of the princes was prepared to work together in unison as usual. “Let the well-to-do princes attend; we are the wretched ones,” some would say. Or, “Let brave men go; we are but cowards.” And on these diverse grounds of disunity, the assembly did not take place.

Brahmin Vassakāra then sent a secret message to King Ajātasattu that it was the time to attack Vesālī. Ajātasattu gave the war cry by the beat of the gong and marched out of Rājagaha.

The ruling princes of Vesālī heard the news. “We will not let them cross the Gaṅgā!” they declared and an assembly was called, but nursing the old grudges, no one attended. “Let the brave ones go.” etc., they would say in derision.

When Ajātasattu's forces had crossed the Gaṅgā, the ruling princes of Vesālī declared: “We will not let them enter our city. We will close our city gates and stand firm. Come! to our defences now!” They shouted and tried to convene an assembly. Yet there was no response.

Ajātasattu's army met no resistance whatever from Vesālī whose city gates remained open. They massacred all the Licchavī princes and returned to Rājagaha as conquerors.

This is the story of how Vesālī fell.

[The events leading to the fall of Vesālī and its utter destruction took place during the three years, beginning with the year of the passing away of the Buddha and two years after that. The story is reproduced here as described in the Commentary in this connection. May the reader, the virtuous follower of the Buddha, visualize in his imagination the scene of Brahmin Vassakāra learning from the Buddha the seven factors of growth, non-decline for rulers at the mountain abode of the Buddha atop mount Gijjhakuṭa, and his departure (in all satisfaction) from there.]

The Seven Factor of Non-decline of Bhikkhu

The First Set of Seven Factor of Non-decline

Even when the Buddha was giving a discourse on the Seven factors of growth for rulers to Brahmin Vassakāra, he had in mind of making a similar discourse for the guidance of bhikkhus, in the interest of the prolongation of His Teaching, (i.e. the threefold training) which will be conducive to release from the round of existences, and realization of Nibbāna and hence are more beneficial than the seven factors of growth for rulers which are merely mundane principles.

Accordingly, soon after the Brahmin Vassakāra had left, the Buddha said to Venerable Ānanda: “Go, Ānanda, and let all the bhikkhus living around Rājagaha gather in the assembly hall.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” said Ānanda and arranged for a full gathering of bhikkhus. He sent bhikkhus endowed with special powers to inform those bhikkhus who dwelled at some distance from Rājagaha, and went personally to those bhikkhus who were living near by. When the bhikkhus had gathered in the Assembly Hall, Ānanda approached the Buddha, made obeisance to Him, and standing at a suitable place, said to Him: “Venerable Sir, the community of bhikkhus is assembled. It is for the Bhagava to go as and when he wishes.”

Then the Buddha went to the Assembly Hall and, taking the seat prepared for Him, addressed the bhikkhus thus:

“Bhikkhus, I shall expound to you the seven factors of non-decline. Listen and pay attention to what I am going to say in detail.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” the bhikkhus responded, and the Buddha gave this discourse:

- i) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus hold frequent meetings and have many meetings, they are bound to make progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- ii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus assemble and disperse in harmony, and attend to the affairs of the Sangha in harmony, they are bound to make progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus do not prescribe rules that had not been prescribed by the Buddha, and observe well the training rules (vinaya) prescribed by the Buddha, they are bound to make progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iv) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus show respect, deference, esteem, and eneration towards the bhikkhu-elders, who are of long standing and senior in *bhikkhu*hood, who have acquired the position of leadership among the Sangha, and consider that the advice of those bhikkhu-elders are worth listening to, they are bound to make progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.

- v) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus do not yield to the power, the influence of taṇhā, craving which arises in them and which leads to rebirth, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- vi) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus are willing to go into seclusion in remote forest dwellings, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- vii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus remain established in mindfulness themselves so that those co-practitioners of the bhikkhu practice who cherish morality and who have not yet come might come, and those (of similar nature) who have already come might live in peace and comfort, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.

“Bhikkhus, so long as these seven factors of non-decline remain with the bhikkhus, and so long as the bhikkhus live by them, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.”

(The discourse is not concluded yet.) The above seven factors are called the first set of seven factors of non-decline of bhikkhus.

- i) Of these seven the first factor of assembling often is essentially the same as the first principle of progress taught to the Vajjians. Unless bhikkhus meet together often they cannot get to know what is going on at various monasteries. For instance, a certain simā in a certain monastery may be flawed for having mixed boundaries so that valid Sangha functions cannot be held in them, or that certain bhikkhus at a certain monastery are practising medicine, or acting as messenger for lay persons, or taxing the patience of their lay supporters by too many wants; or are pursuing gain with gain etc.

When laxity of bhikkhu conduct is not taken note of by the Sangha, evil bhikkhus may take undue advantage of it, and multiply their numbers with adverse consequences for the Teaching.

By the Sangha frequently meeting in assembly promptly, a faulty simā can be put right by Sangha acts so that it can function according to the Vinaya. When evil bhikkhus have formed a community of their own, ariya-bhikkhus who have attained magga-phala can be despatched to teach them the ways and practices of the ariyas (Ariyavaṃsa Dhamma); evil bhikkhus can be chastised by sending bhikkhus adept at the Vinaya rules. In such case, evil bhikkhus will know that the Sangha are vigilant and that they cannot thrive. Thus the progress for the bhikkhus in the threefold training is assured.

- ii) ‘Bhikkhus assembling in harmony’ means promptly responding to a call for Sangha congregation to carry out any Sangha business such as clearing a stupa precincts or doing repair work to the shrines, or making vows or imparting instructions under the Vinaya rules. On no account should the signal for gathering of the bhikkhus be treated slightly. All personal engagements, such as stitching robes, or baking an alms-bowl, or repairing the monastery, should be dropped for the moment to attend the assembly. This attitude of always giving priority to the business of the Sangha assembly assures harmony in bhikkhu assemblies.

‘Dispersing in harmony’ means to rise from the meeting all at once and to break up without exception. If some bhikkhus were to stay on, those who have left the assembly hall might harbour suspicious thoughts against those staying behind. “Those bhikkhus have real business to discuss between themselves only” and such misunderstanding will arise.

'Dispersing in harmony' may also mean rising up together eagerly to take responsibility to carry out the resolutions made at the assembly such as participation in Sangha acts concerning simās or volunteering for chastising an errant bhikkhu.

'Attending to the affairs of the Sangha in harmony' means a readiness, on the part of every bhikkhu, to live as a community, never being selfish. For instance, if a guest bhikkhu arrives, he should be given a warm welcome instead of being directed to another monastery, or making undue inquiries about his identity. This is particularly important in respect of a sick bhikkhu needing shelter and attention. Finding bhikkhu requisites, such as alms-bowl, robes, medicine, for the needy is also an act of harmonious discharge of bhikkhu obligation. Where there is a dearth of learned bhikkhus at a certain place and there is the danger of the Pāli text or the correct meaning thereof going to extinction, the bhikkhus of that place should find a competent bhikkhu to teach the text and interpret the meaning thereof, and he should be looked after properly, by way of the four bhikkhu requisites.

- iii) In the third factor of non-decline, prescribing a bhikkhu undertaking which is not in accordance with the Doctrine amounts to prescribing something that had not been prescribed by the Buddha.

An example of such undertaking: There is a certain provision in the Vinaya rules called Nisīdānasantata rule or Purāṇasantata rule in the Pārājika Pāli, 2-Kosiya Vagga (the fifth rule at page 336, Myanmar translation). When the Buddha was staying in Sāvatti at the Jetavana Monastery, He said to the bhikkhus: "Bhikkhus, I wish to remain in seclusion for three months. No bhikkhu shall come to Me except the one who brings My meals." The bhikkhus then made an undertaking among themselves that any bhikkhu who went to the Buddha, other than the one bringing food for Him, should be liable to pācittiya offence, and breach of this offence should be conveyed to the Sangha. Now this is overdoing the Buddha's orders. These bhikkhus had no right to classify breach of the Buddha's words on that particular occasion as one of pācittiya offence, nor any right to declare (by their own undertaking) the breach a cause for confession. Such undertaking is against the Dhamma-Vinaya, and amounts to prescribing something which the Buddha had not prescribed.

Disregarding what the Buddha prescribed is best illustrated by the case of Vajjīputtaka bhikkhus of Vesālī when they tried to introduce ten unlawful rules of their liking, in flagrant disobedience to the Buddha's Vinaya rules. That event took place on the hundredth year of the Buddha's passing away. (Ref: Vinaya Cūḷavagga Pāli, Satta Satikakkhandhaka).

During the time of the Buddha, there were Bhikkhus Assaji and Punabbasuka who intentionally infringed minor rules of the Discipline. However trifling the offence might be, non-observance of what the Buddha prescribed is nothing but non-observance.

In the story of Puranasantata, the Arahāt Upasena, (brother of Sāriputta) refrained from making an (novel) undertaking as a bhikkhu rule of conduct. This is a case of not prescribing rules that had not been prescribed by the Buddha.

The Venerable Yasa, who headed the Second Council, taught the Dhamma-Vinaya to the bhikkhus. This is an instance of not disregarding the training rules prescribed by the Buddha.

On the eve of the First Council, a lively discussion took place among the Sangha whether minor offences should be dropped from the code of Vinaya because the Buddha, when His passing away was near, gave this option to the Sangha after He was gone. The Venerable Kassapa, head of the First Council, made a formal proposal at the Sangha congregation to uphold all minor offences as prescribed by the Buddha. This is a case of observing well the training rules prescribed by the Buddha.

- iv) With reference to this factor of non-decline, bhikkhu-elders would give spiritual guidance only to those bhikkhus who are courteous and reverential towards them and who approach them twice or thrice every day. To those who willingly seek guidance by showing their admiration, the bhikkhu-elders would impart practical wisdom handed down from generation of teachers and essential points in the Doctrine that are fit to be taught only to the sincere and devoted pupils. If the bhikkhus do not show due respect and regard to the bhikkhu-elders, they will be deprived of the five benefits such as morality, and the seven properties of the ariyas, and so stand to great loss and decline.

Those bhikkhus who are courteous and reverential towards the bhikkhu-elders and approach them twice or thrice every day, gain knowledge from them in many ways. They get practical instructions (in insight meditation), such as: “you should go forward thus (being mindful and with clear comprehension), you should go backward thus; you should look straight ahead thus; you should look sideways thus; you should bend the arm thus; you should stretch the folded arm thus; you should carry the great robe and alms-bowl thus, etc.” The bhikkhu-elders would impart to them practical wisdom, which was handed down from generations of teachers, and the essential points in the Doctrine, which were worthy to only sincere and devoted pupils. They would teach them the thirteen ascetic practices and warn them against pitfalls in doctrinal controversy by explaining to them the moot points contained in the Ten Points of Controversy (Abhidhamma Piṭaka). Thus, being established as good pupils of worthy teachers, these bhikkhus will gain the five benefits such as morality fulfilling the task of arahatship, the fruit of becoming bhikkhu.

- v) As regards the fifth factor of non-decline, a bhikkhu who goes about from village to village, town to town, always at the heels of their donors for the sake of acquiring the four bhikkhu requisites, is one who yields to the power of craving. One, who yields to craving, is on the decline in the benefits of bhikkhu practice such as morality. One who does not yield to craving progresses spiritually beginning with morality.
- vi) As regards the sixth factor of non-decline, a remote forest dwelling is a place away from human settlements (not necessarily to be in a forest). One must be willing to dwell in seclusion at such a place. That indeed is so. In a monastery close to a town or village, when a bhikkhu rises from jhāna, he hears human voices, male, female or children's voices which spoil the tempo of concentration

At a forest abode, one wakes up in the morning to the sounds of animals and birds (which make for peace and contentment) which creates delightful satisfaction (pīti) and by wisely reflecting on that delightful satisfaction, one can attain arahatta-phala. Thus the Buddha speaks in praise of a bhikkhu sleeping at a remote forest dwelling even more than a bhikkhu in jhānic absorption living near a town or a village. This is because He sees the potential for easier attainment of arahatship in the forest-dwelling bhikkhu. That is why he says that as long as bhikkhus are willing to dwell in seclusion in forest abode, they are bound to progress spiritually and that there is no reason for their decline.

- vii) Regarding the seventh factor of non-decline, resident bhikkhus, who do not welcome co-practitioners of the bhikkhu-practice who cherish morality, are those who lack faith in the Triple Gem. This type of bhikkhu would not greet guest-bhikkhus on arrival, would not offer a seat, nor would fan them to cool them and would not do any act normally expected of a host bhikkhu. A monastery, where such bhikkhus live, earns the reputation it deserves that such and such monastery is a place where bhikkhus lacking in faith in the Triple Gem live, that it is unfriendly to guest-bhikkhus, and inhospitable. That reputation keeps away guest bhikkhus from entering that monastery even though they may happen to be passing by it. Therefore, virtuous bhikkhus who have not been there, will never go there. Those virtuous bhikkhus, who have been there, not knowing the inhospitable nature of the monastery, will soon find out that the place is not the right one for them to stay long, and will go away in disgust. In this way that monastery will become a place where other virtuous bhikkhus do not care to settle down. The result is that the resident-bhikkhus of that monastery will lack any opportunity of seeing virtuous ones who can share with them the Doctrine which could dispel doubts in them, teach them the training precepts, and preach to them the excellent Doctrine. These resident-bhikkhus will then hear no new discourse, nor will they try to retain through constant recitation whatever they have learnt. Thus the benefits of bhikkhuhood such as morality will dwindle day by day.

Resident-bhikkhus, who wish to see guest-bhikkhus arrive at their monastery, are those that have faith in the Triple Gem, so they would cordially greet those virtuous bhikkhus who visit them, would offer lodging, and ask them to join them on the alms-round. They get an opportunity to learn the Doctrine from the guest bhikkhus and have their doubts dispelled. They can hear discourses on the excellent Doctrine. The monastery, resided by this type of bhikkhus, earns a good reputation as a place where bhikkhus with faith in the Triple Gem live, as a hospitable place that honours virtuous guest bhikkhus. That reputation attracts virtuous bhikkhus to it. When they arrive, the resident bhikkhus do whatever acts of hospitality is due. They would pay respects to the visiting bhikkhus who are senior to them, or would sit on their own seats around the visiting bhikkhus who are junior to them, and then ask whether the visitor plans to stay or to move on to another place. If the visitor says he intends moving on, the resident bhikkhus would invite him to stay on, pointing out that the place is a suitable one for them and that alms-gathering would also be no problem for him. If the visitor agrees to stay on, then the resident bhikkhus get the privilege of learning the Vinaya rules, if the visitor is proficient in the Vinaya; or learning the Suttanta, if the visitor is proficient in the Suttanta. Abiding by the instructions given by the virtuous visitors, the resident bhikkhus attain arahatship with the Four Discriminative Knowledges (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa). As for the virtuous guest bhikkhus, they say gladly: “When we first came here, we thought of staying only a few days but since the resident bhikkhus make our stay pleasant, we shall stay here for ten or twelve years.” Thus the benefits of bhikkhuhood such as morality increase.

The Second Set of Seven Factor of Non-decline

Further, the Buddha said to the bhikkhus: “Bhikkhus, I shall expound to you another set of seven factors of non-decline. Listen and pay good attention. I shall explain in detail.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” the bhikkhus responded. And the Buddha gave this discourse;

- i) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus do not delight in and concern themselves with mundane activities or transactions, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- ii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus do not delight in and seek enjoyment in idle talk, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus do not delight in, and seek enjoyment in slothfulness, and are not fond of sleeping, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iv) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus do not seek enjoyment in company of associates, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- v) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus do not have any evil desire to make pretentious claims to attainment or to virtue, and do not yield to such evil desire, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- vi) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus do not associate with evil friends or evil companions, and are not favourably disposed towards evil companionship, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.

vii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus do not stop halfway (before attaining arahatship) after comprehending the Truth in a small way, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.

“Bhikkhus, so long as these seven factors of non-decline remain with the bhikkhus, and so long as the bhikkhus live by them, they are bound to progress spiritually; there is no reason for their decline.”

(The discourse is not concluded yet.) The above seven factors are called the second set of seven Factors of non-decline of bhikkhus.

i) Of those seven factors, the first factor, ‘mundane activities’ means assigning a robe for use, stitching robes, reinforcing the layers of a robe, making needle-container, stitching a sling for the alms-bowl, stitching the girdle, stitching a water-strainer, making a circular stand for the alms-bowl, making potsherd for scraping the feet, or making a broom etc.

Some bhikkhus devote to these matters all the time. This, pointed out as the first factor, is not proper. A bhikkhu should apportion his time for such matters, but he should have time for learning, studying, cleaning the stupa precinct, etc., as well as allow some time for meditation. A bhikkhu who uses his time judiciously is not one who enjoys worldly affairs.

ii) ‘Idle talk’ means speaking fondly about women or about men, and any other flippant speech that is not conducive to maggā-phala. A bhikkhu, who indulges in such petty talk all the time, is one who seeks enjoyment in idle talk. A bhikkhu, who discourses on the Doctrine by day and by night, who answers doctrinal questions, is called ‘a reticent bhikkhu, one who is disciplined in speech.’

The Buddha has said: “Sannipatitānam vo bhikkave dvayam karaniyam dhammā vā kathā ariyo vā tunhībhāvo — For you, bhikkhus, there are only two things to do when you meet one another: talking about the Doctrine, and remaining silent in deep contemplation.”

iii) A bhikkhu, who is given to sloth and torpor even while going, sitting or lying down, is one who seeks enjoyment in slothfulness and is fond of sleeping. A bhikkhu, who might have a cat-nap due to earnest effort at bhikkhu practice that tires his body, is not one who is slothful and is fond of sleeping.

iv) A bhikkhu, who feels uneasy in being alone but is fond of company of one or more to talk to, is one who seeks enjoyment in company. A bhikkhu, who delights in being alone in all the four bodily postures and who is perfectly at ease while alone, is not one who is fond of company.

v) A bhikkhu, lacking morality, may claim morality; such a bhikkhu is called one who has an evil desire. A bhikkhu, who does not have pretention to morality, is not one who has an evil desire.

vi) A friend is one whom one loves; a companion is one who lives, goes or eats together with oneself.

vii) A bhikkhu, who does not rest contented with purity of morality, or attainment of Insight-Knowledge, or attainment of jhāna, or attainment of Stream-Entry, or attainment of a Once-Returner, or attainment of a Never-Returner, (but relentlessly strives to attain arahatship), is one who is bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for his decline.

The Third Set of Seven Factor of Non-decline

Further, the Buddha said to the bhikkhus: “Bhikkhus, I shall expound to you another set of seven factors of non-decline. Listen and pay good attention. I shall explain it in detail.”

“Very well Sir,” the bhikkhus responded and the Buddha gave the discourse:

- i) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus are instilled with confidence or faith grounded on conviction, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- ii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus feel ashamed of doing evil (hirī) they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus have fear of wrong doing (ottappa), they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iv) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus have vast learning, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- v) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus are diligent, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- vi) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus are established in mindfulness, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- vii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus are endowed with Insight Knowledge (vipassanā-paññā), they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.

“Bhikkhus, so long as these seven factors of non-decline remain with the bhikkhus, and so long as the bhikkhus live by them, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.”

(The discourse is not concluded yet.) The above seven factors are called the third set of seven factors of Non-decline of bhikkhus.

i) Of these seven factors, the first factor of non-decline.

Saddhā – Conviction or faith, is of these 4 kinds:

- (a) Agamanīya saddhā refers to the strength of conviction that arises in a Bodhisatta due to the noble striving after Perfection in ten ways (pāramī), liberality (cāga) and conduct (carīya), without external prompting, which puts unshakable faith in anything that deserves faith.
- (b) Addigama saddhā refers to the unassailable firm conviction of an ariya in the Four Ariya Truths due to having penetrative knowledge of the Path. (As an example, we may cite Surambaṭṭha, about whom we shall describe under the chapter on the Sangha Ratanā.)
- (c) Pasāda saddhā refers to the depth of conviction in the Triple Gem such as that of King Mahākappina. When he hears the words “Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha,” he has a deep faith in the noble qualities of the Buddha such as “The Buddha has analytical knowledge of all things,” etc., and this faith arises in him without being tutored by others about the attributes of the Buddha, the Dhamma, or Sangha.
- (d) Okappana saddhā refers to conviction after considered judgment regarding the Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha when others make mention about them. After well considered judgment, the holder of this kind of faith has unshakable conviction in the Triple Gem like that of an ariya who has realized the Truth.

In the present context about the first factor of non-decline, Pasāda saddhā and Okappana saddhā are meant.

ii) — (iii) In the second and third Aparihāniya Dhammas, the distinction between hirī and ottapa should be understood by means of this analogy: Let us say, there are two balls of iron, the first is cool but is smeared with human excreta, the second is just a red hot iron ball. A wise man would not touch the first iron ball lest he would pollute his hand, and he would not touch the second one lest his hand would get burnt. Likewise, a wise person abhors evil because he detests it for its shameful quality; his sense of shame to do evil is hirī. He dreads evil because he is full of apprehension about the consequences, both here and in the hereafter; his dread to do evil is ottappa.

- iv) In the fourth Aparihāniya Dhamma, “a person of vast learning” means (a) one who is well read in the Pāli texts and literature (pariyatti), and (b) one who has penetrative knowledge of the truth that is, one who has gained Supramundane Knowledge (paṭivedha). In the present context the first meaning should be taken.

Of the type of persons well read in the Piṭaka, there are these four kinds: (a) a bhikkhu who needs no guidance in the interpretation of the Piṭaka, (b) a bhikkhu who is fit to head a monastery, (c) a bhikkhu who can give advice and instructions to bhikkhunis, (For details about these three kinds of persons, refer to Commentary on the Vinaya entitled Samantapāsādikā, in the explanation on the Pacittiya in Ovāda vagga.) (d) a bhikkhu who, like the Venerable Ānanda, is conversant with the whole of the three Piṭakas and can explain and discourse on any point in them. In the context regarding the fourth Aparihāniya dhamma, this fourth kind of learned person is meant. Only such a person can become established in the Good Practice (patipatti), the Good Penetration (paṭivedha saddhama), because pariyatti saddhama is the foundation for both of them.

- v) In the fifth Aparihāniya dhamma, the diligent person fulfils two aspects of diligence, physical and mental. ‘Physical diligence’ refers to a loner who shuns company and cultivates, in all the bodily postures, the eight subjects<sup>1</sup> on which diligence should be built. ‘Mental diligence’ refers to a yogi who distances himself from the six sense objects and dwells in the eight stages of jhāna, and who, in other moments, in all the bodily postures, allows no defilements to enter his mind which is constantly vigilant. So long as bhikkhus are diligent both physically and mentally, they are bound to prosper; there is no possibility for them to decline.

- vi) In the sixth Aparihāniya dhamma, “established in mindfulness” means persons who have such power of awareness as being able to remember all deeds or words that they had done or spoken long ago, such as in the case of Thera Mahā Gatimbaya Abhaya, Thera Dīghabhāṇaka Abhaya, and Thera Tipiṭakacūḷābhaya.

Thera Mahā Gatimbaya Abhaya: He was a precocious child. At the traditional ceremony for feeding him with the auspicious milk-rice, on the fifth day after he was born, he made the sound “Shoo! Shoo!” to scare away the crow that tried to poke its head into the rice-bowl. When he grew up into an elderly bhikkhu, his pupils asked him: “Venerable Sir, what earliest physical or verbal action of yours do you remember?” He related the event of his shooing away the crow when he was just five days old.

Thera Dīghabhāṇaka Abhaya: When he was just nine days old, his mother, in trying to kiss him, bent down on his face. The big hairdo adorned with lots of Spanish jasmine buds loosened itself, letting handfuls of the flower buds drop on his bare chest. He remembers how that dropping of buds caused him pain then. When asked by his pupils about his earliest memories, he recounted this event that he experienced as a nine-day old child.

Thera Tipiṭakacūḷābhaya: When asked about his power of memory, this Mahāthera said: “Friends, there are four gates to the city of Anurāttha. After the closing of three of these gates, when only the fourth gate was allowed to be used by the people, I would ask the name of each person going out in the morning. When they re-entered the city by the same gate in the evening, I could call up all of their names.”

- (vii) In the seventh Aparihāniya dhamma. ‘Insight’ means the comprehension of the rising and dissolution of the five aggregates (udayabbaya paññā). In another sense, mindfulness or awareness mentioned in the sixth Aparihāniya dhamma and insight mentioned in the seventh refer to Right Mindfulness and Insight which are the foundation of Insight development. (i.e., awareness and perception while meditating).

The Fourth Set of Seven Factor of Non-decline

1. eight subjects on which diligence should be built Virivarambha Vattu.

The Buddha then continued with the further seven factors of Non-decline thus;

- i) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate mindfulness (sati), which is a factor of (necessary condition for) Enlightenment, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- ii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate investigative Knowledge of phenomena (dhamma vicaya), which is a factor of (necessary condition for) Enlightenment, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate Effort (vīriya) a factor of Enlightenment, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iv) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate Delightful Satisfaction (pīti), a factor of Enlightenment, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- v) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate Serenity (passaddhi), a factor of Enlightenment, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- vi) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate Concentration (samādhi), a factor of Enlightenment, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- vii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate Equanimity (upekkhā) which is a factor of Enlightenment, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.

“Bhikkhus, so long as these seven factors of Non-decline remain with the bhikkhus, and so long as the bhikkhus live by them, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.”

(The discourse is not concluded yet.) In these seven Factors of Enlightenment which should be cultivated by bhikkhus for progress, the Buddha teaches Insight development pertaining to magga-phala both at the mundane and supramundane levels.

The Fifth Set of Seven Factor of Non-decline

The Buddha then continued with the further seven factors of Non-decline thus:

- i) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate the perception of Impermanence (anicca), they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- ii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate the perception of Non-Self (anatta), they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate the perception of the Foulness or Impurity of the body (asubha), they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iv) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate the perception of the Faults of the khandha aggregates (ādinava), they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- v) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate the perception of Abandonment (pahāna), they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- vi) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate the perception of Detachment from desire (virāga), they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.

- vii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus cultivate the perception of Cessation (nirodha), they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.

“Bhikkhus, so long as these seven factors of non-decline remain with the bhikkhus, and so long as the bhikkhus live by them, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.”

(The discourse is not concluded yet.) Herein, the perception of impermanence means perception that arises with concentrated reflection on the impermanence of mind and body. The perception of Non-Self should be understood likewise. Insight into the impermanent nature of conditioned phenomena that pertain to the three spheres of existence is Insight-Knowledge (vipassanā paññā), the perception of that knowledge is worth cultivating since it is perception associated with Knowledge. It should be noted that the word, ‘perception’ essentially means ‘knowledge’. The same method of the Buddha’s teaching should be understood regarding perception of non-self, etc.

(Of the above seven factors, the first five are mundane; the last two are both mundane and supramundane.)

The Six Factors of Non-decline of Bhikkhus

Further, the Buddha said to the bhikkhus: “Bhikkhus, I shall expound to you six factors of non-decline. Listen and pay good attention. I shall explain it in detail.”

“Very well Sir,” responded the bhikkhus. The Buddha gave this discourse:

- i) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus show, by their bodily action, their kind regards towards fellow-practitioners of the Pure Life, both openly and in private, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- ii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus show, by their speech, their kind regards towards fellow-practitioners of the Pure Life, openly and in private, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iii) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus keep an attitude of kind regards towards fellow-practitioners of the Pure Life, openly and in private, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- iv) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus share with virtuous fellow-practitioners of Pure Life, whatever they receive righteously (i.e. the four bhikkhu requisites), least of all, even the alms-food collected in their alms-bowl, without enjoying it alone, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- v) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus, both openly and in private, remain in observance of the same moral precepts (sīla) which lead to liberation from bondage to craving (taṇhā), which are extolled by the wise, which are not subject to misconception, which make for concentration, and which are unbroken, intact, unblemished, unspotted, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.
- vi) Bhikkhus, so long as the bhikkhus, both openly and in private, remain in Ariya-Knowledge which leads to Nibbāna and which leads one guided by it to the end of the unalloyed woefulness (dukkha) of sentient existence, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.

“Bhikkhus, so long as these six factors remain with the bhikkhus, and so long as the bhikkhus live by them, they are bound to progress (spiritually); there is no reason for their decline.”

Thus the Buddha taught the assembly of bhikkhus five sets of seven factors of non-decline and a set of six factors of non-decline.

Regarding factors i, ii, iii above,

'Showing kind regards by one's physical action' means doing any deed with loving-kindness. 'Showing kind regards by one's speech' means speech uttered with loving-kindness. 'Keeping kind attitude towards others' means thinking kind thoughts towards them.

In this text, although the Buddha taught that a bhikkhu's deeds, words and thoughts are to be expressions of loving-kindness towards fellow-bhikkhus, the same principle should govern all actions of lay persons too. The Buddha addressed the bhikkhus here simply because in the four kinds of assembly the assembly of bhikkhus is the noblest.

Thus, a deed of a bhikkhu's loving-kindness may consist in doing personal service to fellow-bhikkhus. In the case of a lay person, going to worship at a shrine or at Bodhi-tree, or going to the monastery to invite the Sangha to an offering ceremony, warmly greeting the bhikkhus on their alms-round, offering a suitable seat, seeing the bhikkhu off on his religious mission, etc, are deeds of loving kindness.

A verbal action of a bhikkhu's loving kindness may be expressed in terms of preaching the Rules of the Vinaya, showing the methods of meditation, preaching the Doctrine, teaching the Piṭaka as the most important action. With lay person, stimulating and organizing one's friends to do meritorious acts, such as going to a stupa or to the Bodhi tree to pay respect, going to hear a discourse on the Dhamma, or to offer flowers or lights at the shrines; urging them to abide by the ten moral actions; or to offer ticket alms-food or to offer robes for the vassa period, or to donate the four bhikkhu requisites to the Sangha; (and then having invited the Sangha for the offering,) to organize and urge friends to prepare the food, to lay the seats, to provide drinking water, to greet the Sangha, to conduct them to the seats prepared for them, and above all, to remind them to have the right attitude in serving the Sangha. All these verbal activities spring from loving kindness.

A mental action of a bhikkhu's loving kindness takes the form of diffusing goodwill, after having made the morning's ablutions, seated at a secluded place, and wishing all bhikkhus in the monastery well, that they all be free from trouble and ill-will. On the part of lay persons they should diffuse a similar spirit of good will to all the Sangha "may the Sangha be well, may they be free from trouble and ill-will." Such an attitude constitutes mental action springing from loving kindness.

Overt Action and Action in Private

(a) Of Deeds

Examples of overt action:

Helping in the stitching of robes of fellow-bhikkhus, whether senior or junior to oneself, the younger bhikkhus washing the feet of bhikkhu-elders or doing other personal service, such as fanning, respecting him, etc.

Example of action in private:

Looking after the personal property of fellow-bhikkhus, whether senior or junior to oneself, which have not been properly looked after by the owner, and in doing so, doing it without having any disrespectful opinion about the lack of care on the part of the owner, but doing it as if it were one's own property that needs looking after.

(b) Of Words.

Example of overt verbal action:

Addressing another bhikkhu in reverential terms. e.g., the Venerable Thera Tissa.

Example of verbal action in private:

In inquiring after a certain bhikkhu-elder, asking as, "Where is our Venerable Thera Deva?" or "Where is our Venerable Thera Tissa? When is he expected here?" (etc.)

(c) Of Thoughts.

Example of overt mental action:

When one looks at a fellow-bhikkhu with endearing eyes in a clearly pleased expression this is the outcome of loving kindness in the looker's mind; it reflects his thoughts, (The facial expression itself is bodily action springing from loving kindness.)

Example of mental action in private:

Wishing Venerable Thera Deva or Tissa, etc. to be well, etc., is mental action in private, due to loving kindness.

Regarding the fourth factor of Non-decline above:

'To enjoy something alone' means either not sharing something as an article that is obtained, or not sharing something with a certain person or persons. In the first case, the extent one is prepared to share something is an instance of enjoying something alone in respect of an article. In the second case, one has in mind: "I shall share it with bhikkhu so and so; but I shall not share it with bhikkhu so and so"; this is an instance of enjoying something alone in respect of person.

In this fourth factor, a bhikkhu who regards any item received as an offering to the Sangha as common property of all virtuous bhikkhus co-resident with him, considers thus: "This alms-food is of great value (morally); I shall not give it to lay persons since that would amount to 'pursuing gain with gain'. I shall not enjoy it alone first. I shall offer it to the Sangha. If anything is left after all the Sangha have partaken of it I shall then eat it. For this food has been obtained with the intention of becoming common property of the Sangha." Accordingly he first announces the meal time for all the Sangha by the striking of the gong. This noble practice under the Buddha's Teaching is called Sāranīya Practice.

The Noble Practice of Fraternal Living (Sāranīya)

Notes on Sāranīya Practice:

What kind of bhikkhu is competent or qualified to take up this Sāranīya Practice? An immoral bhikkhu is not in a position to practise Sāranīya. Only a bhikkhu endowed with morality can take up this practice. The reason is that virtuous bhikkhus cannot receive offerings from a bhikkhu of immoral conduct. They will always refuse it.

Only a bhikkhu with impeccable morality is qualified to take up the Sāranīya Practice. Once taken up; the practice must be fulfilled without break, flawlessly. The details of the practice are given below:

Where a bhikkhu gives discriminately the alms-food to his mother, or father, or preceptor, or any such person, he is sharing it with someone whom he is bound to offer. But his sharing is not Sāranīya Practice: it is merely removing an impediment (patibodha), by fulfilling an obligation, as is termed in the Teaching. That indeed is so. For Sāranīya practice is of a superior nobler way of sharing which is suitable only for a bhikkhu who is free from impediments, obstructions, personal obligations.

A practitioner of Sāranīya may give, in fulfilment of his practice, the share of his alms-food to a sick bhikkhu, or to a bhikkhu tending a sick bhikkhu, or a guest bhikkhu, or a way-faring bhikkhu or a newly admitted bhikkhu who has not learnt the proper way to robe himself or to hold his alms-bowl. After giving the alms-food to these types of bhikkhus, if any alms-food is left, he offers it to the bhikkhus beginning from the most senior of the bhikkhu-elders who should be allowed to partake of it as much as they like (and not in a small quantity only). If the food runs out and if there is time to collect alms-food for the day, he may go on another round of alms-gathering and then continue the distribution of whatever food he has collected. If there is any food left after the distribution, he eats it. If none is left and if there is no time to go on another round of alms-gathering, he stays without any food for that day and his sole sustenance then is the delightful satisfaction (pīṭa) derived from the successful undertaking of the Sāranīya practice.

(Note that although the text mentions of sharing with virtuous fellow bhikkhus, a practitioner of the Sāranīya practice may deny his alms-food to an immoral bhikkhu, or he may, out of pity, give it to him, in which latter case it is not by way of fulfilling the practice.)

In actual practice, the practitioner of Sāranīya practice will find it not too difficult, if it is to be undertaken in the company of bhikkhus who are skilful in this practice, but will find it rather difficult if in the company of bhikkhus who are not so skilled. The reason is as follows:

Where the associate bhikkhus are skilful in Sāranīya practice, those who have collected alms-food themselves do not partake of the practitioner's food, (considering the trouble that would otherwise cause to the practitioner). Other bhikkhus who do not get alms-food elsewhere would partake of the food just to satisfy their need. Thus, no unnecessary burden is placed on the practitioner. Where the associate bhikkhus do not know how stringent the Sāranīya practice is, those bhikkhus who have got alms somewhere else would, under the influence of greed, also partake of the food offered by the practitioner. Other bhikkhus who do not get alms-food elsewhere would take more than what they actually need. In such a situation the practitioner has to make repeated rounds of alms-collection within the (morning)time proper to do so, and has, more often than not, to go without food as all his collection having been distributed to others.

Twelve Years Continuous Practice is the Norm

This (self-assigned) task of feeding one's associates must be pursued for twelve years without break so that it can be called a success. A full twelve years self-denial regarding daily sustenance is the unique character of this practice.

If, (supposing) on the last day of the twelve years, there should occur the slightest vexation in the mind of the practitioner, then he fails. For instance, if the practitioner were away to bathe, leaving his alms-bowl containing alms-food gathered by him, and if it was seen by a senior bhikkhu and its contents distributed according to seniority of *bhikkhu*hood and nothing were left in it, the practitioner must be able to take it in the proper attitude. Otherwise, if he had the slightest indignant attitude towards his associates for leaving nothing for him, his twelve year long practice goes to waste. If he is still willing, he has to start it all over again for twelve more years. In this respect, the rule is as stringent as in the case of the probationary service period of Titthiyaparivāsa; once broken, a fresh period must be undertaken by the incumbent.

If the practitioner, under the same circumstances, instead of being vexed, feels joy to know that his fellow-bhikkhus have partaken of all his food, his practice is then accomplished. It is a success.

The Benefits of Fulfilling the Sāranīya Practice

(i) The primary benefit in fulfilling the Sāranīya practice is the abandonment of covetousness (issā) and stinginess (macchariya) through his prolonged cultivation of overcoming these defilements. (ii) His charitableness, having been established, he is adored by everyone. (iii) Since a strong desire to act in charity has the benign effect of bountiful fruit, in the present existence, the practitioner is blessed with the four requisites all the time. (iv) The twelve-year long practice of offering food to virtuous fellow-bhikkhus out of his alms-bowl has the effect of rendering his alms-bowl an inexhaustible source of alms-food. He can give as much as he wishes out of it without depleting it. (v) As the result of giving priority to the most senior bhikkhu-elders in his act of charity for such a long period every day, whenever the common acquisitions of offerings are divided, the best things go to him. (vi) As the result of the gladdening effect, he had produced in others through his act of self-denial in offering food in them, whenever famine visits, devas are ready to help him.

Some Stories related to The Sāranīya Practice

(1) Venerable Tissa feeds fifty wayfaring bhikkhus

Venerable Tissa was a forest dweller who lived in the forest abode known as Sena. His place for the alms-gathering was a village named Mahāgiri. A group of fifty theras, who were on a pilgrimage to the Nāgadīpa Shrine, went on the alms-round in Mahāgiri village but they collected none. As they were leaving the village, they met Venerable Tissa, the local resident bhikkhu, who was entering the village for alms-food. Tissa asked the fifty theras whether they had got alms-food. The theras did not give a straight answer but merely replied: "Friend, we had been on the alms-round there." Tissa knew that the theras had got no alms-food and so he said to them: "May the venerable ones wait here till I come back." The theras then said to him: "None of us fifty bhikkhus got an alms-food there. How could you alone get it?" "Venerable Sir," Tissa replied, "resident bhikkhus can manage somehow; though not possessing great power, they know where alms-food can be collected."

The fifty theras remained waiting there.

As Venerable Tissa entered Mahāgiri village, the very first house was ready with the alms-food, the lady of the house had milk rice prepared to offer to him. As soon as Tissa called in front of her house, she poured the milk rice into his alms-bowl to the full.

Tissa returned to the group of theras and respectfully offered the alms-food, addressing to the most senior bhikkhu: "May the venerable ones accept my offering." The Venerable looked surprised. "Fifty of us had been in that village, none of us have collected any alms-food whatever. This bhikkhu has got milk rice in no time. How could it happen?" These thoughts, though not spoken out, were reflected in their expressions. Venerable Tissa then said to them: "Venerable Sirs, this alms-food is righteously obtained. Do not have any misgivings about it." The fifty theras partook of the rice meal to their satisfaction. After they had finished, Venerable Tissa ate the leftover to his satisfaction too.

After Venerable Tissa had finished his meal, the theras asked: "Friend, when did you gain penetrative knowledge of the Supramundane?"

To this he replied: "Venerable Sirs, I have not attained the Supramundane."

"In that case, are you endowed with jhāna?"

"No, Venerable Sirs."

"Why, friend, you could easily get milk-rice where fifty of us failed to get even a morsel. Is that not a miraculous feat?"

Venerable Tissa was obliged to admit his attainment to dispel doubts in those bhikkhus. Since the attainment of Sāraṇīya is not supramundane dhamma (uttarimanussa dhamma), he considered it proper to admit to it: "Venerable Sirs, I have fulfilled the Sāraṇīya practice. Since I had done that, I could provide food to even a hundred thousand fellow-bhikkhus out of my alms-bowl."

"O Virtuous One! Excellent it is! Excellent it is! this miraculous feat is just befitting a virtuous one like yourself."

This is an instance of the alms-bowl that has virtually become an inexhaustible source of food; the fourth benefit of Sāraṇīya practice. This story also proves the second benefit of being adored by everyone, and the third benefit of being blessed with the four requisites all the time. The Commentary picks up this story to exemplify the fourth benefit which is the most significant here.

(2) Venerable Tissa at the National Offerings Ceremony

In ancient Sri Lanka, there was the Giribhanda Mahāpūjā, (an annual festival of offerings held on Mount Cetīya which was a grand national occasion.) When Venerable Tissa arrived there, he inquired from fellow-bhikkhus what was the most significant item of offering (that year). Being told that two finest fabrics intended for robe-making were the most significant item, Tissa said: "Those two pieces will come to my lot." This was overheard by an official who reported to the King: "Your Excellency, there is a junior bhikkhu who says that the two fine fabrics will come to his lot." The King said: "That is what he imagines. But those fabrics are worthy of bhikkhu-elders only." And he thought of making the offering of the fabrics to the bhikkhu-elders.

When the procession of bhikkhu-doneses arrived, the King himself headed the offerings. The two choicest fabrics were placed foremost, ready to hand. But they did not reach the King's hand, when he was presenting the gifts to the bhikkhu-elders. Only other items reached his hand. When Tissa came along, the two pieces of fabrics strangely reached the King's hand. The King offered them to Tissa. He also signalled (by facial expression) to the official who reported to him about the fabrics to ask Tissa to sit there awhile. After the procession had passed by, the King asked Tissa: "Venerable Sir, when did you become endowed with this special apperception?" Tissa did not want to give even a faint suggestion of him having attained magga-phala and so he simply replied: "Great King, I have not attained the supramundane."

"But Venerable Sir, you had said even before the gift-making that the two fabrics would come to you."

"That is true, O King, That was because since I had successfully completed the Sāraṇīya practice, whenever common property of gifts are distributed among the Sangha the choicest items always come to me."

"Venerable Sir! Excellent it is! Excellent it is! This miraculous happening becomes you well."

After respectfully paying obeisance to Venerable Tissa, the King went back to the palace.

This is an example of the fifth benefit.

(3) Therī Nāga

At one time, ancient Sri Lanka underwent troubled times due to insurgency headed by one Brāhamaṇatissa. At a village known as Bhārata where Therī Nāga resided, the whole village fled for fear of insurgents, without letting it known to the Therī. Early in the morning Therī Nāga noticed the strange silence of the village and said to her pupils: "Bhārata village is strangely silent. Go and enquire what's the matter." The younger bhikkhunīs went into the village and having seen that no one was left, reported it to their teacher.

Therī Nāga said to her pupils: "Do not be alarmed or upset by the flight of the whole village. You go on as usual with your learning (the text, the Commentary) and meditation. When the time came for the alms-round, she robed herself and went to the great banyan tree near the village gate, leading her eleven disciples. The guardian spirit of the banyan tree came down and offered the twelve bhikkhunīs sufficient alms-food. He then said to them: "Venerable Ones, do not move away to another place. Always come to this banyan tree for your alms food."

Now, Therī Nāga had a younger brother, a bhikkhu by the name of Nāga. He assessed the situation and decided that Sri Lanka was no safe place and that he could not find sustenance here. So he left the monastery accompanied by eleven disciples meaning to cross the sea to the mainland. Before leaving Sri Lanka he went to bid farewell to his elder sister Therī Nāga. Learning of their arrival at Bhārata village, Therī Nāga went to see them and was told by Bhikkhu Nāga of his plan to cross over to the mainland. Therī Nāga then said to him: "Would the venerable ones stay at the monastery for tonight, and proceed the next day." The twelve venerables accepted the invitation.

Therī Nāga collected the alms-food in the morning as usual from the banyan tree. She offered the food to Bhikkhu Nāga and his disciples. "Venerable Therī, is this alms-food properly gotten?" Bhikkhu Nāga asked his elder sister and then remained silent.

"Brother, this alms-food is righteously obtained. Do not have any doubts about this."

But Bhikkhu Nāga was still doubtful: "Venerable Therī would it be proper?"

The Self-confidence of Bhikkhu Nāga.

Thereupon, Therī Nāga took the alms-bowl and threw it upwards where it remained for awhile. Bhikkhu Nāga said: "Even if the alms-bowl stays aloft at seven palm-trees high, it is still the alms-food collected by a bhikkhunī, is it not Venerable Therī?" Then he continued: “This disturbance and danger is not to last forever. After the famine has passed, I, who speak in praise of the contented nature of the ariyas (with the four requisites) will be asking myself: ‘O virtuous one, trained in the ascetic practice regarding food, you have survived the Brāhmaṇatissa scourge by eating the alms-food of a bhikkhunī. I shall not be able to bear such criticism of myself. (I must go now) you remain in mindfulness, Therī.’”

The guardian spirit of the banyan tree was watching. If Bhikkhu Nāga partook of Therī Nāga alms-food, he would say nothing to the bhikkhu; but if the bhikkhu were to refuse it, he would intervene, and ask him to drop the idea of going away. When he saw that the bhikkhu refused the alms-food, he descended from his abode in the tree and asked Bhikkhu Nāga to hand over the alms-bowl, and inviting him and his company to the foot of the banyan tree, offered them the meal on prepared seats. After the meal, he got an undertaking from Bhikkhu Nāga not to go abroad. And from that day onwards the guardian spirit of the banyan tree offered meals daily to twelve bhikkhunīs and twelve bhikkhus for seven years.

This is an example of the sixth benefit.

In this story Therī Nāga was unaffected by famine, thanks to her fulfilment of the Sāranīya practice whereas Bhikkhu Nāga was helped by the guardian spirit on account of his morality,

Regarding the Fifth Factor of Non-decline:

“Morality that is unbroken, intact, unchequered and unspotted” is explained thus: for bhikkhus, there are seven groups of breach of morality in brief outline. Of the list of precepts to be observed, if the first precept or the last precept is broken, it is called ‘broken’ (like in a piece of cloth whose edge are frayed); if the precepts in the middle are broken, it is no more ‘intact’ (like in a piece of cloth that has holes in the middle part); if two or three precepts in a series are broken, it is ‘chequered’ (like a cow whose skin is of different colours either on her back or underneath); if there is breach of precepts at alternate places, it is ‘spotted’ (like a cow with spots). Morality to be unbroken, intact, unchequered, and unspotted must be such that no manner of breach of the above four ways occurs anywhere in the observance of bhikkhu precepts.

(Refer to Anudīpanī)

Morality that is flawless in those above four ways is sufficing condition for magga-phala. One, who is endowed with it, is free from the bond of craving and is therefore a truly happy person. Since it is very pure, it is extolled by the Buddha and ariyas. Since that morality is not conceived as a means of glorious future existences, such as a deva of any specific name or unspecified name, it is not misconception due to craving for existence; or not wrongly conceived as something permanent or eternal, a misconception due to wrong view; it is said to be not subject to misconception. Further, since none of the four deviations (vipattis) can be alluded to this kind of morality, it is said to be not subject to misconception. Since it provides sufficient precondition for the attainment of approach concentration (upāreara samādho) and absorption concentration (appanā samādho), it is also called morality conducive to concentration. Since the Four Purity in Morality (Catupānsudhi sīla) of worldlings cannot, in reality, be equal as between one person to another, the fifth factor here is meant as morality of the Path, the supramundane sīla which is the same for all ariyas. In the sixth factor also, Right View as the Path Factor is meant. (These six factors of non-decline are taught by the Buddha also as the six sāranīya factors, vide Aṅguttara (Twos); Dīgha, iii).

The Buddha's Repeated Exhortations about Sīla, Samādhi, Paññā

During the sojourn at the Gijjakuṭa hill in Rājagaha, as His passing away was drawing near (only one year and three months hence), whenever the Buddha discoursed to the bhikkhus, the following theme occurred repeatedly:

“Such is sīla (morality); such is samādhi (concentration); such is paññā (wisdom).
Concentration that is developed through morality is highly efficacious and productive. Wisdom that is developed through concentration is highly efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the moral taints or pervasive defilements (āsavas), namely kammāsava (the taint of sense-desire), bhavāsava (the taint of hankering after continued existence), and avijjāsava (the taint of ignorance of the Four Ariya Truths)."

The Buddha's Sojourn at The Ambalaṭṭhikā Garden

Then the Buddha, after staying at Rājagaha for as long as He wished, said to Venerable Ānanda: "Come, Ānanda, let us go to the Ambalaṭṭhikā garden (Mango Grove)."

"Very well, Sir," Ānanda assented.

(Note: The Buddha addressed Ānanda from among many bhikkhus surrounding Him because Ānanda was always in close attendance.)

Having expressed his assent to the Buddha, Ānanda signalled to the bhikkhus: "Friends, make ready with your alms-bowl and great robe. The Bhagavā intends to go to the Ambalaṭṭhikā garden."

Then the Buddha, accompanied by many bhikkhus, went to the Ambalaṭṭhikā garden where He stayed at the King's rest house. While there also, considering His approaching death, the Buddha discoursed to the bhikkhus on the same theme, i.e.,:

"Such is sīla (morality); such is samādhi (concentration); such is paññā (wisdom). Concentration that is developed through morality is highly efficacious and productive. Wisdom that is developed through concentration is highly efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the moral taints or pervasive defilements (āsavas), namely kammāsava (the taint of sense-desire), bhavāsava (the taint of hankering after continued existence), and avijjāsava (the taint of ignorance of the Four Ariya Truths)."

Herein, in the passage, "Such is sīla, this is samādhi, such is paññā," morality (sīla) refers to mundane morality, i.e. the Fourfold Purity (catupārisudhi sīla); samādhi means mundane concentration at the threshold of perfect concentration (upacāra-samādhi) and perfect concentration (appanā-samādhi) itself. Paññā means mundane Insight (vipassanā-paññā). All these three factors are the necessary conditions for maggā-ñāṇa.

"Concentration developed through morality" means supramundane concentration pertaining to maggā and phala, maggā concentration and phala concentration. Concentration of maggā is highly efficacious because it leads to the fruition of the Ariya's Knowledge (Ariya-phala). (Phala means direct result.) It is also highly productive because it has the superb consequence (ānisaṁsa) of liberation or pacification. (Ānisaṁsa means indirect result or consequence.) The same interpretation should be understood for similar statement that follow. Concentration of phala produces the direct result of abandoning the burning defilements through tranquillity (patippassaddhi-pahāna), and gives the indirect result or consequence of the peace of cessation or extinction of defilements.

"Wisdom developed through concentration" means supramundane Knowledge (maggā-ñāṇa and phala-ñāṇa). Its direct result and indirect result or consequence should be construed as in the case of concentration.

"The mind developed through wisdom", "wisdom" means mundane Insight (vipassanā-paññā) and wisdom associated with jhāna; mind here means supramundane consciousness of maggā-phala. Maggā consciousness completely eradicates defilements as abandoning through destruction (samuccheda pahāna). Phala-consciousness thoroughly liberates one from the moral taints as abandoning through tranquillity (paṭipatssaddhi-pahāna).

The Buddha's Sojourn at Nālanda

Then the Buddha, after staying at the Ambalatthikā garden for as long as He wished, said to Venerable Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to the town of Nāḷanda.”

“Very well, Sir,” Ānanda assented, and called upon the bhikkhus to accompany the Buddha.

Venerable Sāriputta's Brave Utterance

Then the Buddha, accompanied by many bhikkhus, went to the town of Nāḷanda and stayed at the mango grove of Pāvārika, the rich man.

At that time, the Venerable Sāriputta approached the Buddha, and after making obeisance to Him, entered into a stirring and remarkable dialogue with Him:

Sāriputta: Venerable Sir, as regards Perfect Enlightenment, I am convinced that there has never been nor there is, nor will there be any samaṇa or brāhmana who can excel the Bhagavā.

Buddha: You say solemnly and with certitude, like the brave sound of a lions roar, that as regards Perfect Enlightenment, you are convinced that there has never been nor there is, nor will there be any samaṇa or brāhmana who can excel the Bhagavā.

“How is it Sāriputta, do you know definitely in your mind the minds of those Homage-Worthy, Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddhas of the past so that you can assert, such was their practice of morality, such was their practice of concentration (samādhi), such was their wisdom (paññā), such was their manner of abiding (in the sustained attainment of Cessation), such was their emancipation?”

“How is it, Sāriputta, do you know definitely in your mind, the minds of those Homage-Worthy, Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddhas of the future, so that you can assert, such will be their practice of morality, such will be their practice of concentration (samādhi), such will be their wisdom (paññā), such will be their manner of abiding (in the sustained attainment of Cessation), such will be their emancipation?”

“I have no such knowledge, Venerable Sir.”

“How is it, Sāriputta, do you know definitely in your mind, the mind of Myself, the present Buddha, the Homage-Worthy, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened, so that you can assert, ‘Such is the practice of sīla (morality) of the Bhagavā, such is the strength of the concentration of the Bhagavā, such is the wisdom (paññā) of the Bhagavā, such is the manner of the Bhagava's abiding (in the sustained attainment of Cessation), such is the emancipation of the Bhagavā?’”

“Sāriputta, if you do not have the cetopariya-ñāṇa, the faculty of reading another person's mind, by which you can know definitely the minds of the Homage-Worthy, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddhas of the past, the future and the present, how can you say solemnly and with certitude, and sounding like a lion's roar, that as regards Perfect Self-Enlightenment, you are convinced that there has never been, nor will there be any samaṇas or brāhmanas who can excel the Bhagava?”

“Venerable Sir, I do not have the cetopariya-ñāṇa, the faculty of reading another person's mind by which I can know definitely the minds of the Homage-Worthy, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddhas of the past, the future and the present. But I do have the dharmānvaṇa-ñāṇa, the knowledge by inference from personal experience.

“Venerable Sir, if I may give an example, let us say that there is a remote border town with its solid walls built on firm foundation which has only one arched gateway, and that there is a gate-keeper, wise, prudent and intelligent, who would keep out strangers and would admit only person known to him. When he makes his rounds along the roadway that encircles the town, he sees no breaks, no holes in the walls, not even one that would allow a cat to pass through it. Then he will come to the conclusion (rightly) ‘that all big living things that enter or leave the town do so only by that single gateway.’

“In the same way, Venerable Sir, I am possessed of the dhammanvaya-nāṇa, the knowledge by inference from personal experience. Venerable Sir, (thus I know that) all the Homage-Worthy, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddhas, who had arisen in the past, had abandoned the Five Hindrances that defile the mind and weaken the intellect; had well established their minds in the Four Methods of Steadfast Mindfulness; had correctly cultivated the Seven Factors of Enlightenment; and had attained Supreme Perfect Self-Enlightenment.

(Perfect Self-Enlightenment (Sammāsambodhi-nāṇa), is a term encompassing the arahatta-magga-nāṇa and the Omniscience (Sabbāññutā-nāṇa), which pertain to the Buddhas only).

“Venerable Sir, (thus I know that) all the Homage-Worthy, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddhas who will arise in the future will abandon the Five Hindrances (nīvaraṇa) that defile the mind and weaken the intellect; will well establish their minds in the Four Methods of Steadfast Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna), will correctly cultivate the Seven Factors of Enlightenment (Bojjhaṅgam) and will attain Supreme Perfect Self-Enlightenment.

“Venerable Sir, (thus I know that) the Homage-Worthy, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened Bhagavā also, who has arisen in the world, has abandoned the Five Hindrances; has well established the Bhagava’s mind in the Four Methods of Steadfast Mindfulness; has correctly cultivated the Seven Factors of Enlightenment, and has attained Supreme Perfect Self-Enlightenment.

“Venerable Sir, all these conclusions I make are due to the dhammanavaya-nāṇa, Knowledge by inference from personal experience which I am possessed of.”

(This was the stirring and remarkable dialogue that took place between the Venerable Sāriputta and the Buddha).

During the sojourn at the mango grove of Pāvārika the rich man in the town of Nāḷanda, also considering His approaching death, the Buddha discoursed to the bhikkhus on the same theme, i.e.:

“Such is sīla (morality); such is samādhi (concentration); such is paññā (wisdom). Concentration that is developed through morality is highly efficacious and productive. Wisdom that is developed through concentration is highly efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the moral taints or pervasive defilements (āsavas), namely kammāsava (the taint of sense-desire), bhavāsava (the taint of hankering after continued existence), and avijjāsava (the taint of ignorance of the Four Ariya Truths).”

The Buddha’s Discourse on Morality

Then after staying at the town of Nāḷanda for as long as He wished, the Buddha said to Venerable Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Pāṭali village.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” assented Ānanda, and he called upon the bhikkhus to accompany the Buddha. Then the Buddha, accompanied by many bhikkhus, went to Pāṭali village.

When the lay devotees of Pāṭali village heard that the Buddha had arrived at their village, they were very glad, for they had the great good fortune of having to receive the Buddha even without asking for it. They had just finished building a guest-house. How appropriate it would be if their first guest was the Buddha himself? “We shall request the Bhagavā to accept our offering of the guest-house and to listen to the Bhagava’s words of appreciation of our good deed,” they discussed among themselves. They approached the Buddha, made obeisance to Him, and sat at a suitable place. Then they said to Him: “May it please the Bhagavā to accept our new guest-house as His living quarters during His sojourn.” The Buddha showed His consent by remaining silent.

Having received the Buddha's consent, the lay devotees of Pāṭali village rose from their seats, made obeisance to Him and went to their guest-house. They made it ready for use by furnishing it with floor coverings throughout, arranging separate seats, filling the big water pots and lighting the lamps. They arranged with the mothers to feed their infants early that evening and to put them to bed. Then they went back to the Buddha, made obeisance to Him, and stood on one side. They said to Him:

“Venerable Sir, at the guest house, the floor has been covered throughout with floor-coverings, separate seats have been arranged, big water pots have been filled and lamps have been lit. May the Bhagavā proceed there when He wishes.”

(Note: The new guest-house was built by the villagers at the centre of the village. The main purpose in building it was to house visiting officials of the Licchavis and the Magadhans who often came and stayed at Pāṭali village, which was a border village. It was essential for the village because they had to surrender their houses to the visiting officials for their temporary lodging for a month or so, on each occasion. The new guest-house would now ease the situation. It was well arranged for the use of visiting officials with living quarters as well as strong rooms for the upkeep of treasures. At the time of the Buddha's visit to the village it had just been completed. At first the villagers thought that the Buddha might prefer to dwell in the forest and so they did not make it ready to receive Him. Only when the Buddha consented to put up there, did the villagers prepare things to make it ready for His stay.)

Then the Buddha, at evening time, rearranged His robes, and taking His alms-bowl and great robe, proceeded to the guest-house accompanied by the bhikkhus. After washing His feet, He entered the guest-house where He sat against the middle post, facing east. The bhikkhus also washed their feet and entered the guest-house, and sat against the west wall, facing east, with the Buddha in front of them. The lay devotees of Pāṭali village also washed their feet and entered the guest-house, and sat against the east wall facing west, with the Buddha in front of them.

Then the Buddha discoursed on the five disadvantages<sup>2</sup> befalling an immoral person and the five advantages that bless a person of virtue thus:

Five Disadvantages to An Immoral Man

"Householders, five disadvantages descend on an immoral person who lacks morality, and what are the five?"

- (i) Householders, in this world, the immoral person, who lacks moral virtue, suffers great loss in fortune through heedlessness. This is the first disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality
- (ii) Householders, furthermore, the ill-repute of an immoral person, who lacks moral virtue, spreads far and wide. This is the second disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality.
- (iii) Householders, furthermore, an immoral person, who lacks moral virtue in the midst of any class of society, whether among the ruling class, or the recluses or the brahmin class, or the wealthy, looks diffident and uneasy. This is the third disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality.
- (iv) Householders, further more, an immoral person, who lacks moral virtue, dies in a bewildered<sup>3</sup> state. This is the fourth disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality.
- (v) Householders, furthermore, an immoral person, who lacks moral virtue, after death and dissolution of the body, is destined to fall to the miserable existences of niraya. This is the fifth disadvantage befalling an immoral person who lacks morality.

2. Disadvantage: ādīnava. Also translated as danger, fault.

3. Bewildered; Sammulha. The commentary explains this as delirium.

“Householders these are the five disadvantages befalling an immoral person through lack of morality.”

Five Advantages that bless A Virtuous Person

“Householders, five advantages bless a virtuous person for his being virtuous. What are the five?”

- (i) Householders, in this world, a virtuous person, who possess moral virtue, acquires great wealth through being heedful. This is the first advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.
- (ii) Householders, furthermore, the good reputation of a virtuous person, who possess moral virtue, spreads far and wide. This is the second advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.
- (iii) Householders, furthermore, a virtuous person, who possess moral virtue in the midst of any class of society, whether among the ruling class, or the recluses, or the brahmin class, or the wealthy, can hold up his head and look anyone in the face. This is the third advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.
- (iv) Householders, furthermore, a virtuous person, who possess moral virtue, dies without any bewilderment. This is the fourth advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.
- (v) Householders, furthermore, a virtuous person, who possess moral virtue, after death and dissolution of the body, is destined to the fortunate existences of devas. This is fifth advantage that waits on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.

“Householders, these are the five advantages that wait on a virtuous person for his being virtuous.”

Although this discourse was addressed to lay persons it also applies to bhikkhus.

- (1) With a lay person, lack of moral virtue may lead to committing evil deeds such as killing. As he indulges in evil, he tends to forget his usual means of livelihood, such as cultivation or trading, thereby incurring great losses of property. Worse still, his evil deed might be illegal under the law proclaimed by the king such as killing of animals, and he is liable to criminal punishment. If he steals, he also commits a crime equally liable to punishment. Thus, his lack of moral virtue can bring him great losses of property. Similarly, a bhikkhu lacking morality, being heedless, loses virtue, loses the good Doctrine, the word of the Buddha, loses jhāna, and loses the seven noble properties of ariyas<sup>4</sup>.
- (2) An immoral man earns a bad repute so that he is written off as an outcast, useless for this world and hopeless for future worlds. “This man is so stingy that he would not even take part in offering alms-food by drawing lots,” this is the kind of name he builds up for himself. All the four kinds of assemblies see him in that light only.

Similarly, in the case of a bhikkhu who lacks moral virtue, the ill repute that such and such bhikkhu is loose in bhikkhu morality, does not take up serious learning of the good Doctrine, makes a living on practice of medicine, or similar methods of livelihood abhorred by the Buddha, and that his behaviour is marked by six kinds of disrespect, spreads among the four kinds of assemblies.

4. Seven noble properties of ariyas: satta ariya dhanani.

- (i) Saddhā dhanam - faith in Three Jewels and kamma
- (ii) Sīla dhanam - wealth of morality
- (iii) Hirī dhanam - wealth of shame for doing evil
- (iv) Ottappa dhanam - wealth of fear for doing evil
- (v) Suta dhanam - wealth of vast knowledge
- (vi) Cāga dhanam - wealth of charity, renunciation
- (vii) Paññā dhanam - wealth of magga-phala attainments.

- (3) An immoral lay person is always pricked by a guilty conscience for the misdeeds he has done. Therefore, he does not dare to face the crowd. "Someone there might recognize me," he fears, "and I might be apprehended and sent to the authorities." That is why, in any of the four kinds of assemblies, he holds his face down and his shoulders stooping, he would uneasily keep on scratching the earth with a stick. He keeps his mouth shut as far as possible. Likewise, an immoral bhikkhu feels uneasy to face an assembly which might have knowledge of his misdeeds, in which case he might have to face punishment under the Vinaya process such as excommunication. Therefore, he goes into the assembly with great misgivings and speaks little. Some immoral bhikkhu, however, might put up a bold face and wander around amongst Sangha but in his heart he is feeling miserable only.
- (4) An immoral one, whether lay person or bhikkhu, may put up pretences while living but, on his death bed, his evil deeds appear before him in their respective sense-doors. He feebly opens his eyes to see the present world, and then closes his eyes to see his oncoming world where he finds no solace whatever. His imminent destination, the four miserable states of apāya, becomes vividly clear to him. He feels great pangs of conscience as if thrust by a hundred spears on his head. "Help me! Help me!" He would scream in desperation and then breathe his last. This is what the Buddha means by "he dies in a state of bewilderment."
- (5) The fifth disadvantages befalling an immoral one needs no explanation.

(The advantages that wait on a virtuous one may be known as the opposite of the above five disadvantages befalling an immoral one.)

The Buddha then went on late into the night instructing the lay devotees of Pāṭali village on other topics including the happy consequences of their donation of the guest-house, thereby pointing out the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorting them to set themselves up in the practice thereof, and gladdening them in the practice. Then He sent them away, saying: "Householders, the night is far advanced; you may leave when you wish."

"Very well, Venerable Sir," the devotees of Pāṭali village said in assent, and making obeisance to Him, departed respectfully. Then not long after their departure, the Buddha retired in seclusion.

(Note: "The Buddha retired in seclusion" should be understood as referring to a separate part of the guest house screened off for privacy. A cot had been placed there for the Buddha, and He considered that the devotees would earn much merit if He were to use the guest house in all the four bodily postures. Therefore, He lay on the cot on his right side and rested.)

The Founding of Pāṭaliputta

At that time, two brahmins, Sunidha and Vassakāra, Chief Ministers of Magadha Kingdom, were building a (fortified) city at the site of Pāṭali village to keep out the Vajji princes. During that period, many devas in groups of a thousand each, were occupying plots of land at Pāṭali village.

In the location where the devas of great power were occupying, there, the officials responsible for the building of the city were inclined to build houses for princes and the king's ministers of great power. In the location where the devas of medium power were occupying, there, the officials responsible for the building of the city were inclined to build houses for princes and king's ministers of medium power. And in the location where the devas of lesser power were occupying, there, the official responsible for the building of the city were inclined to build houses for princes and king's ministers of lesser power.

(Herein, among the city builders there were officials learned in the science of building-sites. They knew, by their specialised knowledge, the status of the proposed building-sites down to a depth of thirty cubits as to which area is occupied by powerful serpents or nāgas, which, by demons, or which, by evil spirits; or where a slab of rock is lying underneath, or where an old tree stump is hidden. Accordingly, those learned ones took necessary measures by reciting mantras or by blessing, so that they were able to proceed smoothly as if they were building the city in consultation with devas.

Another explanation: The officials responsible for the building of the city were possessed by the devas who occupied various locations and these devas would leave their bodies after the four corners of the building site have been marked out. Prospective human occupants, who were endowed with confidence in the Triple Gem, were possessed by the deva occupants of the sites who were equally endowed with confidence in the Triple Gem. Prospective human occupants who lacked confidence in the Triple Gem were possessed by the deva occupants of the sites who lacked confidence in the Triple Gem. The reason is this: the devas, who were endowed with confidence in the Triple Gem, influenced the mind of the prospective human occupants who had confidence in the Triple Gem, trusting that the new occupants would invite the Sangha to their newly built house and hear the sermon on the auspicious occasion and that they (the devas) would get the opportunity to see the virtuous bhikkhus and hear the Dhamma. They also expected the new occupants to share their merit of offerings made to the Sangha.)

The Buddha saw, with His Knowledge of the Divine Eye (dibba-cakkhu), how the devas in groups of a thousand each, were occupying plots of land at Pāṭali village. Then He woke up at dawn and asked the Venerable Ānanda: “Who are those that are building a city at (the site of) Pāṭali village?”

Ānanda replied: “Venerable Sir, the Brahmins Sunidha and Vassakāra, Chief Ministers of Magadha Kingdom, are building a (fortified) city to keep out the Vajjī princes.”

“Ānanda, the Chief Ministers are building the fortified city as though they were acting in consultation with the devas of the Tāvātimsa realm.

“Ānanda, I have seen with my Knowledge of the Divine Eye how the devas, in groups of a thousand each, were occupying plots of land at Pāṭali village.

“Ānanda, in the locations where the devas of great power are occupying, there, the officials responsible for the building of the city are inclined to build houses for princes and king's ministers of great power. In the locations where the devas of medium power are occupying, there the officials responsible for the building of the city are inclined to build houses for princes and king's ministers of medium power. In the locations where the devas of lesser power are occupying, there the officials responsible for the building of the city are inclined to build houses for princes and king's ministers of lesser power.

“Ānanda, three catastrophes will bring about the downfall of the city of Pāṭaliputta. They are fire, floods, and internal dissension.” (Thus the Buddha was predicting that a part of Pāṭaliputta would be destroyed by fire, a part of it would be washed away by the Gaṅga river, and a part of it would be destroyed by internal dissension.)

After saying those words, the Buddha went to the Gaṅga river to wash His face and awaited for the time to go on the alms-round.

Then Sunidha and Vassakāra remembered that since their King Ajātasattu was a lay supporter of Gotama the Samaṇa, it would only be proper if they were to invite the Buddha to an offering of a meal, because they would be seeing Him in the village of Pāṭali. Further, they considered it a wise thing to request Gotama the Samaṇa, to bless their city-building project with auspicious words, for then the black devils would be driven away from the city site. So both went to the Buddha and stood at a suitable place. After exchanging memorable words of felicitation, they said to Him: “May it please the revered Gotama and the company of bhikkhus to accept our offering of food for today.” The Buddha, by His silence signified His acceptance.

Then the Magadhan Chief Ministers, Sunidha and Vassakāra, knowing that the Buddha had accepted their invitation, went to the place where they were putting up, and having prepared the choicest food and delicacies, informed the Buddha by messengers who said: “Revered Gotama, it is time (to proceed). The food offering is ready.”

Then in the morning, the Buddha rearranged His robes, and taking His alms-bowl and great robe, went in the company of the bhikkhus to the place where the two Magadhan Chief Ministers were being housed, and sat at the place prepared for Him. Sunidha and Vassakāra attended to the Buddha and the bhikkhus, offering the choicest food and delicacies with their own hands till they caused them to stop, signifying they had enough. When the Buddha had finished His meal and had removed His hand from His alms-bowl, the Sunidha and Vassidara took low seats and sat at a suitable place.

To Sunidha and Vassakāra, who were thus seated, the Buddha expressed His pleasure and appreciation by three stanzas in Pāli (Here only prose translation is provided).

“Brahmins, when the wise man makes offerings of food to those possessed of virtue, self-control and purity of life at the place where he has made his home, he should share the merit of his offering with the devas who are guardians of that place. If the devas are honoured thus, they give protection to him, as their way of honouring him in return. If they are revered thus, they help him out of trouble, as their way of revering him in return. That being so, that wise man comes under the protection of the devas who safeguard him, just as a mother safeguards her own son. The person is blessed with auspiciousness at all times.”

After expressing His pleasure and appreciation in these stanzas to the Magadhan Chief Ministers, Sunidha and Vassakāra, the Buddha rose from His seat and left.

Then Sunidha and Vassakāra followed the Buddha all along the route, thinking: “We shall call the gateway, by which the revered Gotama leaves today, the ‘Gotama Gateway’, and the landing place, by which the revered Gotama crosses the Gaṅga, the ‘Gotama Landing Place’.”

The gateway by which the Buddha left that day came to be known as, the ‘Gotama Gateway’. Then the Buddha went to the river Gaṅga. At that time the river was full to the brim so that a crow on the bank might easily drink from it.

Then in the instant it might take a strong man to stretch out his bent arm or bend his out stretched arm, the Buddha vanished from this side of the Gaṅga and reappeared on the other shore together with the company of bhikkhus.

The Buddha saw the people who wanted to cross from one shore to the other, some of whom were looking for boats, some for log rafts, and some were making bamboo rafts. Then He, understanding the matter, uttered these joyous words in exaltation;

“The ariyans have crossed the deep and wide river of Craving (taṇhā), by building the bridge of the Ariya Path, upon having overcome the quagmire of moral defilement. As for the multitudes, they have to build rafts just to cross this insignificant river, the Gaṅga. However, the ariyas who have crossed the river of Craving by means of the Ariya Path of eight constituents have no need to make rafts.”

The Buddha’s Discourse on The Four Ariya Truths

Then the Buddha said to Venerable Ānanda: “Come Ānanda, let us go to Koṭi village.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” Ānanda assented and then called the bhikkhus. The Buddha, accompanied by a company of bhikkhus, went to Koṭi village and dwelt there. (The village was called Koṭi because it was where the pinnacle of King Mahāpanāda fell.)

During that time, the Buddha discoursed to the bhikkhus on the Four Ariya Truths thus:

“Bhikkhus, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the Four Ariya Truths that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences (saṃsāra), never stopping, but ever hanging, from one existence to the next repeatedly. What are the Four Truths that are not understood?”

- i) Bhikkhus, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the Ariya Truth of Dukkha (Dukkha ariya sacca) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences, never stopping, but ever changing, from one existence to the next repeatedly.

- ii) Bhikkhus, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the Ariya Truth of the Origin of Dukkha (Samudaya ariya sacca) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences, never stopping, but ever changing, from one existence to the next repeatedly.
- iii) Bhikkhus, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the Ariya Truth of the Cessation of Dukkha (Nirodha ariya sacca) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences, never stopping, but ever changing, from one existence to the next repeatedly.
- iv) Bhikkhus, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the Ariya Truth of the way to the Cessation of Dukkha (Magga ariya sacca) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the lengthy course of the round of existences, never stopping, but ever changing, from one existence to the next repeatedly.

“Bhikkhus, now I have properly understood the Ariya Truth of Dukkha (Dukkha ariya sacca), I have penetrative knowledge of it; I have properly understood the Ariya Truth of the Origin of Dukkha (Samudaya ariya sacca) I have penetrative knowledge of it; I have properly understood the Ariya Truth of the Cessation of Dukkha (Nirodha ariya sacca), I have properly understood the Ariya Truth of the way to the Cessation of Dukkha (Magga ariya sacca), I have penetrative knowledge of it. The Craving for existence (bhavatanhā) has been completely uprooted, leaving no trace of it. In Me, the craving for existence, which is like a rope that drags one to renewed existence, has become extinct. Now, for me there will be no more rebirth.”

(Herein, “proper understanding” means Insight knowledge conforming to, and preceding magga-ñāṇa. It is mundane Knowledge, and is called Anubodhi in Pāli. “Penetrative knowledge” means penetrative Knowledge of the Path (magga-ñāṇa) itself that destroys the defilements. It is called Paṭivedha in Pāli.)

After the Buddha had spoken the above words, He further said thus in verses:

“Passing from this existence to that, faring through the long course of samsāra, is necessitated by (is due to) lack of understanding of the Four Ariya Truths as they really are. I have fully understood those Four Ariya Truths. Craving for existence, that rope which drags one to rebirth, has been cut off completely. The root of dukkha has been thus eradicated. For me there will be no more rebirth.”

While the Buddha was staying at that Koṭi village also, considering His approaching death, He discoursed to the bhikkhus on the same theme, i.e.:

“Such is sīla (morality); such is samādhi (concentration) such is paññā (wisdom). Concentration, that is developed through morality, is highly efficacious and productive. Wisdom, that is developed through concentration, is highly efficacious and productive. The mind, that is developed through wisdom, is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the moral taints or pervasive defilements (āsavas), namely kammāsava (the taint of sense-desire), bhavāsava (the taint of hankering after continued existence) and avijjāsava (the taint of ignorance of the Four Ariya Truths).”

The Buddha's Discourse at Nātika Village

On Those Disciples whose Spiritual Progress is assured

Then after staying at Koti village for as long as He wished, the Buddha said to Venerable Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Nātika village.”

“Very well, Sir,” assented Ānanda, and he called upon the bhikkhus for the journey. The Buddha went to Nātika village accompanied by many bhikkhus and stayed in a brick building.

(Herein, Nātika was a twin village founded by two cousin brothers (born of two brothers) who sited it near a reservoir. Thus the village got its name, “village of relations” (ñātika), from which Pāli word, ñ became corrupted into n, and hence the name Nātika. In that twin village there was a brick monastery which was the place of the Buddha's sojourn.)

During that time the Venerable Ānanda approached the Buddha and asked these questions:

“Venerable Sir, in Nātika village, a bhikkhu by the name of Sāḷa has passed away. What is his destination? What is his next existence?”

“Venerable Sir, in (this same) Nātika village, a bhikkhunī named Nandā has passed away. What is her destination? What is her next existence?”

“Venerable Sir, in (this same) Nātika village, a devotee named Sudatta has passed away. What is his destination? What is his next existence?”

“Venerable Sir, in (this same) Nātika village, a devotee named Sujātā has passed away. What is her destination? What is her next existence?”

“Venerable Sir, in (this same) Nātika village, a devotee named Kukkuṭa... (repeat below) ...a devotee named Kaḷimba... (repeat below) ...a devotee named Nikāṭa... (repeat below) ...a devotee named Katissaha... (repeat below) ...a devotee named Tuṭṭha... (repeat below) ...a devotee named Santuṭṭha... (repeat below) ...a devotee named Bhaddha... (repeat below) ...a devotee named Subhadda (repeat:) has passed away. What is his destination? What is his next existence?”

To these questions the Buddha answered them, one by one thus:

“Ānanda, due to the extinction of the āsavas (moral taints), Sāḷa the bhikkhu had realized in this very life Emancipation of mind (arahatta-phala-samādhī) and Emancipation through Knowledge (arahatta-phala-paññā) He died an arahat.

“Ānanda, through the eradication of the Five Fetters that lead to rebirth in the Sensuous Sphere, the lower planes of existence, Nanda the bhikkhunī has been reborn spontaneously in the Brahmā realm. She died an anāgāmin (a Never-Returner), with no possibility of returning (reverting) from that Brahmā existence and will realize parinibbāna (the utter passing away), there.

“Ānanda, through the eradication of the three Fetters wrong view of Five Aggregates as a self (sakkāya-ditṭhi), uncertainty and doubts (vicikicchā), belief in religious practices outside of the Ariya Path (sīlabbataparāmāsa) and the lessening of attachment (rāga), hatred (dosa) and bewilderment (moha), Sudatta the devotee was a sakadāgāmin (a Once-Returner). He will make an end of dukkha after being reborn in the human world only once.

“Ānanda, through the eradication of the three Fetters, (namely, the wrong view of the Five Aggregates as a self, uncertainty, and belief in religious practices outside of the Ariya Path), Sujātā the female devotee, was a sotāpanna (a Stream-Enterer), who is not liable to fall into the four miserable states of apāya, destined for the fortunate existences, and is firmly set on the path of spiritual progress marked by the three higher maggas.

“Ānanda over fifty devotees from Nātika village, who have died, were anāgāmin (Never-Returners) by virtue of having eradicated the Five Fetters that lead to rebirth in the sensuous Sphere, the lower planes of existence, destined for Spontaneous rebirth in the Brahmā realm, with no possibility of returning (reverting) from that Brahmā existence and they will realize parinibbāna (the utter passing away), there.

“Ānanda over ninety devotees of Nātika village, who have died, were sakadāgāmin (Once-Returners), who had eradicated the three Fetters (i.e. sakkāya-dīṭṭhi, vicikicchā, silabbata-parāmsa) and had lessened attachment (rāga), hatred (dosa) and bewilderment (moha). They will make an end of dukkha after being reborn in the human world only once.

“Ānanda, over five hundred devotees from Nātika village, who have died, were Stream-Enterers through the eradication of the three Fetters (i.e. the wrong view of the Five Aggregates as a Self, Uncertainty, and Belief in religious practices outside of the Ariya Path). They are not liable to fall into the miserable states of apāya, and were destined for fortunate existence, and are bound to attain the three higher maggas.”

The Mirror Discourse

“Ānanda, this ability to tell about the destination of people is something which anyone endowed with knowledge of the Dhamma can have in respect of himself. It is not a mysterious art that belongs only to the Tathāgata. Ānanda, if the Tathāgata were to be approached and asked as to the destination of every person who has died, it would be quite a botheration for him.

“As such, Ānanda, an ariya disciple, who possesses the Mirror of Wisdom can, if he wishes to, say of himself: ‘I shall never be reborn in the realm of continuous suffering (niraya), nor in the animal world, nor in the realm of wretched spirits burning with thirst and hunger (peta), nor in any of the four miserable states of apāya, I am certain to be reborn only in the fortunate existences. I am bound to attain the three higher maggas.’ I shall expound this discourse on the Mirror of Wisdom. Ānanda, what is this Mirror of Wisdom?

- i) Ānanda, in this Teaching, the ariya disciple (i.e. male or female disciple) has unshakable confidence in the Bhagavā, being convinced that:

The Bhagavā is worthy of homage (Araham); He is Perfectly Self-Enlightened (Sammāsambuddha); He is possessed of perfect knowledge and conduct (Vijjā carana sampāna); He speaks only what is beneficial and true (Sugata); He knows all the three Worlds (Lokavidhū); He is incomparable in taming those who deserve to be tamed (Anuttaro purisadamma sāratti); He is the Enlightened One, knowing and teaching the Four Ariya Truths (Buddho); and he is the Most Exalted (Bhagava);
- ii) The ariya disciple has unshakable confidence in the Dhamma, being convinced that:

The Dhamma expounded by the Bhagavā is well expounded (svākkhāta); its truths are personally apperceivable (sandiṭṭhika); its practice (i.e. of the Ariya Path) yields fruit (akālika); immediately; it can stand investigation (ehipassika); it is worthy of being perpetually borne in mind (opaneyika); and it can be seen, realized and enjoyed by the wise, each according to his own capacity (paccatam veditabba, viññāhi).
- iii) The ariya disciple has unshakable confidence in the Sangha, being convinced that:

The Order of Bhikkhus, the Sangha, are endowed with the right practice (suppaṭipaññā), i.e. Threefold Training in Morality, Concentration and Wisdom; they are endowed with straight forward uprightness (ujjupaṭipaññā); they are endowed with righteous conduct (ñyāyapaṭipaññā), and they are endowed with conducts which inspire awe and respect (samicipaṭipaññā). Thus conducting well in these four ways, serving as four grounds for their worthiness, the Sangha, comprising eight individual types of four pairs, is worthy of offerings, even those brought from a far; worthy of offerings specially prepared for guests; worthy of offerings made for the sake of acquiring great merit, worthy of receiving obeisance; they are the incomparably fertile soil for all to sow the seed of merit, thus they are worthy in these five ways.

iv) The ariya disciple is endowed with the moral precepts (sīla) which tend to liberation from bondage to Craving, which are extolled by the wise, which are not subject to misconception, which make for concentration, and which are unbroken, intact, unchequered, and unspotted, and which are cherished by the ariyas.

“Ānanda, an ariya disciple who is endowed with the above four factors of the Mirror of Wisdom can, if he so desires, say of himself: ‘I shall never be reborn in the realm of continuous suffering (niraya); or in the animal world, or in the realm of wretched spirits burning with thirst and hunger (petā) or in any of the four miserable states of apāya; I am certain to be reborn only in the fortunate existences. I am bound to attain the three higher maggas.’ This discourse is called the Mirror of Wisdom.”

While at the brick monastery at Nātika village as well, the Buddha, considering his approaching death, discoursed to the bhikkhus on the same theme, i.e.,

“Such is sīla (morality); such is samādhi (concentration) such is paññā (wisdom). Concentration that is developed through morality is highly efficacious and productive. Wisdom that is developed through concentration is highly efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through wisdom is thoroughly liberated without any remnant from the moral taints of pervasive defilements (āsavas), namely kammāsava (the taint of sense-desire), bhavāsava (the taint of hankering after continued existence), and avijjāsava (the taint of ignorance of the Four Ariya Truths).”

The Buddha's Sojourn at The Mango Grove of Ambapālī at Vesālī

Then after staying at Nātika village for as long as He wished, the Buddha said to Venerable Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Vesālī.”

“Very well Venerable Sir,” assented Ānanda, and called upon the bhikkhus for the journey. The Buddha, accompanied by many bhikkhus, went to Vesālī and stayed at courtesan Ambapālī's mango grove.

At that time, five hundred of the bhikkhus in the Buddha's company were young men who had joined the Order recently, and were weak in diligence. They would soon be seeing Ambapālī who would be coming to greet the Buddha. In order that the young bhikkhus might not lose mindfulness on setting their eyes on the charming courtesan, the Buddha prepared their minds by giving a discourse thus:

“Bhikkhus, how does a bhikkhu exercise clear comprehension? Bhikkhus, in this Teaching, a bhikkhu exercises clear comprehension in moving forward or back; in looking straight ahead or sideways; in bending or stretching out; in wearing the double-layered robe, or in carrying alms-bowl and robe; in eating, drinking, chewing, savouring food; in defecating and urinating; in walking, standing, sitting, falling asleep, waking, speaking, or in remaining silent. Bhikkhus, this is how a bhikkhu should exercise clear comprehension.

Ambapālī, The Courtesan

When Ambapālī, the courtesan, heard the news that the Buddha had arrived at Vesālī and was staying at her mango grove, she had the most excellent carriages harnessed for the great occasion (to visit the Buddha), and mounting on such carriage and accompanied by other excellent carriages, she left the city of Vesālī for her mango grove. After riding in the carriage for as far as the carriages should properly go, she dismounted from her carriage and approached the Buddha on foot. She made obeisance to Him and sat in a suitable place.

To Ambapālī, the courtesan, who was seated at a suitable place, the Buddha pointed out the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorted her to set herself up in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened her in the practice. After the Buddha had pointed out to her the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorted her to gladden her in the practice, Ambapālī, the courtesan, said to the Buddha, “Venerable Sir, may it please the Bhagavā to accept my offering of food for tomorrow, together with the company of bhikkhus.” The Buddha accepted the invitation by token of His silence.

Then, Ambapālī, knowing that the Buddha had accepted her invitation, rose from her place, made obeisance to Him, and left respectfully.

The Licchavī Princes and Ambapālī

When the Licchavī princes of Vesālī heard that the Buddha had arrived at Vesālī and was staying at the mango grove of Ambapālī, they ordered the most excellent carriages harnessed, and mounting these carriages, they left the city, accompanied by other excellent carriages, which were kept in reserve.

Some of the Licchavī princes were garbed in dark-blue uniform and, wearing dark-blue armaments, they took on a dark-blue appearance. Some of them were garbed in yellow uniform, and wearing yellow ornaments, they took on a yellow appearance. Some of them were garbed in red uniform, and, wearing red ornaments, they took on a red appearance. Some of them were garbed in white uniform, and wearing white ornaments, they took on a white appearance.

(Note: Not only were the dark-blue uniformed princes wearing dark-blue ornaments, they painted themselves in unguents of dark blue colour. Furthermore, the chariots they rode in were also finished in dark-blue, studded with dark-blue gems, and harnessed by horses with embellishments of the same colour; even the whips and the flags fitted to the chariot were also of the same colour. The same applies to the remaining colour groups among the Licchavī princes.)

Then Ambapālī, the courtesan let her carriage bump against the carriages of the young Licchavī princes, axle against axle, wheel against wheel, yoke against yoke. Thereupon, the Licchavī princes said to Ambapālī, the courtesan: “Look, you Ambapālī, why do you let your carriage bump against the carriage of young Licchavī princes, axle against axle, wheel against wheel, yoke against yoke?”

“O my Princes! It is because I have invited the Bhagavā together with His company of bhikkhus to an offering of meal tomorrow.”

“Now then, Ambapālī, give us (in exchange) for a hundred thousand (the privilege to offer) this meal (to the Bhagavā)!”

“O my Princes, even if you were to give me Vesālī together with its fief territories, I would not give up (the privilege to offer) this meal.”

At those brave words of Ambapālī, the Licchavī princes, fluttering their fingers in admiration, exclaimed: “Oh men, we have been outdone by this young woman! We have been outdone by this young woman!”

Then the Licchavī princes rode on to Ambapālī mango grove. The Buddha saw the splendid sight of the Licchavī princes trooped in various colours, and said to the bhikkhus:

“O bhikkhus, let those bhikkhus who have never seen the Tāvātimsa devas look at that array of the Licchavīs; let them look at them carefully; let them feast their eyes on the Licchavīs as if the Licchavī groupings were the Tāvatiṃsa devas.”

[In this context, the Buddha said to the bhikkhus: “.....let them feast their eyes on the Licchavī as if the Licchavī groupings were the Tāvatiṃsa devas,” not in the sense of regarding the splendid sight as something to be cherished. It is said here to impress the bhikkhus about human glory that is comparable to the glory of celestial beings. It is a way of inspiring some of the bhikkhus as in the usual pattern of discourses (beginning with the benefits of giving (dāna-kathā), the benefits of observance of morality (sīla-kathā), including the fortunate existences in deva realms (sagga-kathā) culminating in the faults of sensual pleasure (kamanāṃ ādīnava kathā).]

And yet the question remains, “Why does the Bhagavā urge the bhikkhus to look at the Licchavīs that might lead some bhikkhus in the audience think that sight is something good, something to be cherished?” In many of the Buddha's discourses, the usual instruction is not to regard sense objects such as visual objects, as something beautiful (suba). “But how is it that here the same instruction is not given?”

The answer is this: The Buddha says so in the interest of the bhikkhus. Here is the explanation:

Some of the bhikkhus, among the audience were not diligent in bhikkhu practice. The Buddha wishes to show to them that bhikkhu-practice can lead to the sort of human glory possessed by the Licchavīs. (compare this with the Buddha's method of arousing the initial interest of Nanda in bhikkhu practice by taking him to the deva realms and showing the glory of devas.)

Further, the Licchavīs would in due course furnish a concrete example of the impermanence of things. For these Licchavīs, so high in their present state comparable even to Tāvatiṃsa devas, are bound to meet their ruin in the hands of Ajātasattu. The bhikkhus, who remember the greatness of the Licchavis, will soon have occasion to see their downfall. Then these bhikkhus will gain insight readily into impermanence of sentient, leading to arahatship with the Four Discriminative Knowledge. This is the second and more important reason for the Buddha's urging the bhikkhus to have a close look at the Licchavī princes.

Then the Licchavī princes rode in their carriages as far as their carriages should go and then they alighted and walked towards the Buddha. They made obeisance to the Buddha and sat at a suitable place. To the Licchavī princes thus seated, the Buddha pointed out the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorted them to set themselves up in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice. After He had pointed out to them the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorted them to get established in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice, the Licchavī princes said to Him: “Venerable Sir, may it please the Bhagavā to accept our offering of food for tomorrow together with the company of bhikkhus.” Then the Buddha said to them: “O Licchavī princes, I have already accepted the offering of food for tomorrow by Ambapālī the courtesan.” Thereupon the Licchavī princes, fluttering their fingers (in admiration), exclaimed: “Oh men, we have been outdone by the young woman! We have been outdone by the young woman!”

Then the Licchavī princes expressed their appreciation and delight at the Buddha's discourse, rose from their seats, made obeisance to Him and left respectfully.

(In this connection, it might be asked: “Since the Licchavī princes had known (from Ambapālī) that she had invited the Bhagavā and His company of bhikkhus to the next day's meal, why did they make the invitation to the Bhagavā?”

The answer is: (1) Because the Licchavis did not believe Ambapālī's word; and (2) because they set a high value on lay supporters' obligations. More explanations on this:

(1) The Licchavī princes did not take Ambapālī's words at face value because they regarded her as a fallen woman.

(2) Secondly, it is customary for lay supporters to invite the Sangha to a food offering when they are going home after listening to a discourse.

Ambapālī donates Her Mango Grove to The Buddha

Then after the night had passed, Ambapālī, having had the choicest food and delicacies prepared in her mango grove, informed the Buddha by messengers who said: “Venerable Sir, it is time (to proceed). The food offering is ready.” Then in the morning, the Buddha rearranged His robes, and taking His alms-bowl and great robe, went to the house of Ambapālī, accompanied by His company of bhikkhus, and sat at the place prepared for Him.

(In this content, Ambapālī's house should be understood to mean the holiday home of hers in the mango grove, and not her permanent residence in the city of Vesālī. This fact is clearly indicated by her words to the Buddha which say: “..... I give this grove in donation to the Buddha.” The Bhesajakkhandhaka of Vinaya Mahāvagga is also specific about this: it says ‘that Ambapālī, the courtesan, offered food to the Bhagavā and his company of bhikkhus at her holiday home in her grove, and donated her own mango grove to the Order of Bhikkhus headed by the Bhagavā.’)

Ambapālī, attended on the bhikkhus headed by the Buddha, respectfully offering the choicest food and delicacies with her own hands. After the meal, she sat at a suitable place and said to the Buddha: “Venerable Sir, I give this garden Grove in donation to the Order of Bhikkhus headed by the Bhagavā.” The Buddha accepted the donation and after giving a discourse on the Dhamma to Ambapālī, He rose and departed.

While the Buddha was sojourning at the mango grove of Ambapālī in Vesālī, there too He repeatedly expounded the importance of morality, concentration and wisdom, the Threefold bhikkhu training.

The Buddha's Last Vassa at Veḷuva Village

Then the Buddha, after staying at Ambapālī's mango grove for as long as He wished, told Ānanda His wish to go to Veḷuva village in the vicinity of Vesālī and He proceeded there accompanied by a big company of bhikkhus.

During His stay at Veḷuva village (which was about the full moon of Vesakha, in his forty-fifth vassa), the Buddha said to the bhikkhus:

“Bhikkhus, enter upon the vassa period in the vicinity of Vesālī at the monasteries of your friends and acquaintances. As for me, I am going to pass the vassa in this Veḷuva village.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” the bhikkhus replied, and they entered into the rains-retreat (vassa) period at the monasteries of friends and acquaintances in the vicinity of Vesālī. The Buddha Himself entered the vassa period at Veḷuva village.

(The Buddha told the bhikkhus to dwell, during the vassa period, in the various monasteries in the neighbourhood of Vesālī because Veḷuva village was too small to provide daily alms-food to this great number of bhikkhus whereas the many monasteries around Vesālī could collect alms-food without difficulty.

The reason for the Buddha's orders to the bhikkhus to stay not far away from Vesālī was that He knew that He would enter Parinibbāna in the next ten months, so if the bhikkhus were allowed to go and dwell at far away places, some of them might not be able to pay their last respects to Him when He passed away, and they would feel very sorry for the lack of any hint from Him about His oncoming demise. By staying around Vesālī, they could get the opportunity of listening to His discourses, eight times a month. So it was out of compassion for the bhikkhus that the Buddha limited the area of vassa dwelling for the bhikkhus to the neighbourhood of Vesālī.)

The Buddha is afflicted with A Very Severe Illness

After the Buddha had entered into the vassa period at Veluva village He was afflicted with a very severe illness that caused excessive pain near unto death. He bore the pain and neutralised it by remaining mindful with clear comprehension. (i.e. through Insight Knowledge that reflects on the impermanence, woefulness, and unsubstantiality of sensation.) It now occurred to Him: "It would not be proper for Me to pass away in the attainment of Nibbāna without letting the attendant bhikkhus know, without taking leave of the Order of Bhikkhus. It would be well for Me to keep off this ailment by effort of Insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā), precursor to Fruition-Knowledge, and then by abiding in the life-maintaining phala-samāpatti (sustained absorption in Fruition Knowledge)." Accordingly, the Buddha kept off the ailment through effort of Insight meditation and by abiding in the life-maintaining phala-samāpatti. Then the Buddha's illness faded.

(The continuous process of psycho-physical phenomena kept going by the force of kamma is called life maintaining effort (jīvita-saṅkhāra). The prolonging of this process of psycho-physical phenomena through phala-samāpatti is also called life maintaining effort (jīvita-saṅkhāra). This life maintaining process or effort is also life-sustaining process (āyu-saṅkhāra).

The arahatta-phala-samāpatti of the Buddha is of three kinds: Maggānantara, vaḷañjana, and āyusaṅkhāra (or āyupālaka).

Of those three,

- i) the three impulsion thoughts that arise immediately consequent to the Buddha's arahatta-magga thought process (the magga-impulsion thoughts having the character to fructify immediately, akālika) is called Maggānantara-phala-samāpatti.
- ii) the sustained absorption that the Buddha may at any time later enter at will is called vaḷañjana phala-samāpatti. This is the enjoyment of the peace of Nibbāna. The Buddha entered into this kind of absorption at any possible odd moments, even while the audience expressing appreciation by saying, "sādhu, sādhu" during a discourse.
- iii) the Insight meditation entered into by the Buddha at Veluva village as the preliminary effort to enter into the absorption of phala-samāpatti is the same as the contemplation that the Bodhisatta had practised on the threshold of Enlightenment under the Mahābodhi Tree. It consists in contemplating the three characteristics of physical and mental phenomena. Having first established in this Insight-meditation, the Buddha made a solemn wish that He be free from any ailment for ten months up to the full moon of Āsāḷhā (May). After that He entered upon arahatta-phala-samāpatti. This absorption of phala-samāpatti had the desired effect of the quelling of the severe illness and the freedom from all disease for ten whole months. Therefore this third type of phala-samāpatti is called life maintaining samāpatti. Details of the method of Insight-meditation preceding this phala-samāpatti, called, rūpa-sattaka and namā-sattaka, may be gathered from Visuddhi-magga, Chapter XXII.

Of the above three kinds of phala-samāpatti, the first two, maggāntara and vaḷañjana are referred to as khanika-phala-samāpatti in the Commentaries and Sub-commentaries while the third is called jīvita-saṅkhāra or āyu-saṅkhāra phala-samāpatti.

The distinction between khanika-samāpatti and jīvita-saṅkhāra-samāpatti should be noted. Khanika-samāpatti is preceded by ordinary mode of entering into Insight-meditation whereas jīvita-saṅkhāra-samāpatti is preceded by a higher mode of Insight-meditation called rūpa-sattaka and nāma-sattaka, requiring greater effort. These two types of Insight meditation have, therefore, different effects on the phala-samāpatti that immediately follow them. The former can put off ailment only while the absorption lasts, just like a stone falling on a moss covered surface of water can clear away the moss while the impact of the stone lasts, but will let the moss gather together on the spot later. The latter can put off ailment for a desired period (here ten months), just like when a strong man were to descend the lake, clear away the moss from the desired area so that the moss is kept away for some considerable time.

The Buddha came out of His monastery soon after His recovery, and sat in the shade of the monastery on the seat prepared for Him. Then the Venerable Ānanda approached Him, paid his obeisance and, having seated at a suitable place, said:

“Venerable Sir, I see the Bhagavā now at ease. I find the Bhagavā now in good health. But, Venerable Sir, although I now see the Bhagavā like this, when the Bhagavā was ill, I felt heavy and stiff in my body. I could hardly distinguish between the directions. I became befuddled, unable to comprehend things such as the methods of steadfast mindfulness.

“However, I got a little comfort from the thought that the Bhagavā would not pass away so long as He had not left any instruction concerning the Order of Bhikkhus.”

Thereupon the Buddha explained His position as against the Order of Bhikkhus thus:

“Ānanda, what more could the Order of Bhikkhus expect from Me? For I have taught them without discriminating as the inner circle of disciples or outer circle of disciples. Ānanda, in the matter of the Teaching, I do not keep back anything as if it were some secret held in the closed fist of a (mean) teacher. Ānanda, if someone should desire that he alone should have sole control over the Order of Bhikkhus, or that the Order of Bhikkhus should rely on him alone, then it would be for such person to leave any instructions concerning the Order of Bhikkhus. But Ānanda, I have no desire that I alone should have sole control over the Order of Bhikkhus, or that the Order of Bhikkhus should rely on Me alone. Since I have no such desire, why should I leave any instruction concerning the Order of Bhikkhus?

“Ānanda, I am now grown old, far gone in years, and have arrived at the last stage of life. I am turning eighty years of age. And just as an old worn out cart is kept going by additional efforts and care so My body is kept going by the additional effort of the life maintaining phala-samāpatti. Ānanda, it is (only) when the Tathāgata remains abiding in arahatta-phala-samāpatti, unconcerned with material objects through the cessation of some (mundane) sensations, and through ceasing to attend to any signs of conditioned phenomena, that the Tathāgata's body is at ease (lit, at greater ease).”

“Therefore, Ānanda, let yourselves be your own refuge; let yourselves, and not anyone else, be your refuge. Let the Dhamma be your firm ground, and let the Dhamma, and not anything else, be your refuge.

“Ānanda, how does a bhikkhu make himself his own refuge, make himself and not anyone else, his refuge? How does he make the Dhamma his firm ground, and make the Dhamma, and not anything else, his refuge?

“Ānanda, in this Teaching, a bhikkhu keeps his mind on the body with diligence, comprehension and mindfulness, steadfastly contemplating it as body, so as to keep away sense desire and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind on sensation with diligence, comprehension, and mindfulness, steadfastly contemplating it as sensation, so as to keep away sense desire and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind on the mind, so as to keep away sense desire and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind steadfastly contemplating it as mind, so as to keep away sense desire and distress that would otherwise arise in him. He keeps his mind on mind objects (dhamma), steadfastly contemplating them as mind objects so as to keep away sense desire and distress that would otherwise arise in him.

“Ānanda, thus a bhikkhu makes himself his own mainstay, makes himself, and not anyone else, his refuge. Thus he makes the Dhamma his firm ground, and makes the Dhamma, and not anything else, his refuge.

“Ānanda, those bhikkhus who, either now or after I have passed away, make themselves their own refuge, make themselves, and not anyone else, their refuge; who make the Dhamma their firm ground, and make the Dhamma, and not anything else, their refuge, all such bhikkhus are sure to attain to the highest state (i.e. arahatship) among all the bhikkhus who cherish the Threefold Training.”

Thus did the Buddha conclude the discourse culminating in arahatta-phala.

The Demise of The Two Chief Disciples

After spending the last vassa period at Veluva village. At the end of that period, the Buddha left the village for Sāvatti. Travelling by stages, He arrived at Sāvatti and He stayed in the Jetavana monastery. [It was about the eighth day of the lunar month Tazaungmon, (November)].

On that day, the Venerable Sāriputta, knowing that he had just seven days more to live, bade farewell to the Buddha and took a seven day journey to his native village, Nālaka village in the Province of Rājagaha. There in the brick house where he was born, the Venerable Sāriputta passed away and entered parinibbāna on the full moon day of Tazaungmon (November).

(The details of this event will be described in the chapter on the Sangha.)

After the funeral rites were finished, Venerable Cunda, younger brother of the Venerable Sāriputta, took Venerable Sāriputta's alms-bowl, robe, etc., together with the remains to Sāvatti. These relics were enshrined under the Buddha's instruction at Sāvatti. Thereafter, the Buddha went to Rājagaha. When He was in Rājagaha, on the day of the new moon in Tazaungmon, the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna entered parinibbāna.

(The details of the event will be described in the chapter on the Sangha.)

The relics of the the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna were enshrined under the Buddha's instructions at Rājagaha. After that the Buddha proceeded on His journey and, travelling by stages, arrived at Ukkacela. There, at the landing place on the Gaṅgā river, He gave a discourse concerning the demise of the two Chief Disciples (Refer to Ukkacela Sutta, Saṅgyutta III.)

Then, in the morning, He went into Vesālī on His alms-round, and after His meal, leaving the place of eating, He said to Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, bring the leather sheet seat, let us go to the Capata shrine to spend the day there."

"Very well, Venerable Sir," said Ānanda, and taking a leather sheet seat, followed closely behind the Buddha.

The Buddha gives Hints about His Passing Away

Then the Buddha approached the Capata shrine and sat on the seat spread out for Him. The Venerable Ānanda making obeisance to Him, and seated himself at a suitable place. Then the Buddha said to Ānanda by way of clear hints:

"Ānanda, whosoever has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the Four Bases of Psychic Power (iddhipāda) could, if he so wishes, live the maximum life span or even beyond the maximum life span.

"Ānanda, the Tathāgata has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as His basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the Four Bases of Psychic Power. Therefore, Ānanda, the Tathāgata could, if He so wishes, live the maximum life span."

Although the Buddha thus gave clear hints, the Venerable Ānanda failed to grasp them. And so it did not occur to him to entreat the Buddha along these lines (in these terms): "May the Bhagavā, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, wellbeing and happiness of devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live the maximum life span! May the One who speaks only what is true and beneficial live the maximum life span!" The Venerable Ānanda's mind was like that of one possessed by Māra.

In this connection: the Udena shrine (Udena cetiya) was a temple built on the site where the demon Udena was traditionally propitiated. The other shrines (at Vesālī) likewise were traditional places of worship in respect of traditional deities.

Regarding the term 'kappa' in this context: "Kappam vā tiṭṭheyya kappāvesam vā." is unanimously taken to mean āyu-kappa (life span) of that time by the Commentators and Sub-commentators.

Only the Venerable Mahāsīva took different interpretation. According to him, “The Buddhas never make claims about their powers without some good cause. That being so, the Bhagavā could repeatedly resort to entering into the absorption of phala-samāpatti and go on prolonging His life by ten-month periods up to the end of the present aeon which is marked by five Buddhas. (Yet why the Buddha did not choose to do so? The Buddha probably had thought thus:) Human beings born with the kamma-born corporeality are subject to decay. The Buddhas do not wish to present themselves with their descript bodies which naturally show up after the four-fifth of the life span has passed. That is why it is customary for all Buddhas to pass away when they have attained four fifths of the life span, when their physical appearance is still firm and inspiring for the devotees. There is also another practical consideration: if a Buddha were to survive most of his great disciples and were surrounded by youthful bhikkhus, the people would say: “Oh! what sort of disciples Buddha has!” Thus, the Venerable Mahāsīva maintained the practical considerations that Buddhas take into account in not exercising their power of living till the end of the aeon.

However, the Venerable Mahāsīva's views were not accepted by the Commentators, who take ‘life span’ as the meaning of āyu-kappa on the authority of the Pakinnaka desanā atthakatha.

(Refer to Commentary on Dīgha Nikāya).

The view of Venerable Mahāsīva was also rejected by the Sub-Commentary on Mahāvagga (Dīgha Nikāya). It says: “Since the Mahāsīva's view contains a statement that human beings are subject to decay, which implies that decay cannot be postponed by psychic power. In that case, it also implies that death cannot be prevented by psychic power. Therefore, the argument is inherently unsound. Only the view taken by the Commentary should be taken as the sound view, and not that of Mahāsīva.”

In this matter, Mahāsīva would appear to take only one point as primary consideration, and that is, that a Bodhisatta's resultant-kamma, at his last existence, has the power to prolong life for an infinite period. And that view coupled with the authority of the Pāli (text) that the life maintaining phala-samāpatti of Buddhas can postpone fatal ailment, leads Mahāsīva to claim that if the Buddha so wishes, he might live on throughout the end of the present aeon.

Even though the resultant-kamma of a Bodhisatta at his last existence is supposed to prolong life for an infinite period, that infinite period can be literally true only if the prevailing life span is also an infinite period. But if the prevailing life span is one hundred years, that (so-called) infinite period can last just one hundred years. That indeed is so because the power of kamma has its effect limited by the extent of the prevailing times, physical basis of the person, effort taken, and the plane of existence. That is why the Pakinnaka desanā of the ancient Commentary takes the meaning of āyu-kappa as the prevailing life span. This view has also been maintained by the new Commentators, such as Buddhaghosa, Dhammapāla, etc.

As regards the expression, “possessed by Māra,” the twelve kinds of illusions (vipallasa) should be noted.

- (1) Impermanence (anicca) is held as permanence (nicca) through: (i) the illusion of perception, (ii) the illusion of thought, and (iii) through the illusion of views.
- (2) Pain (dukkha) is held as pleasure (sukha) through; (i) the illusion of perception, (ii) the illusion of thought, and (iii) the illusion of views.
- (3) Non-self (anatta) is held as Self (attā) through (i) the illusion of perception, (ii) the illusion of thought, and (iii) the illusion of views.
- (4) Loathsomeness (asubha) is held as lovely (subho) through: (i) the illusion of perception, (ii) the illusion of thought, (iii) the illusion of views.

One who is free from all these illusions cannot fall victim to Mara's influence mentally. (The Venerable Mahā Moggallāna is an example). A worldling who has not rid of any of these illusions or an ariya who has overcome some of these illusion but still have some remaining in him is liable to be possessed by Māra.

Ānanda still had these four illusions: the illusion of perception and the illusion of thought that made pain appear as pleasure; the illusion of perception and the illusion of thought that made loathsomeness appear as lovely. Hence, his being victimized by Māra.

The way Māra possesses his victim is by frightening him out of his wits, either by creating a dreadful vision or a dreadful sound. When the victim is thus frightened, he loses consciousness, leaving his mouth agape. Māra then would insert his hand through the opened mouth and take hold of the heart exerting pressure on it. The victim lies in a senseless state totally possessed by Māra.

In the case of Ānanda, Māra could not insert his hand through the mouth and oppress the heart. He merely presented some dreadful sense object before Ānanda, under the influence of which Ānanda could not think of the significance of the Buddha's intimation.

For a second time the Buddha said to Ānanda...(repeat p: below)...

For a third time the Buddha said to Ānanda:

(p:)

“Ānanda, pleasant is the city of Vesālī. And pleasant are the shrines of Udena, Gotamaka, Sattamba, Bahuputta, Sarandada, Cāpāta.

“Ānanda, whosoever has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the Four Bases of Psychic Power (iddhipāda) could, if he so wishes, live the maximum life span or even beyond the maximum life span.

“Ānanda, the Tathāgata has cultivated, practised, used as a vehicle, taken as His basis, kept up mastered, and fully developed the Four Bases of Psychic Power. Therefore, Ananda, the Tathāgata could, if He so wishes, live the maximum life span.” Thus said the Bhagavā by way of clear hints.

Although the Buddha thus gave clear hints, Ānanda failed to grasp them. And so it did not occur to him to entreat the Buddha along these lines (in these terms): “May the Bhagavā, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, well being and happiness of devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live the maximum life span! May the Well-Spoken One live the maximum life span!” Ānanda's mind was like that of one possessed by Māra.

(Herein, it might be asked: “Why did the Bhagavā, knowing well that Ānanda was being possessed by Māra, repeated his words of intimation three times?”)

The answer is this: the Buddha foresaw that later, when Māra had released Ānanda, who would regained his senses. Ānanda would then entreat Him to live the whole of the life span. In that event, He would have reason to blame Ānanda for his failure to make the request at the proper time and that this blaming would have the effect of attenuating Ānanda's grief.)

Then the Buddha said to Ānanda: “Go now, Ānanda. Now you know the time to go.” “Very well, Venerable Sir,” assented Ānanda, then arising from his seat, he made obeisance to the Buddha and went to sit at the foot of a tree, not far away from Him.

Māra's Request

Soon after the Venerable Ānanda had left the Buddha's presence, Māra, the Evil one, approached Him and, standing at a certain place, addressed Him thus:

“Venerable Sir, let the Bhagavā realize Parinibbāna now, let the well-spoken one pass away! Venerable Sir, it is time now for the Bhagavā to pass away.

“Venerable Sir, the Bhagavā had said (to me) thus: ‘O Evil One, I shall not pass away so long as my disciples, the bhikkhus, (p1:) are not yet well versed in the Doctrine, not yet well disciplined (in the threefold Training), not yet sure of themselves (in the righteousness of their conduct), not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the Teaching, not yet able to practise according to the Teaching leading to the Supramundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice (i.e. the life of purity), not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their Teacher's doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful Teaching.’

“Venerable Sir, now that the Bhagava's disciples, the bhikkhus, are well versed in the Doctrine, are well disciplined (in the threefold Training), are sure of themselves, are possessed of wide knowledge, are able to memorize the Teaching, are able to practise according to the Teaching leading to the Supramundane, are able to take up the proper practice, are settled in their practice; are able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their Teacher's doctrine that they have learnt: are able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful Teaching.

“Venerable Sir, let the Bhagavā realize Parinibbāna now, let the Well-spoken One pass away! Venerable Sir, it is time now for the Bhagavā to pass away.” (1)

“Venerable Sir, the Bhagavā had said (to me) thus: ‘O Evil One, I shall not pass away so long as my female disciples, the bhikkhunīs... (repeat p1 above) ‘...my male lay-disciples... (repeat p2 below)

‘... my female lay-disciples (p2:) are not well versed in the Doctrine, not yet well disciplined (in the threefold Training), not yet sure of themselves (in the righteousness of their conduct), not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the Teaching, not yet able to practise according to the Teaching leading to the Supramundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice (i.e. the life of purity), not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their Teacher's doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful Teaching.

“Venerable Sir, now that the Bhagava's female lay disciples are well versed in the Doctrine, are well disciplined (in the three fold Training), are sure of themselves, are possessed of wide knowledge, are able to memorize the Teaching, are able to practise according to the Teaching leading to the Supramundane, are able to take up the proper practice, are settled in their practice; are able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make clear their Teacher's doctrine that they have learnt, are able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful Teaching.

“Venerable Sir, let the Bhagavā realize Parinibbāna now, let the Well-spoken One pass away! Venerable Sir, it is time now for the Bhagavā to pass away.

“Venerable Sir, the Bhagavā had said (to me) thus: ‘O Evil One, I shall not pass away so long as this Teaching of mine which is the Practice of Purity is not yet sufficiently established among the disciples, not yet prosperous, widespread, reached the multitudes, and renowned, to the extent that it can be thoroughly made known by wise devas and humans.’

“Venerable Sir, now that the Bhagava's Teaching which is the Practice of Purity is sufficiently established among the disciples, is now prosperous, widespread, has reached the multitudes, and is renowned to the extent that it can be thoroughly made known by wise devas and humans.

“Venerable Sir, let the Bhagavā realize Parinibbāna now, let the Well-spoken One pass away! Venerable Sir, it is time now for the Bhagavā to pass away.”

(This was the third time Māra requested the Buddha to pass away) The first time was during the eight week of Buddha’s Sojourn in the vicinity of the Bodhi Tree, after He had attained Perfect Self-Enlightenment. At that time he said to the Buddha: “Venerable Sir, as the result of your fulfilling the Perfections with the aim at Buddhahood, you have now become the Buddha. You have attained Perfect Self-Enlightenment. What benefit would be there (what good would turn out) from your wandering from town to town, village to village, preaching your doctrine for the welfare of the world of living beings? Venerable Sir, let the Bhagavā realize Parinibbāna now,...(etc).”

(For the second time) Māra, having seen that the Buddha had assented to Brahmā Sahampati’s request to preach the Doctrine, approached Him, who was sitting beneath the Ajapāla (Goat-herd’s) Banyan Tree where He stayed for the seventh week after Enlightenment. Mara was feeling miserable at the prospect of his domain getting lost to the Buddha whose doctrine would lead the multitudes to Deathlessness. So (in spite of the Buddha’s promise to Brahmā Sahampati), he decided to try to change the mind of the Buddha in an attempt to prevent the Buddha’s propagating the Dhamma by making a second request to pass away, in words similar to the first request.

At that time the Buddha replied to Māra that so long as His male disciples, the bhikkhus, His female disciples, the bhikkhunis, His male lay disciples, female lay disciples were not well versed in the Doctrine, not yet well disciplined (in the threefold Training), not yet sure of themselves (in the righteousness of their conduct), not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the Teaching, not yet able to practise according to the Teaching leading to the Supramundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice (i.e. the life of purity), not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their Teacher’s doctrine that they have learnt; so long as they were unable to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as might arise, and expound the wonderful Teaching, He would not pass away. Māra in his third request, therefore, referred to those reasons the Buddha gave on that second request.)

On being requested thus, the Buddha said to Māra the Evil One: “Evil One, don’t you worry; the Parinibbāna of the Tathāgata will not be long in coming. Three months hence the Tathāgata will realize Parinibbāna.”

The Buddha renounces The Life-maintaining Mental Process

Then the Buddha, while at Cāpāla shrine, decided mindfully and with deliberation to give up the life-maintaining mental process, i.e. not to resume the absorption of phala-samāpatti (at the end of three months). On the Buddha’s making that resolution, the great earth quaked with a hair-raising and gooseflesh-causing vehemence.

Then the Buddha, perceiving this phenomenal occurrence, uttered a joyous utterance in verse.

*Tula matulañca sambhavam
Bhava samākhāra mavasvaji muni
Ajjhattarato samāhito
Abhindi kavacamivatta sambhavam.*

The Great Sage, having weighed the Infinite Nibbāna against the ephemeral nature of sentient existence, has cast off (by the Ariya Path) the resultant-producing volitions that cause fresh existence. With delight in Insight-meditation (reflecting on the three characteristics of the five aggregates) and with complete calm of mind, he has destroyed the tenacious defilements that enwrap Him like a tight coat of chain-mail.

The meaning of the verse is further expanded:

The Buddha gained the four ariya-maggas after cultivating meditation for calm and insight-meditation. As a brave warrior at the battlefield would cut loose, with his sharp sword, the tight coat of chain mail that he is wearing, so also the Buddha has completely destroyed the defilements with the four Path Knowledges. Just as when the tap-roots of a tree are cut off, the fruit-producing potential of the tree is terminated, the moment the defilements are destroyed, the potential for rebirth that has been cumulating from the beginningless samsāra is terminated in the mental make-up of the Buddha.

(Notes: In the statement, “The Bhagavā decided mindfully and with deliberation to give up the life-maintaining mental process,” ‘mindfully’ means the Buddha’s mind dwelled at all moments on the Four Foundations of Steadfast Mindfulness, namely, body, sensations, mind and mind objects. Reflecting wisely on these four Foundation, He recalled how He had borne the burden of the five aggregates over such a long, weary journey of samsāra, and that now he was free from the burden; and that to enable him to cast aside this burden, he had for over four asankhyeyyas and a thousand aeons fulfilled the Perfections, the requisite infra structure for the Ariya Path. Now that he was established in the Path which he had long aspired after, he was able to dwell on the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, having had penetrative insight into the loathsomeness, woefulness, impermanence and insubstantiality of conditioned phenomena.

“With deliberation” means the Buddha pondered on the benefits He had brought for Himself and for others. For His own benefit, He had obtained His goal of Buddhahood at the foot of the Bodhi tree. As for the benefit for others He had, by His preaching the Dhamma, caused the multitudes to gain liberation from the round of dukkha. He would be bringing an end to that mission in the next three months (i.e. on the full moon of Āsāḷhā (May).

These thoughts which the Buddha considered led to the decision, by means of the Buddha-Knowledge, to give up the life-maintaining mental process.

In the expression “to give up the life-maintaining mental process,” ‘the life maintaining mental process’ (āyu-saṅkhāra), is a term capable of two meanings: the interaction of mind and matter kept going by the process that sustains life, conditioned by kamma, is one meaning. The āupālika-phala-samāpatti that acts as a condition for prolonging life (as explained above, at p 309 of the Myanmar original text) is the other meaning.

“To give up the life maintaining mental process” means the Buddha, was resolving that He would not re-enter into the phala-samāpatti after three months; he would do so only up to the full moon of Āsāḷhā. By that resolution, the Buddha, in effect, renounced the condition for prolonging his life beyond three months.

When the Buddha thus renounced the life-maintaining mental process, the great earth quaked in six different ways: (i) swaying from east to west, (ii) swaying from west to east, (iii) swaying from south to north, (iv) swaying from north to south, (v) heaving up, and (iv) dropping down. This phenomenon occurred throughout the ten thousand world-systems, causing people terror with gooseflesh appearing and body-hairs standing up on them.

When the Buddha had relinquished the life-maintaining mental process, He felt delightful satisfaction with the thought that the burden of the body, which He had been carrying over the long course of samsāra, was now to be laid aside in the next three months. Since the joy at this happy prospect was so intense that it could not be contained and (like a jar overfilled with oil) it found expression in the joyous utterance of the above stanza.

The fact that that stanza was the outcome of great joy makes it evident that in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, the Buddha was not yielding to Māra out of fear. If it were so, how could such a joyous utterance come about? Only the happy prospect, foreseen by the Buddha-Knowledge, that three months hence He would be laying down the burden of the five aggregates and making an end of all dukkhas, brought forth that joyous utterance concerning his relinquishment.)

Then the Venerable Ānanda bethought himself: “O wonderful it is! O unprecedented it is! This hair-raising earthquake is monstrous indeed! It is really stupendous! And how rolling thunders echoed and re-echoed! What is the cause of great earthquakes? What conditions them?” He approached the Buddha, made his obeisance to Him, and sitting at a suitable place, addressed the Buddha thus: “O wonderful it is! O unprecedented it is! This hair raising earthquake is monstrous indeed! It is really stupendous! and how rolling thunders echoed and re-echoed! Venerable Sir, what is the cause of such great earthquakes? What conditions them?”

Eight Causes of Earthquakes

And the Buddha said: “Ānanda, there are eight causes of, or conditions leading to great earthquakes. They are:

- (1) This great earth is supported by water, the water by air, the air by space. When very strong winds blow, the water is shaken. When the water is shaken, the earth is shaken. This is the first cause of, or the first condition leading to great earthquakes.
- (2) Further, Ānanda, a samaṇa or a brāhmaṇa who has great (mental) power, and who is accomplished in the supernormal powers of the mind, or a deva of great power, by developing intense concentration on the limited image of the earth element and on the boundless image of the water-element can cause the earth to shake strongly, to sway violently, and to convulse. This is the second cause of, or the second condition leading to great earthquakes.
- (3) Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Bodhisatta passing away in the Tusitā Deva realm and descending into (i.e. conceiving) in the mother's womb, mindfully and with clear comprehension, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed. This the third cause of, or the third condition leading to great earthquakes.
- (4) Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Bodhisatta was born, mindfully and with clear comprehension, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed. This is the fourth cause of, or the fourth condition leading to great earthquakes.
- (5) Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Buddha attaining Supremely Perfect-Enlightenment, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed.
- (6) Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Buddha expounding the Supreme Dhamma on the Four Ariya Truths, (His first sermon known as the Dhammacakka-puvattana Sutta), the great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed.
- (7) Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Buddha relinquishing mindfully and with deliberation, the life maintaining mental process, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently and is convulsed.
- (8) Further, Ānanda, on the occasion of a Buddha passing away leaving no remainder of the five aggregates and enters upon Parinibbāna, realizing the ultimate peace, this great earth shakes, quakes strongly, sways violently, and is convulsed.

“Ānanda, these are the eight causes of, or the eight conditions leading to great earthquakes.”

(The Buddha's discourse is not yet ended. Some elaboration on the above eight factors:)

- i) Earthquakes occur due to the unstable conditions of the elements of the cosmos. The great earth is supported by a mass of air which is nine hundred and sixty thousand yojanas thick. Above that mass of air, there is a mass of water which is four hundred and eighty thousand yojanas thick. Above that mass of water lies the great earth which is two hundred and forty thousand yojanas thick. The lower half of the thickness, i.e. a hundred and twenty thousand yojanas, of the earth is granite while the upper half of the same thickness is earth. When the elements become unstable and powerful winds blow across the surface of the normal mass of air, the mass of air is temporarily displaced so that its support of the mass of water is withdrawn. The mass of water then drops abruptly, leading to a sudden drop of the mass of the great earth. When the extra-ordinarily strong winds become calm again, the mass of air returns to its normal level, resumes its function of supporting the mass of water, and rises up again. This leads to the rising up of the great earth. Thus, strong winds that blow due to unstable conditions of the elements are the causes of earthquakes. This phenomena is present all the time, occurring occasionally. This sudden falling and rising of the earth is not noticed because of the thickness of the great earth.

- ii) Earthquakes due to powerful persons: Persons possessed of psychic power can cause earthquakes by means of that power. The method they employ is by entering into absorption of the jhāna, with water as the object of concentration and thereby causing the upheaval of the great earth. They cause the earthquake for some noble purpose, e.g. the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna caused the Vejayanta pinnacled mansion of Sakka to shake for the purpose of arousing an emotional religious feeling in others; and Sāmaṇera Sangharakkhita also did the same thing to inquire after something.

The Story of Sāmaṇera Sangharakkhita

Sāmaṇera Sangharakkhita (nephew of Venerable Mahānāga) was a remarkable sāmaṇera who attained arahatta-phala even while his head was being shaved at the time of entering into the Order of Bhikkhus. He reflected whether, there had appeared before, any bhikkhus who could cause the Vejayanta mansion of Sakka to shake, and seeing none, he attempted at it. But he could not do it. Seeing his attempt fail, the deva maidens who belonged to the group of dancers at Sakka's palace ridiculed him. "Son, you are too young to try to do such a feat; this Vejayanta mansion is too strong for you," they said to him.

Sāmaṇera Sangharakkhita bethought himself: "I am being ridiculed by these celestial maidens because I lack proper instruction from a teacher." And so, he considered where his preceptor the Venerable Sāmuddika Mahānāga could be found, and knowing that the latter was spending the day in a cave underneath the great ocean, he went there and stood in worshipping posture before the bhikkhu-elder.

"So you had failed to shake the Vejayanta mansion because you joined battle even before you learned how to fight," said the elder.

"Venerable Sir, I have not received any instructions from an able teacher," the Sāmaṇera said.

"Son, if such a person of psychic power as yourself cannot shake the Vejayanta mansion, who else could? Now, then, you have seen some dried piece of cow dung floating along the surface of water, haven't you? And remember, son, how the pan-cake maker retrieves her pancake from the frying pan by tearing off its edges first. Mark this example." These were the elliptical words from the teacher.

"That will do, Venerable Sir," the Sāmaṇera said.

Then he made the wish: "Let the Vejayanta mansion be surrounded by water." And the Sāmaṇera went to where the Vejayanta mansion stood. On seeing him return, the celestial maidens remarked: "Here he comes round again, not satisfied with his disgrace. Yes, he is here again!"

When Sakka heard them, he said to them: "Do not ridicule my son. He has received instruction from an able teacher. He will shake the mansion now." Sāmaṇera Sangharakkhita then touched the outside beam of the Vejayanta mansion with his big toe. The mansion swayed in all the four directions, sideways as well as back and forth. Thereupon the deva maidens cried: "Son, please stop! Leave the great mansion alone!"

Sāmaṇera Sangharakkhita then let the Vejayanta mansion stand in its place, and standing above it, uttered the following three verses in ecstatic joy:

"Just today I have become a bhikkhu. I have today attained arahatship even as my head was being shaved. And today, I have been able to shake Sakka's mansion, (having received instruction from my teacher.) Excellent and marvellous indeed is the Buddha, the Perfectly Self-Enlightened One. Excellent and marvellous indeed is the Dhamma, that truly leads to emancipation. Excellent and marvellous indeed is the Sangha, the true ariyas!"

(Three verses rendered combinedly).

- iii) The third cause (conception of a Buddha to be) and
- iv) The fourth cause (birth of a Buddha to be) are due to the superb merit of the Buddha-to-be.
- v) The fifth cause (the occasion of Enlightenment) is due to the power of the penetrative Knowledge of the Buddha.
- vi) The sixth cause (the occasion of delivering the First Sermon) is due to the power of the Knowledge consisting in the power of exposition (i.e., expression) of the Buddha. On this great occasion, the guardian spirit of the great earth, showing his appreciation is figuratively said to be applauding by the great earth, according to the Commentary.
- vii) The seventh cause is due to the power of the Buddha-Knowledge in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, out of weariness of sentient existence which is conditioned by cause. On this great occasion, the guardian spirit of the earth sympathized with the Buddha (in the matter of decay and death which incumbent on everyone, not excepting the Buddha) and showed his sympathy by the great earthquake.
- viii) The eighth cause is due to the power of the Buddha's Knowledge that makes the Buddha very happy with the delightful satisfaction in having accomplished His mission that had taken Him four asaṅkhyeyyas and a hundred thousand aeons (kappas) for attainment of Perfect Peace (Anupādisesa Nibbāna). As for the guardian spirit of the earth, it was occasion for grief and lamentation. The great earthquake then is an expression of his grief and lamentation. (Commentary and Sub-Commentary).

Eight Categories of Assemblies

When the Buddha discoursed on the eight causes of great earthquakes, Venerable Ānanda, being of great wisdom, rightly concluded that the Buddha had relinquished the life-maintaining mental process that very day. The fact of Ānanda's appraisal of the situation was known by the Buddha but He did not allow Ānanda to disrupt the discourse and continued with other topics, such as the eight categories of assemblies, the eight abhibhāyatanas, and the eight vimokkha. (There are certain commentators who explain this action, on the part of the Buddha, as His strategy of alleviating the sorrow that would arise in Ānanda, if the fact of the relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process were to be allowed to surface itself. The fresh topics that the Buddha takes up without interrupting are thus meant to occupy Ānanda's mind with matters other than the Buddha's oncoming death.)

“Ānanda,” said the Buddha, “there are eight categories of assemblies. There are: assembly of nobles, assembly of brahmins, assembly of householders, assembly of bhikkhus, assembly of the devas of the realm of the Four Great Kings, assembly of the devas of the realm of the Tāvātimsa Deva realm, assembly of the devas led by Māra, and assembly of Brahmās.

“Ānanda, I remember having attended hundreds of assemblies of nobles. (p:) In those assemblies, I sat together with them, conversed with them, and had discussions with them. While I was among them, My appearance was like their appearance and My voice was like their voice. In My discourses to them, I pointed out to them the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorted them to get established in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice. While I was thus discoursing to them, they did not know Me: they wondered: “Who is this one discoursing? Is He, a deva or a man?” After I had, by My discourse, pointed out to them the benefits of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice, I vanished from there. When I vanished too, they did not know Me; and wondered: ‘Who was that one who has vanished now? Was He a deva or a man? ” “Ānanda, I remember having attended hundreds of:

... assemblies of brahmins...(repeat p: above).

... assemblies of householders...(repeat p: above)

... assemblies of bhikkhus...(repeat p: above)

... assemblies of devas of the realm of the Four Great Kings...(repeat p: above)

... assemblies of devas of the realm of Tāvatiṃsa devas...(repeat p: above)

... assemblies of devas led by Māra...(repeat p: above)

“Ānanda, I remember having attended hundreds of assemblies of Brahmā. In those assemblies, I sat together with them, conversed with them, and had discussion with them. While I was among them, My appearance was like their appearance, and My voice was like their voice. In My discourses to them I pointed out to them the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorted them to get established in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice. While I was thus discoursing to them, they did not know Me; they wondered, who is this one discoursing? Is He, a deva or a man? After I had, by My discourse, pointed out to them the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorted them to get established in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened them in the practice, I vanished from there. When I vanished too, they did not know Me, they wondered: “Who was that one that has vanished now? Was He a deva or a man?”

(Herein: some examples of the great many assemblies of nobles are: the first meeting with King Bimbisāra after the Buddha had attained Enlightenment (Refer to Chapter 24), the Buddha's first visit to Kapilavatthu and meeting with His kinsmen (Refer to Chapter 26), the Buddha's meeting with Licchavī princes as told in the Sunakkhatta vatthu, Saccaka vatthu (Refer to Chapter 32). Such meetings with nobles took place also in the other world-systems, it should be presumed.

“My appearance was like their appearance” means not the colour of the skin, but the form, for nobles had various colours in skin, some white, some black, some dark tan like the bed bug. As regards the form, the Buddha did not assume any particular guise, but remained His ownself. Only the onlookers, the nobles, regarded them as one of them. (This reminds one the traditional presentation of the Buddha image in royal attire with reference to the His taming of Jambupati.)

“My voice was like their voice” means the language that the Buddha used in speaking at the particular assembly. Regarding the voice itself, the Buddha had a voice like that of the Lord of Brahmas, a voice replete with eight marvellous qualities. When the Buddha happened to be seated on a throne, the audience would think that their king was speaking in a sweet voice. Only after He had finished the discourse and left the assembly, then the audience could see their real king and they were left wondering: “Who was there sitting on the throne, who talked to us in Magadhī on the Dhamma in such a sweet voice, and who is gone now? Was He a deva or was He a man?” They did not know that it was the Buddha.

It might be asked: “Why did the Buddha discoursed on the Dhamma to those who did not recognize Him? What benefit did He see there?” The answer is: the Buddha preached to them to prepare the ground for their enlightenment later. Here's the explanation: Although those hearers of the Dhamma did not recognize the Buddha and did not take real, interest in the Dhamma, since the Dhamma is replete with the excellent qualities such as “well-delivered” (savakhāto), hearing it will serve as a necessary condition for enlightenment in future to gain magga-phala.

As regards the great many assemblies of brahmins, we have examples in the Buddha's encounters with Sonadanta, Kūḍadanta, etc. Similar assemblies of brahmins in the other world-systems may also be presumed to have taken place.

It might be asked: “What benefit did the Bhagavā see in discoursing on the eight categories of assemblies?” The answer is: The Buddha discoursed on the eight categories of assemblies to illustrate the fact that He was fearless. Here’s the explanation: After describing the eight categories of assemblies, the Buddha continued: “Ānanda, in going among those eight assemblies, the Tathāgata had no fear. That being so, how could anyone say that the Tathāgata was afraid of Māra who came to Him alone? Ānanda, in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, the Tathāgata did so fearlessly, with mindfulness and clear comprehension.”

(These words are contained in the Pakīṇṇaka Dhamma Desanā Pāli which was not recited at the Great Council but was quoted by the Commentaries.)

Eight Ways of Mastery of The Mind through Concentration

Then the Buddha continued His discourse without break thus:

“Ānanda, there are eight ways (abhibhāyatana-jhānas) of overcoming the opposite phenomena and sense objects, i.e. the hindrances that mar clear mental vision (i.e. concentration). These are:

- i) Someone (with an excellent mental capacity or intelligence) after having gained concentration at the preliminary or preparatory level on the colour of certain parts of his own body, concentrates his mind on small external forms of his choice (kaṣiṇa objects), which may be either unblemished or blemished (i.e. whose colour may be either good or bad). His mind gets fixed on these small forms, gains mastery over them and thus dwells in appanā-jhāna. After emerging from the jhānic absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the first abhibhāyatana-jhāna.
- ii) Some other person (of similar intelligence), after having gained the preliminary concentration on the colour of certain parts of his own body, concentrates his mind on big external forms (as kaṣiṇa objects), which may be either unblemished or blemished. His mind gets fixed on these big objects, gains mastery over them, and thus dwells in appanā-jhāna. After emerging from the jhānic absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the second abhibhāyatana-jhāna.
- iii) Some other person (of similar intelligence), without taking the colour of any part of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on small external objects (kaṣiṇa objects), which may be either unblemished or blemished, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on these small forms (as kaṣiṇa objects), gains mastery over them, and thus dwells in appanā-jhāna. After emerging from the jhānic absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the third abhibhāyatana-jhāna.
- iv) Some other person (of similar intelligence), without taking the colour of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on big external forms (as kaṣiṇa objects), which may be either unblemished or blemished, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on these big forms, gains mastery over them, and thus dwells in appanā-jhāna. After emerging from the jhānic absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the fourth abhibhāyatana-jhāna.
- v) Some other person (of similar intelligence), without taking the colour of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on external forms (as kaṣiṇa objects) that are dark blue, with a dark-blue colour, dark-blue hue, like the flax-blossom which is dark blue, with a dark-blue colour, dark-blue hue, or like Bārāṇasī fabric with a smooth finish on both sides, which is dark-blue and has a dark-blue colour, dark-blue hue. He concentrates on external forms that are dark-blue, with a dark-blue colour, dark-blue hue, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on them, gains mastery over them, and thus dwells in appanā-jhāna. After emerging from the jhānic absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the fifth abhibhāyatana-jhāna.
- vi) Some other person (of similar intelligence), without taking the colour of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on external forms (as kaṣiṇa objects) that are yellow, with a yellow colour, yellow hue, or like Bārāṇasī fabric with a smooth finish on both sides, which is yellow and has a yellow colour, yellow hue. He concentrates on these external forms that are yellow, with a yellow colour, yellow hue, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on them, gains mastery over them, and thus dwells in appanā-jhāna. After emerging from the jhānic absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the sixth abhibhāyatana-jhāna.

- vii) Some other person (of similar intelligence), without taking the colour of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on external forms (as kaṣiṇa objects) that are red, with a red colour, red hue, like a flower of the tree Pentapetes phoenicea (baṇḍhu jīvaka) which is red, with a red colour, red hue, or like Bārāṇasī fabric with smooth finish on both sides, which is red and has a red colour, red hue. He concentrates on these external forms that are red, with a red colour, red hue, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on them, gains mastery over them, and thus dwells in appanā-jhāna. After emerging from the jhānic absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the seventh abhibhāyatana-jhāna.
- viii) Some other person (of similar intelligence), without taking the colour of his body as an object of preliminary concentration, concentrates on external forms (as kaṣiṇa objects) that are white, with a white colour, white hue, like the morning star which is white, with a white colour, white hue, or like Bārāṇasī fabric with a smooth finish on both sides which is white and has a white colour, white hue. He concentrates on these external forms that are white, with a white colour, white hue, as objects of preliminary concentration. His mind duly gets fixed on them, gains mastery over them, and thus dwells in appanā-jhāna. After emerging from the jhānic absorption, he is aware that he knows and sees these forms. This is the eighth abhibhāyatana-jhāna.

(The discourse is not yet ended)

(Abhibhāyatana-jhāna: Abhibhū, overcoming opposite external states such as hindrances (āyatana); a state of ecstatic bliss (jhāna). It is the jhāna that is possible for those with very sharp intellect who can achieve concentration quickly and thereby overcome all hindrances, and who are able to deal with either a small object or a big object of meditation, and gain mastery over it without difficulty.)

To achieve the abhibhāyatana-jhāna, a yogi may begin the preliminary or preparatory concentration by taking an internal form, i.e. by concentrating on a certain part of his own body or an external form.

If he begins with an internal form he may choose any one of the four colours, viz., dark-blue, yellow, red and white — that consist in the various parts of his own body. For example, if he concentrates on the dark-blue colour, he may concentrate on either his hair, or bile, or the pupil of the eye and impress his mind with the dark-blue colour, thinking, ‘Dark-blue, dark-blue’. If he concentrates on the yellow colour, he may concentrate on either the fat, the skin, the top of the hand, or the top of the foot, or the yellowish surface of the eye-ball and impress his mind with the yellow colour, thinking, ‘Yellow, yellow’. If he concentrates on the red colour, he may concentrate on either the flesh, the blood, the tongue, or the reddish surface of the eye-ball and impress his mind with the red colour, thinking, ‘Red, red’. If he concentrates on the white colour, he may concentrate on either the bone, the teeth, the finger nails, toe nails, or the whitish surface of the eye-ball, and impress his mind with the white colour, thinking, ‘White, white’.

Internal forms can help set up only the preliminary concentration (parikamma), and not the full concentration or appanā-bhāvanā. The after image or reflex image that the yogi obtains after achieving the preliminary concentration is not sufficiently clear. To get the necessary unblemished reflex image (paṭi bhāga nimitta), the yogi has to shift his object of meditation from an internal form to an external form. Then only can he get the desired sign or reflex image that can upgrade his concentration till he attains threshold concentration (upacāra) and full concentration (appanā) by stages.

The yogi, who begins the preliminary concentration by taking an external form as an object of meditation, can fulfil all the three stages of concentration (i.e. the preliminary stage (parikamma-bhāvanā), the threshold stage (upacāra-bhāvanā) and the jhānic stage (appanā-bhāvanā).

The objects of concentration may either be small or large. For the yogi, who can achieve the abhibhāyatana-jhāna, is of very keen intellect so that he does not find any difficulty on account of the size of object of concentration. It is like that of a person of good appetite who can eat a small amount or a big amount without difficulty. Whether the object of concentration is small or big, the yogi of this calibre achieves threshold concentration quickly and then immediately attains appanā-jhāna, thus overcoming all opposing mental states such as hindrances.

Regarding the first four of the eight abhibhāyatana-jhānas, a small form, as object of concentration, is suitable for yogi who are ruminative in nature (vitakka-carita). A big form, as object of concentration, is suitable for yogi who have a bewildered nature (moha-carita). An external form of good colour is suitable for yogi who are irritable by nature (dosa-carita). An external form of bad colour is suitable for yogi who have a strong inclination towards sensuous desire (rāga-carita).

These abhibhāyatana jhānas were taught by the Buddha out of His own experience. As a matter of fact, He had practised them innumerable times. To some people outside the Buddha's Teaching, an indefinite object can be quite daunting to be taken as a proper object of concentration, for an indefinite object may be as vast as the entire physical setting to the world of living things. As for the Buddha the extent of object of concentration is infinite. Nothing whatever can therefore daunt the Buddha's mind. In discoursing on the eight abhibhāyatana-jhānas to Venerable Ānanda, the Buddha intended to let the venerable disciple understand the fearless nature of the Buddha.

“Ānanda,” the Buddha continued, “the Tathāgata, who has dwelt in the eight abhibhāyatana-jhānas of such nature and has emerged from them, has no fear or dread at all. That being so, how could anyone say that the Tathāgata was afraid of Māra who came to Him alone? Ānanda, in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, the Tathāgata did so fearlessly, with mindfulness and clear comprehension.”

(These words occur in the Pakiṇṇaka Dhamma desanā Pāli which was not recited at the Great Council but was quoted by the Commentaries.)

The Eight Stages of Release, Vimokkha

Then the Buddha without any pause continued to the next subject, on the eight stages of release (vimokkha), in His discourse to the Venerable Ānanda thus:

“Ānanda, there are eight stages of release (vimokkha). These are:

- i) Having attained jhāna by contemplating on one's own body, the yogi contemplates external forms as kaṣiṇa objects. This is the first Release.
- ii) Not taking any internal object, i.e. without contemplating on one's own body, the yogi contemplates external forms (as kaṣiṇa objects). This the second Release.
- iii) The yogi contemplates the brightness and clarity (subha) of the object of contemplation. This is the third Release.
- iv) Having completely transcended all forms of perception to corporeality (rūpa-saññā), all forms of consciousness arising out of contact between sense and sense object (paṭigha-saññā), having disappeared and completely disregarding all other forms of multifarious consciousness (nānatta-saññā), the yogi, contemplating "that space is infinite", achieves concentration on that object of contemplation, and dwells in ākāśānañcāyatana-jhāna. This is the fourth Release.
- v) Having clearly advanced beyond the jhāna of Infinity of Space, the yogi, contemplating "that Consciousness is infinite," achieves concentration on that object of contemplation, and dwells in viññāṇaṇcāyatana-jhāna. This the fifth Release.
- vi) Having clearly advanced beyond the jhāna of the Infinity of Consciousness, the yogi, contemplating "that nothing is there," achieves concentration on that object of contemplation, and dwells in ākīñcañāyatana-jhāna. This is the sixth Release.

vii) Having clearly advanced beyond the jhāna of nothingness, the yogi, contemplating the subtle consciousness, achieves concentration on it, and dwells in the nevasaññā-nāsaññāyatana-jhāna. This is the seventh Release.

viii) Having clearly advanced beyond the jhāna of Neither-Consciousness-nor-Non-Consciousness, the yogi achieves and dwells in sustained attainment of Cessation in which all forms of Consciousness and sensation cease. This is the eighth Release.

“Ānanda, these are the eight stages of Release.”

(The discourse not ended yet.)

(Vimokkha means a total freedom from hindrances and opposing mental states that shroud the mind, a cultured state of ecstatic bliss which maybe likened to the peaceful repose of a child in his father's chest. This freedom or release lasts as long as the jhāna lasts. Vimokkha also means unity of mind and object of meditation unhampered by any other thought.)

Of those eight vimokkhas the first three are the jhāna of the fine material sphere (rūpāvacara-jhānas).

Of these three, the first vimokkha, the jhāna of the Fine Material Sphere, is achieved by concentrating on internal as well as external objects. The second is the jhāna of the Fine Material Sphere, is achieved by concentrating on external objects. The third is achieved by concentrating on material objects or kasiṇas of very clear and pure colour, namely: nīla, pīta, lohita, adāta (dark-blue, yellow (golden), red, white). While the yogi is dwelling in this third stage of jhāna, he does not have such a thought as: “This is exquisite,” and yet since his mind gets fixed on exquisite objects, it appears as if he is entertaining such a thought. Hence the text describes it: “He is concentrating that this is exquisite.”

The four successive vimokkhas — the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, and the seventh — refer to the four jhānas of the Non-Material Sphere (Arūpa-jhānas). These four arūpa-jhāna are called vimokkha because they are entirely free from perceptions of corporeality, and also because the yogi's mind is in complete unity with the object of meditation, unhampered by any other thought.

The eighth vimokkha refers to Nirodha-samāpatti, It is called Release because while one dwells in nirodha-samāpatti, all mental phenomena, headed by perception and sensation, cease, i.e. the mental process is suspended altogether, and along with it, mind-born corporeality also ceases, so that one is totally free from being a conditioned state. This cessation of the four mental aggregates and mind-born corporeality lasts during Nirodha-samāpatti.

For those persons who find pleasure in the woeful round of rebirth and are satisfied with their sentient existence in the three sphere, Release is a dreadful idea. As for the Buddha, it was a very pleasant thing to dwell in Release. He has no fear to experience Release. The Buddha discoursed on the eight stages of Release to let the Venerable Ānanda understand the fearless nature of the Buddha.

“Ānanda,” the Buddha continued, “the Tathāgata who has dwelt in the eight stages of Release and has emerged from them, has no fear or dread at all. That being so, how could anyone say that the Tathāgata was afraid of Māra who came to him alone? Ānanda, in relinquishing the life-maintaining mental process, the Tathāgata did so fearlessly, with mindfulness and clear comprehension.” (These also are the Buddha's words to Ānanda, as continued in the Pakiṇṇaka Dhamma desanā).

The Buddha relates The Whole Story about The Relinquishing of The Life-maintaining Mental Process

Having discoursed on the eight stages of Release, the Buddha continued His discourse without letting Venerable Ānanda to say anything:

“Ānanda, on one occasion, soon after I attained Enlightenment (in the eighth week after the Enlightenment), I was staying at the foot of the goat-herd's banyan tree, near the bank of the Nerañjarā river, in Uruveḷa forest. At that time Māra the Evil One approached Me and standing at a certain place, said to Me thus:

‘Let the Bhagavā realize Parinibbāna now, let the Well-Spoken One pass away! Venerable Sir, it is time now for the Bhagavā to pass away.’

“Ānanda, when this was said, I replied to Māra the Evil One thus:

‘O Evil One, I shall not pass away so long as my disciple, the bhikkhus, are not yet well versed in the Doctrine, not yet well disciplined (in the threefold Training), not yet sure of themselves in the righteousness of their conduct, not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the Teaching, not yet able to practise according to the Teaching leading to the Supramundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice (i.e. the noble Life of Purity), not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their Teacher's doctrine that they had learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful Teaching.’

‘O Evil One, so long as my female disciples, the bhikkhunīs...(repeat p1 & p2 below)

‘O Evil One, so long as my lay disciples...(repeat p1 & p2 below)

‘O Evil One, so long as my female lay-disciples (p1:) are not yet well versed in the Doctrine, not yet well disciplined (in the threefold Training), not yet sure of themselves in the righteousness of their conduct, not yet possessed of wide knowledge, not yet able to memorize the Teaching, not yet able practise according to the Teaching, leading to Supramundane, not yet able to take up the proper practice (i.e. the noble Life of Purity), not yet settled in their practice; not yet able to expound, to set forth, to show, to establish, to elucidate, to analyse, or to make evident their Teacher's Doctrine that they had learnt; so long as they are not yet able to thoroughly refute on righteous grounds such other doctrines as may arise, and expound the wonderful Teaching.

(p2:) ‘O Evil One, I shall not pass away so long as this Teaching of Mine which is the Practice of Purity is not yet sufficiently developed among the disciples, not yet prosperous, widespread, reached the multitudes, and renowned, to the extent that it can be thoroughly made known by wise devas and humans.’

“Ānanda, Māra the Evil One, just now came to Me at the Cāpāta Shrine, and standing at a suitable place, again addressed Me thus:

‘Venerable Sir, let the Bhagavā realize Parinibbāna now, let the Well Spoken one pass away! Venerable Sir, it is time now for the Bhagava to pass away.

‘Venerable Sir, the Bhagavā had said to me thus: ‘O Evil One, I shall not pass away so long as my disciples the bhikkhus...(p)...my female disciples the bhikkhunīs,...(p)...my male lay disciples...(p)... my female lay disciples...(p)...O Evil One, I shall not pass away so long as this Teaching of mine which is the practice of Purity is not yet sufficiently established among the disciples, not yet prosperous, widespread, reached the multitudes, and renowned, to the extent that it can be thoroughly made known by wise devas and humans.

‘Venerable Sir, now that the Bhagava's Teaching which is the practice of Purity is sufficiently established among the disciples, is now prosperous, widespread, has reached the multitudes, and is renowned, to the extent that it can be thoroughly made known by wise devas and humans.

‘Venerable Sir, let the Bhagavā realize Parinibbāna now, let the Well Spoken One pass away! Venerable Sir, it is time now for the Bhagavā to pass away.’

“Ānanda, on being requested thus, I said to Māra: ‘O Evil One, don't you worry: the Parinibbāna of the Tathāgata will not be long in coming, three months hence the Tathāgata will realize Parinibbāna.’

“Ānanda, today at the Cāpāta shrine, the Tathāgata has decided, mindfully and with deliberation, to give up the life-maintaining mental process (three months from now).”

Thus related the Buddha the whole story about the relinquishing of the life-maintaining mental process.

The Venerable Ānanda entreats The Buddha to live on

When the Buddha said this, the Venerable Ānanda entreated Him thus:

“Venerable Sir, may the Bhagavā, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, wellbeing and happiness of devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live the maximum life span! May the Well-Spoken One live the maximum life span!”

Thereupon the Buddha said:

“Enough, Ānanda, Do not implore the Tathāgata now. The time for such entreaty is past.”

For a second time the Venerable Ānanda repeated his entreaty and the Buddha rejected it in the same words. When for a third time he repeated his entreaty the Buddha said to him:

“Do you have faith in the Enlightenment wisdom (Bodhi-ñāṇa) of the Tathāgata?”

“Yes, I do, Venerable Sir.”

“Why, then, in spite of your belief, do you persist entreating Me thrice?”

“Venerable Sir, I have been told by the Bhagavā Himself thus:

‘Ānanda, whoever has cultivated, practised, used as a medium, taken as his basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the Four bases of Psychic Power (iddhipāda) could, if he so wishes, live the maximum life span or even beyond the maximum life span. Ānanda, the Tathāgata has cultivated, practised, used as a medium, taken as His basis, kept up, mastered, and fully developed the Four Bases of Psychic Power. Therefore, Ānanda, the Tathāgata could, if He so wishes, live the maximum life span or even beyond the maximum life span.’ (Venerable Sir, it is on account of those words of the Bhagavā that I make the appeal thrice).”

“Do you believe that, Ānanda?”

“Yes, Venerable Sir, I do.”

“Ānanda, although the Tathāgata thus gave clear hints, you failed to grasp them. It never occurred to you to entreat the Bhagavā: ‘May the Bhagavā, for the welfare of mankind, for the benefit, wellbeing and happiness of devas and humans, out of compassion for the world, live the maximum life span! May the Well-Spoken One live the maximum life span!’ Therefore, Ānanda, this failure to entreat Me then is your doing, your own omission.

“Ānanda, if you had entreated Me then, the Tathāgata might have refused the entreaty twice but might have acceded to it on the third time. Therefore, Ānanda, this failure to entreat Me then is your own doing, your own omission.”

The Buddha relates Similar Instances of Omission on The Past of Ānanda to allay His Sorrow

(1) “Ānanda, on one occasion, I was staying on the mountain abode on the Gijjhakuṭa hill in Rājagaha. (p1:) At that time I had said to you: ‘Ānanda, pleasant is the city of Rājagaha. Ānanda, pleasant is the Gijjhakūṭa hill. “Ānanda, if you had entreated Me then, the Tathāgata might have refused the entreaty twice but might have acceded to it on the third time. Therefore, Ānanda, this failure to entreat the Bhagavā then is your own doing, your own omission.”

(The Buddha related the fifteen previous instances of Ānanda's failure to entreat Him to continue to live. That latest occasion, the sixteenth, took place at the Cāpāla shrine. All these cases of omission were pointed out here by the Buddha to attenuate the sorrow Ānanda was feeling at that time. Of course, Ānanda's failure on all these various occasions was due to Māra's mischief.)

“Ānanda, have I not previously told you that it is in the very nature of things most near and dear to us that we must part with them somehow, even while we are living, or when death divides us, or when we are of different planes of existence? Ānanda, in this matter, how could one expect anything that has the nature of arising, of appearing, of being conditioned, and of dissolution, not to disintegrate? It is not possible for anyone to wish so.

“Ānanda, the Tathāgata has discarded, thrown up, given up, abandoned, thrown away, and relinquished the life-maintaining mental process. And the Tathāgata has spoken out in no uncertain terms that the Parinibbāna of the Tathāgata will not be long in coming, that three months hence the Tathāgata will realize Parinibbāna. There is no possibility of the Tathāgata, for the sake of living, to go back on His word. Come, Ānanda, let us go to the pinnacled hall at the Mahāvana forest.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” assented Ānanda.

Then the Buddha, accompanied by the Venerable Ānanda, went to the pinnacled hall at the Mahāvana forest. There, He said to him: “Ānanda, go and summon all bhikkhus living in Vesālī to come and assemble in the assembly hall.” Ānanda caused all the bhikkhus living in Vesālī to gather in the Assembly Hall. Then he went to the Buddha, made obeisance to Him, and standing in a certain place, reported: “Venerable Sir, the bhikkhus are assembled. May the Bhagavā go to them as and when He wishes.”

Thirty-seven Factors of The Perpetuation of The Teaching

Then the Buddha went to the assembly hall, took His seat prepared for Him, and addressed the bhikkhus as follows:

“Bhikkhus, the doctrines which I have perceived through Magga-insight and which I have expounded to you should be mastered, resorted to, cultivated, put to constant practice. If you master, resort to, cultivate and constantly practise these doctrines, this Teaching, which is the practice of Purity, will endure long and perpetuate itself, thus making for the welfare of mankind, the preservation of the world, the benefit, wellbeing and happiness of devas and humans.

These doctrines are:

- (a) the Four Methods of Steadfast Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna);
- (b) the Four Supreme Efforts (Sammāpadāna);
- (c) the Four Bases of Psychic Power (Iddhipāda);
- (d) the Five Faculties (Indriya);
- (e) the Five Powers (Bala);
- (f) the Seven Factors of Enlightenment (Bojjhaṅga);
- (g) the Ariya Path of Eight Constituents (Ariya-magga);

[These are the Thirty-Seven Constituents of Enlightenment (Bodhipakkhiya).]

“Bhikkhus, these thirty-seven doctrines (Constituents of Enlightenment) which I have perceived through magga-insight and which I have expounded to you should be mastered, resorted to, cultivated, and put to constant practice. If you master, resort to, cultivate and constantly practise these doctrines, this Teaching, which is the Practice of Purity, will endure long and perpetuate itself, thus making for the welfare of mankind, the preservation of the world, the benefit, wellbeing and happiness of devas and humans.”

Then the Buddha further said to the bhikkhus:

“Now, look bhikkhus, I exhort you: Decay is inherent in all compounded things, physical or mental. With mindfulness and diligence strive (towards the goal of liberation). The Parinibbāna of the Tathāgata will take place before long: three months hence the Tathāgata will realize Parinibbāna.”

Having said this, the Buddha further spoke these words (in verse):

My age is now quite ripe (having, turned eighty).
 Only a little (just three months) of My life remains.
 I shall have to depart, leaving you behind.
 I have made a refuge of Myself.

“Bhikkhus, never be forgetful, be possessed of mindfulness, be pure in morality. Keep your mind collected, think right, and watch your mind ever closely against defilements.

“Bhikkhus, in this Teaching, (the Doctrine and Discipline) he who remains holding fast the Good Doctrine will be able to get rid of the cycle of rebirths and make an end of all ills (dukkha).”

The Buddha looked back like A Noble Tusker

Then the Buddha, rearranging His robes in the morning, He took His alms-bowl and great robe and entered the city of Vesālī for the alms-round. After the alms-round, after having had His meal, He left the place of His meal. On leaving the place, He turned around and looked back towards Vesālī, like a tusker looking back. Then He said to Venerable Ānanda, “Ānanda, this will be the last time the Tathāgata looks on Vesālī. Come, Ānanda, let us go to Bhaṇḍa village.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” assented Ānanda.

(In this matter, the statement about the Buddha “turning around to look back” would need some comment. The Buddha's anatomy is unique among human beings. Ordinary people have bones joined together by touching at the ends (i.e., end to end). Paccekabuddhas have bones joined by hooks formed at the end of each bone (i.e., hook to hook). The Buddha's bone structure is a set of chain-links (i.e., ring to ring). With the exception of the arms, which consist of twelve big joints and fingers and toes with smaller joints, all other bones are joined as chain-links. That is why the Buddha is endowed with the physical might equal to the strength of ten thousand million tuskers or that of a hundred thousand million men of ordinary strength.

The bone structure being of chain-links, the Buddha's neck cannot turn back by itself alone. Therefore, when the Buddha wants to look back, He has to turn back the whole body, as an elephant does.)

Although it was the Buddha's intention to turn around to look back, due to the intervention of (the guardian spirit of) the great earth, that act was not actually carried out. For the great earth, as if unable to bear the sight of the Supreme Being turning around, rotated itself so that the Buddha stood with His person facing Vesālī. The great earth intervened as if it were saying: “O Great Lord, Your fulfilling of the Perfections has been unique. So why should there be the need for the Bhagavā to trouble Himself to turn around physically just to look back as with other ordinary people?” In any case, the expression that “the Bhagavā turned around to look back like a tusker” was used with reference to the Buddha's intention to do so.

It might be asked: “Why was Vesālī alone being mentioned as the place the Bhagavā has His last look at, and not other places, such as Sāvathī, Rājagaha, Nālanda, Pāṭali village, Koṭi village, Nātika village that He had made His last visit? Did the Bhagavā not look back on those places as well?”

The answer is, No. If the Buddha were to look back on these various places, the uniqueness of the occasion would be lost.

There is also another reason: Vesālī was a doomed city. It was going to be destroyed after three year from the Buddha's last visit there. The Buddha saw that if He made a turning around to look back like a noble tusker (on Vesālī), that place would be commemorated by the Licchavī princes, “The Noble Tuskers-Turning-Around Shrine” which would bring great benefits to them for a long time. That was the object of the Buddha's decision to turn around to look back on Vesālī.

The Buddha's Discourse at Bhaṇḍu Village

Then the Buddha, accompanied by His large company of bhikkhus, visited Bhaṇḍu village and took up His residence there. During His sojourn there He discoursed to the bhikkhus as follows:

“Bhikkhus, it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of four Principles that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the long course of the round of existences (saṃsāra), going through from existence to existence. And the Four Principles are as follows:

- i) Bhikkhus, (p1:) it is through not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the Ariya Morality, the virtue of the Noble One (Ariya Sīla) (p2:) that

I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the long course of the round of existences, going through from existence to existence.

- ii) Bhikkhus,.... (repeat p1: above) the Ariya Concentration (Ariya Samādhī)...(repeat p2: above)
- iii) Bhikkhus,....(repeat p1 above) the Ariya Wisdom (Ariya Paññā)...(repeat p2: above)
- iv) Bhikkhus, it is though not having proper understanding and penetrative knowledge of the Ariya Liberation (Ariya Vimutti) that I, as well as yourselves, have had to fare along the long course of the round of existences, going through existence to existence.

“Bhikkhus, I have properly understood and gained penetrative knowledge of the Ariya Morality; I have properly understood and gained penetrative knowledge of the Ariya Concentration; ... of the Ariya Wisdom;... of the Ariya Liberation. Craving for existence has been completely eradicated so that craving which drags one to renewed existence is extinct in Me. Now there will be no more rebirth.”

Then the Buddha further said to the bhikkhus (in verse):

“(Bhikkhus;) Buddha Gotama, of vast followership, has correctly known these Principles of Supreme Morality, Concentration, Wisdom and Liberation.

“Having gained penetrative knowledge of them through Magga Insight, He has (out of compassion) expounded them to the bhikkhus. The Teacher (of deva and humans), endowed with the fivefold Eye of Wisdom, who has quelled all the fires of defilements, has made an end of all ills (dukkha) (in himself as well as his arahat disciples).”

During His sojourn at Bhaṇḍu village the Buddha, considering His approaching death, discoursed to the bhikkhus of the repeated theme as follows:

“Such is Morality, such is Concentration, such is Wisdom. Concentration developed through Morality is efficacious and productive. Wisdom developed through Concentration is efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through Wisdom is thoroughly liberated from the moral taints, namely, the taint of sense-desire, the taint of hankering after continued existence, and the taint of ignorance of the four Ariya Truths.”

The Discourse at Bhoga on The Four Great Authorities (Mahāpadesas)

Then after staying at Bhaṇḍu village for as long as He wished, the Buddha said to the Venerable Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Hatthi village,... to Amba village, ... to Jamba village, and thence the town of Bhoga.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” assented Ānanda. And the Buddha, accompanied by a large following of bhikkhus, arrived at the town of Bhoga, where He dwelled at the Ānanda shrine. During His sojourn there, the Buddha discoursed to the bhikkhus on the Four Great Authorities (i.e. principles to assess the doctrines that are being alluded to persons of high esteem):

- i) “Bhikkhus, in this Teaching, if a bhikkhu should say thus: ‘Friends, I have heard this exposition from the mouth of the Bhagavā, such and such is the Doctrine (Dhamma); such and such is the Rule of Bhikkhu Conduct (Vinaya); such and such is the Teaching of the Buddha.’

“Bhikkhus, the words of that bhikkhu should not be readily accepted or readily rejected. The words and phrases stated by him (attributed to the Buddha) should be carefully noted. They should be collated with the Suttanta and compared with the rules of the Vinaya.

“If, on collation with the Suttanta and comparison with the Vinaya rules, the words and phrases, as stated by the bhikkhu, do not agree with the Suttanta or are not in line with the Vinaya rules, then it must be concluded that ‘This certainly is not what the Bhagavā said. It is something wrongly learnt by the bhikkhu.’ And concluding thus, bhikkhus, those words should be rejected and ignored.

“If, on the other hand, the words and phrases, as stated by the bhikkhu, on being collated with the Suttanta and compared with the Vinaya rules, are found to agree with the Suttanta and are in line with the Vinaya rules, then it must be concluded that, ‘This certainly is what the Bhagavā said. It is something correctly learnt by the bhikkhu.’ Bhikkhus, remember well this first directive principle regarding assertions attributed to a great authority (here, the Buddha).”

- ii) “And then, bhikkhus, in the Teaching, if a bhikkhu should say thus: ‘Here is such and such monastery where the community of bhikkhus with a bhikkhu-elder in charge, I have heard (this exposition) from that particular community of bhikkhus: such and such is the Doctrine; such and such is the Vinaya; such and such is the Teaching.’

“Bhikkhus, the words of that bhikkhu should not be readily accepted or readily rejected. The words and phrases stated by him (attributed to the Sangha of a certain monastery) should be carefully noted. They should be collated with the Suttanta, and compared with the rules of the Vinaya.

“If, on collation with the Suttanta and comparison with the Vinaya rules, the words and phrases, as stated by the bhikkhu, do not agree with the Suttanta or are not in line with the Vinaya rules, then it must be concluded that, ‘This certainly is not what the Bhagavā said. It is something wrongly learnt by the bhikkhu.’ And concluding thus, bhikkhus, those words should be rejected and ignored.

“If, on the other hand, the words and phrases as stated by the bhikkhu, on being collated with the Suttanta and compared with the Vinaya rules, are found to agree with the Suttanta and are in line with the Vinaya rules, then it must be concluded that, ‘This certainly is what the Bhagavā said, it is something correctly learnt by the bhikkhu.’ Bhikkhus, remember this second directive principle regarding assertions attributed to a great authority.”

- iii) “And then, bhikkhus, in the Teaching, if a bhikkhu should say thus: ‘There is such and such monastery where many bhikkhu-elders of wide learning who have memorized the Pāli (Text), who abide by the Doctrine and the Vinaya rules, and who are thoroughly versed in the Fundamental Precepts for bhikkhus (Pātimokkha), I have heard (this exposition) from these bhikkhu-elders themselves: such and such is the Doctrine; such and such is the Vinaya; such and such is the Teaching.’

“Bhikkhus, the words of that bhikkhu should not be readily accepted or readily rejected. The words and phrases stated by him (attributed to the bhikkhu-elders) should be carefully noted. They should be collated with the Suttanta and compared with the rules of the Vinaya.

“If, on collation with the Suttanta and comparison with the Vinaya rules, the words and phrases, as stated by the bhikkhus, do not agree with the Suttanta or are not in line with the Vinaya rules, then it must be concluded that, ‘This certainly is not what the Bhagava said. It is something wrongly learnt by the bhikkhu.’ And concluding thus, bhikkhus, these words should be rejected and ignored.

“If, on the other hand, the words and phrases as stated by the bhikkhu, on being collated with the Suttanta and compared with the Vinaya rules, are found to agree with the Suttanta and are in line with the Vinaya rules, then it must be concluded that, ‘This certainly is what the Bhagavā said. It is something correctly learnt by the bhikkhu.’ Bhikkhus, remember well this third directive principle regarding assertions attributed to a great authority.”

- iv) “And then, bhikkhus, in this Teaching, if a bhikkhu should say thus: ‘There is a certain bhikkhu-elder of wide learning who has memorized the Pāli (Texts), who abides by the Doctrine and the Vinaya rules, and who is thoroughly versed in the Fundamental Precepts for bhikkhus. I have heard (this exposition) from that bhikkhu himself: such and such in the Doctrine; such and such is the Vinaya; such and such is the Teaching.’

“Bhikkhus, the words of that bhikkhu should not the readily accepted or readily rejected.

The words and phrases stated by him (attributed to the learned bhikkhu-elder) should be carefully noted. They should be collated with the Suttanta and compared with the rules of the Vinaya.

“If, on collation with the Suttanta and comparison with the Vinaya rules, the words and phrases, as stated by the bhikkhus, do not agree with the Suttanta or are not in line with the Vinaya rules, then it must be concluded that, ‘This certainly is not what the Bhagavā said. It is something wrongly learnt by the bhikkhu.’ And concluding thus, bhikkhus, these words should be rejected and ignored.

“If, on the other hand, the words and phrases, as stated by the bhikkhu, on being collated with the Suttanta and are in line with the Vinaya rules, then it must be concluded that, ‘This certainly is what the Bhagavā said. It is something correctly learned by the bhikkhu.’ Bhikkhus, remember well this fourth directive principle regarding assertions attributed to a great authority.”

“Bhikkhus, remember well these four directive principles regarding assertions attributed to the Great Authorities.”

Miscellaneous Points on The Subject

On this subject of the Four Great Authorities, the Commentary draws the attention of the reader to miscellaneous points touching on it. A brief note follows:

Herein,

- i) there are the four directive principles concerning the four great authorities; (in Dīgha Nikāya)
- ii) four directive Principles on the subject as taught in Vinaya Mahāvagga;
- iii) four types of answers corresponding to four types of questions called the four Vyakaraṇas;
- iv) the four Vinayas;
- v) the three Great Councils.

(i) The Four Great Authorities as taught in the Suttanta Piṭka

There are what has been described above.

(ii) The Four Great Authorities as taught in the Vinaya Piṭaka

(Matavagga; 6 Bhesajjakkhandhaka)

Four directive principles are laid down by the Buddha regarding what sort of medicinal preparation is proper for bhikkhus:

- (a) Bhikkhus, a certain item of drug is not specifically mentioned by Me as improper for use by bhikkhus, yet if it tends towards impropriety and rules out any possibility of its propriety, in the light of Vinaya rules, then consider it as being improper for use.
- (b) Bhikkhus, a certain item of drug is not specifically mentioned by Me as improper for use by bhikkhus, and if, in the light of Vinaya rules, it tends towards propriety and rules out any possibility of its impropriety, then consider it as being proper for use.
- (c) Bhikkhus, a certain item of drug is not specifically mentioned by Me as proper for use by bhikkhus, and if it tends towards impropriety and rules out any possibility of propriety in the light of Vinaya rules, then consider it as being improper of use.
- (d) Bhikkhus, a certain item of drug is not specifically mentioned by Me as proper for use by bhikkhus, and if it tends towards impropriety and rules out any possibility of propriety in the light of Vinaya rules, then consider it as being improper of use by bhikkhus, and if it tends towards propriety and rules out any possibility of its impropriety in the light of Vinaya rules, then consider it as being proper for use.

(iii) Four Types of Answer

There are four types of answers to match the four types of questions:

- (a) A straight question is answered by a categorical statement, e.g. if the question is: “Is the eye impermanent?” the appropriate answer is: “Yes, the eye is impermanent.”
- (b) A question requiring an analysis to answer e.g. “Is the eye the only thing that is impermanent?” The answer needs an analysis: “The eye is not the only thing that is impermanent: the ear also is impermanent; the tongue also is impermanent; etc.”
- (c) A question to be replaced by question, e.g. “Is the ear to be regarded as being the same as the eye? Is the eye to be regarded as being the same as the ear?” The appropriate reply is: “In what sense is this question put?” Then if the inquirer says: “In the sense of seeing: is the ear capable of seeing as the eye is?” The answer then is: “No, it is not.” If again, the inquirer says: “In respect of its impermanence: is the ear the same as the eye is?” The answer then is: “Yes, it is.”
- (d) The type of question that is ignored, e.g. To believers in attā, there is java (life), sarīra (body), which are mere names but which do not exist in the ultimate sense, Therefore if the question is, “Is life the same as the body?” the proper answer is silence because one understands that the Buddha Himself ignores such a question. The question is of the nature of saying, “the son of a barren woman”, which is absurd.

(iv) The Four Vinayas.

- (a) Sutta: here refers to the Three Piṭakas.
- (b) Suttānuloma: the four Mahāpadesas (Great Authorities) described in the Vinaya and the four Mahāpadesas described in the Suttanta.
- (c) Ācariyavāda: miscellaneous exposition in elucidation of the doctrines of the Buddha that were made even during His lifetime at different places. Since they explain the Pāli texts, they were also called Commentaries (aṭṭhakathā). At the great Councils, the bhikkhu-elders recited the Pāli first and at the end of it, they prescribed the respective Commentaries to each division of the texts as the regular syllabus for elucidation. These learned sayings which were miscellaneous discourses as well as Commentaries, being written by learned teachers, come to be known also as Ācariyavāda. These learned observations or treatises which are referred to by three different names, which are Ācariyavāda, Aṭṭhakathā, Pakiṇṇakadesanā, were carried by the Venerable Mahinda to Sri Lanka. The Sri Lanka bhikkhu-elders translated them into Sinhalese to ensure, for Sinhalese bhikkhus, the tradition against doctrines that might be introduced by other sects later. The Venerable Mahā Buddhaghosa studied the Sinhalese Aṭṭhakathā, (i.e. the Mūla Pakiṇṇaka) cleared up repetitive statements and condensed them wherever suitable, classified them under suitable headings which were appropriate to the Piṭaka texts, elucidating wherever necessary, and thereby produced a new Commentary in Māgadhī, adding the traditional views held by bhikkhu-elder (Theravāda) which came to be called ‘own views’ (attanomati), wherever necessary. Thus, Ācariyavāda, the third of the four Vinayas, is for practical purposes as used today, refers to (This new) Commentary.
- (d) Attanomati: this is a reference to the ‘own views’ i.e. considered opinions held by bhikkhu-elders after following the principles contained in the Sutta, Suttānuloma and Ācariyavāda. Attanomate is also known as Theravāda, the doctrines upheld traditionally by bhikkhu-elders. Thus these four Vinayas are Sutta, Suttānuloma, Ācariyavāda and Attanomati, should be noted..

(v) The Three Great Buddhist Councils.

- (a) The first Great Council of five hundred arahats headed by the Venerable Mahā Kassapa.
- (b) The Second Great Council of seven thousand arahats headed by the Venerable Mahā Yasa.
- (c) The Third Great Council of one thousand arahats headed by the Venerable Mahā Moggaliputta.

These are the three great official Buddhist Councils.

First, remember, (i) the four Great Authorities as taught in the Suttanta, (ii) the four Great Authorities as taught in the Vinaya, (iii) the four types of Questions and Answers, (iv) the four Vinayas and (v) the three Great official Councils.

Then apply them to practical problems thus:

- (i) If a bhikkhu says: “This is the Doctrine, this is the Vinaya, this is the Buddha's Teaching,” citing the authority of the Buddha, or of the Sangha, or of a number of bhikkhu-elders, or a certain bhikkhu-elder. To decide the veracity of his statement, apply the test of the four Great Authorities as taught in the Suttanta: if only the statement accords with these four Great Directive Principles, the statement should be taken as true. Otherwise it must be regarded as mere hearsay, a case of irresponsible talk.
- (ii) Where a certain problem arises as to “whether a certain thing is proper for a bhikkhu or not,” the test is the Four Great Authorities as taught in the Vinaya Mahāvagga. (The Commentary on the Vinaya Mahāvagga should be consulted for detailed information on the subject). If, on examining the subject of controversy or doubt in the light of the Four Great Authorities taught in the Vinaya Piṭaka, it tends to agree with the rules, it should be accepted as being proper; otherwise it should be considered as being improper.
- (iii) If a question on the Doctrine arise, as illustrated above, the answer should be appropriate to the type of question taught as the four Types of Questions.
- (iv) Of the four Vinayas, if the assertion by someone is part of the Suttanta Piṭaka i.e. as contained in the three Piṭakas approved at the Councils, the statement should not be rejected, for rejection of the Piṭaka amounts to the rejection of the Buddha Himself. If the assertion is a Suttānuloma statement, it should be collated with the Suttanta (i.e. the Pāli Tipiṭaka.) If it agrees with the Suttanta, it should be accepted otherwise it should be rejected. As regards Ariyavāda or the miscellaneous exposition, there is the possibility the commentary not conforming to the Piṭaka due to slackness. Therefore, Āriyavāda should be collated with the Pāli Piṭaka. Only if it agree with the Pāli then it should be accepted; otherwise it should be rejected as something carelessly said. Attanomati (own opinion) is the weakest of authorities. It is to be accepted only if it accords with the Suttanta i.e. the Pāli text.
- (v) If someone quotes a passage as being part of the Pāli, “which had been approved by the Councils”, it must conform to the texts approved at the three Great Councils. If it is not part of the Pāli text approved at the three Great Councils, it is to be regarded as spurious.

While the Buddha was staying at the Ānanda shrine, in the town of Bhoga also, being thoughtful of His approaching death, He exhorted the bhikkhus, where there was occasion to do so, in the following words:

“Such is Morality; such is Concentration; such is Wisdom. Concentration developed through Morality is efficacious and productive. Wisdom developed through Concentration is efficacious and productive. The mind that is developed through Wisdom is thoroughly liberated from the moral taints, namely, the taint of sense desire, the taint of hankering after continued existence, and the taint of ignorance of the Four Ariya Truths.”

The Story of Cunda, The Goldsmith's Son

Then after staying at the town of Bhoga for as long as He wished, the Buddha said to the Venerable Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to Pāvā.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” assented Ānanda. And the Buddha, accompanied by His large following of bhikkhus, went to Pāvā where He dwelled in the Mango grove monastery donated by Cunda, the goldsmith's son.

(Cunda, the goldsmith's son, was a very rich man. From his earlier meeting with the Buddha, he had benefited from His discourse and become a Stream-Winner. He built a big monastery in his mango grove and donated it to the Buddha. This was the last time the Buddha resided at the monastery.)

When Cunda, the goldsmith's son, heard the news that the Buddha had arrived and was staying at his mango grove monastery, he approached Him, made obeisance to Him, and sat in a suitable place. The Buddha pointed out to Cunda, the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorted him to set himself up in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened him in the practice. After listening to His discourse, Cunda, said to the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, may it please the Bhagavā to accept my offering of food for tomorrow together with the company of bhikkhus." The Buddha signified His acceptance by remaining silent.

Cunda, knowing that the Buddha had accepted his request, rose from his seat, and making obeisance to Him and left respectfully. The next day, he had choice foods of hard and soft kinds prepared at his home, including tender pork (sūkara maddava), meat of a wild pig that was neither too old nor too young. "Venerable Sir, it is time (to proceed). The food-offering is ready," he announced to the Buddha.

(Herein, the Pāli word for tender pork (sūkara maddava), is interpreted by some teachers as soft rice boiled with fine differently-tasting cow's milk, while others also say that it means a special food prepared with some delicious and highly nutritive concoction called rasāyana. They say that Cunda had this special meal prepared for the Buddha in the belief that it would not cause the passing away of the Buddha.)

Then in the morning, the Buddha, taking His alms-bowl and robe, went to the house of Cunda, accompanied by the bhikkhus, and sat on the seat prepared for Him.

Having thus seated, the Buddha said to Cunda, the goldsmith's son: "Cunda, you may serve Me the tender pork prepared by you; and you may serve the other food prepared by you to the company of bhikkhus."

"Very well, Venerable Sir," asserted Cunda, and accordingly served the personally prepared tender pork to the Buddha, and the other personally prepared food to the bhikkhu-sangha.

After finishing the meal, the Buddha said to Cunda: "Cunda, bury the remaining tender pork in a pit. I see no one else, besides me, in all the celestial world of devas, māras and Brahmas, or in this human world of samanas and brāhmanas, rulers and men who, should he perchance eat it, could digest it well" thus declared the Buddha categorically.

"Very well, Venerable Sir," assented Cunda and accordingly buried the remaining tender pork in a pit. Then he approached the Buddha, made obeisance to Him, and sat in a suitable place. And the Buddha taught Cunda a discourse on the Doctrine. Then the Buddha rose from His seat and departed.

Thereafter, subsequent to the meal offered by Cunda, the Buddha became afflicted with a severe illness, an acute form of dysentery with discharge of blood, causing great pain near unto death but He bore the pain with mindfulness and clear comprehension, without perturbation.

Then He said to Ānanda: "Come, Ānanda, let us go to Kusināgara."

"Very well, Venerable Sir," assented Ānanda.

(It should be noted here that the dysentery came upon the Buddha not on account of Cunda's food offering. It is meant here that the affliction came merely subsequent to the meal but not because of it. As a matter of fact, Cunda's specially prepared meal strengthened the Buddha. If not for Cunda's highly nourishing food, the Buddha would not be able to withstand the onslaught of the severe illness. Thanks to Cunda's tender pork meal, the Buddha found strength to journey to Kusināgara on foot.)

The Buddha asks Ānanda to fetch Drinking Water

Then the Buddha left the road and went to the foot of a tree. There, He said to Venerable Ānanda: “Ānanda, fold my double-layered robe fourfold and place it on the ground. Ānanda, I am weary. I shall sit down for a while.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” Venerable Ānanda assented and he placed on the ground the double-layered robe folded fourfold. The Buddha sat on the seat thus prepared and said:

- (1) “Ānanda, go and get some drinking water. Ānanda, I am thirsty. I want to have a drink of water.”

The Venerable Ānanda said: “Venerable Sir, five hundred carts have just now crossed the stream. The shallow water is disturbed and is flowing turbid. Venerable Sir, the Kakudhā river is not far off. There the water is clear, sweet, cool and free from muddiness. The river bank is also pleasant and inviting. The Bhagavā may take His drink of water at the Kakudhā river and also may cool His limbs there.”

- (2) “Ānanda, go and get some drinking water. I am thirsty. Ānanda, I am thirsty. I want to have a drink of water.”

The Venerable Ānanda again said: “Venerable Sir, five hundred cans have just crossed the stream. The shallow water is disturbed and is flowing turbid. Venerable Sir, the Kakudhā river is not far off. There the water is clear, sweet, cool and free from muddiness. The river bank is also pleasant and inviting. The Bhagavā may take His drink of water at the Kakudhā river, and also may cool His limbs there.”

- (3) “Ānanda, go and get some drinking water. Ānanda I am thirsty, I want to have a drink of water.”

After being commanded thrice by the Buddha, Ānanda assented: “Very well, Venerable Sir,” and taking the alms-bowl, went to the little stream. Then the shallow water which was flowing turbid after having been disturbed by the caravan, became mysteriously clear, pure and free from muddiness. Thereupon, the Venerable Ānanda bethought himself:

“Wonderful indeed, and marvellous indeed, is the great power of the Tathāgata! This shallow stream which was flowing turbid due to the crossing of the caravan is, on my arrival, flowing clear, pure and free from muddiness.”

With these thoughts of wonderment, the Venerable Ānanda took the drinking water in the alms-bowl, went back to the Buddha, and said:

“Wonderful indeed, Venerable Sir, marvellous indeed, Venerable Sir, is the great power of the Tathāgata! That shallow stream which was flowing turbid due to the crossing of the caravan just now, on my arrival there, was flowing clear, pure and free from muddiness. Now let the Bhagavā drink the water. Let the Well-Spoken One drink the water.”

And the Buddha drank the water.

The Twelve Saṃsāric Debts of The Buddha

In this connection it would seem appropriate to mention briefly the twelve counts of recompense (which might be considered as twelve saṃsāric debts) the Buddha had to meet:

(1) The First Recompense

In His former existence, the Buddha-to-be (Bodhisatta) was a drunkard named Munāḷi. He accosted a Paccekabuddha named Surabhi with a wild accusation: “This man is an immoral person who indulges in sense pleasures in private.”

For that evil verbal action, he was reborn in the realm of continuous suffering (niraya). And in the last existence as the Buddha, He was publicly accused by Sundarī, the wandering female ascetic, as being luscious and having had an affair with her.

(2) The Second Recompense

In a former existence, the Bodhisatta was a disciple, named Nanda, to a Paccekabuddha named Sabbābhīhu. He accused his teacher as a person of loose character.

On account of that evil verbal action, He had to suffer for a hundred thousand years in the Niraya realm. When He was reborn as a human being many times, He was unjustly accused of wrongdoing. In the last existence as the Buddha, He was publicly accused by Ciñjamāna as a wanton person who had caused her pregnancy.

(3) The Third Recompense

The Bodhisatta was once a learned brahmin teacher, who was well versed in the three Vedas, and a person of great esteem. While he was teaching the Vedas in the Mahāvana forest to five hundred pupils, they saw, in the sky, a holy hermit named Bhima coming to the forest by means of psychic powers. (Instead of being inspired) the Bodhisatta told his five hundred pupils that the hermit was a sensuous hypocrite. The pupils, believed in what the teacher had said, spread the teacher's view of the holy hermit while he (hermit) was going alms-collecting.

These five hundred pupils were reborn as bhikkhu-disciples of the Buddha. Due to their slander against Bhima, as the five hundred pupils of the brahmin teacher in their former life, they were falsely accused of murdering Sundarī, the wandering female ascetic, who was actually the victim of the ascetics. It should be noted that an accusation against the disciples of the Buddha amounted to an accusation against the Buddha Himself.

(4) The Fourth Recompense

In a previous existence, the Bodhisatta murdered his half brother on account of covetousness. He threw the younger brother into a ravine and then crushed him with a boulder.

For that evil deed, the Buddha, in His last existence, became the victim of Devadatta's plot against His life. But, since a Buddha is not liable to get killed, He suffered from a rock splinter, which was as a result of a huge boulder being dropped from the hillside by Devadatta. His big toe was internally bruised by the rock splinter.

(5) The Fifth Recompense

In one of His former existences, the Bodhisatta was a scamp and when he met a Paccekabuddha on the way, he gave vent to frolicsome tendencies and threw stones at the Paccekabuddha.

For that evil deed, the Buddha once came under attack by a band of archers sent by Devadatta who meant to kill Him.

(6) The Sixth Recompense

When the Bodhisatta was a mahout, he threatened a Paccekabuddha, who was on His alms-collection, with his elephant, as if to trample on Him.

On account of that misdeed, the Buddha was once threatened with a drunken elephant named Nālāgīri in Rājagaha which was sent (by Devadatta) to trample on Him.

(7) The Seventh Recompense

In one of His former existences, the Bodhisatta was a monarch. Out of kingly conceit, he executed a prisoner (not considering the kammic consequences) personally by piercing him with a spear.

That evil deed brought him down to the realm of continuous suffering for a great many years. In His last existence, the Buddha had to undergo treatment by His big toe being cut open by Jīvaka, the celebrated physician, to heal it (when it was hit by a splinter caused by Devadatta's wicked scheme).

(8) The Eighth Recompense

In a former existence, the Bodhisatta was born into a fisherman's family. He used to take delight in witnessing his relatives hurting and killing the fish. (He did not do the killing himself).

As the result of that evil thought, in His last existence as the Buddha, He often suffered from head-ache. (As for His relatives of that existence, they were reborn as Sakyans who were massacred by Viṭṭhābha).

(9) The Ninth Recompense

When the Bodhisatta was born as a human being during the time of Buddha Phussa's Teaching, he railed the bhikkhu-disciples of the Buddha saying: "You may eat only barley, but not rice."

That vituperation had the consequence. In His last existence, the Buddha having to live on barley meal for the whole of the rains-retreat (vassa) period at the Verañjā brahmin village (where He stayed at the invitation of Brahmin Verañja).

(10) The Tenth Recompense

Once the Bodhisatta was born as a professional boxer when he broke the back of his combatant.

As a consequence of that evil deed, the Buddha, in His last existence, often suffered from back-ache.

(11) The Eleventh Recompense

When the Bodhisatta was a physician in one of his former existences, he purposely administered a drug causing loose bowels to a rich man's son who grudged him his fee.

On account of that evil deed, the Buddha, in His last existence, was afflicted with a severe dysentery with discharge of blood, prior to His passing away.

(12) The Twelfth Recompense

The Bodhisatta was once born as a brahmin named Jotipala. He made blasphemous remarks about Buddha Kassapa saying: "How is it possible that this shaveling is Perfectly Enlightened? Perfect Enlightenment is a most rare thing."

That blasphemy had the consequence of delayed Enlightenment for Him. Other Bodhisattas attained Enlightenment in a matter of days or months, whereas Gotama, the Buddha-to-be, had to go through six painful years in his quest for Truth.

These twelve consequences of the past blunders of the Buddha-to-be were related by the Buddha Himself, vide: Khuddaka Nikāya, Therāpadāna Pāli, 39, Avatāphala Vagga; 10, Pubbakammapiḷḷitika Buddha apādāna.

The Story of Pukkusa, The Malla Prince

While the Buddha was sitting at the foot of the tree after having a drink of water, Pukkusa, a Malla prince, who was a disciple of Āḷāra Kālāma, was on his journey from Kusināra to Pāvā. Seeing the Buddha sitting at the foot of a tree, Pukkusa of the Mallas approached Him, made obeisance to Him, and sat in a suitable place. Then he addressed the Buddha:

"Wonderful it is, Venerable Sir, marvellous it is, Venerable Sir, how the recluses remain in their tranquil state!"

"Venerable Sir, as it happened in the past, Āḷāra Kālāma, while on a journey, left the road and sat down at the foot of a tree by the roadside to spend the day. At that time, five hundred carts passed by, very close to him.

"Venerable Sir, a man who was following behind the five hundred carts went towards Āḷāra Kālāma and asked: 'Sir, did you see five hundred carts pass by?'

(Āḷāra:) 'Friend, I did not see them.'

'Sir, how is it then? Did you hear the noise of those carts?'

'Friend, I did not hear the noise, either.'

'Sir, how is it then? Were you asleep then?'

'Friend, I was not asleep, either.'

'Sir, how is it then? Were you quite conscious then?'

'Yes, friend, I was quite conscious.'

'Sir, you say you did not see nor hear the five hundred carts that passed very close by you even though you were conscious and awake. Yet your double-layered robe is covered all over with dust, isn't it?'

'It is so, friend.'

"Venerable Sir, after having that dialogue with Ājāra Kālāma, that man thought thus: 'Wonderful it is, marvellous it is, that the recluses remain in their tranquil state! This recluse Ājāra, although conscious and awake, did not see nor hear the five hundred carts that passed close by him!' And saying how deeply he revered Ājāra Kālāma, he went away."

Thereupon the Buddha said to Pukkusa of the Mallas:

"Pukkusa, what do you think of this? (i) Someone, though conscious and awake, does not see nor hear the five hundred-carts that pass close by him. (ii) Another person, though conscious and awake, does not see nor hear downpour of rain with rumbling thunder, lightning and crashing thunderbolts (close by him). Now, of these two cases, which is the more difficult to achieve? Which is the more difficult to happen?"

"Venerable Sir," replied Pukkusa, "To remain unseeing and unhearing the passing of carts close by oneself, be it five hundred, six hundred, seven hundred, eight hundred, nine hundred, a thousand, or even a hundred thousand carts, cannot be called difficult (compared to the other case). Indeed, it is much more difficult to remain unseeing and unhearing the downpour of rain with rumbling thunder, lightning and crashing thunderbolts (close by). It is more difficult to happen."

Then the Buddha said:

"Pukkusa, at one time, I was living in a straw hut at the town of Āluma. During that time, there was a downpour of rain with rumbling thunder, lightning and crushing of thunderbolts. A thunderbolt struck near My hut killing four oxen and two cultivators who were brothers.

"Then, Pukkusa, a large number of people came out from the town to see the place where the four oxen and two cultivator brothers were killed. By that time, I had come out of the straw hut and was walking up and down in the open near the hut. A man from that crowd drew near Me, and after making obeisance to Me, stood at a suitable place. I asked that man: 'Friend, why are there many people gathered?'

'Venerable Sir, four oxen and two cultivator brothers were struck by a thunderbolt and killed while it rained heavily with rumbling thunder and lightning. These people have come to see (the damage). But, Venerable Sir, where were You (at that time)?'

'Friend, I have been here all the while.'

'Venerable Sir, how is it, then? Did you see (what happened)?'

'Friend, I did not see it.'

'Venerable Sir, how is it then? Did you here that sound?'

'Friend, I did not hear the sound, either.'

'Venerable Sir, how is it then? Were you asleep?'

'Friend, I was not asleep, either.'

'Venerable Sir, how is it then? Were you conscious?'

'Yes, friend, I was conscious.'

'Venerable Sir, is it that, though conscious and awake, you neither saw nor heard the heavy rain, rumbling thunder and lightning, crashing thunderbolts?'

'That is so, friend.'

"Pukkusa, at the end of the dialogue, the man thought: 'Wonderful it is, marvellous it is that recluses (bhikkhus in this case) remain in their tranquil state! The Bhagavā here, though conscious and awake, did not see nor hear the heavy rain, rumbling thunder and lightning, and crashing thunderbolts? And saying how deeply he revered Me, he made obeisance to Me and went away.”

Pukkusa of The Mallas makes A Special Gift to The Buddha

After the Buddha had said these words, Pukkusa of the Mallas said to Him:

“Venerable Sir, whatever high esteem, I had for Āḷāra Kālāma, I now throw it away (as if I would throw away rubbish), in a strong wind, or let go (as if I would cast some worthless thing) down the rushing stream.

“Venerable Sir, excellent (is the Dhamma)! Venerable Sir, excellent (is the Dhamma)! It is as if, Venerable Sir, that which has been turned over has been turned up, or as if that which has been hidden is revealed, or as if a lost traveller is told the way, or as if a lamp is lit in a dark place so that those with eyes may see visible objects, even so the Bhagavā has shown the Dhamma to me in various ways. Venerable Sir, I take refuge in the Buddha, I take refuge in the Dhamma, I take refuge in the Sangha! May the Bhagavā regard me as a lay disciple, one who has taken refuge in the Triple Gem, from this day to the end of life.”

Then Pukkusa called a man and said to him: “O man, go and bring me the pair of fine golden-hued pieces of cloth that is specially reserved for ceremonial occasions.” And when the pair of lengths of fine golden-hued cloth were brought, Pukkusa, the Malla prince, offered them to the Buddha, saying: “Venerable Sir, may the Bhagavā, out of compassion for me, accept this pair of fine ceremonial lengths of cloth.”

The Buddha said: “In that case, Pukkasa, present one to me and one to Ānanda.” And so Pukkusa presented one piece to the Buddha, and the other piece to Venerable Ānanda.

(In this connection, one might ask: “Did Venerable Ānanda accept Pukkasa's gift?” And the answer is, Yes. Then the inquirer might point out to the previous agreement by Ānanda not to receive offerings originally made to the Buddha, (agreement to receive only four kinds of gifts and to refuse four kinds of gifts) made by him when he became the personal attendant to the Buddha. The gift was accepted in this case as an exception on these three reasons:

- i) Ānanda had, by this time, fulfilled his task as the Buddha's personal attendant supremely well.
- ii) This fact of his receiving the gift would stop others who might otherwise say that Ānanda had not served the Buddha well. So the Buddha did not favour him with any gift after twenty-five years of personal service.
- iii) Ānanda understood that the Buddha let Pukkusa enjoy the benefit of making the gift to the Sangha, for giving to Ānanda amounted to giving to the Sangha. The Buddha also knew that Ānanda would not use the cloth himself but, instead, would present it to Him.)

Then the Buddha pointed out to Pukkusa, the benefits of the Doctrine, exhorted to him to set himself up in the practice of the Dhamma, and gladdened him in the practice. After thus being pointed out the benefits of the Dhamma, being exhorted to set himself up in the practice of the Dhamma, and being gladdened in the practice, Pukkusa rose from his seat and after making obeisance to the Buddha, departed respectfully.

Not long after Pukkusa was gone, Venerable Ānanda placed neatly the pair of fine golden-hued robes on the body of the Buddha. Once they were placed on the person of the Buddha, the pair of robes appeared to lose their splendour, as against the natural splendour of the Buddha's person. Venerable Ānanda was awestruck. He exclaimed what he saw. Thereupon the Buddha explained to him thus:

“Ānanda, what you say is true. Ānanda, what you say is true. There are two occasions when the natural colour of the Tathāgata's becomes exceedingly clear and His complexion exceedingly bright. These two occasions are:

“The night, Ānanda, when the Tathāgata attains Supreme Perfect Self-Enlightenment, and the night in which He passed away leaving no trace of the five aggregates, and realizes the Ultimate Peace (Anupādisesa Nibbāna).

“Ānanda, these are the two occasions on which the natural colour of the Tathāgata's person becomes exceedingly clear and His complexion exceedingly bright.

“Ānanda, today, in the last watch of the night, in the Sal grove of the Malla princes where the road to Kusināra turns, between the twin Sal trees, the Tathāgata's realization of Parinibbāna will take place.”

Then the Buddha said: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to the Kakudhā river.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” said the Venerable Ānanda in assent.

Then the Buddha proceeded to the Kakudhā river accompanied by a large number of bhikkhus. He entered the river, bathed in it, and drank its water. Back again on the river bank, He went to the mango grove by the river. There, He said to Venerable Cunda (Venerable Ānanda was then at the river bank drying (wringing) the loin cloth in which the Buddha bathed): “Cunda, fold my double-layered robe fourfold and place it on the ground. I am weary. I need to lie down.”

The Venerable Cunda assented respectfully, and placed the folded double-layered robe on the ground and the Buddha lay down on His right side in a noble posture, with His left foot above the right foot, placed slightly beyond it, with mindfulness and clear comprehension, and keeping in mind the time of arising. The Venerable Cunda kept watch there, seated nearby.

The Comparable Merits of The Two Meals explained

When Venerable Ānanda returned to the Buddha, He made the following special remarks about the last meal:

“Ānanda, it may happen that someone may cause unhappiness to Cunda, the goldsmith's son, by saying: ‘Friend Cunda, the Bhagavā passed away after he had eaten his last meal provided by you. How unfortunate, what a loss to you.’

“Should such a thing happen, Cunda should be solaced thus: ‘Honourable Cunda, the Bhagavā passed away after he had eaten his last meal provided by you. How fortunate, what good gain to you. Honourable Cunda these are the words I heard from the mouth of the Bhagavā himself: ‘There are two offerings of food that surpass all other food offerings, in their benefit, and whose merits compare well as between the two of them. The two offerings are: the food offered to the Tathāgata, after eating which the Tathāgata attains Supreme Perfect Self-Enlightenment, and the food offered to the Tathāgata, after eating which the Tathāgata passes away leaving no trace of the five aggregates, and realizes the Ultimate Peace (anupādisesa-nibbāna). These two offerings of food surpass all other food offerings in their benefit, and whose merits compare well as between the two of them.’ These are the words I heard from the mouth of the Bhagavā himself.’ That being so, the Honourable Cunda, the goldsmith's son has in store for him: the merit that will ensure him long life, the merit that will ensure him good looks, the merit that will ensure him well being and happiness, the merit that will ensure him large followership, the merit that leads to the deva-world, and the merit that ensures him pre-eminence. Thus should Cunda the goldsmith's son be solaced.”

Then the Buddha, comprehending the matter, uttered this stanza in exultation on the spur of the moment (udāna gāthā):

In one who gives, merit grows. In one who is self-controlled, enmity cannot gather. One who has Insight Wisdom abandons evil.

One who is endowed with charity, morality, concentration and wisdom, having destroyed attachment, hatred and bewilderment, attains Peace.

(Herein the “equal merit” in Sujāta's milk-rice (at the Bodhi tree) and Cunda's tender pork might be a matter of controversy.)

One might ask: “At the time the Bhagavā ate Sujāta's milk-rice, He had not destroyed attachment, hatred and bewilderment whereas at the time He ate Cunda's food-offering, He was free from attachment, hatred and bewilderment. Thus the offerer's state of purity being not equal, how could merit in the offering be equal?"

The answer is this: the equal factors in both are:

- (a) both the meals lead to Parinibbāna.
- (b) both enable the Buddha to dwell in the attainment of jhāna.
- (c) both led to the same mode of contemplation, by the two donors.

Now to expand this:

- (a) After eating Sujāta's milk-rice, the Buddha extinguished the defilements and attained Buddhahood which is the "parinibbāna of kilesas," realization of Nibbāna with the five aggregates remaining.

After eating Cunda's tender pork, the Buddha extinguished the re-arising of the five aggregates, which is the "parinibbāna of khandha," realization of Nibbāna with no aggregates remaining. Thanks to Sujāta's milk-rice, there arose in the Buddha's physical system superior corporeality (pañña-rūpaṃ). This gave strength to the mental system so that the Dhamma body, comprising the arising of Insight, the arising of magga, and the arising of phala, was able to destroy the defilements without difficulty, thus leading to kilesa-parinibbāna.

Cunda's food-offering, likewise provided proper sustenance to the Buddha and enabled Him to renounce the five aggregates without difficulty, thus leading to khandha-parinibbāna.

- (b) On the day of Enlightenment, the Buddha, after eating the milk-rice offered by Sujāta, had the strength to dwell in the attainment of concentration comprising 2.4 million crores of absorptions (devasikavaḷaṅjana-samāpatti) which was to become His daily routine. After eating Cunda's food offering, the Buddha was (in spite of His severe dysentery) also able to keep up the daily routine of dwelling in the attainment of concentration comprising 2.4 million crores of absorptions.
- (c) Sujāta offered her milk-rice to the Buddha-to-be thinking him to be the guardian spirit of the great banyan tree (later to be called Mahābodhi tree). But when she knew that it was the Buddha whom she made her offering and that He attained Buddhahood after having her meal of milk-rice and that the Buddha got sustenance for forty-nine days from her food-offering, she was intensely happy. "What a great fortune for me, what a great gain to me!" She contemplated repeatedly, thus increasing her meritorious thoughts of delightful satisfaction and joy. Similarly, when Cunda learnt that his food-offering was the Buddha's last meal, after which, He realized the Ultimate Peace after passing away, leaving no remaining aggregates, he was overjoyed. "What a great fortune for me, what a great gain to me!" he contemplated repeatedly, thus increasing his meritorious thoughts of delightful satisfaction and joy.

On The Daily Routine of The Buddha in dwelling in The 2.4 million crores of Sustained Absorptions

As discussed in Saṃyutta Tika, Volume I (Sagāthā Vagga Saṃyutta Tika; Brahmā Saṃyutta, 2: Dutiya Vagga, 5. Parinibbāna Sutta, pp 251-252)

According to some teachers (Keci vāda):

The Buddha, as of daily routine, dwelled in the absorptions of Great Compassion numbering 12 million crores of times, and the Arahatta-phala Absorptions numbering the same; thus dwelled in a total of 2.4 million crores known as Deva-sikavaḷaṅjana samāpatti.

(Another explanation:) With the Buddhas, the return to life-continuum thought-moment (bhavaṅga-citta) is very swift. Entering into and dwelling in a certain type of absorption as from one to another is an accomplished feat. To enter into absorption and to emerge from absorption, the Buddha needs just two or three thought-moments. That being so, it is routine for the Buddha to dwell in: 5 types of fine-material absorptions, 4 types of non-material absorptions, appamaññā-samāpatti, nirodha-samāpatti and arahatta-phala- samāpatti, thus making a daily total of twelve types of samāpatti. One hundred thousand crores of times for each of these twelve samāpattis were entered into every morning, and the same number of absorptions repeated every afternoon, thus a daily routine of 2.4 million crores of absorptions took place every day. (This is according to some teachers).

According to other teachers (Apāre vāda):

It was customary for the Buddha to dwell in the Absorption of Cessation (Nirodha samāpatti) every day. Entering into the Absorption of Cessation is to be preceded by insight meditation. With the Buddhas, the subject of contemplation to develop insight-meditation leading to the Absorption of Cessation is Paṭiccasamuppāda (Refer to Chapter 16 on Mahāvajira Vipassanā). This meditation procedure involves contemplating the twelve factors of Paṭiccasamuppāda in the forward order beginning from avijjā (ignorance), each for a hundred thousand crores of times. Thus 1.2 million crores of times are devoted to the twelve factors of Dependent Origination or Paṭiccasamuppāda. Then contemplating the same twelve factors in the reverse order involves another 1.2 million crores of times. The entering into the Absorption of Cessation, with Paṭiccasamuppāda as the subject of contemplation, is therefore 1.2 million crores of times each for the forward and the reverse order of Dependent Origination, thereby taking up 2.4 million crores of times. (This is what other teachers say.)

Since the 2.4 million crores of times are devoted daily to the absorptions by the Buddha, what significance is there about these absorptions on the day of Enlightenment and on the day of passing away? The significance, as pointed out in the sub-Commentary on Matravagga, Dīgha Nikāya, is that on these particular days the absorptions are built up on a more rigorous, mental discipline that requires contemplating seven aspects of physical phenomena (rūpa-sattaka) and seven aspects of mental phenomena (nāma-sattaka) in the preliminary insight-meditation.

Kusināgara As Buddha's Last Repose

Then the Buddha said to Venerable Ānanda: “Come, Ānanda, let us go to the sal grove of the Malla princes where the road bends to Kusināgara town, on yonder bank of the Hiraññavati river.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” Ānanda assented, Then the Buddha, accompanied by a large body of bhikkhus, reached (at last) the sal grove of the Malla princes where the road bends to Kusināgara town on the further bank of the Hiraññavati river. There, He said to the Ānanda: “Ānanda, lay the couch with its head to the north between the twin sal trees. Ānanda, I am weary, and wish to lie down.”

“Very well, Venerable Sir,” assented Ānanda, and laid the couch with its head to the north between the twin sal trees, And the Buddha lay down on His right side in a noble posture, with His left foot above the right foot, placed slightly beyond it, with mindfulness and clear comprehension. (Some noteworthy points may be presented at this point.)

On this journey from Pāvā to Kusināgara, a very large body of bhikkhu-disciples, almost beyond count, had gathered around the Buddha because from the time the news of His imminent passing away had gone out of the small village of Veḷuva, all bhikkhus living at various places, who had come to the Buddha, did not disperse.

The Twin Sal Trees

In the Sal grove of the Malla princes where the couch for the Buddha was laid, there were two fine rows of sal trees at the north (where the head of the couch was placed) and at the south. Amidst these two rows, there were a pair of sal trees at the opposite ends of the couch whose roots, branches and foliage were intertwined so that they were referred to as twin sal trees. There was a couch used by the Malla princes in the sal grove and it was the couch that the Buddha commanded Ānanda to be laid for him, and which was duly complied with.

The Buddha's Exhaustion

“Ānanda, I am weary, and wish to lie down.” The significance of these words may be considered in the light of the Buddha's natural physical might, which was equal to the strength of a thousand crore of ordinary elephants, equivalent to that of ten Chaddanta white elephants, or that of ten thousand crores of average men. All that marvellous might drained down with the dysentery, like the water poured down into a funnel filter, after the Buddha had eaten Cunda's food. The distance from Pāvā to Kusināgara was a mere three gāvuta (three quarters of a yojana, a yojana variously taken as seven and half to twelve and half miles), yet the Buddha had to make twenty-five pauses on His journey. At the end of the last leg of His journey, on entering the Sal grove at sunset, He was overwhelmed by the ailments. Hence, His admission of uneasiness and need to lie down, was an ominous signal to the world that He was as good as dead.

The Buddha's Choice of Kusināgara as His last repose

Here one might be tempted to ask: “Why did the Buddha take as much trouble to get to Kusināgara? Were not other places fit to be His last repose?” The answer is, there was no place which was actually unfit for that great occasion. But there were three reasons for the Buddha in choosing this insignificant town of Kusināgara as the place of His last repose. He saw the following three eventualities and considered:

- i) “If I were to pass away at any place other than Kusināgara, there would be no occasion to discourse on the Mahāsudassana Sutta. This long discourse which took two sessions of recitals at the Council and which revealed that even as of a human being as, when the Buddha, was a Buddha-to-be, one could enjoy divine (celestial) glory on earth, would find a fitting setting only at Kusināgara. The discourse would kindle the interest of the hearers to do good deeds.
- ii) “If I were to pass away at some place other than Kusināgara, Subhadda, the wandering ascetic, would get no opportunity of meeting Me. In which case it would be utter loss for him. For he was fit to be enlightened only by a Buddha and not by a Buddha's disciple. That ascetic Subhadda would be there at Kusināgara, he would be putting (intelligent) questions to Me, and at the end of My answers to his questions, he would embrace the Doctrine, learn the method of practice for developing Insight, and would become the last arahat during My lifetime.
- iii) If I were to pass away elsewhere, there would be bloodshed over the scramble for the relics of the Tathāgata. In Kusināgara, Brahmin Dona would be able to prevent such a catastrophe and the distribution of the relics would be effected peacefully.”

These were the three reasons why the Buddha took so much trouble to get to Kusināgara.

The Sal Trees and Celestial Beings honoured The Buddha

As the Buddha lay there on the couch, the twin Sal trees burst forth into full bloom, though it was not the flowering season, and in adoration of the Buddha, rained blossoms, continuously scattering them over His body.

Also, celestial mandāvara flowers fell from the sky, continuously scattering themselves over the body of the Buddha, signifying the adoration of the Buddha by the celestial beings.

Also, celestial sandalwood powder fell from the sky, continuously scattering themselves over the body of the Buddha, signifying the adoration of the Buddha by the celestial beings.

And, celestial music wafted in the sky, celestial melodies resounded in the air above, in adoration of the Buddha.

The Best Way of honouring The Buddha

Then the Buddha said to the Venerable Ānanda:

“Ānanda, the twin Sal trees burst forth into full bloom though it was not the flowering season, and in adoration of the Tathāgata, rain blossoms, continuously scattering them over the body of the Tathāgata.

“Also, celestial mandāvara flowers fall from the sky, continuously scattering themselves over the body of the Tathāgata, signifying the adoration of the Tathāgata by the celestial beings.

“Also, celestial sandalwood powder fall from the sky, continuously scattering themselves over the body of the Tathāgata, signifying the adoration of the Tathāgata by the celestial beings.

“And, celestial music wafts in the sky, celestial melodies resound in the air above, in adoration of the Tathāgata.

“Ānanda, all these forms of adoration cannot be called sufficient acts of honour, esteem, reverence, adoration or worship of the Tathāgata. Ānanda, the bhikkhu or bhikkhuni, or the male lay disciple, or the female lay disciple, who practices according to the Doctrine leading to the Supramundane, who conducts himself correctly in the practice, and who leads a righteous life, by such follower of the Tathāgata, only is the Tathāgata best honoured, esteemed, revered, adored, and worshipped.

“Accordingly, Ānanda, train yourselves diligently with a firm resolve to practice according to the Doctrine leading to the Supramundane; conduct yourselves correctly in the practice, and lead a righteous life.”

(Herein, the Sal trees raining down their blossoms should be understood as acts of adoration by the guardian spirits of those trees by shaking the branches.

“Mandāra flowers bloom in the Nandā Lake (in the Tāvatiṃsa Deva realm).” The leaf of the plant is about the size of an umbrella, and the pollen collects in each flower is as much as a basketful. Not only mandāra flowers, but also other celestial flowers, such as the Coral flower and other celestial flowers, were strewn down by the devas who dwell around the regions at the walls of the Cakkavāḷa, Tāvatiṃsa Deva realm and Brahmā Loka so that there was a continuous sprinkling of celestial flowers.

Likewise, “celestial sandalwood” here should be understood to represent various other kinds of scented wood not only from deva realm but from realms of nāgas, garudas, and other foreign lands of the human world, as well as all kinds of exotic natural scents in various forms, such as gold dust, silver powders, minerals, rocks, etc. In short, all the sentient worlds, celestial as well as terrestrial, were joined in sprinkling scented dust of all descriptions continuously onto the reclining Buddha at Kusināgara.

“Celestial music” also represents a universal symphony played by musicians of all the sentient worlds extending to ten-thousand world-systems, including devas, nāgas, garudas and human beings, that sounded in the sky of the world-system.

The Celestial Garland of exceedingly Large Size

“Celestial melodies resounded in the air above”: Behind the statement lies a touching story. It concerns Varuṇa and Vāraṇa devas who have exceedingly long life spans. These devas, on learning that the deva who was the Buddha-to-be was going to be reborn in the human world, started making a garland for presentation to the Buddha-to-be on the day of His conception. Before they had finished making the garland they heard the news that the Buddha-to-be was conceived in the human mother's womb. So when other devas asked them for whom the garland was being made, they said: “Our garland is not finished yet, so it has to be present to the Bodhisatta on the day he is born.”

Again, when they learnt that the Bodhisatta was already born, the garland-making devas said: “Well, we will present it to the Bodhisatta on the day of his Renunciation.” When, after twenty-nine years of life in the human world, the Buddha-to-be renounced the world, the garland-makers heard the news and said: “We will present it to the Buddha on His day of Enlightenment.” Then after six years of the Bodhisatta's great Endeavour and the news of his Enlightenment reached the garland-making devas, they said: “We will present it to the Bhagavā on the day of the first sermon.” After forty-nine days satta sattāha (seven various dwellings in absorption at seven different places) of samāpatti, when the first sermon was delivered at the Migadāvana forest, the garland-making devas said: "Well, we will present it to the Bhagavā on the day the Bhagavā displays the Twin Miracle." When the news that the Twin miracle had taken place reached the garland-makers, they thought of offering the garland when (after three months) the Buddha had descended from the Tāvatiṃsa Deva realm. And when the news of the Buddha's descent from the Tāvatiṃsa realm was received also, they thought of offering the garland on the day the Buddha relinquished His life-maintaining thought-process. But by that day the garland was still not finished, and so they said: "The garland is still not finished; we will honour the Bhagavā with it on the day of His passing away."

Now that the latest news of the Buddha lying on His deathbed reached the garland-makers and that at the third watch of that very night the Buddha would be passing away, the Varuṇa devas and Vāraṇa devas exclaimed, quite bewildered: "How is that? Just today the Bodhisatta is known to be conceived in his mother's womb; just today he is born; just today he has renounced earth and home; just today the Bhagavā has attained Enlightenment; just today He has delivered His first sermon; just today He has displayed the Twin Miracle; just today He has descended from the Tāvatiṃsa Deva realm; just today He has relinquished the life-maintaining thought-process, and just today He is about to pass away! Should He not have tarried till breakfast time the next day? It is just too soon, too early, for such a great personage who has fulfilled the Ten Perfections supremely and has attained Buddhahood to pass away now."

Thus murmuring mournfully, the Varuṇa devas and the Vāraṇa devas came before the Buddha bringing with them the great garland, still unfinished, together with more flowers to go into its making. But they could not find any place in this world-system amidst the celestial crowds who had already gathered so that they were obliged to recede to the edge of the world-system, and had to keep the great garland hanging in the air above. Then those devas ran about the rim of the world-system holding on another's hands or embracing one another, all the while contemplating the noble attributes of the Triple Gem, and singing devotional songs on the thirty-two marks of the great man, the six-hued aura of the Buddha, the Ten Perfections, the five-hundred-and-fifty existences of the Bodhisatta, and the Fourteen Knowledges of the Buddha; and singing the refrain at the end of each song, "O, the Bhagavā with such great following and fame! O, the Bhagavā with such great following and fame!" All these beautiful melodies were coming from these great devas so that celestial music resounded in the air above.)

Even while the Buddha was lying there, on the couch, He saw the great gathering of devas and Brahmās which filled the entire world-system, from the earth's surface to the brim of this world-system and from its brim to the Brahmā-world. On seeing the zeal with which they were honouring the Buddha, the Buddha said the above words to the Venerable Ānanda. After mentioning the marvellous modes of worshipping the Buddha by the celestial beings (of the ten thousand world-systems), the Buddha pointed out that the material offerings (āmiṣa-pūjā) were not sufficient in themselves as the best way of doing honour to the Buddha, but that only following and practising the Doctrine is the best honour done to the Buddha. In saying these words, the Buddha also implied 'that since the very beginning when, having been endowed with the eight factors required of a full-fledged Bodhisatta (as Recluse Sumedhā), He had aspired to Buddhahood at the feet of Buddha Dīpaṅkarā, lying face downward in the marsh, offering himself to be used by the Buddha and his company of four hundred thousand arahats, all His fulfilling of the Perfections over four asaṅkhyeyyas and a hundred-thousand kappas, were not for the purpose of being honoured by the celestial world with these flowers, perfumes and music, but was solely for the purpose of being honoured by His disciples following His Teaching, which is the best way of doing honour to Him.'

(Herein, it might be asked: "It is usual for the Bhagavā to extol offering of as insignificant an object as a sesame flower, unless the offering is made with a consciousness of the Buddha's attributes, then the benefit accruing from the offering would be infinite. Yet in this case (of the Varuṇa devas and Vāraṇa devas) why did the Bhagavā not welcome their offering (of the great garland)?"

The answer is that the Buddha had in mind the true interest of the vast multitudes, and also the perpetuation of the Teaching. Here is the explanation: The Doctrine lays down the three-fold training of sīla, samādhi, paññā. If offering of material things were allowed too freely, then, in future, the disciples of the Buddha might neglect the practice of samādhi and paññā, they would neglect the practice of Insight meditation; the bhikkhu-disciples would preach the merits of offerings of flowers and fragrant things and offering other material things only. Offering of material things cannot maintain the Teaching consisting essentially of the threefold Training even for one breakfast period. Indeed, thousands of splendid monasteries or thousands of splendid stupas cannot maintain the Teaching. These material donations merely lead only to mundane welfare.

It is the right practice of the Dhamma only, that truly counts as honouring the Buddha. Indeed it is so. The Buddha desires for honouring Him by practising the Dhamma (dhamma-pūjā). For, by right practice alone can the Teaching be perpetuated. That was the reason why the Buddha extolled the practice of the Dhamma. (This is not the negation of the merit of material offerings.)

The Practice Conducive to The Attainment of The Supramundane

The practice leading to the four maggas, four phalas and Nibbāna, the nine supramundane Dhamma, is the highest mode of honouring the Buddha. This practice, in accordance with Dhamma (Dhammānu dhamma paṭipatta), begins with getting established in the Triple Gem and culminates in the highest development that marks the change of the worldling into the lineage of the ariyas. Gotrabhū, the state of mental maturity, which is, so to speak, the threshold of magga-ñāṇa.

A bhikkhu, who indulges in the six kinds of disrespect (agāraṇa), disobeys the rules of bhikkhu conduct, and lives an improper life using the four requisites, which are acquired unlawfully and not according to the rules of Vinaya, is one who does not practice in accordance with the Dhamma. The bhikkhu, who meticulously obeys every rule prescribed as bhikkhu conduct, is one who practises in accordance with the Dhamma. These observations apply equally to bhikkhunīs.

As for lay disciples, he who is in the habit of breaking the Five Precepts, (such as killing, etc.), which is also known as ‘the five veras’ because non-observance of these precepts are inimical to one’s own true interest; and who indulges in the ten courses of evil action, is called one who does not practise according to the Dhamma. The lay disciple, who is well established in the Triple Gem, who observes the Five Precepts, the Ten Precepts, who keeps fasting-day precepts on four fasting days and the four days prior to them, who is in the habit of giving charity, offerings of fragrant flowers to the Triple Gem, looking after his parents and ministers to the needs of men of virtue, is called a lay disciple who practises in accordance with the Dhamma. These observations apply equally to female lay disciples.

Honouring the Buddha by honouring the Dhamma (Dhammānu dhamma paṭipatta) is also called nirāmisā-pūjā. This kind of doing honour to the Buddha alone contributes to the perpetuation of the Teaching. So long as the four categories of the Buddha’s disciples, i.e. bhikkhus, bhikkhunīs, lay male-disciples and lay female-disciples, are doing honour in this way the Teaching will shine forth like the full moon in the clear sky.)

Venerable Upavāṇa

At that time, the Venerable Upavāṇa was standing in front of the Buddha, fanning Him. Then the Buddha said to Upavāṇa: “Move away, bhikkhu, do not stand in front of me.” The Venerable Upavāṇa obeyed without delay, dropped the palm-leaf fan there, and stood at a suitable place.

Thereupon it occurred to Venerable Ānanda thus: “This Venerable Upavāṇa had for a long time (during the first twenty years of the Bhagava’s Buddhahood) been a close attendant to the Bhagavā, and yet at this period of His passing away the Bhagavā caused him to move aside, saying: ‘Move away bhikkhu, do not stand in front of me.’ What might be the reason for the Bhagavā in doing so?” Therefore he asked the Buddha:

“Venerable Sir, Venerable Upavāṇa had for a long time been a close attendant on the Bhagavā, and yet at this period of the Bhagava's passing away, the Bhagavā caused him to move aside with the words: ‘Move away bhikkhu, do not stand in front of me.’ What is the reason for the Bhagavā in doing so?”

Then the Buddha, wishing to clear away from Ānanda's mind any idea of Venerable Upavāṇa being at fault and to make it clear that the Venerable Upavāṇa was not at fault, explained to him thus:

- (a) “Ānanda, (with the exception of the Asaññasatta Brahmās and Brahmās of the Non-Material Sphere) most of the devas and Brahmās of ten world-systems are gathered here at Kusināgara to see the Tathāgata. There is not, within twelve yojanas in and around this Sal grove, a single space about the breadth of a tail hair (of a mountain goat) that remains unoccupied by powerful deva.
- (b) “Ānanda, the devas are murmuring against Upavāṇa thus: ‘We have come from afar to see the Tathāgata. It is only rarely that the Homage-worthy, Perfectly Self-Enlightened Buddhas arise in the world. And tonight, in the third watch of the night, the Tathāgata is due to pass away. This powerful bhikkhu standing in front of the Bhagavā is obstructing our view. Alas! we are going to miss the chance of seeing the Tathāgata at his last hour.’ This is the reason why I had asked Bhikkhu Upavāṇa to step aside.”

(A note of explanation:-

- (a) Within the space close to the Buddha, devas and Brahmās in their subtle corporeality in groups of ten each, occupied units of space which were a tail hair in breadth. Beyond those groups of devas are Brahmās, there were groups of devas and Brahmās in groups of twenty, each occupying space of the same breadth. And beyond those groups were similar arrangement of space occupancy with groups of thirty, forty, fifty and sixty devas and Brahmās. Even though tightly spaced, there was no deva or Brahmā who got in the way of another either bodily or in their costumes; no one needed to ask another to clear the way for him or for her.
- (b) Upavāṇa was a person of extra large size, about the size of an elephant calf. Moreover, he was wearing dust-rag robes (paṇṣakū), which added to his bulk. So he was making an obstruction by standing himself in front of the Buddha, a genuine cause of complaint on the part of the devas and Brahmās. It might be asked: “Did not the devas and Brahmās have power to see through the bhikkhu?” The answer is: “No, they did not have.” For although devas and Brahmās can see through a worldlying, they cannot see through an arahat. The Venerable Upavāṇa was not only an arahat but a person of unique powers so that people could not come too close to him.

The cause and condition for the extraordinary powers of the Venerable Upavāṇa even amongst the arahats was that he had been a guardian spirit at the shrine set up in honour of Buddha Kassapa.)

The Guardian Spirit of the Shrine

Ninety-one aeons or kappas before the advent of Buddha Gotama, Buddha Vipassī passed away leaving behind a single relic, a mass of golden hue. (It is customary for the Buddhas, who appear during the human life span of thousands of years, to leave behind a single piece of relic at their passing away, which is enshrined by the people.) The people of those times built a shrine to house the relic. The shrine was of a yojana high, with golden coloured bricks measuring one cubit by half cubit, two fingers' breadth thick. For cement they used crystal stone powder (used for eye lotion) mixed in sesame oil.

In the construction of the shrine, the devas belonging to terrestrial abodes raised a further yojana above the shrine built by human beings, which was further raised by another yojana by the devas of celestial abodes. Above that height, the Unhavalāhaka devas, the Ābbhavalāhaka devas, the devas of Catumahārāja realm and the devas of Tāvātimsa realm added a yojana respectively to the structure so that altogether the shrine, in commemoration of Buddha Vipassī, that encased a single piece of the Buddha-relic was seven yojanas in height.

When people came to that shrine to make offerings of flowers and other things, the guardian spirit of the shrine took over the offerings and placed them suitably before the shrine even in the presence of the donors.

At that time, in his previous existence, bhikkhu-elder Upavāṇa was born as a wealthy brahmin. He went to the shrine to make an offering of golden-hued piece of cloth, as a token of a robe for the Buddha. The guardian spirit placed the cloth beautifully at the shrine which pleased the brahmin donor greatly and who uttered his wish that in future he be reborn as a guardian spirit to a Buddha-shrine of this kind. At his death, he was reborn in the deva realm.

During the time the future Upavāṇa was being reborn, in turns, in the deva-loka and the human world, Buddha Kassapa had appeared in the world. When Buddha Kassapa passed away, the prevailing human life span being immense (twenty-thousand years), only a single piece of Buddha-relic remained. This relic was treasured in a shrine of one yojana in diameter and in height. The future Upavāṇa, at that time, became the guardian spirit of the shrine. After passing away from that life, he was born in the deva realm again. At the time of Buddha Gotama, he was reborn in a noble family. He renounced householder's life, leaving behind his wife and children, and became an arahat.

Thus, the cause and condition for Upavāṇa's extraordinary powers even among arahats, was that he had been a guardian spirit at the shrine erected in commemoration of Buddha Kassapa.

After the Buddha had thus explained to the Venerable Ānanda that Venerable Upavāṇa was told to move aside in the crowd not because he was at fault but only to satisfy the devas, the Venerable Ānanda said to the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, what is the Bhagava's assessment of the state of mind that is present in the devas and Brahmās?" (By this, the Venerable Ānanda was enquiring how far the devas and Brahmās were able to bear the grief at the impending Buddha's decease.) The Buddha told Ānanda that the devas and Brahmās were in a state of despondency thus:

"Ānanda, the devas, who choose to remain in the air and are standing there (as if there was firm ground to stand on, having transformed the sky into firm ground by their divine power), are wailing with dishevelled hair, their arms upraised; they fling themselves down, rolling (on the fancied ground) in all directions, all the while lamenting: 'All too soon is the Bhagavā going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Well-Spoken One going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Possessor of the Eye of Wisdom going to vanish from the world!'"

"Ānanda, the devas, who choose to remain on the earth and are standing on the ground (transforming the natural earth into supportable ground for their bodies of subtle corporeality), are wailing with dishevelled hair, their arms upraised, they fling themselves down, rolling in all directions, all the while lamenting: 'All too soon is the Bhagavā going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Well-Spoken one going to realize Parinibbāna! All too soon is the Possessor of the Eye of Wisdom going to vanish from the world!'"

"But those devas, who are free from sensual attachment, can bear it with fortitude in the keen contemplation 'that all conditioned things are impermanent by nature. And hence, how would it be possible to find any permanence in this conditioned nature?'"

(The devas' bodies are composed of subtle corporeality. The texture of the natural earth cannot support them; if they were to stand on it, their bodies would seep into the earth like a lump of butter. On a certain occasion, a Brahmā named Hatthaka went to the Buddha and as he tried to stand there, his body seeped into the earth. The Buddha had to remind him to transform his body into a gross kind of corporeality so as to be able to remain solid on the ground. The same situation holds true with devas. That was why the devas, in this context, needed to transform the natural earth to suit their subtle corporeality so that it became possible for them to roll on it.)

Four Places that inspire Emotional Religious Awakening

Then the Venerable Ānanda said to the Buddha: “Venerable Sir, it was customary for bhikkhus who had ended the rains-retreat period in various parts of the land to pay homage to the Bhagavā. We used to have the privilege of meeting and honouring these bhikkhus whose presence inspired us. But, Venerable Sir, now that the Bhagavā would be no more, we shall not get the privilege of meeting these inspiring bhikkhus.”

In the days of the Buddha, bhikkhus went to see the Buddha twice a year, before the rains-retreat period began and at the end of the rains-retreat period. They went to the Buddha before going into rains-retreat to learn the meditation method, and at the end of the rains-retreat period to report to the Buddha their attainments such as magga-phala. In Sri Laṅkā also, as in the days of the Buddha, bhikkhus used to assemble twice each year, before and after the rains-retreat period. Bhikkhus, on the shore on the Mahāgāma side, assembled at the Tissa monastery, which was donated by King Kākavaṇṇatissa while those on yonder shore assembled at Lohapāsāda Pinnacled Hall. Of those two groups, bhikkhus on the yonder shore, at the beginning of the rains-retreat period assembled at the Great Monastery (Mahāvihāra), bringing with them brooms and garbage-collecting baskets, where they carried out maintenance works to the Mahācetiya (the Great Shrine) such as, mending the masonry work, white-washing, etc. Before they dispersed to the various places of their choice to pass the rains-retreat period, after having finished their cleaning up operations, they agreed to meet at the end of the rains-retreat period at the Lohapāsāda Pinnacled Hall. At the end of the rains-retreat period, they assembled again at the Lohapāsāda Pinnacled Hall where the Five Collections (Nikāya) of the Buddha's teachings were taught by the bhikkhu-elders and recited by the students. Some bhikkhus attended the Pāli text sessions while others attended the Aṭṭhakathā sessions. Whenever the texts or the Aṭṭhakathā were wrongly recited, the teachers would ask the student where (under which teacher) he had learned it, and correct it. The same functions also took place, by bhikkhus on the shore on the Mahāgāma side, at the Tissa monastery.

Here the Venerable Ānanda was referring to these biannual functions that were customary during the Buddha's times.

Venerable Ānanda was careful in the observance of religious and social duties towards fellow-bhikkhus. Whenever he saw a bhikkhu-elder arrived, he would rise from his seat to welcome him. He would relieve the guest of the umbrella, alms-bowl and great robe and offer a seat to the senior bhikkhu. He would then sit down, make obeisance to the bhikkhu-elder. And, finding a suitable lodging place for the visitor, he would clean it for occupation. Whenever he saw a bhikkhu of senior standing arrived also, he would welcome him, asked about his needs and render every possible help to him. This was because Ānanda was always desirous of being a useful, helpful and respectful bhikkhu to every other bhikkhu. This was his usual way, and hence he expressed his concern about the matter in the above words.

The Buddha knew how Ānanda was feeling: “Ānanda is concerned about losing the usual privilege of seeing and knowing bhikkhus who are inspiring. Now I shall point out to him those places where he can see such bhikkhus easily by just staying there himself.” And He said to him:

“Ānanda, there are four places which are worthy of pilgrimage for persons with devotion to the Triple Gem which will inspire in them an emotional religious awakening. These are:

- i) Ānanda, the Lumbinī Sai grove is one such place. A person of devotion, visiting there, reflects: ‘This is the place where the Tathāgata was born,’ and this reflection will inspire in him an emotional religious awakening; hence it is a place worthy of pilgrimage.
- ii) Ānanda, the Mahābodhi, the Great Tree of Enlightenment, is another such place. A person of devotion, visiting there reflects: ‘This is the place where the Tathāgata attained Supremely Perfect-Enlightenment,’ and this reflection will inspire in him, an emotional religious awakening; hence it is a place worthy of pilgrimage.

- iii) Ānanda, the Migadāvana forest is another such place. A person of devotion, visiting there, reflects: ‘This is the place where the Tathāgata set the Supreme Wheel of Truth turning,’ and this reflection will inspire in him an emotional religious awakening; hence it is a place worthy of pilgrimage.
- iv) Ānanda, Kusināgara is another such place. A person of devotion, visiting there, reflects: ‘This is the place where the Tathāgata realized Parinibbāna (the Ultimate Peace), having passed away without leaving any traces of the five aggregates,’ and this reflection will inspire in him an emotional religious awakening; hence it is a place worthy of pilgrimage.

“Ānanda, these are four places which are worthy of pilgrimage for person with devotion to the Triple Gem which will inspire in them an emotional religious awakening.

“And, Ānanda, there will come to these four places bhikkhus, bhikkhunis, male lay disciples and female lay disciples who are devoted to the Triple Gem, reflecting: ‘(i) this (sacred place of) Lumbinī is the place where the Tathāgata was born; (ii) this (sacred place of) Mahābodhi is the place where the Tathāgata attained Supremely Perfect Enlightenment; (iii) this (sacred place of) Migadāvana is the place where the Tathāgata set the Supreme Wheel of Truth turning; and (iv) this (sacred place of) Kusināgara is the place where the Tathāgata realized Parinibbāna (the Ultimate Peace), having passed away without leaving any trace of the five aggregates.’ Ānanda, all those pilgrims, if they should die with devotion in their hearts while on pilgrimage to these four sacred places or shrines will, after their death and dissolution of the body, be bound for the fortunate destination. They will be reborn in the deva realm.”

The Venerable Ānanda's Questions

Then the Venerable Ānanda put a series of questions to which the Buddha answered in detail.

Ānanda: “Venerable Sir, how should we conduct ourselves with regard to women?”

Buddha: “Not seeing them, Ānanda.”

(Hence the best way, the Buddha says, is not to see any woman. That indeed is so. For if a bhikkhu stays with closed doors and windows inside the monastery, and if a woman were to appear at the door, there is no idea in him of attachment to the woman so long as he does not see her. But when he sees her, some thought of desire comes into his mind, the mind is agitated. That is why the Buddha says it is best for a bhikkhu not to see a woman.)

Ānanda: “Venerable Sir, if we should (unavoidably) see them, what should we do?”

Buddha: “Do not speak to them, Ānanda.”

(On going for alms-collection in the mornings, women devotees usually come to offer alms-food. They will have to be seen by bhikkhus. In such a case, the Buddha says: “Consider the woman as if she were a fierce man with a sharp knife in his hand, who says to you: ‘If you dare speak to me, I will cut off your head’ or as an ogre who says to you: ‘If you speak to me, I will devour you.’ Consider that if you were to speak to the fierce man or to the ogre your life is at stake for the present life only, whereas, if you were to speak to the woman whom you are obliged to see, you are liable to fall to the four miserable states. If a bhikkhu were to enter into conversation with a woman, there occurs familiarity. When there is familiarity, attachment arises. When the bhikkhu's mind becomes attached to a woman, his morality is spoilt and it leads him to the four miserable states. That is why the Buddha says, “Do not speak to them.”)

Ānanda: “Venerable Sir, if we have occasion to speak to them what should we do?”
